

✓ 43026

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

<http://archive.org/details/nation127julnewy>

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43026

==

VOLUME CXXVII

JULY 4, 1928, TO DECEMBER 26, 1928

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXVII

JULY 4, 1928, TO DECEMBER 26, 1928

(Nos. 3287-3312)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
I International Relations, Documents
IP International Relations, Foreign Press
IS International Relations, Signed Articles
M Music
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

- Abbott, Edith D.
Ocean liners' limits; C..... 158
- Abele, Trescott T.
Science and religion; C..... 546
- Academic freedom
Ohio university discharges professor of journalism at behest of business interests; EP..... 28
Right of college professors to express political preferences in public; EP..... 562
- Accidents
Accident industry; Isidor Wasservogel reports on legal aspects; EP..... 412
Drunken car drivers. C. J. Buffum; C.. 64
Subway wreck in New York followed by game of legal hide-and-seek; EP..... 238
- Achmed Zogu Bey. See Zogu, Achmed
- Adler, Lawrence
Strauss in Philadelphia and New York; M 640
- Adler & Sons strike. See Strikes—United States
- Aeronautics
Airplane-railway service between New York and San Francisco; EP..... 257
Arctic heroes—and others; E..... 77
Graf Zeppelin in New York; EP..... 411
Twenty-five years of flight; E..... 674
- Africa
Central; Labor in the Congo. R. L. Buell; IS..... 24
Stratman-Thomas's expedition to conquer sleeping sickness; EP..... 387
- Agriculture, climate and flood control. M. Coleman; S..... 61
- Aiken, J. N.
Either way, the South wins; S..... 244
- Alabama
Abolition of convict-lease system; E..... 54
- Alba Julia. See Rumania—A call to Rumanians
- Albania
Achmed Zogu Bey willing to become king; EP..... 238
King versus mpret; EP..... 332
- Alexander, Ruth
Color line in South Africa; IS..... 530
- "Alice in Wonderland"
Sale of MS; EP..... 413
- Allen A. hosiery company strike. See Strikes—United States
- Aloha, beautiful bark; E..... 5
- Alsace. See France—Alsatian problem
- Alsberg, Henry G.
The new Liberia; C..... 295
- Amalgamated clothing workers
Efforts at solving unemployment problem; EP..... 166
- "Ambulance chasing." See Accidents—Accident industry
- American civil liberties union
Intercedes in behalf of wronged left-wing miners in Pittsburgh; EP..... 282
Reimbursing bondsmen. R. N. Baldwin; C 520
- American federation of labor
Dull and unimportant convention at New Orleans; EP..... 561
Executive council condemns Brookwood labor college; EP..... 508
Hostile to John Dewey; EP..... 645
Labor strategy; E..... 259
Respectable A. F. of L. C. Haessler; S. 654
What Brookwood means; E..... 241
- American justice. See Censorship—Boston protects itself
- American legion
Hounds C. A. Sorensen, opponent of war hysteria in Nebraska; EP..... 281
- American newspaper publishers' association. See Newspapers
- American-Russian chamber of commerce. See Good-will missions
- American Weekly. See Newspapers
- Americana. J. P. McEvoy; D..... 528
- Americanists. See Anthropology—An American résumé
- Americans we like
Cook, Waldo L. E. McCausland; S..... 11
Finger, Charles J.—literary adventurer. C. M. Wilson; S..... 219
Hunt, George Wiley Paul. M. Austin.... 572
- Amvorg trading company
Signs contract with General electric company for sale and export of equipment; EP..... 439
- Anderson, Maxwell, and Harold Hickerson Gods of the lightning. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 528
- Anderson, Paul Y.
What next in Washington?; S..... 540
- Anglo-French naval accord. See Peace—Navies and peace
- Animal Crackers; D..... 502
- "Anschluss." See Austria—Austro-German union
- Antarctic exploration
"Race to the South pole." E. Hanson; S. 418
- Anthony, Susan B. See Kirchwey, Freda—The good fanatic
- Anthropology
American résumé, an; E..... 311
Bering sea islands; appraisal of prehistoric mummies discovered by Stoll-McCracken expedition; EP..... 75
- Archer, Daniel
G. B. S. on America; C..... 135
- Architecture
A censor for building; E..... 195
- Arctic exploration
Arctic tragedies. McClusky, J.; S..... 59
Polaris, the; camping on an ice floe; E.. 6
- Arctic tragedies
George Washington De Long. J. McClusky; S..... 59
- Argentina
Inauguration of Hipolito Irigoyen as president; EP..... 563
- Arkansas
Arkansas disturbed by wizardry of astronomers; EP..... 591
As seen in Arkansas. F. F. Reed; C..... 153
Ben M. Bogard debates evolution with Charles Smith; EP..... 533
Jails Charles Smith for preaching atheism; EP..... 438
Right to teach evolution to be submitted to popular vote; EP..... 281
Teaching evolution made a crime; EP.... 533
- Armistice day
Criticism of President Coolidge's speech; EP..... 534
Mr. Coolidge plays with fire; E..... 564
Ten years since the armistice; EP..... 508
- Art
What ails the Metropolitan Museum? W. Gutman; S..... 614
- Asquith, Herbert H. See Oxford and Asquith, Earl of
- Astronomers
Wizardry disturbs Arkansas; EP..... *591
- Astronomy
California institute of technology is to erect largest telescope in world; EP..... 467
- Atheism
See Arkansas
- Athens, Ohio. Messenger. See Newspapers
- Atlantic, schooner-yacht; E..... 5
- Atwell, William H.
Dismissal of case brought against judge by F. R. Serri; EP..... 508
Stirs up trouble in Brooklyn; EP..... 192
- Austin, Mary
Hunt of Arizona; S..... 572
In Papagueria; P..... 65
Love coming late; P..... 43
- Austria
Austro-German union. F. Hertz; IS..... 696
Fascists, Austrian. G. E. R. Gedy; S.. 420
Fascismo, entry of. G. E. R. Gedy; IS.. 584
Postal, telegraph, and telephone employees resort to passive resistance in controversy with government; EP..... 700
Submits to virtual blackmail on the part of Italy in the question of South Tyrol; EP..... 100
Ten years of Austria's republic. K. Renner; IS..... 583
- Autobiography of a criminal
$10 and "make good." Leavenworth 20,803; C..... 227
- Automobiles
Demand proper headlights for motor vehicles; EP..... 121
Gearless automobiles; E..... 285
See also Ryanlite
- Babcock, Frederic
Curtis's oily hands; S..... 288
Insull-ating the Coolidge cabinet; S..... 243
Not for silver, anyway; C..... 42
- Bad words
Frontier of decency. O. W. Firkins; C.. 320
- Baeumer, Carl L.
From a life prisoner; C..... 491
- Bailey, Warren Worth. Obituary; EP..... 535
- Baillie, Helen Tufts
D. A. R. gas bomb; C..... 64
Expulsion from D. A. R.; EP..... 2
- Bakshy, Alexander
Future of the movies; S..... 360
Language of images; S..... 720
Russian contribution to moving pictures; S 94
- Baldwin, Roger N.
Reimbursing bondsmen; C..... 520
- Barco concession
Colombian government upholds cancellation of concession; EP..... 308
- Barde, A., and M. Yvain
Luckee girl. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 328
- Bare legs
What of them?; EP..... 239
- Barnett, Eugene
Christmas brings freedom; EP..... 673
Voice from prison; C..... 180
- Barney, E. C.
He is through; C..... 135
- Barrett, E. Boyd
Catholic bigotry too; C..... 343
- Barry, Philip
Holiday. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 694
- Beahan, C., and G. Fort
Jarnegan. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 382
- Beals, Carleton
Digging graves in Mexico; S..... 105
- Belgium
Hoover's telegram urging peace in dispute over Louvain library inscription; EP... 28 Scandal in connection with rebuilding Louvain library; EP..... 27
- Beling, Mabel Ashe
Hoover the incomparable; C..... 399
- Benefactions
J. D. Rockefeller, jr., contributes $5,000,000 for restoration of Williamsburg, Va.; E. 55
- Benét, William Rose
Mighty is man; P..... 159
- Bergson, Henri
Receives Nobel prize for literature; EP.. 563
- Bering sea islands
Appraisal of prehistoric mummies discovered by Stoll-McCracken expedition; EP. 75
- Berle, A. A., sr.
Justice to Judge Murray; C..... 320
- Bernard, Jean-Jacques
L'invitation au voyage. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 433
- Berry schools of Georgia
Awarded $5,000 by Pictorial Review; EP. 509
- Bess, Ben
Fate still undecided; EP..... 212
- Bigotry
Catholic bigotry too; C..... 343
- Bira-Bidjan. See Russia—A Jewish state in the soviet union
- Birth control
Catholics and birth control. P. J. Ward, M. Sanger; C..... 545
Smith and birth control. M. Sanger; C.. 452
- Bixel, Walter M.
How dry is Hoover?; C..... 247
- Blanshard, Paul
It costs money to die; S..... 682
- Blasphemy
What is blasphemy? G. Jackson; C..... 270
- Blindness
"Babies' sore eyes" reduced 64 per cent in last twenty years; EP..... 121
- Bloch, Blanche
Leaderless orchestra; M..... 556
- Board of education
Father Duffy replies. F. P. Duffy; C.... 454
- Bodine, T. V.
Southern gloom; C..... 603
- Bogan, William J.
Bare legs; opinion on; EP..... 239
- Bogard, Ben M.
Debates evolution with Charles Smith; EP 533
- Bolivia
Bolivian-Paraguayan disturbance good for Mr. Hoover's education; EP..... 700
Calls for settlement of dispute with Paraguay; EP..... 699 Outburst of war spirit in controversy with Paraguay; EP..... 672
- Books
How to sell books; E..... 441
Organization of the Book league; EP.... 563
Some notable fall books..... 348
- B. B. R.
Klan from within; C..... 426

- Borah, William Edgar
 Borah and Hoover; E..... 471
 Melancholy picture of compromise; EP..... 561
 Not for silver, anyway. F. Babcock; C. 42
 Sorriest figure in campaign; EP..... 307
- Borchard, Edwin M.
 Kellogg treaties sanction war; IS..... 284
- Boston, Massachusetts
 Newspapers still "the poor farm of journalism"; EP..... 99
- Boulder dam bill. See Public utilities
- Bowers, Claude, at Houston; EP..... 27
- Branham, Lucy
 An invitation; C..... 520
- Brennan, George. Obituary; EP..... 191
- Brenner, Anita
 Mexican messiahs; S..... 266
 Student rebels in Latin America; IS..... 668
- Brewster, Ralph O.
 Defeated by Republican machine in Maine; EP..... 2
 Presents plea for construction fund to be used in time of unemployment, before governors at New Orleans; EP..... 590
- Briand, Aristide
 Strange speech before Assembly of league of nations; EP..... 256
- Britons
 "Those terrible Britons." St. J. Ervine; C 687
- Brockdorff-Rantzau, Count. Obituary; EP..... 257
- Brooklyn Edison and Consolidated gas companies
 Does regulation protect consumers?; EP.. 99
 Power mergers and the public; E..... 150
- Brookwood labor college
 Condemned by executive council of A. F. of L.; EP..... 508
 What Brookwood means; E..... 241
- Broome, Edwin C.
 Appointed chairman of committee to investigate propaganda in schools; EP.. 535
- Broun, Heywood
 Al Smith and lukewarm liberals..... 417
 Al Smith swallows the Tiger..... 58
 Artist needs a vacation..... 473
 Case of St. John Ervine and Philip Goodman..... 677
 Concerning the world series..... 336
 Disbarment of William Tilden from Davis cup play..... 104
 Ernst and Seagle's "To the Pure..... 567 Francisco Miranda..... 513
 Friendly houses..... 152
 Hoover's hypocrisy..... 313, 391
 Language as handled by eminent playwrights..... 262
 Nullification..... 196
 On the primrose path..... 242
 Plea for a literary judgment day..... 7
 Plea of abatement in antagonism between Harvard and Yale..... 649
 Poor unfortunate Bobby Jones, golfer!..... 287
 Reply to William E. Sweet on prohibition. 33
 Smith or Sahara..... 217
 Town or country—which most promotes artistic creation?..... 80
 Tunney and Heeney..... 125
 Use fires of bigotry for purposes of illumination..... 539
 Why America hates foreigners..... 171
- Brown, C. K.
 Railroad building and local pride; S..... 176
- Brown, Ralph M.
 Virginia doubtful; C..... 426
- Brown, W. Norman
 Caste under attack in India; S..... 712
- Brownell, W. C. Obituary; EP..... 121
- Buck, Pearl S.
 Communism in China; IS..... 97
- Budlong, Julia N.
 Commercial humor; C..... 271
 What happened in Seattle; S..... 197
- Buell, Raymond Leslie
 Labor in the Congo; IS..... 24
- Buffum, Caleb J.
 Drunken car drivers; C..... 64
- Burke, E.
 This thing called love. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 383
- Busey, Garreta
 An infidelity; P..... 90
- Business and finance
 Chain stores: the revolution in retailing. M. S. Rukeyser; S..... 568
 Wall street's speculative optimism. M. S. Rukeyser; S..... 514
- Butler, Nicholas Murray
 Scores Hoover on preparedness; EP..... 191, 414
- Butler, William M.
 Outdone by H. Work for ineptitude in political management..... 132
 By request. E. Nugent; D..... 434
- Byington, Steven T.
 The Anti-saloon league; C..... 89
- Bynner, Witter
 Smith for the cabinet; C..... 688
 To certain Bostonians; P..... 522
- Byrd, Richard Evelyn. See Antarctic exploration—"Race to the South pole"
- California
 California is for Hoover. G. P. West; S.. 339
 Facts reflecting on the state's prosperity; EP..... 309
- California institute of technology
 To erect largest telescope in the world; EP..... 467
- California, University of. See Campbell, W. W.
- Camera, color. See Photography
- Campbell, W. W.
 President of University of California; controversy with professors; EP..... 562
- Canada
 Publicly owned and operated railway system a success; EP..... 413
 Tortuous course of prohibition; EP..... 562
- Candy, white list of Consumers' league of New York. E. Pharo; C..... 109
- Cannon, James, jr.
 Al Smith—Catholic, Tammany, wet; S.. 9
- Capital punishment
 Death penalty; E..... 472
 Miscarriage of justice in celebrated cases swells opposition in Germany and other countries; EP..... 74
 Strange case of James Sweeney in New Jersey; EP..... 29
- Capstaff, John G.
 Inventor of color camera; EP..... 167
- Carcassonne, back from. M. Lindsay; S..... 268
- Carib syndicate. L. Denny; C..... 110
- Carney, Jack
 Hoover's touchiness; C..... 203
- Carranza, Emiliano; EP..... 75, 283
- Cason, Clarence E.
 Literary bushwhackers; S..... 364
- Caste. See India
- Castillo, Andres V.
 Filipino's land; IS..... 344
- Catholics. See Roman Catholics
- Cella, Louis B.
 For Chicago readers; C..... 546
- Censorship
 Boston protects itself; E..... 593
 Padlocking the "talkies." J. N. Rosenberg; S..... 601
 Pure Boston. G. Jackson; C..... 606
- Central Africa. See Africa
- Centralia, Washington
 Barnett, Eugene, set free; EP..... 673
 National organization to fight for release of victims; EP..... 412
 Voice from prison, a. E. Barnett; C.... 180
 Working for victims; EP..... 673
- Chain stores
 Revolution in retailing. M. S. Rukeyser; S..... 568
- Chamberlain, J. P.
 Dwight W. Morrow's achievement; C.... 295
- Chang Tso-lin. See Millard, Thomas F.—Did Japan kill Chang Tso-lin?..... 406
- Chee-chee. H. Fields; D..... 406
- Chekhov, Anton Pavlovich
 Cherry orchard. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 461
- Cherrington, Ernest
 Attributes American success in Olympic games to prohibition, ignoring other nations; EP..... 165
- Cherry orchard. A. P. Chekhov; D..... 461
- Chiang Kai-shek
 Chinese generals; E..... 5
 Promoted to head new government; EP.. 13
- Chicago
 Chicago bullets [Chicago politics]. Anonymous..... 82
- Chicago Tribune. See Newspapers
- Childs restaurants
 Offer "meats for the meat eater"; EP.. 192
- Chile
 Sketches from Chile. H. E..... 221
- China
 Britain and United States oppose Japanese aggression; EP..... 238
 China and Japan—1928. T. F. Millard; S 598
 Chinese generals; E..... 5
 Communism in China. P. S. Buck; IS.. 97
 Communism in China. A. W. Hummel; C 271
 Crisis in Manchuria; E..... 194
 Failure of loan to South Manchuria railway; IP..... 435
 Internal conflict in China. W. Prohme; IS 725
 Mayor Ho Chi-kung suppresses feudalistic habits; EP..... 257
 Our treaty with China; E..... 123
 Truth about Tsinanfu. H. J. Timperley; S..... 130
 Welcome to new nationalist government; EP..... 413
- Churchill, Winston Refused membership by British building trade workers' union; EP..... 467
- Citizenship
 Citizen, do your duty! W. J. Rapp; S... 245
- Civil liberties union. See American civil liberties union
- Climate, agriculture and flood control. M. Coleman; S..... 61
- Clugston, Katharine
 These days. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 581
- Clugston, W. G.
 As the farmers go, so goes the election; S 337
- Coal miners. See United mine workers
- Cohen, David A.
 Disgusted; C..... 452
- Coleman, McAlister
 Hay and corn; S..... 61
 Old executioner, the; P..... 296
- Outspoken or naive?; C..... 270
- Thomas, Norman; S..... 128
- Coll, E. P.
 Work for Centralia victims; EP..... 673
- College of the City of New York
 Expulsion of S. Gerson for protest against compulsory military training at the college; EP..... 3
- College professors
 Right to state political preferences in public; EP..... 562
- Colleges
 College morality; E..... 334
- Colombia
 Carib syndicate. L. Denny; C..... 110
 Government upholds cancelation of Barco concession; EP..... 308
- Colombia and Nicaragua
 Settlement of old dispute over certain islands; EP..... 590
- Colonies
 Bothersome colonies; E..... 703
- Color camera. See Photography
- Colton, John W., on utilities tactics; EP... 2
- Columbus memorial lighthouse; EP..... 309
- Command performance. C. S. Dickens; D... 434
- Commercial humor. See Humor, commercial
- Communism
 Is it becoming respectable?; EP..... 562
 See also China—Communism in China
- Communists
 Not entitled to protection of constitution; EP..... 412
- Compromisers
 Tight walkers? K. Miller; C..... 319
- Congo. See Africa
- Connors, Barry
 Girl trouble. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 528
- Consumers' league of New York
 Candy white list. E. Pharo; C..... 109
- Convict-lease system
 Governor Bibb Graves of Alabama helps end survival of barbarism; EP..... 54
- Cook, Arthur James
 Refuses, with Maxton, to negotiate with capitalist employers; EP..... 74
- Cook, Waldo L.
 Waldo L. Cook. E. McCausland; S..... 11
- Cooksley, Bert
 To a girl; P..... 661
 Two poems; P..... 321
- Coolidge, Calvin
 Armistice-day speech a mass of contradictions; EP..... 534
 Asks for larger naval expenditures; E.... 564
 Demands fifteen new cruisers and the Kellogg pact; EP..... 671
 Sends equivocal congratulatory telegram to Senator Curtis; EP..... 533
 Swan song for lame ducks; E..... 646
- Copyright
 World copyright. L. J. de Bekker; IS.... 253
- Cost of living
 Statistics in twelve industrial cities; EP.. 387
- Costigan, Josephine
 Catholic despair; C..... 575
- Courts
 The courts on trial; E..... 194
- Covering Washington
 Actual military operations not affected by Kellogg multilateral treaty..... 60
 Bill Vare's part in Kansas City..... 132
 Disclosures of John B. Sheridan with regard to activities of power trust..... 60
 Dr. Work outranks W. M. Butler for sheer ineptitude in political management.... 132
 Groundless apprehensions on account of Hoover's Quakerism..... 60 Nomination to office causes politicians to "get religion"..... 60
- Coward, Noel
 Year of grace. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 557
- Cowley, Malcolm
 For St. Bartholomew's day; P..... 175
- Cox, James M.; E..... 54
- Croatia
 Croatian crown. G. Fraser; C..... 546
- Cross my heart. D. Kusell; D..... 328
- Cuba
 Government relinquishes restrictive legislation in sugar production; EP..... 256
- Curtis, Charles
 Curtis's Indian blood. E. Kiel; C..... 109
 Curtis's oily hands. F. Babcock; S..... 288
 Equivocal congratulatory telegram from President Coolidge; EP..... 533
- Czecho-Slovakia. See Sugar
- D
- Daab, H., and E. E. Paramore, jr.
 Ringside. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 302
- Daily Californian
 Commended; EP..... 562
- Daily Mirror, New York
 Acquired by A. J. Kobler; EP..... 309
- Dance, The
 Angna Enters. L. Untermeyer; S..... 616
 Doris Humphrey and others. R. Pickering; S..... 580
- Dandurand, Raoul
 On Anglo-American differences regarding naval disarmament; EP..... 386
- Daniels, Josephus; EP..... 386

- D. A. R.
Daughter is a daughter. M. Ogden; C... 109
Expulsion of Helen Tufts Bailie; EP... 2
That D. A. R. gas bomb. H. T. Bailie; C. 64
- Davis, J. N.
Editor's troubles; C... 343
- Davis, Owen
Tonight at twelve. Criticism. A. W.; D. 641
- Dawes plan
Blood from a stone; E... 537
- Death penalty. See Capital punishment
- de Bekker, L. J.
World copyright; IS... 253
- Debs radio station
Granted extension of license; EP... 212
- Dell, Floyd, and Thomas Mitchell
Little accident. Criticism. P. B.; D... 461
- Dell, Robert
The Poincaré legend; S... 153
- De Long, George Washington
Arctic tragedies. J. McClusky; S... 59
- Democratic national convention
Big show at Houston. L. S. Gannett; S. 24
Cooped. B. Hard; C... 63
- Denmark
Danish adventure. S. Toksvig; S... 12
- Denny, Ludwell
British intrigue at the Panama canal; S... 36
Carib syndicate; C... 110
- De Quincey, Thomas
De Quinceyana. H. A. Eaton; C... 716
- Deutsch, Babette
To a friend; P... 111
- Dewey, John
An invitation. L. Branham; C... 520
- Dickens, C. S.
Command performance. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; B... 434
- Dictionary of American biography
American notables; E... 647
- Disarmament
Dandurand, Raoul, on Anglo-American differences regarding naval disarmament; EP... 386
Fighting against disarmament; E... 335
Scott, C. P., on disarmament; IP... 144
- Divorce
Decency in divorce; E... 214
- Douglas, Paul H.
Real wages; C... 454
- Drama
Literature and drama; E... 511
Post-war German drama; S... 488
See also Theater; Censorship
- Dry and liberal. E. W. Howland; C... 426
- Du Bois, W. E. Burghardt
Is Al Smith afraid of the South?; E... 392
- Duffy, Francis P.
Father Duffy replies; C... 454
- Dunning, Phillip
Night hostess. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D... 327
- Duranty, Walter
Good work in reporting Shakhta trial for New York Times; EP... 53
- E
- E., H.
Sketches from Chile... 221
- Earle, Edward Mead
The issue is tolerance; C... 294
- Eastman, Crystal. Obituary; E... 123
- Eastman, Max
Eleventh anniversary; P... 522
Replies to A. R. Williams's criticism of him in review of Trotsky's book; C... 715
- Eaton, Horace A.
De Quinceyana; C... 716
- Education
New Mexico and Yale. C. P. Loomis; C... 271
Ohio university discharges professor of journalism at behest of business interests; EP... 28
Right to teach evolution in Arkansas to be submitted to popular vote; EP... 281
Socrates sits upon the log. L. H. Jenks; S... 289
Summer school. L. Pruette; S... 86
- Edwards, Jonathan, jr.
Cocktail presidents; C... 42
- Egypt
Secret of governing, by Great Britain; EP 119
- Eidlitz, Otto M. Obituary; EP... 509
- Eisenstein, S. M.
Ten days that shook the world. Criticism. A. Bakshy... 720
- Elections
Free and fair elections. S. Nearing; S... 449
- Electoral versus popular vote
Possible disparity that may exist between these processes shown by election; EP... 534
- Electric bond and share company
To be asked to open operating-expenses ledger to Federal trade commission; EP 643
- Electricity
Does regulation protect consumers?; EP 99
Mergers and the public; E... 150
- Ellis, Leo
Last political prisoner in United States released; EP... 412
- Elmer the great. R. Lardner; D... 406
- Emory university
Professor prevented from engaging in campaign against long working hours in mills; EP... 282
- England. See Great Britain
- English, Horace B.
Geographical liberalism; C... 399
- Enns, C. M.
In reply to Senator Norris; C... 157
- Epstein, Louis
Editor's troubles; C... 343
- Ernst, Morris L.
On regulation of public utilities; EP... 99
- Ernst, Morris L., and William Seagle
The literary critic as expert; S... 355
- Errata
Correction. A. R. Williams; C... 609
Dead baron. A. Parry; C... 660
Invert. L. Riding, R. Graves; C... 660
- Ervine, St. John
H. Broun on St. John Ervine... 677
"Those terrible Britons"; C... 687
- Esler, Lemist
Grey fox. Criticism. A. W.; D... 528
- Ethics
Let's follow the horses!; E... 31
- Europe, Central
Plays in Central Europe. J. W. Krutch; S... 107
- Evolution
Knoxville, Tennessee, boasts a baby with a tail; EP... 645
Right to teach doctrine in Arkansas to be submitted to popular vote; EP... 281
See also Arkansas
Exceeding small. C. Francke; D... 500
- Ex-Journalist
Anonymous, of course; C... 320
- F
- Fadiman, Clifton P.
Continental book flood; S... 613
- Fagan, M. C.
Great power. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 302
- Falstaff, Jake
A judge; P... 618
- Farmers
As the farmers go, so goes the election. W. G. Clugston; S... 337
Independent of prohibition through apple-jack
What the farmer is up against. R. Stewart; S... 422
- Faust, W. v. Goethe; D... 433
- Federal trade commission. See Public utilities
- Feiler, Arthur
Germany's rehabilitation; S... 484
- Feng Yu-hsiang. General; E... 5
- Ferril, Thomas Hornsby
Some grass; P... 136
- Ferris, Frederick L.
Can Al Smith carry New Jersey?; S... 126
- Field, Frederick V., and John Herling
New votes for Thomas; C... 491
- Fields, H.
Chee-Chee. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 406
- Finance—France
Stabilization or repudiation; EP... 1
- Finger, Charles J.
Americans we like—C. J. Finger, literary adventurer. C. W. Morrow; S... 219
- Firkins, O. W.
Frontier of decency; C... 320
- Fischer, Louis
German foreign policy; S... 486
- Flagler, Harry Harkness
Flagler's philanthropy. B. H. Haggin; C. 688
- Flanner, Hildegarde
Two California poems... 272
- Fletcher, John Gould
Portrait, The; P... 204
Song of the moderns; P... 16
- Flood control
Hay and corn. M. Coleman; S... 61
- Flood relief
Herbert Hoover's tortuous policy in regard to Mississippi flood relief; EP... 147
- Fontaine, Maurice
Have we recognized Soviet Russia?; S... 543
- Football
Growing indifference of undergraduates; EP... 591
Nineteen players killed in 1928; EP... 645
- Foreign policy association
Sounds warning against misuse of league of nations by nationalist politicians; IP 505
- Foreign policy discussions
Amazing spread of institute habit in United States; EP... 283
- Foster, James E.
Police cruelty; C... 521
- Fradin, Germaine. See Glozel
- France
Alsatian problem. E. Lengyel; IS... 163
Briand's disappointing speech before the assembly of the league of nations; EP... 256
Hearst press publishes essential terms of Franco-British naval understanding; EP 308
Meaning of change in cabinet; EP... 534
Parliament assembles without a cabinet; EP... 508
Poincaré legend. R. Dell; S... 153
Stabilization or repudiation; EP... 1
- Francke, Caroline
Exceeding small. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D... 500
- Fraser, Geoffrey
Croatian crown; C... 546
- Free press
Under attack in the case of Saturday Press of Minneapolis; EP... 167
Saturday Press supported by American newspaper publishers' association; EP... 562
- Free speech
Blasphemy à la mode; E... 259
Controversy between professors and President Campbell of university of California; EP... 562
How to win free speech. R. Levin; S... 604
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
- Fuller, Alvan T.
Attacks "best people" in valedictory address; EP... 643
Governor Fuller's way. C. Hill; C... 180
- Fullerton, Kemper
Fresh air for liberals; C... 454
- Funeral costs
It costs money to die. P. Blanshard; S... 682
- G
- Gaffney, Margaret A.
Declares Smith candidacy advances reforms; C... 295
Why dries should support Al; C... 15
- Galsworthy, John
Tolstoi as a novelist; S... 218
- Gannett, Lewis S.
Big show at Houston; S... 34
It's all Al Smith; S... 8
Retires from active editorial staff of Nation; EP... 309
- Garrison, William Lloyd, jr.
In memory of Fanny Garrison Villard; P. 62
- Gas
Does regulation protect consumers?; EP... 99
Mergers; E... 150
- Gebhart, John C. See Blanshard, Paul—it costs money to die
- Gedye, G. E. R.
Austria—Enter fascismo; IS... 584
Austria's fascists; S... 420
Jugoslavia at the cross-roads; E... 264
- Geiger, F. A.
Fines strikers at Allen-A hosiery company at Kenosha; EP... 508
- Georgia
Cotton manufacturers strangle free education and research; EP... 282
Emory university; EP... 282
- Germany
Critical stage in Germany's reparations history; EP... 256
Death of Admiral von Scheer; EP... 701
Difficulties in way of French evacuation of Rhineland; EP... 282
Efficiency of unified control demonstrated by German federal railroads company; EP... 467
Foreign policy. L. Fischer; S... 486
Germany, an economic colony. R. R. Kuczynski; S... 481
Germany of today. I. Wrobel; S... 476
Germany's red front. A. Smedley; IS... 116
Government wins temporary victory over Ruhr capitalists; EP... 644
Keynes, J. M., predictions regarding the Dawes plan verified; EP... 256
Miscarriage of justice in Jakubovsky case leads to revulsion against capital punishment; EP... 74
Pacifism since the war. P. Frh. v. Schoenaich; S... 482
Papers complain of American treatment of passengers of Graf Zeppelin; EP... 439
Post-war German drama. E. Toller; S... 488
Poverty. B. Hall; C... 606
Rehabilitation. A. Feiler; S... 484
Revolt of German women. C. v. Ossietzky; S... 478
Social democracy. E. Rabold; S... 477
Stresemann, G. E. Ludwig; S... 474
Stupid allied tactics in the Rhineland; EP 590
Ten years of republican Germany; E (O. G. V.)... 468
"Wacht am Rhein." E. Lengyel; IS... 558
Young Germany. H. D. Hill; S... 480
- Gerson, Simon
Expulsion from College of the City of New York for protest against compulsory military training at the college; EP... 3
- Gil, Emilio Portes; EP... 308
- Gilford, Duff
Notes from Washington; S... 519
- Ginsburg, Leonard E.
Reforming police practice; C... 715
- Giolitti, Giovanni. Obituary; EP... 75
- Girl trouble. B. Connors; D... 528
- Glozel
Germaine Fradin and family; EP... 120
Gods of the lightning. M. Anderson and H. Hickerson; D... 528
- Goethe, Wolfgang von
Faust. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D... 433
- Gooding, Hattie
Editor's troubles; C... 343
- Goodman, Philip
Opinion of St. John Ervine, and attack on him by critic. H. Broun... 677
- Good-will missions
American-Russian chamber of commerce invites the Krassins to come to America as its guest; EP... 74
Feat of Emiliano Carranza and his tragic fate; EP... 75

- Gould, Randall
Stimson shows his hand; IS..... 463
- Governors' conference
Hears plea for construction fund to be used in time of unemployment; EP..... 590
- Graf Zeppelin
Admirable bearing of officers; EP..... 439 Humiliating treatment of passengers on landing at Lakehurst; EP..... 439
- Granbery, John C.
Southern defense; C..... 608
- Gray, Annie E.
How to hold outdoor meetings; C..... 110
- Great Britain
Anglo-French naval accord. See Unre-generate diplomacy
Asquith reveals war secrets. W. Mac-Donald; S..... 340
Britain talks politics; E..... 441
British building trade workers' union re-fuses membership to Winston Churchill; EP..... 467
Conservative and liberal press growing critical of official Franco-English policy; EP..... 671
England's industrial outlook. J. A. Hob-son; S..... 446
Hearst press publishes essential terms of Franco-British naval understanding; EP 308
Labor party victorious in municipal elec-tions; EP..... 562
Labor strategy; E..... 259
Lloyd George, David, pessimistic on the prospects of peace; EP..... 671
Manifestation of great interest in Kellogg treaties; EP..... 165
Maxton and Cook refuse to negotiate with capitalist employers; EP..... 74
Nearly a million miners on verge of star-vation; EP..... 672
Secret of governing Egypt; EP..... 119
- Great parade
Plates wanted. C. Long; C..... 399
- Great power. M. C. Fagan; D..... 302
- Greece
Venizelos returns to favor; EP..... 100
- Grey fox. L. Esler; D..... 528
- Gruening, Ernest
Calles: Mexico's leading citizen; S..... 708
News from Mexico; S..... 223
Obregon, Alvaro; S..... 106
- Gutman, Walter
What ails the Metropolitan museum?; S. 614
- H
- Haessler, Carl
Respectable A. F. of L.; S..... 654
- Haggin, B. H.
Ballet russe: 1928; M..... 207
Bayreuth—1928; M..... 233
Flagler's philanthropy; C..... 688
Munich and Salzburg; M..... 404
Orchestra merger; S..... 382
- Haldane, Viscount, of Cloan (Richard Bur-don Haldane). Obituary; E..... 216
- Hale, Frederick
Renominated as Republican United States senator from Maine; EP..... 2
- Hall, Bolton
German poverty; C..... 606
- Hanna, Edward J.
Archbishop of San Francisco deplors killing of Obregon; EP..... 120
- Hanson, Earl
"Race to the South pole"; S..... 418
- Hanson, Florence Curtis
Teachers and the power trust; C..... 202
- Hapgood, Isabel. Obituary; EP..... 29
- Hapgood, Powers
Sorry liberals; C..... 425
- Hard, B.
Cooped; C..... 63
- Harris, Nathan M.
The one issue; C..... 320
- Harrison, E. S.
Who is responsible? (for anti-Smith propaganda); C..... 452
- Hartsock, Ernest
Literary epitaphs; P..... 321
- Harvard university
Harvard's new plan; E..... 594
Receives gift of $3,000,000 for splitting university into small colleges; EP..... 535
Morison, S. E., writing official history of university, unearths President Eliot's guide to the "durable satisfactions" of life; E..... 55
- Harvey, George. Obituary; EP..... 212
- Hawaiian islands
Sesquicentennial of discovery; EP..... 192
- Hay, Mary Garrett. Obituary; EP..... 257
- Hazelton, George C., and Benrimo
Yellow jacket. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 582
- Headlights for automobiles. See Automobiles; also Ryanlite
- Hearst press
Publishes essential terms of Franco-British naval understanding; EP..... 308
- Heavy traffic. A. Richman; D..... 277
- Heden, Gustav
Suggests applejack as explanation of farm-ers' independence of prohibition..... 539
- Henry, Patrick
Spoke in St. John's Church, Richmond, Virginia, not in Williamsburg, Virginia. E. W. Shaw; C..... 134
- Henson, Francis A.
Norman Thomas for president; C..... 88
- Heroism
The case of Paul Wittgenstein; EP..... 149
- Hertz, Friedrich
Austro-German union; IS..... 696
- Hess, Newman W.
Vox populi; C..... 425
- Hibben, Paxton
Obituary; EP..... 673
Paxton Hibben. S. La Follette; S..... 711
- High road. F. Lonsdale; D..... 328
- Hill, Creighton
Governor Fuller's way; C..... 180
- Hill, H. D.
Young Germany; S..... 480
- Hirohito, emperor of Japan
Ascends to the throne at end of elaborate ceremonial; EP..... 508
- Hobson, John A.
England's industrial outlook; S..... 446
Tribute by the Manchester Guardian to the economist on the occasion of his seventieth anniversary; EP..... 100
- Hodge, William
Straight through the door. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 434
- Holiday. P. Barry; D..... 694
- Hood, Gretchen
Mencken in 1936; C..... 399
- Hooton, Earnest Albert
When races intermarry; S..... 84
- Hoover, Calvin B.
The South is still solid; S..... 199
- Hoover, Herbert
Accepts; E..... 169
Analysis of Elizabethton speech; EP..... 385
And Scripps-Howard press; E..... 415
Bungles campaign, especially on question of extra session to provide farm relief; EP..... 466
California is for Hoover. G. P. West; S. 339
Comment on speech in New York; EP..... 437
Discontinues Negro segregation in depart-ment of commerce..... 519
Dishonesty of Hoover position on protec-tion and restriction of immigration; EP 308
Hoover the incomparable. M. A. Beling; C..... 399
How dry is Hoover? W. M. Bixel; C..... 247
In praise of Hoover. D. S. Jordan; C..... 88
May his administration match the land-slide that put him into office; EP..... 507
Misstatements; E..... 310
Poverty of economic thought revealed in controversy with political opponent; EP 466
Pursues tortuous policy in regard to Mis-sissippi flood relief; EP..... 147
Quaker; Hoover as a; EP..... 388
Quakerism; groundless apprehension on ac-count of his Quakerism..... 60
Record. P. W. Slosson; C..... 454
Remains silent on issues before the coun-try; EP..... 73
Republican national committee's inept man-agement of campaign; EP..... 331
South American trip good strategy; EP..... 533
Stands for restriction of labor; EP..... 307
Telegram urging peace in dispute over Louvain library inscription; EP..... 28
Touchiness. J. Carney; C..... 203
Trip; E..... 565
Wins; E..... 510
- Houghton, Alanson B.
Nomination for United States senator from New York commendable; EP..... 332
Roosevelt and Houghton; E..... 389
- House, Edward Mandell
More revelations of Colonel House. O. G. Villard; S..... 595
- Howard, Perry
Case of Southern Negro politician; E..... 258
EP..... 700
- Howard university
Not Howard, but Harvard. M. W. John-son; C..... 15
- Howe, Frederic C.
A political utopia; S..... 178
- Howland, Ethel W.
Dry and liberal; C..... 426
- Hummel, Arthur W.
Communism in China; C..... 271
- Humor
Will Rogers, the bunkless candidate. D. Van Doren; S..... 314
Humor, commercial
Commercial humor. J. N. Budlong; C..... 271
- Humphrey, Doris
Her dancing, and others'. R. Pickering; S..... 580
- Hunt, George Wiley Paul. See Austin, Mary—Hunt of Arizona
- Hunt, Robert Booker
Orthodox; P..... 366
- Hunter, Edward H.
Addresses New Bedford Rotary club on "red menace"; EP..... 239
- I
- Illinois
Chicago bullets. Anonymous..... 82
Chicago Tribune's service in compelling Mayor Thompson to disgorge loot; EP. 28
- Insull-ating the Coolidge cabinet. F. Bab-cock; S..... 243
- Immigration
Statistical figures and their significance; EP..... 166
- Immortality
Science says—; E..... 390
- In the Driftway
Additional remarks on companionate mar-riage by Bernhard S. Levey..... 88
"Bigotry" in the metropolitan newspapers 450
"Color movies"..... 156
Cream no longer cream..... 134
Dittmer, C. G., questionnaire among stu-dents with regard to freer sex relations 14
Eric the robot..... 319
Eruption of old Etna..... 544
Europe or America first..... 201
Exchange of editorships..... 687
Fashion no respecter of business..... 520
Fate of milk bottles in New York..... 87
In search of a hobby..... 63
Last page of the Evening Post..... 658
Old and new country roads..... 293
On the reading of books..... 714
Plea for The society of quiet turnstiles.. 42
Qualifications for public office..... 109
Revery on ghosts and churches..... 520
Sauntering in England..... 397
Some letters, with Drifter's comment..... 489
Tale of a country hermit..... 225
Teuton linguist..... 424
Urge to life in men and plants..... 270
Ways of a Long Island realtor..... 179
West coast!..... 574
Which end of a cigarette to put in one's mouth..... 246
Who should receive first attention on board a sinking vessel?..... 605
World thrives on discontent..... 342
- India
Caste in India; IP..... 463
Caste under attack in India. W. N. Brown; S..... 712
Death of Lala Lajpat Rai; EP..... 563
First India conference of America in New York city; EP..... 439
Hindu farmers at bay. N. B. Parulekar; IS..... 329
Indictment of British rule. G. O. Trevel-yan; EP..... 75
Miss Mayo and the Rockefeller foundation. B. B. Mundkur; C..... 521
- Indians
Exploited Indian, the; E..... 215
- Institute of politics at Williamstown
Notable discussions of public questions; EP 166
- Institute of public affairs at Charlottesville Notable discussions of public questions; EP 166
- Institutes
Amazing spread of habit in United States; EP..... 283
- Insurance
Government versus private plan of social insurance; EP..... 121
- Intermarriage
When races intermarry. E. A. Hooton; S. 84
- International amenities
Those terrible Britons; E..... 566
- "Intimate papers of Colonel House." Volumes III and IV. See Villard, Oswald Garri-son—More revelations of Colonel House
- Inventions
Summer of 1928 a continuous spasm of progress; EP..... 167
- Ireland, Alleyne
Too dense; C..... 343
- Irigoyen, Hipolito; EP..... 563
- Irish Free State
Appalling conditions said to exist in jails; EP..... 120
- Italia. See Nobile, Umberto
- Italy
Cross currents in Italy. M. Kelsey; S.. 396
Mussolini the humorist; E..... 416
- J
- Jackson, Gardner
Pure Boston; C..... 606
Sacco and Vanzetti; S..... 172
Sacco-Vanzetti meetings; C..... 180
Way of Boston; S..... 292
What is blasphemy?; C..... 270
- Jakubovsky case
Miscarriage of justice leads to revulsion against capital punishment in Germany; EP..... 74
- Japan
Aggression in China; EP..... 238
And China; EP..... 598
Britain and United States antagonistic to Japanese aggression on China; EP..... 238
Dams "dangerous thought." W. G. Mathe-son; IS..... 504
Did Japan kill Chang Tso-lin? T. F. Mil-lard; S..... 652
Fights for Manchuria. T. F. Millard; S. 681
Hirohito's ascension to the throne; EP... 503
Inexpediency of bankers' loans to Japan during unsettled political conditions in Orient; EP..... 466
Japanese propaganda; IP..... 436
Questionableness of National city bank's contemplated loan to Oriental develop-ment company; EP..... 466
See also Millard, Thomas F.—China and Japan—1928

- Jarnegan, C. Beahan and G. Fort; D..... 382
 Jealousy. L. Verneuil; D..... 502
 Jenks, Leland Hamilton
   Socrates sits upon the log; S..... 289
 Jessel, George
   War song; C..... 546
 Johannsen, S.
   White lilacs. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 302
 "John Brown's body"; E..... 169
 Johnson, Allen. See Dictionary of American biography—American notables
 Johnson, Andrew
   Johnsoniana wanted. G. F. Milton; C.... 660
 Johnson, Eldridge R.
   Founds home for Alice in Wonderland; EP 413
 Johnson, Mordecai W.
   Not Howard, but Harvard; C..... 15
 Johnson, Olive M.
   An oversight; C..... 490
 Jones, Howard Mumford
   What's wrong with The Nation?; S..... 678
 Jones, John R.
   Catholic defense; C..... 452
 Jordan, David Starr
   In praise of Hoover; C..... 88
 Jordan, Virgil
   Defines prosperity as a state of mind; EP 591
 Jourdan, Albert
   Paradise enow; C..... 15
 Jugoslavia
   Assassination of Radich and others in skuptchina; EP..... 166
   Jugoslavia at the cross-roads. G. E. R. Gedy; S..... 264
 Jurors
   More pay for jurors. G. Selenine; C.... 110
 Jury system
   "Look upon the jury!"; E..... 512
- K
- K., G. S.
   Mississippi speaks; C..... 451
 Kaiser, Georg
   Phantom lover. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 277
 Kalar, Joseph
   For Foster; C..... 490
 Karolyi, Michael
   Spends two days in New York and makes speech; EP..... 237
 Kates, Edgar J.
   Electric rates need readjustment; S..... 316
 Kellogg Pact
   Actual military operations not affected by Kellogg multilateral treaty..... 60
   Fighting against disarmament; E..... 335
   Sanctions war. E. M. Borchard; IS..... 234
   United States as guardian of Europe; IP. 408
 Kelsey, Mary
   Cross currents in Italy; S..... 396
 Kenosha strike. See Strikes—United States
 Kent, Frank R.
   Blundering through the campaign; S..... 394
 Keshin, Albert
   Vox populi; C..... 425
 Keynes, John Maynard
   Predicted breakdown of Dawes plan; EP. 256
 Kiel, Eric
   Curtis's Indian blood; C..... 109
 Kirchwey, Freda
   Boas, Franz; S..... 689
   Good fanatic, the; S..... 455
   Hungarian magic; S..... 617
   Out of bondage; S..... 661
   Sex in the South seas; S..... 427
   Through the nose; S..... 717
 Knapp, Florence S.
   Sentenced to serve thirty days; EP..... 256
 Knowledge
   Numbered knowledge. D. H. Markham; C. 716
 Kobler, Albert J.
   A new Napoleon of the press; EP..... 309
 Kongo. See Africa
 Kreisler, Fritz
   Forty years of virtuosity before American audiences; E..... 511
 Krutch, Joseph Wood
   Amateur night; D..... 581
   American comedy; D..... 694
   Behaviorism and drama; D..... 302
   Chekhov, greatness of; D..... 461
   Comedy, a; D..... 276
   Cowards' league for peace, a; D..... 406
   Gallant defeat; D..... 500
   G. B. S. and the test of time; D..... 666
   Genius on the west coast; D..... 382
   Goethe, some grave doubts about; D..... 433
   Logic and love; D..... 556
   Melpomene on a soap-box; D..... 528
   Murder with music; D..... 327
   Nihilism of Remy de Gourmont; S..... 357
   Plays in Central Europe; S..... 107
   Reinhardt's "Redemption"; D..... 640
   Season in Moscow—IV. Mise en scène; S. 40
   Tour de force; D..... 721
 Ku klux klan
   Klan from within. B. R. B.; C..... 426
 Kuczynski, Robert R.
   Germany, an economic colony; S..... 481
 Kunitz, Stanley J.
   Man does not ask for much; P..... 182
 Kusell, D.
   Cross my heart. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 328
- L
- Labor
   Formation of the Union of technical men; EP..... 29
 Labor party (English)
   Britain talks politics; E..... 441
 Lady lies. J. Meehan; D..... 694
 La Follette, Robert Marion, Jr.
   Renominated for United States senate; EP 255
 La Follette, Suzanne
   Paxton Hibben; S..... 711
 Laidler, Harry W.
   Socialist party; C..... 660
 Lala Lajpat Rai; death of; EP..... 563
 Lamont, Thomas W.
   Failure of loan to South Manchuria railway; IP..... 435
 La Motte, Ellen N.
   Opium leaks through; IS..... 70
   Opium-smoking in the Far East; IS..... 610
 Landes, Bertha K.
   What happened in Seattle. J. N. Budlong; S..... 197
 Lansing, Robert. Obituary; EP..... 509
 Lardner, Ring
   Elmer the great. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 406
 Latin America
   Student rebels in Latin America. A. Brenner; IS..... 668
 Law courts
   Julian trial in Los Angeles; EP..... 1
   Slater, Oscar, set free as innocent after eighteen years' imprisonment; EP..... 120
 League of nations
   Briand's strange speech before the assembly; EP..... 256
   Clash between Stresemann and Zaleski; EP..... 700
   Council ponders Monroe doctrine and leaves it unsolved; EP..... 237
   Opium leaks through. E. N. La Motte; IS..... 70
   Spoils system at Geneva; IP..... 505
 Leavenworth 20,803
   $10 and "make good"; C..... 227
 Lechlitner, Ruth
   The radical; P..... 90
 Lee, Borghild
   Angel Guri; P..... 689
 Legs, bare
   What of them?; EP..... 239
 Lengyel, Emil
   Alsation problem; IS..... 163
   "Wacht am Rhein"; IS..... 558
 Leonard, Dorothy
   Down in the long grass; P..... 272
 Let's follow the horses!; E..... 31
 Lever, John H.
   Rebuke; C..... 490
 Levey, Bernhard S.; Dt..... 88
 Levin, Ruben
   How to win free speech; S..... 604
 Levinson, Edward
   Socialism and prejudice; C..... 575
 Levy, Jerome
   It undoubtedly would; C..... 688
 Lewis, Alfred Baker
   Thomas and a new party; C..... 398
 Lewis, Nell Battle
   Save North Carolina; C..... 453
 Lewis, Sinclair
   Mr. Lorimer and me; S..... 81
 Liberalism
   Geographical liberalism. H. B. English; C..... 399
 Liberal party
   New liberal party?; E..... 702
   Next! H. E. Rouillard; C..... 575
   Now is the time. C. E. Pettee; C..... 606
 Liberals
   Disgusted. D. A. Cohen; C..... 452
   Fresh air for liberals. K. Fullerton; C. 454
   Should liberals vote for Smith?; E..... 284
   Sorry liberals. P. Hapgood; C..... 425
 Liberia
   New Liberia, the. H. G. Alsberg; C..... 295
   Rubber plantations discussed at institute of politics; EP..... 238
 Life. See Newspapers—Martin and Life
 Lindsay, Malvina
   Back from Carcassonne; S..... 268
 L'invitation au voyage. J.-J. Bernard; D.... 433
 Literary bushwhackers. C. E. Cason; S..... 364
 Literature
   Authors of books; E..... 415
   Continental book flood. C. P. Fadiman; S. 613
   Literary bushwhackers. C. E. Cason; S. 364
   Literary cliques; E..... 78
   Literary critic, the, as expert. M. L. Ernst and W. Seagle; S..... 355
   Literature and drama; E..... 511
   Lusty literature, a; E..... 333
   Nihilism of Remy de Gourmont. J. W. Krutch; S..... 357
   Popular long poems; E..... 169
   Robinson and Millay. J. H. Preston; C. 42
   Sale of MS of "Alice in Wonderland"; EP..... 413
   "What do you call it?"; E..... 29
 Little accident. F. Dell and T. Mitchell; D. 461
 Liveright, Ada L.
   Denied admission to Columbia University summer school; EP..... 167
- M
- Lloyd George, David
   Pessimistic concerning outlook for peace; EP..... 671
 Long, Cedric
   Plates wanted; C..... 399
 Lonsdale, Frederic
   High road. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 328
 Loomis, Charles P.
   New Mexico and Yale; C..... 271
 Lorimer, George Horace
   Mr. Lorimer and me. S. Lewis; S..... 81
 Louvain library
   Hoover's telegram urging peace in dispute over inscription; EP..... 28
 Luckee girl. A. Barde and M. Yvain; D..... 328
 Ludwig, Emil
   Stresemann; S..... 474
 Luhrs, Marie
   For a few hours; P..... 111
 Lummis, Charles Fletcher. Obituary; EP.... 645
 Lyons, Eugene
   Says Russians are poor propagandists; EP. 333
- M
- McCarl, David
   Religion and liquor; C..... 320
 McCausland, Elizabeth
   Waldo L. Cook; S..... 11
 McClusky, John
   Arctic tragedies; S..... 59
 McCormick, Ruth Hanna; EP..... 534
 MacDonald, William
   Anti-saloon league, the; C..... 89
   Asquith reveals war secrets; S..... 340
 McEvoy, J. P.
   Americana. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 528
 Machinal. S. Treadwell; D..... 302
 Madeley, W. B.
   Inroads into labor party in South Africa; EP..... 644
 Maine
   Reactionaries triumph in Republican primaries; EP..... 2
   Republicans sweep state in gubernatorial contest; EP..... 255
   What happened in Maine. P. Musgrave; S. 291
 Major Barbara. G. B. Shaw; D..... 666
 Manchuria. See China
 Maniu, Julius. Slogan for Rumania; EP.... 535
 Mantell, Robert. Obituary; E..... 57
 Marie Feodorovna. Obituary; EP..... 413
 Markham, D. H.
   Numbered knowledge; C..... 716
 Marshall, Charles C.
   Mr. Marshall and Al Smith; C..... 64
 Marshall, Louis
   Mr. Marshall's spleen; C..... 491
 Martin, Edward S. See Newspapers—Martin and Life
 Martin, Townsend
   Most immoral lady. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 694
 Mason, Arthur J.
   Work on Mississippi river flood control; S. 61
 Matheson, Walker G.
   Japan dams "dangerous thoughts"; IS.. 504
 Matzoths. See Gifford, Duff—Notes from Washington
 Maugham, W. Somerset
   Sacred flame. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 694
 Maurer, Wesley H.
   Discharged from Ohio university at behest of business interests; EP..... 28
 Maxton, James
   Refuses, with Cook, to negotiate with capitalist employers; EP..... 74
 Mayo, Katherine
   Miss Mayo and the Rockefeller foundation. B. B. Mundkur; C..... 521
 Mead, William Rutherford. Obituary; E..... 3
 Mechanical men. See In the driftway—Eric the robot
 Meehan, John
   Lady lies. Criticism. A. W.; D..... 694
 Meetings, Outdoor
   How to hold. A. E. Gray; C..... 110
 Mencken, H. L., in 1936. G. Hood; C..... 399
 Mencken, H. L.
   What's wrong with The Nation?; S..... 542
 Messenger, Athens, Ohio. See Newspapers
 Metropolitan life insurance company
   Writes largest group insurance policy for General motors corporation; EP..... 121
 Metropolitan museum of art
   What ails it? W. Gutman; S..... 614
 Mexico
   Calles declines to run for president; EP.. 237
   Calles: Mexico's leading citizen. E. Gruening; S..... 708
   Digging graves in Mexico. C. Beals; S.. 105
   Establishment of various postal and passenger air lines; EP..... 333
   Gil, E. P., likely to become president; EP 308
   Great trial; E..... 538
   Hanna, E. J., and Ruiz y Flores, archbishops, comment on Obregon's assassination; EP..... 120
   Life is cheap in Mexico; E..... 101
   Messiahs, Mexican. A. Brenner; S..... 266
   Morrow, Dwight W., achievement. J. P. Chamberlain; C..... 295
   Mourns three heroes: Obregon, Carranza, Mirón; EP..... 283

- News from Mexico. E. Gruening; S..... 223
 Obregon, Alvaro. E. Gruening; S..... 106
 Revival of symphony orchestra; EP..... 387
- Military training
 Case of S. Gerson at the College of the city of New York; EP..... 3
- Mill, John Stuart
 Grave of Mill. C. F. Thwing; S..... 201
- Millard, Thomas F.
 China and Japan—1928; S..... 598
 Did Japan kill Chang Tso-lin?; S..... 652
 Japan fights for Manchuria; S..... 681
- Millay, Edna St. Vincent
 And Edwin Arlington Robinson. J. H.
 Preston; C..... 42
- Miller, Kelly
 Tight walkers?; C..... 319
- Milliken, Judge Frank
 Poor handling of New Bedford strike cases; EP..... 148
- Milton, George Fort
 Johnsoniana; C..... 660
- Milwaukee, Wisconsin, strike. See Strikes—
 United States
- Miners
 Left-wing, in Pittsburgh; American civil liberties union intercedes in their behalf; EP..... 282
 See also United mine workers
- Mirón, Salvador Diaz
 Passing; EP..... 283
- Mississippi
 Mississippi speaks. G. S. K.; C..... 451
 Perry Howard and codefendants, charged with sale of offices, acquitted; EP..... 700
- Mississippi floods Engineering problem challenging comprehensive study; EP..... 589
 Hoover's tortuous policy in regard to relief; EP..... 147
 Mason, A. J., work on flood control; S..... 61
- Molière, Jean Baptiste
 Would-be gentleman. Criticism. J. W.
 Krutch; D..... 434
- Molnar, Franz
 Olympia. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 502
- Monroe doctrine
 Council of league of nations ponders doctrine and leaves it unsolved; EP..... 237
- Mooney and Billings
 Call for action toward liberation; E..... 168
 Fear-ridden California. I. F. Morrow;
 C..... 716
 National committee to work for unconditional pardon; EP..... 561
 National organization to fight for release;
 EP..... 412
 New drive for liberation; EP..... 99
 Political bigotry. R. Whitaker; C..... 247
 Quotation from private letter of Tom
 Mooney; EP..... 99
 Visit to Tom Mooney. N. Thomas; S..... 423
- Moore, Merrill
 Three sonnets; P..... 228
- Morality
 College morality; E..... 334
- Morey, Walter W.
 Inventor of teletypesetter; EP..... 701
- Morison, Samuel Eliot
 Writing official history of Harvard; EP.. 55
- Morrow, Dwight W.
 Achievement in Mexico; C..... 295
- Morrow, Irving F.
 Fear-ridden California; C..... 716
- Most immoral lady. T. Martin; D..... 694
- Moving pictures
 Future of the movies. A. Bakshy; S..... 360
 Hollywood speaks; E..... 285
 Language of images. A. Bakshy; S..... 720
 McAteer, Ercel C., contradicts Louis B.
 Mayer in regard to service of news reels; EP..... 74
 Placed in the service of a narrow patriotism; EP..... 74
 Russian contribution. A. Bakshy; S..... 94
 "Talkies," padlocking. J. N. Rosenberg;
 S..... 601
 Mr. Moneybags. C. Pollock; D..... 502
- Muck, Karl. See Haggin, B. H.—Bayreuth—1928
- Mundkur, B. B.
 Miss Mayo and the Rockefeller foundation;
 C..... 521
- Murphy, James
 His faith [in Governor Smith] is slipping;
 C..... 294
- Murray, M. J.
 Justice to Judge Murray. A. A. Berle, sr.; C..... 320
- Musgrave, Percival
 What happened in Maine; S..... 291
- Music
 Ballet Russe: 1928. B. H. Haggin; S..... 207
 Bayreuth—1928. B. H. Haggin; S..... 233
 Kreisler, Fritz; E..... 511
 Leaderless orchestra. B. Bloch; S..... 556
 Munich and Salzburg. B. H. Haggin;
 S..... 404
 Orchestra merger. B. H. Haggin; S..... 382
 Strauss in Philadelphia and New York.
 L. Adler; S..... 640
- Mussey, Henry Raymond
 Prohibition and citizenship; C..... 659
- Mussolini, Benito. See Italy—Mussolini the humorist
- Naidu, Sarojini; EP..... 439
- Nation, The
 Anonymous, of course. Ex-Journalist; C. 320
 Appreciation. A. W. Porterfield; C..... 608
 Editor's troubles. J. N. Davis, H. Gooding, G. T. Packard, L. Epstein; C..... 843
 Ex-Journalist voices his anonymous opinion of The Nation; C..... 320
 For Chicago readers. L. B. Cella; C..... 546
 New year's greetings to our readers; EP.. 699
 Post-card poll of Nation subscribers; EP.
 331, 385, 411, 437, E 470
 Readers and the campaign; C...398, 425, 451
 Rebuke. J. H. Lever; C..... 490
 WMCA puts The Nation on the air; EP 699
 What's wrong with The Nation? H. L.
 Mencken; H. M. Jones; S..... 542, 678
Nation Club of Chicago; C..... 546
- National city bank
 Questionableness of contemplated loan to Oriental development company; EP..... 466
- National education association
 Appoints E. C. Broome to investigate
 power propaganda in schools; EP..... 535
- National industrial conference board
 Studies cost of living in twelve industrial cities; EP..... 387
- National woman's party
 Chivalry and labor laws; E..... 648
- Naval disarmament. See Disarmament
- Nearing, Scott
 Free and fair elections; S..... 449
- Negroes
 Discontinuance of segregation in some government departments..... 519
 Houston's shame. H. R. Southwood; C.. 319
 Women's bureau of United States Department of Labor issues statement on white and colored women's wages; EP..... 535
 See also Alexander, Ruth—Color line in South Africa
- New Bedford, Massachusetts. See Strikes—
 United States
- New Bedford rotary club. See Hunter, E. H.
- New Mexico
 And Yale. C. P. Loomis; C..... 271
- New moon; D..... 383
- New year
 New year's greetings to our readers; EP 699
- New York Times
 Material success; EP..... 283
- New York (city)
 First India conference of America; EP.. 439
- New York (state)
 Alliance of Tammany with Republican organization; EP..... 438
 Good augury of Franklin D. Roosevelt's election as governor; EP..... 507
 Mr. Marshall's spleen. L. Marshall; C.. 491
 New York Times; material success; EP..... 283
- Newspapers
 American newspaper publishers' association aids Saturday Press; EP..... 562 American Weekly. A. J. Kohler leaves paper; EP..... 309
 Athens, O., Messenger disciplined for treating coal strike impartially; EP.. 28
 Ayer's Newspaper Annual reveals figures about vanishing Ohio dailies; E..... 54
 "Big story" in the metropolitan newspapers; Dt..... 450
 Boston still "the poor farm of journalism"; EP..... 99
 Chicago Tribune's civic deed in forcing
 Mayor Thompson to disgorge loot; EP.. 23
 Daily Californian commended; EP..... 562
 Dying daily; E..... 170
 Hoover and Scripps-Howard press; E... 415
 Martin and Life; E..... 103
 Material success of New York Times; EP 283
 Post-Dispatch, St. Louis, fiftieth anniversary; E..... 675
 Spectator, of London; one hundredth anniversary; E..... 704
 Scripps-Howard chain not to be confused with James G. Scripps's group; EP.... 412
- News-reels. See Moving pictures
- Nicaragua
 And Colombia; settlement of old dispute over certain islands; EP..... 590 Anti-imperialists in Wall Street denounce war in Nicaragua; E..... 54
 Election; preparations for Yankee-supervised election; EP..... 255
 Election; country holds its "free" election under United States guns; EP..... 509 Election, 1932; opposing presidential candidates request United States to supervise 1932 election; EP..... 467
 Freedom in Nicaragua: Program of Nationalist party; I..... 278
 Hope for Nicaragua?; E..... 647
 Moncada, José María, elected president;
 EP..... 509
 Sandino's "immortal legion"; EP..... 255
 Ugarte on Sandino; IS..... 280
- Nichols, Robert, and Maurice Brown
 Wings over Europe. Criticism. J. W.
 Krutch; D..... 721
- Nicoll, Charles
 Receives Nobel prize for medicine; EP... 563
- Night hostess. P. Dunning; D..... 327
- Nobel prizes
 Awarded to S. Undset and H. Bergson for literature; to Professors H. Wieland and A. Windaus, for chemistry, and to C. Nicoll for medicine; peace prize not awarded; EP..... 563
- Nobile, Umberto
 The crew of the Italia. M. P. Yuppa; C. 202
- Norman, Charles
 Autumn; P..... 248
- Norris, George W.
 Hope for progressives; S..... 679
 In reply to Senator Norris. A. G. Wray,
 C. M. Enns, G. L. Record, P. Pollack;
 C..... 137
 On a third party; C..... 63
 States reasons for supporting Governor
 Smith; EP..... 465
- North, Sterling
 Chicago; P..... 455
- North Carolina
 Save North Carolina! N. B. Lewis; C.... 453
- North pole. See Arctic exploration
- Northwestern public utilities company. See Stewart, E. A.
- Nugent, Elliot
 By request. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 434
- O
 Obregon, Alvaro, assassination of. See Mexico —Life is cheap in Mexico; also Mexico
 —Obregon, Alvaro
- O'Brien, Timothy
Voz populi; C..... 425
- Ocean races. See Yachting
- Ogden, Mary
 A daughter is a daughter; C..... 109
- Ohio
 Possibility of nomination of Peter Witt for governorship; EP..... 2
- Oil. See Petroleum
- Olympia. F. Molnar; D..... 502
- Olympics. See Sports
- Ophthalmia neonatorum. See Blindness
- Opium
 Opium leaks through. E. N. La Motte; IS 70
 Opium-smoking in Far East. E. N. La Motte; IS..... 610
- Orchestras
 Leaderless. B. Bloch; M..... 556
- Ownership, public. See Public ownership
- Orr, Samuel
 Do it now!; C..... 319
- Ossietzky, Carl von
 Revolt of German women; S..... 478
- Oukrainka
 What's the Ukraine?; C..... 295
- Our readers and the campaign; C...398, 425, 451
- Outdoor meetings
 How to hold outdoor meetings. A. E.
 Gray; C..... 110
- Outlook and Independent
 Publishes material exculpating Sacco and Vanzetti; EP..... 465
- Owen, Ruth Bryan
 Elected to House of Representatives; EP. 534
- Oxford and Asquith, Earl of Reveals war secrets. W. MacDonald; S. 340
- P
 Packard, Mrs. G. T.
 Editor's troubles; C..... 343
- Panama Canal
 British oil intrigues at canal. L. Denny;
 S..... 36
- Panathenaenzug; EP..... 149
- Paraguay. See Bolivia
- Parry, Albert
 Dead baron; C..... 660
- Parulekar, N. B.
 Hindu farmers at bay; IS..... 329
- Peace
 Kellogg treaties sanction war. E. M.
 Borchard; IS..... 234
 Kellogg treaties vitiated by instigators' false positions; EP..... 165
 Navies and peace; E..... 151
 "Peace bridge." K. Spitzer; C..... 135
 Russia's pertinent reply to France on Kellogg "peace pact"; EP..... 237
 Those "peace pacts"; E..... 214
 What is this Kellogg talk about peace?; E 76
- Pennsylvania
 Roots of corruption; E..... 258
- Petroleum
 British intrigue at the Panama canal. L.
 Denny; S..... 36
 More about Salt Creek fields oil scandal;
 EP..... 438
 Oil complications in Venezuela and Columbia; EP..... 308
 Senator Walsh uncovers minor oil scandal; EP..... 411
- Pettee, Charles E.
 Now is the time; C..... 606
- Pfeiffer, Julius
 "Zu ehren von Al Smith"; C..... 158
- Phantom lover. G. Kaiser; D..... 277
- Pharo, Eugene
 Candy white list; C..... 109
- Philadelphia note. M. B. Scheler; C..... 660
- Philippines
 Filipino's land. A. V. Castillo; IS..... 344
 Stimson shows his hand. R. Gould; IS.. 463

- Pickering, Ruth
The dance; Doris Humphrey and others; S 580
Piedmont and Northern railway company. See Brown, C. K.—Railroad building and local pride
- Photography
Capstaff, I. G., inventor of color camera; EP 167
- Pinchot, Amos
Hoover and the "big lift"; S 706
Play without a name. A. Strong; D 694
Playfair, Nigel
When Crummies played. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 406
- Poems
Angel Guri. B. Lee 689
Autumn. C. Norman 248
Chicago. S. North 455
Christmas eve: New York. H. S. White 717
Deserted barn. H. S. White 182
Down in the long grass. D. Leonard 272
Eleventh anniversary. M. Eastman 522
Eucharist. A. Singleton 296
Evening before rain. L. A. G. Strong 600
For a few hours. M. Luhrs 111
For St. Bartholomew's day. M. Cowley 175
G. O. P. muses 387
Hamlet in modern dress. J. Rorty 159
Have you heard the latest news? 257
Housewarming. H. S. White 492
In memory of Fanny Garrison Villard. W. L. Garrison, jr. 62
In Papageria. M. Austin 65
Infidelity, an. G. Bussey 90
Judge, a. J. Falstaff 618
Literary epitaphs. E. Hartsock 321
Little triangle. M. Van Doren 617
Love coming late. M. Austin 43
Man does not ask for much. S. J. Kunitz 182
Mighty is man. W. R. Benét 159
Old executioner, the. M. Coleman 296
Orthodox. R. B. Hunt 366
Portrait. J. G. Fletcher 204
Prologue to a reading of poems. J. Rorty 400
Radical. R. Lechitner 90
Remembering Vaughan in New England. G. Taggard 357
Sincere conversation. L. Riding 204
Some grass. T. H. Ferril 136
Song of the moderns. J. G. Fletcher 16
To a friend. B. Deutsch 111
To a girl. B. Cooksley 661
To certain Bostonians. W. Bynner 522
Three sonnets. M. Moore 228
Two California poems. H. Flanner 272
Two poems. S. B. Cooksley 321
Under the sheen. H. S. White 576
- Poetry
Popular long poems; E 169
- Poincaré, Raymond
Poincaré legend. R. Dell; S 153
- Poland, Orville S.
Anti-saloon league; C 89
- Poland
A nation on trial. W. Zukerman; IP 304
- Polaris, the Camping on an ice floe; E 6
- Police
Brutality and irregularity; EP 308
Cruelty. J. E. Foster; C 521
Reforming police practice. L. E. Ginsburg; C 715
- Political prisoners
Leo Ellis released; EP 412
"Politics, pressure"; C 89
- Pollack, Philip
In reply to Senator Norris; C 157
- Pollock, Channing
Mr. Moneybags. Criticism. P. B.; D 502
- Popescu, Aureliu Ion
Rumanian minorities; C 574
- Population
Dense. A. Ireland; C 343
- Porterfield, Allen W.
Appreciation; C 608
- Porto Rico
Appeal for victims of hurricane; EP 281
Bothersome colonies; E 703
Too dense. A. Ireland; C 343
- Post-Dispatch, St. Louis. See Newspapers
- Post-war time
Ten years since the armistice; EP 508
- Power
Mergers and the public; E 150
Power propaganda in schools; EP 535
- Power trust
Disclosures of John B. Sheridan with regard to activities 60
Teachers and the power trust. F. C. Hanson; C 202
- Pratt, Ruth Baker; EP 534
- Preparedness
President Butler versus Hoover; EP 191
- Presidential campaign
Blundering through the campaign. F. R. Kent; S 394
Disgusted. D. A. Cohen; C 452
Final word, a. N. Thomas; C 490
For Foster. J. Kalar; C 490
From a life prisoner. C. L. Baumer; C 491
Government by the people the great issue. N. Schmidt; C 453
Hope for progressives. G. W. Norris; S 679
Issue is tolerance. E. M. Earle; C 294
Nation's presidential poll; EP 331, 385, 411, 437; E 470
- New votes for Thomas. F. V. Field, J. Herling; C 491
Oversight, an. O. M. Johnson; C 490
Rebuke. J. L. Lever; C 490
Religion and liquor. D. McCarl; C 320
Religious issue. See Religion; Religious issue; Religious liberty; Roman Catholicism
Wall street and the election. D. A. Cohen; C 452
"Pressure politics"; C 89
Preston, John Hyde
Robinson and Millay; C 42
Professors, college. See College professors
- Progressives
Importance of six men, the; E 240
Special plea for election of progressives; EP 437
- Prohibition
And citizenship. H. R. Mussey; C 659
And Olympic games; EP 165
Anti-saloon league. O. S. Poland, S. T. Byington, W. MacDonald; C 89
Cocktail presidents. J. Edwards, jr.; C 42
Difficulties in way of enforcement; EP 673
Farmers independent of prohibition through applejack 509
Governor Sweet and Mr. Brown. W. E. Sweet; C 134
It seems to Governor Sweet. W. E. Sweet; C 14
No pussyfooting in dealing with liquor problem; E 4
Rival claims with regard to meaning of election; EP 533
Staggering sums needed in enforcement of Volstead act; EP 590
Tortuous course in Canadian provinces and New Zealand; EP 562
- Prohme, William
Internal conflict in China; IS 725
- Propaganda, power, in schools; EP 535
- Prosperity
What is it?; EP 591
- Pruette, Lorine
Summer school; S 86
- Public ownership
Canada's publicly owned and operated railway system a success; EP 413
- Public utilities
Behind the power lobby; E 57
Business is not business; E 442
Case of James S. Thomas; EP 332
Cautious propaganda; EP 386
Electric rates need readjustment. E. J. Kates; S 316
Marvelous organism of utilities lobby; EP 1
Nothing wrong in W. A. White's fee for address before National electric light association; EP 332
Officials defy Federal trade commission; EP 438
Open letter to Owen D. Young; E 592
Salutary results follow from Federal trade commission's exposé of power propaganda; EP 535
Teachers and the power trust. F. C. Hanson; C 202
Unsatisfactory state of Boulder dam bill; EP 700 Utilities tactics criticized by John W. Colton; EP 2
- Publications, new
New England Quarterly, the; EP 212
- Publishing firms
Announcement of changes in list of American publishers; EP 167
- Quakers
Declaration of some of the fundamental principles of Christian truth; E 388
Difference, a. W. C. Woodward; C 454
Question for Quakers, a. N. M. Smith; C 491
- Rabold, Emil
German social democracy, the; S 477
- Rachich, Punica, Serbian assassin; EP 3
- Radich, Stefan; EP 166
- Radio
WMCA gives valuable privilege to The Nation; EP 699
Radio commission, federal Extends license of Debs radio station; EP 212
- Rai, Lala Lajpat. Obituary; EP 563
- Railroads
German federal railroads company demonstrates efficiency of unified control; EP 467
Publicly owned and operated Canadian railway system a success; EP 413 Railroad building and local pride. C. K. Brown; S 176
- Rainbow. L. Stallings; D 694
- Raphaelson, Samson
Young love. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 556
- Rapp, William Jourdan
Citizen, do your duty!; S 245
- Raskob, John J.
Explanation of retirement from active connection with General Motors; EP 119
Nomination as chairman of Democratic national committee characteristic of Smith strategy; EP 73
- What brought him, a Republican, to leadership of Democratic party; EP 73
- Ratner, Joseph
Smith and the liberals; C 393
- Record, George L.
In reply to Senator Norris; C 157
- Redemption. L. Tolstoi; D 640
- "Red menace," proper handling of Set forth by E. H. Hunter of Industrial defense association of Boston; EP 239
- Reed, Forrest F.
As seen in Arkansas; C 153
- Reed, Mary
Soviet health; IS 133
- Rehoboth colony
When races intermarry. E. A. Hooton; S 84
- Religion and liquor. D. McCarl; C 320
And oil, in politics. E. C. Barney; C 135
Churches and peace; I 436
Science and religion. T. T. Abele; C 546
- Religious issue
Mr. Tilson denies all. J. Q. Tilson; C 343
- Religion important. J. J. Sternbach; C 490
- Religious liberty
The one issue. N. M. Harris; C 320
- Renner, Karl
Ten years of Austria's republic; IS 583
- Reparations payment. See Germany
- Republican party
Dr. Work outranks W. M. Butler for sheer ineptitude in political management 132
- Rice, Russell L.
Vox populi; C 425
- Richman, Arthur
Heavy traffic. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 277
- Richmond, Virginia
Patrick Henry's speech delivered there, not at Williamsburg, Virginia. E. W. Shaw; C 134
- Riding, Laura
Sincere conversation; P 204
- Riding, Laura, and Robert Graves
Invert; C 660
- Riesenberg, Felix
Master of the Vestris; S 570
Sea is not safe; S 650
- Ringside. H. Daab and E. E. Paramore, jr.; D 302
- Robinson, Edwin Arlington
And Edna St. Vincent Millay. J. H. Preston; C 42
- Robinson, Joseph Taylor; EP 27
- Roche, Josephine
Her control of the Rocky Mountain fuel company; EP 233
- Rockefeller, J. D., jr., contributes $5,000,000 for restoration of Williamsburg, Va.; E 55
- Rockefeller foundation. K. Mayo and the foundation. B. B. Mundkur; C 521
- Rocky Mountain fuel company
Control by J. Roche; EP 233
- Rogers, Will
Bunkless candidate. D. Van Doren; S 314
- Roman Catholics
And birth control. P. J. Ward, M. Sanger; C 545
- Roman catholicism
Catholic bigotry too. E. B. Barrett; C 343
Catholic despair. J. Costigan; C 575
Catholic menace. M. L. Swift; C 399
"Dirtiest political campaign"; E 440
Mr. Marshall and Al Smith. C. C. Marshall; C 64
- Roosevelt, Franklin D.
Good augury of his election as governor; EP 507
Roosevelt and Houghton; E 289
- Rorty, James
Hamlet in modern dress; P 159
Prologue to reading of poems; P 400
- Rosenberg, James N.
Padlocking the "talkies"; S 601
- Rouillard, Harry Enos
Next; C 575
- Rubber
Plantations discussed at institute of politics; EP 233
- Ruiz y Flores, archbishop of Michoacan; EP 120
- Rukeyser, Merryle Stanley
Chain stores: the revolution in retailing; S 563
Wall street's speculative optimism; S 514
- Rumania
Call to Rumanians, a; I 208
Government temporarily without cabinet; EP 508
Maniu, J., offers new slogan for his country; EP 535
Minorities. A. I. Popescu; C 574
Two pictures of Rumania. H. Solow; C 247
- Russia
Economic and financial recognition by United States grows; EP 439
Have we recognized soviet Russia? M. Fontaine; S 543
Jewish state in the soviet union, a. L. Talmy; IS 51
Marie Feodorovna. Obituary; EP 413
Misleading reports in newspapers foretelling fall of Soviet government; EP 645
Real situation in Russia. A. R. Williams; S 516; (correction, 609)
Replies pertinently to France on Kellogg "peace pact"; EP 237
Russians poor propagandists; EP 333

- Shakhta trial, end of; EP..... 53
 Shakhta trial; account by W. Duranty in
New York Times; E..... 53
 Soviet health. M. Reed; IS..... 188
 Stalin-Trotsky controversy discussed in M.
 Eastman's reply to A. R. Williams's criticisms of Eastman in review of Trotsky's book..... 715
 What's the Ukraine? Oukrainka; C..... 295
 Ruth, Babe; EP..... 101
 Ryan, Robert
 Brokers and suckers; S..... 154
 Ryan, Thomas Fortune. Obituary; EP..... 591
 Ryanlite, remarkable new headlight; EP..... 121
- S
- Sacco-Vanzetti
 Boston censors "Gods of the Lightning";
 E..... 593
 First anniversary of execution; EP..... 211 Fuller, A. T., attacks "best people" in valedictory address; EP..... 643
 Fuller's, A. T., way. C. Hill; C..... 180
 Kallen, H. M., offends reactionaries on first anniversary of execution; EP..... 211
 Material indicating innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti published by Outlook and In- dependent; EP..... 465
 Sacco record; E..... 77
 Sacco and Vanzetti. G. Jackson; S..... 172
 Sacco-Vanzetti—a call for action; E..... 168
 Sacco-Vanzetti meetings. Sacco-Vanzetti memorial committee, G. Jackson; C..... 180
 Way of Boston. G. Jackson; S..... 292
 Sacred flame. W. S. Maugham; D..... 694
 St. Louis Post-Dispatch. See Newspapers
 Salt Creek oil fields scandal, more about; EP.. 438
 Sanger, Margaret
 Catholics and birth control; C..... 545
 Smith and birth control; C..... 452
 Santo Domingo
 All nations of the Americas to build a
 Columbus memorial lighthouse; EP..... 309
Saturday Press. See Free press; also Newspapers
 Scheer, Admiral Reinhard von. Obituary; EP. 701
 Scheler, Michael B.
 Philadelphia note; C..... 660
 Schmidt, Nathaniel
 Great issue, the; C..... 453
 Schoenaich, Paul Freiherr von
 German pacifism since the war; S..... 482
 Schools
 Power propaganda in schools; EP..... 535
 Schools, summer. See Education
 Schubert, Franz
 Commemoration of centenary of his death;
 EP..... 563
 Schuler, Rev. "Bob"; EP..... 255
 Schwimmer, Rosika
 Triumph in courts over American reactionaries; EP..... 28
 Scott, C. P.
 On disarmament; EP..... 144
 Scripps-Howard press
 And Hoover; E..... 415
 See also Newspapers
 Sea tragedy
 Lesson of the Vestris; E..... 676
 Master of the Vestris. F. Riesenberg; S. 570
 Official investigation into sinking of the Vestris; EP..... 589
 Sea is not safe! F. Riesenberg; S..... 650
 Ugly sea tragedy; E..... 565
 Seagle, William. See Ernst, Morris L., and William Seagle—The literary critic as expert
 Seattle, Washington
 What happened in Seattle. J. N. Budlong;
 S..... 197
 Sedgwick, Ellery
 Publication of so-called Lincoln letters in Atlantic unwise; EP..... 673
 Selenine, George
 More pay for jurors; C..... 110
 Serbia
 Assassination in skuptchina in Belgrade;
 EP..... 3
 Serri, F. R.
 Attacked in Brooklyn courtroom by Judge
 Atwell; EP..... 192
 Case brought by him against Judge William H. Atwell is dismissed; EP..... 508 Severing, Carl, German minister of the interior; EP..... 644
 Shakhta trial. See Russia
 Shaw, E. W.
 We apologize; C..... 134
 Shaw, George Bernard
 G. B. S. on America. D. Archer; C.... 135
 Major Barbara. Criticism. J. W. Krutch;
 D..... 666
 Sheridan, John B.
 Disclosures with regard to activities of power trust..... 60
 Sherman law, drive against Hoover and the "big lift." A. Pinchot; S. 706
 Shipman, S., and M. Marcin
 Trapped. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 302
 Shipping
 Better and bigger transatlantic liners; E. 54
 Mystery surrounding the building of the White Star line's new Oceanic; E..... 54
 Ocean liners' limits. E. D. Abbott; C.... 158
 Steamship speed topic of animated discussion; EP..... 239
 Simkhovitch, Mary Kingsbury
 Al Smith—able, honest, liberal; S..... 10
 Simonson, Lee
 Bombing London; S..... 318
 Sinclair, Upton
 How Upton Sinclair votes. U. Sinclair; C. 247
 Singing jailbirds. Criticism. J. W.
 Krutch; D..... 722
 Singing jailbirds. U. Sinclair; D..... 722
 Singleton, Anne
 Eucharist; P..... 296
 Slater, Oscar
 Set free after long imprisonment by Scottish court of appeals; EP..... 120
 Sleeping sickness. See Stratman-Thomas,
 W. K.
 Sloane, William Milligan. Obituary; EP..... 283
 Slosson, Preston W.
 Hoover's record; C..... 454
 Smedley, Agnes
 Germany's red front; IS..... 116
 Smith, Alfred Emanuel
 Achieves greatest popular receptions in Republican territory; EP..... 466
 Al Smith—able, honest, liberal. M. K.
 Simkhovitch; S..... 10
 Al Smith—Catholic, Tammany, wet. J.
 Cannon, jr.; S..... 9
 Al Smith speaks out; E..... 193
 Asleep about Al? W. Taylor; C..... 88
 Blame. M. A. Gaffney; C..... 295
 Can Al Smith carry New Jersey? F. L.
 Ferris; S..... 126
 Catholic defense. J. R. Jones; C..... 452 Dishonesty of Rev. "Bob" Schuler's attack; EP..... 255
 Faith [in Smith] is slipping. J. Murphy;
 C..... 294
 Governor Smith the nominee; E..... 30
 Has taken offensive in campaign; EP... 307
 Is Al Smith afraid of the South? W. E.
 B. Du Bois..... 392
 It's all Al Smith. L. S. Gannett; S..... 8
 Marshall, C. C., and Al Smith; C..... 64
 N. B. R. T. Thompson; C..... 660
 Optimistic voices from California; EP... 412
 Outspoken or naive? C. E. Tallmadge,
 M. Coleman; C..... 270
 Poverty of economic thought revealed in controversies of presidential candidates;
 EP..... 466
 Save North Carolina! N. B. Lewis; C.... 453
 Smith and birth control. M. Sanger; C.... 452
 Smith and the liberals. J. Ratner; C.... 398
 Smith breaks the South; E..... 537
 Smith for the cabinet. W. Binner; C..... 688
 Straton, Rev. J. R., treatment by Smith;
 EP..... 166
 Takes lead in campaign; E..... 53
 Thomas, N., on Al Smith. N. Thomas; C. 226
 Western tour furthered Smith's candidacy;
 EP..... 331
 Who is responsible? [for anti-Smith propaganda] E. S. Harrison; C..... 452
 Why dries should support Al. M. A. Gaffney; C..... 15
 "Zu ehren von Al Smith." J. Pfeiffer; C. 158
 Smith, Charles
 Debates evolution with B. M. Bogard; EP. 533
 Jailed in Arkansas for preaching atheism;
 EP..... 438, 533
 Smith, Nellie M.
 Question for Quakers, a; C..... 491
 Socialist party
 Do it now! S. Orr; C..... 319
 National campaign during September; EP. 331
 Socialism and prejudice. E. Levinson; C. 575
 Socialist party. H. W. Laidler; C..... 660
 Socialist vote in presidential campaign;
 EP..... 643
 Sorensen, C. A.
 Attacked in Nebraska by American legion for opposition to war; EP..... 281
 Solow, Herbert
 Two pictures of Rumania; C..... 247
 South
 Either way, the South wins. J. N. Aiken;
 S..... 244
 Is Al Smith afraid of the South? W. E.
 B. Du Bois; S..... 392
 Prominent Southerners denounce race issue in campaign; EP..... 438
 Southern defense. J. C. Granbery; C.... 608
 Southern gloom. T. V. Bodine; C..... 608
 South Africa
 Acute friction between native colored and pure white labor organizations; EP..... 644 Color line in South Africa. R. Alexander;
 IS..... 530
 South pole. See Antarctic exploration
 Southwood, H. R.
 Houston's shame; C..... 319
Spectator, The. See Newspapers—Spectator
 Speculation
 Brokers and "suckers." R. Ryan; S.... 154
 Spewacks, the, and George Jessel
 War song. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 406 Spitzer, Karl
 The "peace bridge"; C..... 135
 Sports
 "Amateur"; E..... 103
 Americans crash polo gates and see the show; EP..... 387
 Dr. Cherrington attributes American success in Olympics to prohibition, ignoring other nations; EP 165, see also 332
 "Friendly" Olympics; E..... 151 Growing indifference of undergraduates toward football; EP..... 591
 Nina and Elena winners in transatlantic yacht race; EP..... 120
 Nineteen men killed playing football in
 1928; EP..... 645
 On with the dance!; E..... 32
 Tennis the international sport par excellence; E..... 54
 Which team won first honors in Olympic games of 1928?; EP..... 165, 332
 Wonderful feat of Babe Ruth; EP..... 101
 Stallings, Laurence
 Rainbow. Criticism. M. G.; D..... 694
 Sternbach, Jacob J.
 Religion important; C..... 490
 Stevens, Doris; EP..... 289
 Stewart, E. A.
 Becomes president of Northwestern public utilities company; EP..... 672
 Stewart, Robert
 What the farmer is up against; S..... 422
 Stewart, Robert W.
 Escapes penalty on legal technicality; EP. 589
 Stimson, Henry L.
 Shows his hand; R. Gould; IS..... 463
 Stone, Wilmer T.
 Thomas and a new party; C..... 398
 Straight through the door. W. Hodge; D.... 434
 Stratman-Thomas, Warren K.
 Goes to Africa to conquer sleeping sickness; EP..... 887
 Straton, John Roach; EP..... 166
 Rum, Romanism. . . . A. C. Watson; C.. 247
 Stresemann, Gustav
 Clash with Zaleski; EP..... 700
 Stresemann. E. Ludwig; S..... 474
 Strikes—United States
 Cotton manufacturers in New Bedford rebuffed; EP..... 74
 Defeat of the coal strike; E..... 102
 Equivocal ruling of Judge Milliken on what is a crime in New Bedford strike; EP.. 148 Imprisonment of Allen A. Hosier company strikers, Kenosha, Wisconsin, for defying an injunction; EP..... 508
 Jolly riot among New Bedford textile strikers; EP..... 148
 Strikers turn tables upon Adler & Sons in Milwaukee; EP..... 467 Unsatisfactory ending of New Bedford strike; EP..... 386
 Young women's Christian association ejects two girl strikers in New Bedford; EP.. 211
 Strong, Austin
 Play without a name. Criticism. J. W.
 Krutch; D..... 694
 Strong, L. A. G.
 Evening before rain; P..... 600
 Sudermann, Hermann. Obituary; E..... 593
 Sugar
 Failure of governmental attempts at restricting production in Cuba and Czecho-Slovakia; EP..... 256
 Summer schools. See Education
 Superstitions
 Business superstitions; E..... 286
 Sweeney, James
 Strange case of Sweeney, saved from electric chair in New Jersey; EP..... 29
 Sweet, William E.
 Governor Sweet and Mr. Brown; C..... 134
 It seems to Governor Sweet; C..... 14
 Swift, Morrison I.
 Catholic menace; C..... 399
 Switzer, J. A.; EP..... 386
- T
- Taggard, Genevieve
 Remembering Vaughan in New England;
 P..... 357
 Tallmadge, Charles E.
 Outspoken or naive?; C..... 270
 Talmy, Leon
 Jewish state in the soviet union; IS..... 51
 Tammany and womanhood. E. L. Upton; C. 426
 Taylor, William
 Asleep about Al?; C..... 88
 Teachers and the power trust. F. C. Hanson;
 C..... 202
 Teaching
 Advice to a prospective teacher. G. Williams; S..... 602
 Telescope
 Largest in world; EP..... 467
 Teletypesetter
 New invention facilitating newspaper publishing; EP..... 701
 Tennessee
 Knoxville boasts a baby with a tail; EP.. 645
 Tennis
 International sport par excellence; E.... 54
 Terry, Ellen
 Ellen Terry. J. R. Towse; S..... 133
 Obituary; EP..... 100
 Terzopoulos, C. L.
 Venizelos; C..... 227
 Texas
 Lynching of Negro on eve of Democratic national convention in Houston; EP.... 2

- Theater
 Boston protects itself; E..... 593
 Law and the lady; E..... 389
 Season in Moscow—IV. Mise en scène.
 J. W. Krutch; S..... 40
 War song. G. Jessel; C..... 546
 See also Censorship
 These days. K. Clugston; D..... 581
 Third degree. See Police
 Third party
 Senator Norris on a third party. G. W.
 Norris; C..... 63
 This thing called love. E. Burke; D..... 383
 Thomas, James S.
 Equivocal connection with public utilities;
 EP..... 332
 Thomas, Norman
 Comments on Hoover and Smith; EP..... 466
 Defines issues of national political campaign; EP..... 147
 Final word; C..... 490
 Norman Thomas. M. Coleman; S..... 128
 Norman Thomas for president. F. A.
 Henson; C..... 88
 Norman Thomas on Al Smith; C..... 226
 Polled 300,000 votes in presidential campaign; EP..... 643
 Sets forth inadequacy of Democratic party's power program; EP..... 331 Sole expounder of economic question in presidential campaign; E..... 414
 Thomas and a new party. A. B. Lewis,
 W. T. Stone; C..... 398
 Visit to Tom Mooney; S..... 423
 Waged finest campaign; E..... 440
 Thompson, Roy T.
 N. B.; C..... 660
 Three cheers; D..... 502
 Thwing, Charles Franklin
 Grave of Mill; S..... 201
 Tilson, John Q.
 Mr. Tilson denies all; C..... 343
 Timperley, H. J.
 Truth about Tsinanfu; S..... 130
 Tin-pan alley; D..... 557
 Toksvig, Signe
 Danish adventure; S..... 12
 Tolerance
 The issue is tolerance. E. M. Earle; C.. 294
 Toller, Ernst
 Post-war German drama; S..... 488
 Tolstoi, Leo
 Leo Tolstoi: 1828-1928; E..... 213
 Redemption. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 640
 Tolstoi as a novelist. J. Galsworthy; S. 218
 Tonight at twelve. O. Davis; D..... 641
 Towse, J. Ranken
 Ellen Terry; S..... 133
 Trade commission, federal. See Public utilities
 Trapped. S. Shipman and M. Marcin; D..... 302 Travel
 Back from Carcassonne. M. Lindsay; S. 268
 Travel statistics; EP..... 509
 Treadwell, Sophie
 Machinal. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 302
 Trevelyan, George Otto
 Indictment of British rule in India; EP.. 75 Salute on occasion of his ninetieth birthday; EP..... 75
 Tribune, Chicago. See Newspapers
 "Tristram"; E..... 169
 Trotzky-Stalin controversy
 Max Eastman replies. M. Eastman; C... 715
 Tsinanfu. See China
 Tunney, Gene
 Woes of successful prize-fighter; EP..... 192
- U
 Ugarte, Manuel
 Ugarte on Sandino; IS..... 280
 Ukraine. See Russia
 Undset, Sigrid
 Receives Nobel prize for literature; EP.. 563
 Unemployment
 British versus American treatment of problem; EP..... 166
 Plea for construction fund to be used in time of unemployment; EP..... 590
 United mine workers
 Disgraceful attack on left-wing rivals assembled in convention in Pittsburgh;
 EP..... 282
 United States—Agriculture
 What the farmer is up against. R. Stewart..... 422
 United States—China
 China, treaty with; E..... 123
 United States—Congress
 Demand for reapportioning membership... 675 Election of three new women members to house; EP..... 534
 United States—Department of labor
 Chivalry and labor laws; E..... 648
 Women's bureau issues statement of white and colored women's wages; EP..... 535
 United States—Diplomacy
 Unregenerate diplomacy; E..... 472
 United States—Federal radio commission
 Stops dissemination of private propaganda;
 EP..... 535
 United States—Federal trade commission
 Consumer's view; E..... 259
 Files case against Electric bond and share company; EP..... 643
 Salutary results follow commission's exposé of power propaganda; EP..... 535
- United States—Foreign policy
 Amazing spread of institute habit; EP.. 283
 United States—Foreign relations
 Have we recognized soviet Russia? M.
 Fontaine; S..... 543
 Inexpediency of bankers' loans to Japan during unsettled political conditions in Orient; EP..... 466
 United States and England growing unfriendly; EP..... 671
 What is this Kellogg talk about peace?; E. 76
 United States—Internal revenue bureau Names 283 persons with income of more than $1,000,000; EP..... 535
 United States—National education association
 Appoints E. C. Broome to investigate
 power propaganda in schools; EP..... 535
 United States—Navy
 Every new cruiser built against England;
 EP..... 561
 Mr. Coolidge plays with fire; E..... 564
 Row between Secretary Kellogg and Representative Britten over naval discussions with Premier Baldwin; EP..... 643
 Stop the cruiser bill!; E..... 703
 United States—Politics and government
 Al Smith speaks out; E..... 193
 As like as two peas [the two older political parties]; E..... 122
 As the farmers go, so goes the election.
 W. G. Clugston; S..... 337
 Big show at Houston. L. S. Gannett; S. 34
 Blundering through the campaign. F. R.
 Kent; S..... 394
 Can Al Smith carry New Jersey? F. L.
 Ferris; S..... 126
 Chicago bullets. Anonymous..... 82
 Citizen, do your duty! W. J. Rapp; S.. 245
 Consolation in results of voting for United States senators; EP..... 507
 Curtis's oily hands. F. Babcock; S..... 288
 Democracy and the liquor problem; E.... 4
 "Dirtiest political campaign"; E..... 440
 Either way, the South wins. J. N. Aiken;
 S..... 244
 Final phase of campaign; EP..... 281
 Governor Smith the nominee; E..... 30
 Great issue. N. Schmidt; C..... 453
 Hoover accepts; E..... 169
 Hoover stands for restriction of immigration; EP..... 307
 Hoover whispering campaign. Unofficial Spokesman..... 263
 Hoover wins; E..... 510
 Hope for progressives. G. W. Norris; S. 679
 How Upton Sinclair votes. U. Sinclair;
 C..... 247
 Importance of six men [progressive candidates of the United States senate]; E.. 240
 Inept management of Hoover campaign;
 EP..... 331
 Insulting the Coolidge cabinet. F. Babcock; S..... 243
 Is Al Smith afraid of the South? W. E.
 B. Du Bois; S..... 392
 Issue is tolerance. E. M. Earle; C..... 294
 Issues of campaign as set forth by Norman Thomas; EP..... 147
 Meaning of election with regard to prohibition; EP..... 533
 Nation's presidential poll; EP. 331, 385, 411,
 437; E. 470
 Notes from Washington. D. Gilfond; S.. 519
 Our readers and the campaign; C. 398, 425, 451
 Political gymnastics of politicians and newspapers; EP..... 211
 Politicians bouncing back into party folds;
 E..... 53
 Possible disparity between electoral and popular vote shown by election; EP..... 534 Potatoes versus presidents—campaign contributions; EP..... 119
 Protestant menace; E..... 311
 Real issues of the campaign; E..... 414
 Republicans sweep Maine in gubernatorial contest; EP..... 255
 Roots of corruption; E..... 258
 Sale of Southern post-office jobs in return for contributions to Republican campaign committees; EP..... 73
 Showing of straw votes in various states;
 EP..... 147
 Smash-up of Democratic party; EP..... 507
 Smith and Robinson; EP..... 27
 Smith breaks the South; E..... 537
 Smith has taken offensive; EP..... 307
 South is still solid. C. B. Hoover; S.... 199
 Southern bishops; E..... 149
 Swan song for lame ducks; E..... 646
 Undemocratic democracy; E..... 675
 What happened in Maine. P. Musgrave;
 S..... 291
 What next in Washington? P. Y. Anderson; S..... 540
 What of the democracy?; E..... 536
 Woman's party and Mr. Hoover; E..... 312
 "Young Bob" La Follette renominated for United States senator from Wisconsin;
 EP..... 255
 United States—Politics and superstition
 Business superstitions; E..... 286
 United States—Tariff
 Discreditable utterances of Smith and Hoover; EP..... 411
 Smith, Hoover, and the tariff. O. G. Villard; S..... 444
- United States—Transportation act of 1920
 Railroad building and local pride. C. K.
 Brown; S..... 176
 University of California. See Campbell, W. W.
 Unregenerate diplomacy; E..... 472
 Untermyer, Louis
 Angna Enters; S..... 616
 Upton, Etta L.
 Tammany and womanhood; C..... 426
 Utilities, public. See Public utilities
 Utopia
 Mr. Lorimer and me. S. Lewis; S..... 81
 My private Utopia. U. Sinclair; S..... 39
 Paradise enow. A. Jourdan; C..... 15
 Political utopia. F. C. Howe; S..... 178
- V
 V.. O. G.
 Ten years of republican Germany; E.... 468
 Vacations;
 Back from Carassonne. M. Lindsay; S.. 268
 E..... 215
 Vagabondia. See Yachting
 Van Doren, Dorothy
 Will Rogers, the bunkless candidate; S.. 314
 Van Doren, Mark
 Little triangle; P..... 617
 Retires from active editorial staff of Nation; EP..... 309
 van Loon, Hendrik Willem
 Exclusive; Ct..... 261
 Full circle; Ct..... 79
 Movies; Ct..... 443
 Season of good-will in South America; Ct. 105
 Vane, William S.
 Part at Republican national convention.. 132
 Venezuela
 Great jump in oil production; EP..... 308
 Venizelos, Eleutherios; EP..... 100
 Venizelos. C. L. Terzopoulos; C..... 227
 Verneuil, Louis
 Jealousy. Criticism. P. B.; D..... 502
 Vestris. See Sea tragedy
 Villard, Fanny Garrison. Obituary; E..... 56
 In memory of Fanny Garrison Villard. W.
 L. Garrison, jr.; P..... 62
 Villard, Oswald Garrison
 More revelations of Colonel House; S.... 595
 Smith, Hoover, and the tariff; S..... 444
 Virgin islands
 Bothersome colonies; E..... 703
 Virginia
 Doubtful. R. M. Brown; C..... 426
- W WMCA
 Puts The Nation on the air; EP..... 699
 Wages
 Real wages. P. H. Douglas; C..... 454
 Wagner operas. See Haggin, B. H.—Bayreuth—1928
 Waldorf lunch system, inc.
 Two hundred workers stricken with some form of poisoning; EP..... 99
 Wall street and the election. D. A. Cohen; C. 452
 Wallstreet
 Old chronicle. E. M. Whitesmith; C.... 660
 Wall Street
 Brokers and "suckers." R. Ryan; S.... 154
 Wall Street's speculative optimism. M. S.
 Rukeyser; S..... 514
 Walsh, Thomas J.
 Uncovers minor oil scandal; EP..... 411
 War
 Bombing London. L. Simonson; S..... 318
 War debts
 Blood from a stone; E..... 537
 War song. The Spewacks and G. Jessel; D.. 406
 Ward, Patrick J.
 Catholics and birth control; C..... 545
 Warren, Whitney; EP..... 28
 Wasservogel, Isidor
 Legal aspects of accident industry; EP.. 412
 Watson, Agnes C.
 Rum, Romanism . . . ; C..... 247
 Ways, Max; Dt..... 156
 Weather
 Hot weather; E..... 241
 West, George P.
 California is for Hoover; S..... 339
 West, Mae. See Theater—Law and the lady
 West, Roy O.
 Senate stands between him and headship of Department of Interior; EP..... 148 Unfit for position of secretary of the interior; EP..... 672
 What of the democracy?; E..... 536
 When Crummies played. N. Playfair; D.... 406
 Whitaker, Robert
 Political bigotry; C..... 247
 White, Hal Saunders
 Christmas eve: New York; P..... 717
 Deserted barn; P..... 182
 Housewarming; P..... 492
 Under the sheen; P..... 576
 White, William Allen
 Attack, violent, upon Governor Smith; EP. 148
 Attack on Governor Smith and disclaimers;
 EP..... 191
 Needs rest cure in some Swiss resort; EP. 148 Nothing wrong in acceptance of fee for address before National electric light association; EP..... 332
 White lilacs. S. Johannsen; D..... 302

- Whitesmith, Ernest M.
Old chronicle; C..... 660
Whoopee; D..... 722
Wieland, Professor Heinrich
Receives Nobel prize for chemistry; EP... 563
Wilhelm of Wied; EP..... 332
Wilkins, George Hubert. See Antarctic exploration—"Race to the South pole" Willebrandt, Mabel Walker
Boomerang quotation from Encyclopaedia Britannica; EP..... 439
Manipulates official position for political ends; E..... 258
Williams, Albert Rhys
Real situation in Russia; S. 516; correction 609
Williams, George
Advice to a prospective teacher; S..... 602
Williamsburg, Virginia
Rockefeller, J. D., jr., contributes $5,000,-000 for restoration; E..... 55
Not scene of P. Henry's speech. E. W. Shaw; C..... 134
Wilson, Charles Morrow
Charles J. Finger—literary adventurer; S. 219
Windaus, Professor Adolph
Receives Nobel prize for chemistry; EP... 563
Wings over Europe. R. Nichols and M. Brown; D..... 721
Witt, Peter; EP..... 2
Wittgenstein, Paul
Exhibits rare heroism; EP..... 149
Woll, Matthew. See Haessler, Carl—Respectable A. F. of L.
Womanhood and Tammany. E. L. Upton; C. 426 Women
Attempt to invade Rambouillet; EP..... 239
Middle-class women; E..... 55
Woman's party and Mr. Hoover; E..... 312
See also Ossietzky, Carl von—Revolt of German women Woodward, Walter C.
A difference; C..... 454
Work, Hubert
Implicated in oil scandal; EP..... 411
Outranks W. M. Butler for sheer ineptitude in political management..... 132
Would-be gentleman. Molière; D..... 434
Wrangel, Baron, dead; C..... 660
Wray, Arthur G.
In reply to Senator Norris; C..... 157
Wrobel, Ignaz
Germany of today; S..... 476
Wylie, Elinor. Obituary; EP..... 701

Y

- Yachting
Nina and Elena winners in transatlantic race; EP..... 120
Vagabondia, new yacht, arrives in New York; EP..... 701
Sail ho! [Atlantic vs. Aloha]; E..... 5
Yale
And New Mexico. C. P. Loomis; C..... 271
Year of grace. N. Coward; D..... 557
Yellow jacket. G. C. Hazelton and Benrimo.. 582
Yen Hsi-shan, general; E..... 5
Young, Owen D.
Model to President Coolidge for clarity of speech; EP..... 119
See also Public utilities—Open letter to Owen D. Young Young love. S. Raphaelson; D..... 556
Young women's Christian association
Ejects two girl strikers in New Bedford; EP..... 211
Yugoslavia. See Yugoslavia
Yuppa, Maurice P.
Crew of the Italia; C..... 202

Z

- Zaleski, Premier
Clash with Stresemann; EP..... 700
Zogu, Achmed; EP..... 332
Willing to become king of Albania; EP... 238
Zukerman, William
A nation on trial; IP..... 304

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:
B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- A B C of architecture. M. Price; B..... 141
Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1858. A. J. Beveridge; B..... 368
Adam, George and Pearl
Book about Paris; AN..... 694
Adler, Mortimer J.; R..... 251
Adventures in Afghanistan. L. Thomas; AN..... 553
Adventures of an African slaver. T. Canot. Ed. by M. Cowley; AN..... 379
Adventures of Thomas Jefferson Snodgrass. Mark Twain; AN..... 143

- Æ
Midsummer eve; AN..... 142
Agonia antillana: el imperialismo yanqui en el mar Caribe. L. Araquistain; B..... 136
Aiken, Conrad
Costumes by Eros; AN..... 432
Alexander, Hartley; R..... 142
Allen, G. C.
Modern Japan and its problems; AN..... 276
Allen, Philip Schuyler, and Howard Mumford Jones
Romanesque lyric: studies in its background and development from Petronius to the Cambridge songs (50-1050); B..... 229
Allgemeiner deutscher gewerkschaftsbund
Amerikareise deutscher gewerkschaftsführer; B..... 493
Allingham, William
Fairy shoemaker; B..... 548
All kneeling. A. Parrish; AN..... 381
America seen through German eyes. A. Feiler; B..... 493
American labor year book (1928). Rand school of social science; B..... 429
American Negro folk songs. N. I. White; AN..... 579
American renaissance. R. L. Duffus; B..... 400
Americans in Santo Domingo. M. M. Knight; B..... 272
Amerika und der Amerikanismus. A. Halfeld; B..... 493
Amerikareise deutscher gewerkschaftsführer. Allgemeiner deutscher gewerkschaftsbund; B..... 493
Ananias, or the false artist. W. Pach; B..... 690
Anatole France abroad. J. J. Brousson. Tr. by John Pollock; AN..... 114
Anderson, Eugene N.; R..... 275
Andrade, E. N. daC. Engines; AN..... 554
André, Marius
Columbus; AN..... 94
Andy breaks trail. C. L. Skinner; B..... 550
Annie Besant. G. West; AN..... 232
Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie américaine. E. Jolas; B..... 68
Anthony, Susan B. See Susan B. Anthony.
R. C. Dorr
Anthropology and modern life. F. Boas; B.. 689
Aphra Behn. V. Sackville-West; AN..... 232
Araquistain, Luis
Agonia antillana: el imperialismo yanqui en el mar Caribe; B..... 136
Architect of the Roman empire. T. R. Holmes; AN..... 187
Ariadne. I. Lhevinne; AN..... 432
Armance. M.-H. Beyle. Tr. by C. K. Scott-Moncrieff; AN..... 22
Armstrong, Martin
Lady Hester Stanhope; AN..... 232
Art and Germany. North German Lloyd steamship company; AN..... 326
Art in painting. A. C. Barnes; AN..... 114
Art of play production. J. Dolman, jr.; B..... 630
Artist in the family. S. G. Millin; AN..... 276
Ashes. S. Zeromski. Tr. by H. S. Zand; B.. 692
Asquith, earl of Oxford and Memories and reflections, 1852-1927; B... 366
Assassin. L. O'Flaherty; AN..... 639
Assassination of Christopher Marlowe. S. A. Tannenbaum; B..... 372
As they seemed to me. U. Ojetti. Tr. by H. Furst; AN..... 461
Atherton, Gertrude
Jealous gods; AN..... 665
Atkinson, Henry A., and others
Roumania ten years after; B..... 18
Austin, Mary
Children sing in the far west; B..... 548

B

- Bacon, Gaspar G.
Constitution of the United States in some of its fundamental aspects; AN..... 276
Bacon, Peggy
Mercy and the mouse; B..... 547
Songs for new voices; B..... 548
Bagger, Eugene
Francis Joseph, emperor of Austria—king of Hungary; B..... 136
Bailey, L. H.
Harvest of the year to the tiller of the soil; AN..... 93
Baker, Charles H., editor
Rejections of 1927; AN..... 162
Baker, Newman F.
Legal aspects of zoning; AN..... 48
Bambi. Life in the woods. F. Salten. Tr. by W. Chambers; AN..... 379
Bankers in Bolivia. M. A. Marsh; B..... 272
Barbusse, Henri
Faits divers; AN..... 500
Barker, Ernest
National character; B..... 140
Barnes, Albert C.
Art in painting; AN..... 114
Barnes, Djuna
Ryder; AN..... 639
Barnes, Harry Elmer
In quest of truth and justice; B..... 622
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R..... 252, 297
Baroja, Pio
Tree of knowledge; AN..... 162
Bassett, John Spencer
League of nations: chapter in world politics; B..... 184

- Bates, Frank G., and Oliver P. Field
State government; AN..... 500
Bates, H. E.
Day's end; B..... 377
Bates, Sylvia
That magic fire; AN..... 665
Battle of the horizons. S. Thompson; B..... 160
Bauhaus bücher. W. Gropius and L. Moholy-Nagy; B..... 494
Bax, Clifford
Bianca Cappello; AN..... 232
Bazin, René. Margery Bianco, translator
Juniper farm; B..... 552
Beals, Carleton; R..... 634
Beard, Charles A.
Whither mankind: panorama of modern civilization; B..... 621
Beauty and the beast. J. G. Macleod; AN... 298
Beckford, William. See travel-diaries of William Beckford of Fonthill Bedel, Maurice
Jerome; or latitude of love; AN..... 162
Beebe, William
Beneath tropic seas; B..... 458
Behavior of museum visitor. E. S. Robinson; B..... 44
Behn, Aphra. See Aphra Behn
Bell, Clive
Civilization; B..... 662
Bell, Gertrude. Sir E. Denison Ross, preface
Persian pictures; AN..... 720
Beneath tropic seas. W. Beebe; B..... 458
Benét, Stephen Vincent
John Brown's body; B..... 274
Benjamin Franklin of Paris. W. Steell; AN.. 637
Bennett, John
Pig tails of Ah Lee and Ben Lou; B..... 548
Béraud, Henri. Madeleine Boyd, translator
Twelve portraits of the French Revolution; B..... 690
Bernal Diaz del Castillo: discovery and conquest of Mexico, 1517-1521. Ed. by Genaro Garcia; tr. by A. P. Mandslay; B. 297
Bertrand, Louis. Cleveland B. Chase, translator
Louis XIV; B..... 690
Besant, Annie. See Annie Besant
Beston, Henry
Outermost house; B..... 522
Beveridge, Albert J.
Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1858; B..... 368
Beyle, Marie-Henri (de Stendhal)
Armance; AN..... 22
Bianca Cappello. C. Bax; AN..... 232
Bianco, Pamela, illustrator and compiler
Land of dreams. Twenty poems by William Blake; B..... 548
Bitter end. J. Brophy; AN..... 162
Blake's innocence and experience. J. H. Wicksteed; AN..... 554
Bloch, Blanche; R..... 577
Boas, Franz
Anthropology and modern life; B..... 689
Bodenheim, Maxwell
Georgie May; AN..... 20
King of Spain and other poems; AN..... 143
Boguslovsky, Boris B.
Technique of controversy; B..... 250
Bonn, M. J.
Geld und geist; B..... 493
Bonnet and shawl. P. Guedalla; AN..... 579
Bonsels, Waldemar
Indian journey; B..... 113
Book about Paris. G. and P. Adam; AN..... 691
Book of nonsense. Verse, prose, and pictures. Collected by E. Rhys; B..... 548
Booth, Herbert. See Herbert Booth
Borden, Mrs. John
Cruise of the Northern Light; B..... 918
Borgias: Alexander VI, Caesar, Lucrezia. G. Portigliotti. Tr. by B. Miall; AN..... 94
Boston. U. Sinclair; B..... 618
Bowers, Claude G.; R..... 628
Boy in the sun. P. Rosenfeld; AN..... 432
Bradford, Gamaliel
Life and I: an autobiography of humanity; AN..... 554
Bradford on Mt. Washington. B. Washburn, jr.; B..... 550
Brandeis, Alice Goldmark, tr.
Karl Goldmark: notes from life of Viennese composer; AN..... 94
Brebner, John Bartlet
New England's outpost. Acadia before the conquest of Canada; AN..... 49
Brenner, Anita; R..... 690
Brewster, Dorothy; R..... 577
British documents on the origin of the war, 1898-1914. Vol. III: Testing of entente, 1904-1906. Ed. by G. P. Gooch and H. Temperley; AN..... 403
British foreign policy under Sir Edward Grey. M. Montgelas. W. C. Dreher, tr. H. E. Barnes, ed.; B..... 274
Brod, Max
Redemption of Tycho Brahe; AN..... 162
Brody, Alter
Lamentations. Four folk-plays of the American Jew; B..... 630
Brody, Sandor
Rembrandt; AN..... 20
Bromfield, Louis
Strange case of Miss Annie Spragg; B... 374
Brook Evans. S. Glaspell; B..... 66
Brophy, John
Bitter end; AN..... 162

- Brousson, Jean Jacques
Anatole France abroad; AN..... 114
- Brown, W. Norman; R..... 114, 161
- Bryan the great commoner. J. C. Long; AN. 381
- Buchanan, Scott; R..... 16
- Buck in the snow. E. St. V. Millay; B..... 628
- Buell, Raymond Leslie
Native problem in Africa; B..... 43
- Building of cultures. R. B. Dixon; AN..... 252
- Bunyan, John. William Strang, illustrator Pilgrim's progress; AN..... 381
- Burke, Robert Belle, tr.
Opus majus of Roger Bacon; B..... 205
- Burning bush. L. Untermeyer; B..... 18
- Burt, Struthers
Other side; AN..... 23
- C
- Callaghan, Morley
Strange fugitive; B..... 370
- Calverton, V. F.; R..... 183
- Canot, Theodore. Malcolm Cowley, editor
Adventures of an African slaver; AN..... 379
- "Cap'n George Fred." G. F. Tilton; B..... 718
- Cappello, Bianca. See Bianca Cappello
- Capture of old Vincennes. Original narrative of George Rogers Clark and of his opponent, Governor Henry Hamilton. Ed. by M. M. Quaife; AN..... 114
- Carco, Francis
Last Bohemia; AN..... 69
- Cardozo, Benjamin N.
Paradoxes of legal science; AN..... 324
- Carlyle, his rise and fall. N. Young; AN..... 380
- Castles in Spain. B. L. Gunterman; B..... 552
- Catlin, George E. G.; R..... 140
- Central Americans. A. Ruhl; AN..... 382
- Chadbourne, Marc. Eric Sutton, translator
Ford Madox Ford, preface.
Vasco; AN..... 377
- Chafee, jr., Zechariah
Inquiring mind; AN..... 49
- Chafee, jr., Zechariah; R..... 720
- Chapman, Guy, editor
Travel-diaries of William Beckford of Font-hill; AN..... 500
- Chapman, Maristion
Happy mountain; B..... 248
- Charles Dickens: biography from new sources. R. Straus; AN..... 459
- Charlotte Löwensköld. S. Lagerlöf; AN..... 554
- Chase, Stuart; R..... 634
- Chase, Stuart, Robert Dunn, and Rexford Guy Tugwell
Soviet Russia in the second decade. Joint survey by technical staff of first American trade delegation; B..... 249
- Chief Mexican participants. Carlos E. Castañeda
Mexican side of Texas revolution; AN..... 327
- Children. E. Wharton; B..... 370
- Children and fools. T. Mann; AN..... 22
- Children sing in the far west. M. Austin; B..... 548
- Child's story of civilization. S. King-Hall; AN..... 554
- Chi Li
Formation of the Chinese people; anthropological inquiry; AN..... 693
- China and England. W. E. Soothill; AN..... 275
- China year book. Ed. by H. G. W. Woodhead and G. E. Sokolsky; AN..... 276
- Chinese-Japanese mythology. J. C. Ferguson and M. Anesaki; AN..... 527
- Churchill, Winston. See Winston Churchill
- Cicero. C. W. Keyes, translator
De republica; De legibus; AN..... 300
- Cipher of Roger Bacon. W. R. Newbold. Roland Grubb Kent, ed.; B..... 205
- City stories; B..... 548
- Civilization. C. Bell; B..... 662
- Cole, G. D. H.
Short history of British working-class movement; B..... 17
- Coleman, McAlister, and Clement Wood
Don't tread on me; B..... 429
- Collected works. W. H. Hudson; B..... 376
- Collins, H. P.
Pensées and letters of Joseph Joubert; AN..... 579
- Collins, William
Ode occasion'd by the death of Mr. Thompson, 1749; AN..... 50
- Columbus. M. André. Tr. by E. P. Huguenin; AN..... 94
- Coming of age in Samoa. M. Mead; B..... 427
- Complete works of François Villon. Tr. by J. U. Nicolson; AN..... 579
- Conception of Buddhist Nirvana. Th. Stcherbatsky; AN..... 50
- Condemned to Devil's island. B. Niles; AN..... 461
- Condliffe, J. B., editor
Problems of the Pacific. Proceedings of second conference of institute of Pacific relations, Honolulu, July 15-29, 1927; AN..... 276
- Conquest of Montezuma's empire. A. Lang; B..... 550
- Constitution of the United States in some of its fundamental aspects. G. G. Bacon; AN..... 276
- Constitutional jurisprudence of German republic. J. Mattern; AN..... 327
- Contemporaries of Marco Polo. Ed. by M. Komroff; AN..... 114
- Contemporary American authors. J. C. Squire and associated critics; AN..... 207
- Contemporary economic thought. P. T. Ho-man; AN..... 326
- Correspondence of King George the Third. Ed. by Sir J. Fortescue. Volumes III-VI; B. 91
- Corti, Egon Caesar
Rise of the house of Rothschilds; B..... 138
- Costumes by Eros. C. Aiken; AN..... 432
- Count of Monte Cristo. A. Dumas; AN..... 553
- Covarrubias, Miguel
Negro drawings; AN..... 93
- Crake, A. D.
Edwy the fair; B..... 550
- Cram, Ralph Adams
Ruined abbeys of Great Britain; B..... 141
- Cromwell. G. R. S. Taylor; AN..... 69
- Crowther, Samuel
Presidency vs. Hoover; B..... 44
- Cruise of the Northern Light. Mrs. J. Bor-den; B..... 918
- D
- Daisy and Daphne. R. Macaulay; AN..... 22
- Dana, John Cotton; R..... 46
- Das amerikanische wirtschaftswunder. J. Hirsch; B..... 493
- Davis, Malcolm W., and Walter H. Mallory, editors
Political handbook of world's parliaments, parties, and press as of January 1, 1928; AN..... 252
- Davison, Archibald T.
Music education in America; B..... 66
- Davison, Ellen Scott
Forerunners of Saint Francis and other studies; AN..... 50
- Davison, Walter P.
Pooling wheat in Canada; B..... 92
- Day of fortune. N. Matson; B..... 230
- Day's end. H. E. Bates; AN..... 377
- Death of society. R. Wilson; AN..... 162
- Debussy, Claude, and Lawrence Gilman
Monsieur Croche, dilettante hater; AN..... 232
- Defeat. R. Huck. Tr. by C. A. Phillips; B..... 692
- Defries, Amelia
Interpreter Geddes: man and his gospel; AN..... 380
- Degas: Intimate portrait. A. Volland; AN..... 93
- De Hevesy, André. Robert M. Coates, translator Discoverer: Christopher Columbus; AN..... 637
- De Kruif, Paul
Hunger fighters; B..... 523
- Deltail, Joseph
Lafayette; B..... 17
- Democratic party. A history. F. R. Kent; B..... 182
- Dennis, Geoffrey
Mary Lee; AN..... 554
- Denny, Ludwell
We fight for oil; B..... 65
- Des grossen kampflieder, landfahrers, gauklers und magiers Till Eulenspiegel abenteuer, streiche, gaukeleien, gesichte und träume. G. Hauptmann; B..... 496
- Destinations: canvass of American literature since 1900. G. B. Munson; AN..... 298
- De Unamuno, Miguel
Mist; AN..... 639
- Deutschland, das herz Europas. E. Jäckh; B..... 373
- Development of English biography. H. Nicolson; AN..... 232
- Diaries of Sylvester Douglas, lord Glenbervie. Ed. by F. Bickley; AN..... 302
- Diary of communist schoolboy. N. Ogynov; B..... 110
- Dibble, R. F.; R..... 113
- Discoverer: Christopher Columbus. A. de Hevesy. Tr. by R. M. Coates; AN..... 637
- Dixon, Roland B.
Building of cultures; AN..... 252
- Dobb, Maurice
Russian economic development since the revolution; B..... 205
- Doctor Arnold of Rugby. A. Whitridge; AN..... 381
- Dog-puncher on the Yukon. A. T. Walden; AN..... 381
- Dollars and world peace. K. Page; AN..... 252
- Dolman, jr., John
Art of play production; B..... 630
- Don. Z. Grey; AN..... 553
- Don't tread on me. M. Coleman and C. Wood; B..... 429
- Doran, Herbert B., and Albert G. Hinman Urban land economics; AN..... 69
- Dorr, Rheta Childe
Susan B. Anthony; B..... 455
- Dostoevsky, man and his work. J. Meier-Graefe; AN..... 459
- Douglas, Paul H.; R..... 273
- Douglas, Sylvester. Francis Bickley, editor
Diaries of Sylvester Douglas, lord Glenbervie; AN..... 302
- Drafting of the covenant. D. H. Miller; AN..... 404
- Dreiser, Theodore, editor
Songs of Paul Dresser; AN..... 187
- Drifting sands of party politics. O. W. Underwood; B..... 228
- Duffus, R. L.
American renaissance; B..... 400
- Dumas, Alexander
Count of Monte Cristo; AN..... 553
- E
- Earhart, Amelia
20 hours, 40 minutes: our flight in the Friendship; AN..... 553
- Early days in Ohio. F. M. Everson and E. Power; AN..... 554
- Early life of Thomas Hardy: 1840-1891. F. E. Hardy; B..... 662
- East, E. M.
Heredity and human affairs; B..... 20
- Eastman, E. R.
These changing times; AN..... 23
- Eastman, Max
Marx and Lenin: the science of revolution; B..... 159
- Eastman, Max; R..... 630
- Echols, Ula W.
Knights of Charlemagne; B..... 550
- Edwards, Lyford P.
Natural history of revolution; AN..... 378
- Edwy the fair. A. D. Crake; B..... 550
- Effect of world war on European education. F. Kellermann; B..... 373
- El águila y la serpiente. M. L. Guzmán; B..... 401
- Elegy wrote in a country churchyard. 1751. T. Gray; AN..... 50
- Elements of rural sociology. N. L. Sims; AN..... 142
- Elizabeth and Essex. L. Strachey; B..... 715
- Elizabethan story book. Famous tales from the Palace of Pleasure. P. Haworth, ed.; AN..... 187
- Emerson, Caroline. Lois Lenski, illustrator
Hat tub tale; B..... 552
- Empire-builder. O. M. Sullivan; AN..... 69
- Enchantress. H. W. Henderson; B..... 690
- Endymion. A poetic romance. J. Keats; AN..... 252
- Engelmann, Geza
Political philosophy from Plato to Jeremy Bentham; AN..... 50
- Engines. E. N. daC. Andrade; AN..... 554
- England's holy war. I. C. Willis; B..... 322
- "Ephesian"
Winston Churchill; B..... 161
- Ervine, St. John G.
Mountain; AN..... 275
- Escott-Inman, H.
Wulmoth the wanderer; B..... 550
- Esherick, Wharton, illustrator
Song of Solomon. King James version; AN..... 142
- Essary, J. Frederick
Reverse English: Some off-side observations upon our British cousins; AN..... 48
- Essence of architecture. W. R. Greely; B..... 141
- Evans, Ernestine; R..... 548
- Everson, Florence M., and Effie Power
Early days in Ohio; AN..... 554
- Examples of San Bernardino. Chosen by A. Harrison; AN..... 68
- Extraordinary women. C. Mackenzie; AN..... 378
- F
- F., C. P.; R..... 23, 162, 275, 378, 432, 639
- Fadiman, Clifford P.; R..... 205, 230, 249, 274, 372, 498, 636, 693
- Faguet, Emile. Dorothy Galton, translator Politicians and moralists of the nineteenth century; AN..... 527
- Fairchild, Hoxie Neale
Noble savage. Study in romantic naturalism; AN..... 380
- Fairy shoemaker. W. Allingham; B..... 548
- Fait divers. H. Barbusse; AN..... 500
- Fall of the Russian empire. E. A. Walsh; B..... 91
- Famous prize fights. J. Farnol; AN..... 579
- Farnol, Jeffery
Famous prize fights; AN..... 579
- Farrell, Andrew
John Cameron's Odyssey; B..... 718
- Father India. A reply to Mother India. C. S. Ranga Iyer; B..... 160
- Fay, Sidney Bradshaw
Origins of world war; B..... 622
- Feiler, Arthur
America seen through German eyes; B..... 493
- Ferguson, John C., and Masaharu Anesaki
Chinese-Japanese mythology; AN..... 527
- Fischer, Louis; R..... 496
- Fitzpatrick, Benedict
Ireland and the foundations of Europe; AN..... 68
- Fletcher, John Gould
John Smith—and Pocahontas; AN..... 665
- Flower, Newman
Franz Schubert; B..... 577
- Flying with Lindbergh. D. Keyhoe; AN..... 553
- Follett, Barbara Newhall
Voyage of the Norman D., as told by the cabin boy; AN..... 300
- Forbes, Esther; R..... 636
- Forerunners of Saint Francis and other studies. E. S. Davison; AN..... 50
- Forgotten ladies. R. Wright; AN..... 638
- Formation of the Chinese people: anthropological inquiry. Chi Li; AN..... 693
- Fortescue, Sir John, ed.
Correspondence of King George the Third. Volumes III-VI; B..... 91
- Fox, Ralph
Storming heaven; B..... 498
- Francis Joseph, emperor of Austria—king of Hungary. E. Bagger; B..... 136
- Francke, Kuno; R..... 374, 498
- François Villon. D. B. W. Lewis; AN..... 665
- Frank, Bruno. Eden and Cedar Paul, translators
Trenck: love story of a favourite; B..... 692

- Frankfurter, Marion Denman, and Gardner Jackson
Letters of Sacco and Vanzetti; B..... 618
Franz Schubert. N. Flower; B..... 577
French revolution. A. Mathiez. Tr. by C. A. Phillips; B..... 619
Freud, Sigmund
Future of an illusion; AN..... 500
From serfdom to bolshevism. N. Wrangel; AN 527
Fuller, Halsey
Halsey in the West Indies; B..... 550
Future of an illusion. S. Freud; AN..... 500
- G
- G., L. S.; R..... 276
Gag, Wanda
Millions of cats; B..... 547
Gallant came late. M. Storm; B..... 401
Galsworthy, John
Swan song; B..... 204
Gannett, Lewis S.; R..... 66, 459
Garcia, Genaro, editor; A. P. Maudslay, translator
Bernal Díaz del Castillo: discovery and conquest of Mexico, 1517-1521; B..... 297
Gay, H. Nelson
Strenuous Italy. Solving a perilous problem; AN..... 301
Geiser, Karl F.; R..... 185
Geld und geist. M. J. Bonn; B..... 493
Gellius. J. C. Rolfe, translator
Attic nights of Aulus Gellius. Vol. III; AN..... 300
Gentlemen, be seated! Parade of the old-time minstrels. D. Paskman and S. Spaeth. With foreword by Daniel Frohman; AN. 114
George III. See Correspondence of King George the third
Georgie May. M. Bodenheimer; AN..... 20
Gewerkschaftsbewegung in den Vereinigten Staaten. H. Pollak; B..... 493
Ghond the hunter. D. G. Mukerji; B..... 548
Glaspell, Susan
Brook Evans; B..... 66
Gobbler of God. Poem of the southern Appalachians. P. Mackaye; AN..... 114
Godley, A. D. C. R. L. Fletcher, editor
Reliquiae; AN..... 252
Goldberg, Isaac
Story of Gilbert and Sullivan; AN..... 720
Golden goose. M. L. Seaman; B..... 547
Gongorism and the Golden Age. A study of exuberance and unrestraint in the arts. E. K. Kane; AN..... 143
Gooch, G. P., and Harold Temperley, editors
British documents on the origin of the war. Vol. III: Testing of entente, 1904-1906; AN..... 403
Good-bye Wisconsin. G. Wescott; AN..... 431
Good morning, America. C. Sandburg; B..... 456
Gottschalk, Louis R.; R..... 17, 621
Gould, Jay. See Jay Gould: story of a fortune
Goyau, Georges
Saint Louis; AN..... 326
Graf, Oskar Maria. Margaret Green, translator Prisoners all; AN..... 460
Gray, Thomas
Elegy wrote in a country churchyard. 1751; AN..... 50
Great Britain and the dominions. Harris foundation lectures; AN..... 301 Greely, W. R.
Essence of architecture; B..... 141
Green, Fitzhugh
Martin Johnson, lion hunter; B..... 550
Green, Paul
Wide fields; AN..... 22
Grey, Zane
Don; AN..... 553
Gropius, L., and L. Moholy-Nagy
Bauhaus bücher; B..... 494
Grove's dictionary of music and musicians. American supplement. W. S. Pratt, ed.; C. N. Boyd, assoc. ed.; AN..... 206
Growing into life. Magna Charta of youth. D. Seabury; B..... 92
Grub-Street journal. J. T. Hillhouse; AN..... 187
Gruening, Ernest
Mexico and its heritage; B..... 632
Gruening, Ernest; R..... 298, 578
Guedalla, Phillip
Bonnet and shawl; AN..... 579
Gunterman, Bertha L.
Castles in Spain; B..... 552
Gunterman, Bertha L., editor
Tartan tales from Andrew Lang; B..... 550
Gutman, Walter; R..... 524
Guzmán, Martín Luis
El águila y la serpiente; B..... 401
- H
- Hafiz, tongue of the hidden. C. K. Streit; AN..... 527
Haggin, H. B.; R..... 67, 184, 207
Haire, Norman
Hymen, or the future of marriage; AN.. 232
Haldane, J. B. S.
Possible worlds and other papers; B..... 16
Halfeld, Adolf
Amerika und der Amerikanismus; B..... 493
Hall, Bolton, editor
Living Bible: being the whole Bible in its fewest words; AN..... 187 Halsey in the West Indies. H. Fuller; B..... 550
- Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner; R..... 142
Hamsun, Knut. Arthur G. Chater, translator
Women at the pump; AN..... 639
Hanging Johnny. M. Johnson; AN..... 325
Happy mountain. M. Chapman; B..... 248
Harding, M. Esther; R..... 664
Hard, William
Who's Hoover?; B..... 44
Hardy, Florence Emily
Early life of Thomas Hardy: 1840-1891; B 662
Harris foundation lectures
Great Britain and the dominions; AN.... 301
Harrison, Ada
Examples of San Bernardino; AN..... 68
Harvest of the year to the tiller of the soil. L. H. Bailey; AN..... 93
Hat tub tale. C. Emerson. Ill. by L. Lenski; B..... 552
Hauptmann, Gerhart
Des grossen kampflieders, landfahrs, gauklers und magiers Till Eulenspiegel abenteuer, streiche, gaukeleien, gesichte und träume; B..... 496
Haworth, Peter, editor
Elizabethan story book. Famous tales from the Palace of Pleasure; AN..... 187
Hawthorne, Julian
Shapes that pass; AN..... 460
Hazard, Paul
La vie de Stendhal; AN..... 554
Hearst, William Randolph. See W. R. Hearst, an American phenomenon. John K. Winkler
Hellpach, Willy
Politische prognose für Deutschland; B.. 373
Henderson, Alice Corbin
Turquoise trail: anthology of New Mexico poetry; B..... 298
Henderson, Helen W.
Enchantress; B..... 690
her knight comes riding. J. V. A. Weaver; B 160
Herbert Booth. F. C. Ottman; AN..... 276
Herbst, Josephine
Nothing is sacred; AN..... 432
Heredity and human affairs. E. M. East; B. 20
Hergesheimer, Joseph
Quiet cities; AN..... 23
Hill, H. D.; R..... 493
Hill, James J. See Empire-builder
Hill, Leslie Pinckney
Toussaint L'Ouverture; B..... 578
Hillhouse, James T.
Grub-street journal; AN..... 187
Hillyer, Robert
Seventh hill; B..... 18
Hine, Reginald L.
History of Hitchin; AN..... 378
Hirsch, Julius
Das amerikanische wirtschaftswunder; B. 493
History of American foreign relations. L. M. Sears; AN..... 300
History of European liberalism. G. de Rugiero. Tr. by R. G. Collingwood; B.... 113
History of European diplomacy, 1914-1925. R. B. Mowat; AN..... 403
History of Hitchin. R. L. Hine; AN..... 378
Hoffmann, Karl
Oelpolitik und angelsächsischer imperialismus; B..... 494
Hogarth essays; AN..... 500
Holmes, T. Rice
Architect of the Roman empire; AN..... 187
Homan, Paul T.
Contemporary economic thought; AN..... 326
Hoover, Herbert Clark. See Who's Hoover?
Houdini: Life-story from recollections and documents of Beatrice Houdini. H. Kellock; B..... 112
Hourwich, Rebecca; R..... 550
House, Roy Temple; R..... 496
House at Pooh Corner. A. A. Milne; AN..... 553
House with the echo. T. F. Powys; AN..... 275
How we got our liberties. L. B. Swift; AN.. 325
Howes, Isaiah C.
Jane, be good!; B..... 548
Huc, Régis-Evariste, and Joseph Gabet. William Hezlett, translator
Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China; AN..... 324
Huch, Ricarda. Catharine Alison Phillips, translator Defeat; B..... 692
Huddleston, Sisley
In and about Paris; B..... 140
Hudson, W. H.
Collected works; B..... 376
Human waste in education. A. Y. Reed; AN. 93
Hunger fighters. P. De Kruif; B..... 523
Hutchison, Keith; R..... 17, 162, 322
Huxley, Aldous
Point counter point; B..... 456
Hymen, or the future of marriage. N. Haire; AN..... 232
- I
- In and about Paris. S. Huddleston; B..... 140
In quest of truth and justice. H. E. Barnes; B..... 622
Indecisiveness of modern war and other essays. J. H. Rose; AN..... 301
Indian journey. W. Bonsels; B..... 113
Indice de documentos de Nueva España. Secretaría de Relaciones exteriores, Mexico; AN..... 693
Inquiring mind. Z. Chafee, jr.; AN..... 49
- Interpreter Geddes: man and his gospel. A. Defries; AN..... 380
Invader. H. Vaughan; B..... 401
Ireland and the foundations of Europe. B. Fitzpatrick; AN..... 68
Irving, Washington
Legend of Sleepy Hollow; B..... 548
Isocrates. George Norlin, translator
Isocrates. Vol. I; AN..... 300
Iyer, C. S. Ranga
Father India. A reply to Mother India; B..... 160
- J
- Jäckh, Ernst
Deutschland, das herz Europas; B..... 373
Jagendorf, M., editor
Nine short plays; B..... 552
Jane, be good! I. C. Howes; B..... 548
Jay Gould: Story of a fortune. R. L. Warshaw; AN..... 69
Jealous gods. G. Atherton; AN..... 665
Jealous of dead leaves. S. O'Sheel; AN..... 187
Jenks, Leland H.
Migration of British capital to 1876; AN 49
Our Cuban colony; B..... 272
Jerome; or latitude of love. M. Bedel. Lawrence S. Morris, tr.; AN..... 162
Jingling in the wind. E. M. Roberts; AN.. 431
John Brown's body. S. V. Benét; B..... 274
John Cameron's Odyssey. Transcribed by A. Farrell; B..... 718
J. S. Bach. A biography. C. S. Terry; AN.. 720
John Smith—and Pocahontas. J. G. Fletcher; AN..... 665
John Wesley. A. Lipsky; AN..... 460
Johnson, Myrtle
Hanging Johnny; AN..... 325
Johnson, Samuel
Vanity of human wishes. 1749; AN..... 50
Jolas, Eugène
Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie américaine; B..... 68
Josephson, Matthew
Zola and his time; B..... 635
Josephus. H. St. J. Thackeray, translator
Jewish war. Books IV-VII; AN..... 300
Juggler's kiss. M. Komroff; AN..... 554
Julius Stockhausen, der sänger des deutschen lieds. Nach documenten seiner zeit; AN. 206
Jung, C. G. H. G. and C. F. Baynes, translators
Two essays on analytical psychology; B. 664
Juniper farm. R. Bazin. Tr. by M. Bianco; AN..... 552
- K
- Kane, Elisha K.
Gongorism and the Golden Age. A study of exuberance and unrestraint in the arts; AN..... 143
Karl Goldmark: notes from life of Viennese composer. Tr. by A. G. Brandeis; AN. 94
Keats, John
Endymion. A poetic romance; AN..... 252
Kellermann, Fritz
Effect of world war on European education; B..... 373
Kellock, Harold
Houdini: Life-story from recollections and documents of Beatrice Houdini; B..... 112
Kellock, Harold; R..... 92, 205
Kent, Frank R.
Democratic party. A history; B..... 182
Kerr, W. B.
Reign of terror, 1793-1794, Experiment of the democratic republic, and Rise of the bourgeoisie; AN..... 49
Kessel, J.
Nuites de princes; AN..... 232
Kessler, Harry Graf
Walther Rathenau: sein leben und sein werk; B..... 496
Keyhoe, Donald
Flying with Lindbergh; AN..... 553
King Akhnaton. Chronicle of ancient Egypt. S. Strunsky; AN..... 377
King, Georgiana Goddard
Mudejar; B..... 141
King-Hall, Stephen
Child's story of civilization; AN..... 554
King of Spain and other poems. M. Bodenheimer; AN..... 148
Kirchwey, Freda; R..... 427, 455, 492, 522, 547, 576, 617, 661, 689, 715
Kirkland, Edward C.
Peacemakers of 1864; AN..... 324
Kirsh, Benjamin S.
Trade associations: legal aspects; AN.... 579
Kluckhohn, Clyde
To the foot of the rainbow; B..... 142
Knight, M. M.; R..... 525
Knight, Melvin M.
Americans in Santo Domingo; B..... 274
Knights of Charlemagne. U. W. Echols; B.. 550
Komroff, Manuel, ed.
Contemporaries of Marco Polo; AN..... 114
Komroff, Manuel
Juggler's kiss; AN..... 554
Kreymborg, Alfred
Lost sail. A Cape Cod diary; AN..... 638
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..... 456, 524, 662, 715
Kung Chuen Hsiao
Political pluralism; B..... 142

- L
- Ladd, Henry; R. . . . . 401
- Lady Hester Stanhope. M. Armstrong; AN. . . . . 232
- Lafayette. H. D. Sedgwick; B. . . . . 17
- Lafayette. J. Delteil; B. . . . . 17
- Lagerlöf, Selma
Charlotte Löwensköld; AN. . . . . 554
- Lamb, Harold
Tamerlane: earth shaker; AN. . . . . 461
- Lamentations. Four folk-plays of the American Jew. A. Brody; B. . . . . 630
- Land gottes. Das geistige Amerika von heute. H. G. Scheffauer; B. . . . . 493
- Land of dreams. Twenty poems by W. Blake. Selected by P. Bianco; B. . . . . 548
- Lang, Andrew
Conquest of Montezuma's empire; B. . . . . 550
- Langer, William L.; R. . . . . 624
- Last address. C. P. Smith; B. . . . . 430
- Last Bohemia. F. Carco. Tr. by M. Boyd; AN. . . . . 69
- Laughlin, Clara E.
Where it all comes true: in Italy and Switzerland; AN. . . . . 553
- La vie de Stendhal. P. Hazard; AN. . . . . 554
- Lawrence, D. H.
Woman who rode away; AN. . . . . 22
- Lawrence, Henry W.
Not-quite puritans; AN. . . . . 633
- Leaf of grass from Shady hill. With review of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass. C. E. Norton; AN. . . . . 380
- League of nations: chapter in world politics. J. S. Bassett; B. . . . . 184
- Legal aspects of zoning. N. F. Baker; AN. . . . . 43
- Le Gallienne, Richard
Romance of perfume; B. . . . . 715
- Legend of Sleepy Hollow. W. Irving; B. . . . . 543
- Lenape trails. C. Lisle; B. . . . . 550
- Lengyel, Emil; R. . . . . 136
- Lenin, V. I.
Materialism and empirio-criticism; B. . . . . 182
- Leonard, William Ellery
Son of earth; B. . . . . 624
- Lescarbot, Marc
Nova Francia; AN. . . . . 187
- Leslie, Shane
Skull of Swift. An extempore exhumation; AN. . . . . 252
- Letters of Sacco and Vanzetti. Ed. by M. D. Frankfurter and G. Jackson; B. . . . . 618
- Lewis, D. B. Wyndham
François Villon; AN. . . . . 665
- Lhevinne, Isidore
Ariadne; AN. . . . . 432
- Life and I: an autobiography of humanity. G. Bradford; AN. . . . . 554
- Life and times of Pieter Stuyvesant. H. W. van Loon; AN. . . . . 665
- Life of Sir Martin Frobisher. W. McFee; AN. . . . . 460
- Lincoln, Abraham. See Abraham Lincoln 1809-1858. A. J. Beveridge . . . . . 92
- Lind, John E.; R. . . . . 92
- Lipsky, Abram
John Wesley; AN. . . . . 460
- Lisle, Clifton
Lenape trails; B. . . . . 550
- Living Bible: being the whole Bible in its fewest words. B. Hall, ed. Revised by A. Berthelot; AN. . . . . 187
- Loeb classical library
Attic nights of Aulus Gellius. Vol. III. Gellius. Tr. by J. C. Rolfe; AN. . . . . 300
- De re publica; De legibus. Cicero. Tr. by C. W. Keyes; AN. . . . . 300
- Geography of Strabo. Vol. V. Tr. by H. L. Jones; AN. . . . . 300
- Isocrates. Vol. I. Tr. by G. Norlin; AN. . . . . 300
- Jewish war. Books IV-VII. Josephus. Tr. by H. St. J. Thackeray; AN. . . . . 300
- Letters. Vol. II. St. Basil. Tr. by R. J. Deferrari; AN. . . . . 300
- Moral essays. Vol. I. Seneca. Tr. by J. W. Basore; AN. . . . . 300
- Silvae; Thebaid I-IV. Statius. Tr. by J. H. Mozley; AN. . . . . 300
- Thebaid V-XII; Achilleid. Statius. Tr. by J. H. Mozley; AN. . . . . 300
- London reverie. Drawings by J. Pennell. Essays and notes by J. C. Squire; AN. . . . . 720
- Long, J. C.
Bryan the great commoner; AN. . . . . 381
- Lord Grey and the war. H. Lutz; B. . . . . 251
- Losing liberty judicially. Prohibitory and kindred laws examined. T. J. Norton; B. . . . . 719
- Lost sail. A Cape Cod diary. A. Kreymborg; AN. . . . . 638
- Louis XIV. L. Bertrand. Tr. by C. B. Chase; B. . . . . 690
- Loving, Pierre; R. . . . . 141
- Löwensköld, Charlotte. See Charlotte Löwensköld. S. Lagerlöf
- Loves, John Livingston, editor
Selected poems of Amy Lowell; AN. . . . . 143
- Lozowick, Louis; R. . . . . 494
- Ludwig, Emil
Son of man: story of Jesus; B. . . . . 321
- Lutz, Hermann
Lord Grey and the war; B. . . . . 251
- Lynch, Bohun
Respectability; AN. . . . . 554
- M
- Macaulay, Rose
Daisy and Daphne; AN. . . . . 22
- MacDowell, E. C.; R. . . . . 20, 182, 229, 370, 664
- McFee, William
Life of Sir Martin Frobisher; AN. . . . . 460
- Machiavelli, Nicolo. See Nicolo Machiavelli
- McKay, C.; R. . . . . 93
- MacKaye, Benton
New exploration; B. . . . . 634
- Mackaye, Percy
Gobbler of God. Poem of the southern Appalachians; AN. . . . . 114
- Mackenzie, Compton
Extraordinary women; AN. . . . . 378
- McKeon, Richard; R. . . . . 206
- Macleod, Joseph Gordon
Beauty and the beast; AN. . . . . 298
- Macy, John; R. . . . . 428
- Malam, Charles
Spring plowing; AN. . . . . 94
- Malinowski, Bronislaw
Sex and repression in savage society; AN. . . . . 114
- Manhood, H. A.
Nightseed; AN. . . . . 431
- Mann, Thomas
Children and fools; AN. . . . . 22
- Marin, Luis Muñoz; R. . . . . 138
- Mark Twain
Adventures of Thomas Jefferson Snodgrass; AN. . . . . 143
- Marsh, Margaret A.
Bankers in Bolivia; B. . . . . 272
- Martin Johnson, lion hunter. F. Green; B. . . . . 550
- Marx and Lenin: the science of revolution. M. Eastman; B. . . . . 159
- Mary Lee. G. Dennis; AN. . . . . 554
- Materialism and empirio-criticism. V. I. Lenin; B. . . . . 182
- Mathiez, Albert. Catherine Alison Phillips, translator
French revolution; B. . . . . 619
- Matson, Norman
Day of fortune; B. . . . . 230
- Mattern, Johannes
Constitutional jurisprudence of German republic; AN. . . . . 327
- Mauriac, François
Thérèse; AN. . . . . 23
- Maury, Reuben
Wars of the godly; AN. . . . . 325
- Mayorga-Rivas, Rodolfo; R. . . . . 48
- Mead, Margaret
Coming of age in Samoa; B. . . . . 427
- Meade, Norah; R. . . . . 112, 249, 324
- Meet General Grant. W. E. Woodward; B. . . . . 628
- Meier-Graefe, Julius
Dostoevsky, man and his work; AN. . . . . 459
- Melville, Herman. See Shorter novels of Herman Melville
- Memories and reflections, 1852-1927. Earl of Oxford and Asquith; B. . . . . 366
- Mencken, H. L.; R. . . . . 91, 523
- Mercy and the mouse. P. Bacon; B. . . . . 547
- Metcalf, John
Mrs. Conover; B. . . . . 401
- Mexican side of Texas revolution. Chief Mexican participants. Tr. by C. E. Castaneda; AN. . . . . 327
- Mexico and its heritage. E. Gruening; B. . . . . 632
- Midsummer eve. Æ; AN. . . . . 142
- Migration of British capital to 1876. L. H. Jenks; AN. . . . . 49
- Millay, Edna St. Vincent
Buck in the snow; B. . . . . 628
- Miller, David Hunter
Drafting of the Covenant; AN. . . . . 404
- Millin, Sarah Gertrude
Artist in the family; AN. . . . . 276
- Millions of cats. W. Gag; B. . . . . 547
- Milne, A. A.
House at Pooh Corner; AN. . . . . 553
- Minor prophets in the Freer collection and the Berlin fragment of Genesis. H. A. Sanders and C. Schmidt; AN. . . . . 232
- Mirage of Versailles. H. Stegemann; B. . . . . 296
- Miss Mayo's Mother India. A rejoinder. K. Natarajan; B. . . . . 160
- Mrs. Conover. J. Metcalf; B. . . . . 401
- Mist. M. de Unamuno; AN. . . . . 639
- Mr. Blettsworthy on Rampole island. H. G. Wells; B. . . . . 576
- Modern French painters. M. Raynal; B. . . . . 524
- Modern Japan and its problems. G. C. Allen; AN. . . . . 276
- Monroe doctrine, 1823-1826. D. Perkins; B. . . . . 230
- Monsieur Croche, dilettante hater. C. Debussy. With foreword by L. Gilman; AN. . . . . 232
- Montague, Margaret Prescott
Up Eel river; AN. . . . . 207
- Montglas, Max; William C. Dreher, translator; Harry Elmer Barnes, editor
British foreign policy under Sir Edward Grey; B. . . . . 274
- Moore, Virginia
Rising wind; AN. . . . . 381
- Morale scolarium of John of Garland. Ed. by L. J. Paetow; AN. . . . . 68
- Mother Goose circus parade. C. F. Pritchard; B. . . . . 550
- Mother Goose moving pictures. C. F. Pritchard; B. . . . . 550
- Motherhood in bondage. M. Sanger; B. . . . . 661
- Mountain. St. J. G. Ervine; AN. . . . . 275
- Mowat, R. B.
History of European diplomacy, 1914-1925; AN. . . . . 403
- Mudejar. G. G. King; B. . . . . 141
- Mukerji, Dhan Gopal
Ghond the hunter; B. . . . . 548
- Munson, Gorham B.
Destinations: canvass of American literature since 1900; AN. . . . . 298
- Murasaki, Lady. Arthur Waley, translator
Tale of Genji. Part four: Blue trousers; AN. . . . . 300
- Music education in America. A. T. Davison; B. . . . . 66
- Music: science and art. J. Redfield; B. . . . . 183
- Mussey, Henry Raymond; R. . . . . 160
- Myers, William Starr
Republican party. A history; B. . . . . 182
- My first two thousand years: the autobiography of the Wandering Jew. G. S. Viereck and P. Eldridge; B. . . . . 578
- Mystic Italy. M. I. Rostovtzeff; AN. . . . . 143
- N
- Naboth's vineyard: Dominican republic, 1844-1924. S. Welles; B. . . . . 524
- Natarajan, K.
Miss Mayo's Mother India. A rejoinder; B. . . . . 160
- National character. E. Barker; B. . . . . 140
- Native problem in Africa. R. L. Buell; B. . . . . 43
- Natural history of revolution. L. P. Edwards; AN. . . . . 378
- Negro drawings. M. Covarrubias; AN. . . . . 93
- Neumann, Alfred. Huntley Paterson, tr.
The devil; B. . . . . 273
- Newbold, William Romaine. Rolland Grubb Kent, ed.
Cipher of Roger Bacon; B. . . . . 205
- New England's outpost. Acadia before the conquest of Canada. J. B. Brebner; AN. . . . . 49
- New exploration. B. MacKaye; B. . . . . 634
- New Russia. D. Thompson; B. . . . . 322
- New towns for old. J. Nolen; AN. . . . . 48
- Nicolo Machiavelli, the Florentine. G. Prezzolini. Tr. by R. Roeder; AN. . . . . 301
- Nicolson, Harold Development of English biography; AN. . . . . 232
- Nicolson, J. U.
Complete works of François Villon; AN. . . . . 579
- Nightseed. H. A. Manhood; AN. . . . . 431
- Niles, Blair
Condemned to Devil's island; AN. . . . . 461
- Nine short plays. M. Jagendorf, editor; B. . . . . 552
- Noble savage. Study in romantic naturalism. H. N. Fairchild; AN. . . . . 380
- Nolen, John
New towns for old; AN. . . . . 48
- North German Lloyd steamship company
Art and Germany; AN. . . . . 326
- Norton, Charles Eliot
Leaf of grass from Shady hill. With review of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass; AN. . . . . 380
- Norton, Thomas James
Losing liberty judicially. Prohibitory and kindred laws examined; B. . . . . 719
- Nothing is sacred. J. Herbst; AN. . . . . 432
- Not-quite puritans. H. W. Lawrence; AN. . . . . 638
- Nova Francia. M. Lescarbot. Pierre Eron-delle, tr.; AN. . . . . 187
- Now the sky and other poems. M. Van Doren; B. . . . . 691
- Nuites de princes. J. Kessel; AN. . . . . 232
- O
- Occasional verses, 1702-1719. M. Prior; AN. . . . . 50
- Ode occasion'd by the death of Mr. Thompson. 1749. W. Collins; AN. . . . . 50
- Oelpolitik und angelsächsischer imperialismus. K. Hoffmann; B. . . . . 494
- O'Flaherty, Liam
Assassin; AN. . . . . 639
- O'Riordan, Conal
Yet do not grieve; AN. . . . . 638
- O'Sheel, Shaemas
Jealous of dead leaves; AN. . . . . 187
- Ogynov, N.
Diary of communist schoolboy; B. . . . . 110
- Ojetii, Ugo. Henry Furst, translator
As they seemed to me; AN. . . . . 461
- Old and the young. L. Pirandello; AN. . . . . 20
- Olivier, Lord; R. . . . . 44
- On my way. A. Young; B. . . . . 492
- Open conspiracy: blue prints for a world revolution. H. G. Wells; B. . . . . 428
- Opus majus of Roger Bacon. R. B. Burke, tr.; B. . . . . 205
- Orcutt, William Dana, editor
The book in Italy during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; AN. . . . . 143
- Origins of world war. S. B. Fay; B. . . . . 622
- Orlando. A biography. V. Woolf; B. . . . . 577
- Other side. S. Burt; AN. . . . . 23
- Ottman, Ford C.
Herbert Booth; AN. . . . . 276
- Our Cuban colony. L. H. Jenks; B. . . . . 272
- Outermost house. H. Beston; B. . . . . 522
- P
- Pach, Walter
Ananias, or the false artist; B. . . . . 690
- Paetow, Louis John, ed.
Morale scolarium of John of Garland; AN. . . . . 68
- Page, Kirby
Dollars and world peace; AN. . . . . 252
- Palmer, Frank
Spies in steel; B. . . . . 429
- Paradoxes of legal science. B. N. Cardozo; AN. . . . . 324
- Parrington, Vernon Louis; R. . . . . 622

- Parrish, Anne
All kneeling; AN. 381
Parsons, Alice Beal; R. 66, 160, 230, 376, 402, 691
Paskman, Dailey, and Sigmund Spaeth
Gentlemen, be seated. Parade of old-time minstrels; AN. 114
Peacemakers of 1864. E. C. Kirkland; AN. 324
Pearce, Helen; R. 18
Pennell, Joseph, drawings. J. C. Squire, essay and notes
London reverie; AN. 720
Pensées and letters of Joseph Joubert. Tr. by H. P. Collins; AN. 579
Perkins, Dexter
Monroe doctrine, 1823-1826; B. 230
Persian pictures. G. Bell. Preface by Sir E. Denison Ross; AN. 720
Philosophy of John Dewey. Joseph Ratner, editor; B. 457
Phoenix. A. Sims; AN. 275
Pigtail of Ah Lee Ben Lou. J. Bennett; B. 548
Pilgrim's progress. J. Bunyan. Fourteen illustrations after W. Strang; AN. 381
Pirandello, Luigi
Old and the young; AN. 20
Plays for people and puppets. C. Reighard; B. 552
Pogany, Willy
Willy Pogany's mother goose; B. 550
Point counter point. A. Huxley; B. 456
Political handbook of world's parliaments, parties, and press as of January 1, 1928. M. W. Davis and W. H. Mallory, eds.; AN. 252
Political philosophy from Plato to Jeremy Bentham. G. Engelmann. Tr. by K. F. Geiser; AN. 50
Political pluralism. Kung Chuan Hsiao; B. 142
Politicians and moralists of the nineteenth century. E. Faguet. Tr. by D. Galton; AN. 527
Politische prognose für Deutschland. W. Hellpach; B. 373
Pollak, Heinrich
Gewerkschaftsbewegung in den Vereinigten Staaten; B. 493
Pooling wheat in Canada. W. P. Davisson; B. 92
Portigliotti, Giuseppe
Borgias: Alexander VI, Caesar, Lucrezia; AN. 94
Possible worlds and other papers. J. B. S. Haldane; B. 16
Powys, T. F.
House with the echo; AN. 275
Practical application of sociology. Study of the scope and purpose of applied sociology. H. N. Shenton; AN. 231
Pratt, Waldo Selden, editor
Grove's dictionary of music and musicians. American supplement; AN. 206
Presidency vs. Hoover. S. Crowther; B. 44
Prezzolini, Giuseppe. Ralph Roeder, translator
Nicolo Machiavelli, the Florentine; AN. 301
Price, Matlock
A B C of architecture; B. 141
Prior, Matthew
Occasional verses. 1702-1719; AN. 50
Prisoners all. O. M. Graf. Tr. by M. Green; AN. 460
Pritchard, C. F.
Mother Goose circus parade; B. 550
Mother Goose moving pictures; B. 550
Problems of the Pacific. Proceedings of second conference of institute of Pacific relations, Honolulu, July 15-29, 1927. Ed. by J. H. Condliffe; AN. 276
Prophets true and false. O. G. Villard; B. 90
- Q
Quaife, Milo M.
Capture of old Vincennes. Original narrative of George Rogers Clark and of his opponent, Governor Henry Hamilton; AN. 114
Quaker adventures. E. Thomas; AN. 526
Quiet cities. J. Hergesheimer; AN. 23
Quantitative methods in politics. S. A. Rice; AN. 378
- R
Raiders of the deep. L. Thomas; AN. 637
Raleigh, Sir Walter. See Sir Walter Raleigh
Rand school of social science
American labor year book (1928); B. 429
Ratcliffe, S. K.; R. 368
Rathenau, Walther. See Walther Rathenau: sein leben und sein werk. H. Graf Kessler Ratner, Joseph, editor
Philosophy of John Dewey; B. 457
Raynal, Maurice
Modern French painters; B. 524
Redemption of Tycho Brahe. M. Brod. F. W. Crosse, tr.; AN. 162
Redfield, John
Music: science and art; B. 183
Reed, Anna Y.
Human waste in education; AN. 93
Reighard, Catharine
Plays for people and puppets; B. 552
Reign of terror, 1793-1794. Experiment of the democratic republic, and Rise of the bourgeoisie. W. B. Kerr; AN. 49
Rejections of 1927. C. H. Baker, ed.; AN. 162
- Reliquiae. A. D. Godley. C. R. L. Fletcher, ed.; AN. 252
Rembrandt. S. Brody; AN. 20
Republican party. A history. W. S. Myers; B. 182
Respectability. B. Lynch; AN. 554
Reverse English: Some off-side observations upon our British cousins. J. F. Essary; AN. 48
Rhys, Ernest, collector
Book of nonsense. Verse, prose, and pictures; B. 548
Rice, Stuart A.
Quantitative methods in politics; AN. 378
Riesenberg, Felix
Shipmates; AN. 252
Rise of the house of Rothschilds. E. C. Corti; B. 138
Rise of the red alders. L. Rogers; B. 548
Rising wind. V. Moore; AN. 381
Roberts, Elizabeth Madox
Jingling in the wind; AN. 431
Robertson, William Spence; R. 230
Robida
Treasure of Carcassonne; AN. 553
Robinson, Edward Stevens
Behavior of museum visitor; B. 44
Rockow, Lewis; R. 113, 142, 231
Rogers, Lou
Rise of the red alders; B. 548
Romance of perfume. R. Le Gallienne; B. 715
Romanesque lyric: studies in its background and development from Petronius to the Cambridge songs (50-1050). P. S. Allen. With rendering into English verse by H. M. Jones; B. 229
Rorty, James; R. 298, 430, 619
Rose, J. Holland
Indecisiveness of modern war; AN. 301
Rosenfeld, Paul
Boy in the sun; AN. 432
Rostovtzeff, Michael I.
Mystic Italy; AN. 143
Roumania ten years after. H. A. Atkinson and others; B. 18
Rowan, Richard Wilmer
Spy and counter-spy: development of modern espionage; B. 691
Ruggiero, Guido de
History of European liberalism; B. 113
Ruhl, Arthur
Central Americans; AN. 382
Ruined abbeys of Great Britain. R. A. Cram; B. 141
Russian economic development since the revolution. M. Dobb, assisted by H. C. Stevens; B. 205
Ryder, D. Barnes; AN. 639
- S
S., J. J.; R. 18
Sackville-West, V.
Aphra Behn; AN. 232
Sails and swords. Being the golden adventures of Balboa and his intrepid company, freebooters all, discoverers of the Pacific. A. Strawn; AN. 637
St. Basil. Roy J. Deferrari, translator
Letters. Vol. II; AN. 300
Saint Louis. G. Goyau; AN. 326
Saltén, Felix. Whittaker Chambers, translator
Bambi. Life in the woods; AN. 379
Sandburg, Carl
Good morning, America; B. 456
Sanders, Henry A., and Carl Schmidt
Minor prophets in the Freer collection and the Berlin fragments of Genesis; AN. 232
Sanger, Margaret
Motherhood in bondage; B. 661
Scheffauer, Herman George
Land gottes. Das geistige Amerika von heute; B. 493
Schneider, David
Workers' party and American trade unions; B. 429
Schneider, Isidor
Temptation of Anthony and other poems; AN. 379
Schnitzler, Arthur
Theresa; B. 523
Schubert, Franz. See Franz Schubert. N. Flower
Schuyler, Robert Livingston; R. 91
Schwimmer, Rosika
Tisza tales; B. 617
Seabury, David
Growing into life. Magna charta of youth; B. 92
Seagle, William; R. 140, 322, 578, 691
Seaman, Mary Lott
Golden goose; B. 547
Search relentless. C. L. Skinner; AN. 638
Sears, Louis M.
History of American foreign relations; AN. 300
Secretaria de Relaciones exteriores, Mexico
Indice de documentos de Nueva España; AN. 693
Sedgwick, Henry Dwight
Lafayette; B. 17
Seldes, Gilbert
Stammering century: eccentricity and fanaticism in the United States, 1800-1900; B. 297
Selected poems of Amy Lowell. J. L. Lowes, ed.; AN. 143
- Seneca. John W. Basore, translator
Moral essays. Vol. I; AN. 300
Seventh hill. R. Hillyer; B. 18
Sex and repression in savage society. B. Malinowski; AN. 114
Shapes that pass. J. Hawthorne; AN. 460
Shenton, Herbert Newhard
Practical application of sociology. Study of the scope and purpose of applied sociology; AN. 231
Shipley, Joseph T.; R. 68
Shipmates. F. Riesenberg; AN. 252
Short history of British working-class movement. G. D. H. Cole; B. 17
Shorter novels of Herman Melville. With introduction by R. Weaver; B. 622
Simonson, Lee; R. 632
Sims, Alan
Phoenix; AN. 275
Sims, Newell Leroy
Elements of rural sociology; AN. 142
Sinclair, Upton
Boston; B. 618
Sir Walter Raleigh. M. Waldman; AN. 69
Skinner, Constance Lindsay
Andy breaks trail; B. 550
Search relentless; AN. 638
Skull of Swift. An extempore exhumation. S. Leslie; AN. 252
Smertenko, Johan; R. 630
Smith, Chard Powers
Last address; B. 430
Smith, Jessica
Woman in soviet Russia; B. 46
Solow, Herbert; R. 297
Sombra de la casa blanca. M. Soto-Hall; B. 46
Son of earth. W. E. Leonard; B. 624
Son of man: story of Jesus. E. Ludwig; B. 321
Song of Solomon. King James version. Ill. by W. Esherick; AN. 142
Songs for new voices. P. Bacon; B. 548
Songs of Paul Dresser. T. Dreiser, ed.; AN. 187
Soothill, W. E.
China and England; AN. 275
Sophocles' king Oedipus. Version for modern stage. W. B. Yeats; AN. 379
Soto-Hall, Maximo
Sombra de la casa blanca; B. 46
Sovereignty. Study of a contemporary political notion. P. W. Ward; B. 231
Soviet Russia in the second decade. Joint survey by technical staff of first American trade delegation. S. Chase, R. Dunn, R. G. Tugwell; B. 249
Spain from the south. J. B. Trend; AN. 143
Spanish-American frontier: 1783-1795. Westward movement and Spanish retreat in Mississippi valley. A. P. Whitaker; AN. 93
Spanish art. E. Weyhe; AN. 93
Spider boy. C. Van Vechten; AN. 275
Spies in steel. F. Palmer; B. 429
Spokesmen. T. K. Whipple; AN. 232
Spring plowing. C. Malam; AN. 94
Spy and counter-spy: development of modern espionage. R. W. Rowan; B. 691
Squad. J. B. Wharton; B. 636
Squire, J. C., and associated critics
Contemporary American authors; AN. 207
Stammering century: eccentricity and fanaticism in the United States, 1800-1900. G. Seldes; B. 297
Stanhope, Lady Hester. See Lady Hester Stanhope
State government. F. G. Bates and O. P. Field; AN. 500
Statius. J. H. Mozley, translator
Silvae; Thebaid I-IV; AN. 300
Thebaid V-XII; Achilleid; AN. 300
Stcherbatsky, Th.
Conception of Buddhist Nirvana; AN. 50
Steell, Willis
Benjamin Franklin of Paris; AN. 637
Stegemann, Hermann
Mirage of Versailles; B. 296
Steuart, Justin
Wayne Wheeler, dry boss. An uncensored biography of Wayne B. Wheeler; B. 663
Stockhausen, Julius
Sänger des deutschen lieds. Nach documenten seiner zeit; AN. 206
Stoddard, Lothrop
Story of youth; B. 552
Storm, Marian
Gallant came late; B. 401
Storming heaven. R. Fox; B. 498
Story of Gilbert and Sullivan. I. Goldberg; AN. 720
Story of youth. L. Stoddard; B. 552
Strabo. H. L. Jones, translator
Geography of Strabo. Vol. V; AN. 800
Strachey, Lytton
Elizabeth and Essex; B. 715
Strange case of Miss Annie Spragg. L. Bromfield; B. 371
Strange fugitive. M. Callaghan; B. 370
Straus, Ralph
Charles Dickens: biography from new sources; AN. 459
Strawn, Arthur
Sails and swords. Being the golden adventures of Balboa and his intrepid company, freebooters all, discoverers of the Pacific; AN. 637
Streit, Clarence K.
Hafiz, tongue of the hidden; AN. 527

- Strenuous Italy. Solving a perilous problem.
H. N. Gay; AN..... 301
- Strunsky, Simeon
King Akhnaton. Chronicle of ancient Egypt; AN..... 377
- Sullivan, Oscar M.
Empire-builder; AN..... 69
- Survey of international affairs. A. J. Toynbee, C. A. Macartney, and others. Compiled by V. M. Boulter; AN..... 403
- Susan B. Anthony. R. C. Dorr; B..... 455
- Swan song. J. Galsworthy; B..... 204
- Swift, Lucius B.
How we got our liberties; AN..... 325
- T
- Tale of Genji. Part four: Blue trousers. Lady Murasaki. Tr. by A. Waley; AN..... 300
- Tamerlane: earth shaker. H. Lamb; AN..... 461
- Tannenbaum, Samuel A.
Assassination of Christopher Marlowe; B... 372
- Tartan tales from Andrew Lang. Ed. by B. L.
Gunterman; B..... 550
- Tate, Allen; R..... 274, 691
- Taylor, Ellen Du Pois
Towers along the grass; AN..... 665
- Taylor, G. R. Stirling
Cromwell; AN..... 69
- Technique of controversy. B. B. Bogoslovsky;
B..... 250
- Temptation of Anthony and others poems. I.
Schneider; AN..... 379
- Terry, Charles Sanford
J. S. Bach. A biography; AN..... 720
- Thackeray, William Makepeace
The rose and the ring; B..... 552
- That magic fire. S. Bates; AN..... 665
- The book in Italy during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. W. D. Orcutt, ed.;
AN..... 143
- The devil. A. Neumann. Tr. by H. Paterson; B..... 273
- The Pacific: a forecast. P. T. Etherton and
H. H. Tiltman; AN..... 275
- The rose and the ring. W. M. Thackeray; B. 552
- Theresa. A. Schnitzler; B..... 523
- Thérèse. F. Mauriac. Tr. by Eric Sutton;
AN..... 23
- These changing times. E. R. Eastman; AN... 23
- This week. F. Kirchwey; B..... 576
- A private letter to H. G. Wells..... 689
- Franz Boas..... 617
- Hungarian magic..... 522
- Nature lovers will be mystics..... 547
- On reviewing books for children..... 661
- Out of bondage..... 492
- Portrait of himself [Art Young]..... 427
- Sex in the South seas..... 455
- The good fanatic [Susan B. Anthony]..... 715
- Through the nose..... 526
- Thomas, Edward
Quaker adventures; AN..... 553
- Thomas, Lowell
Adventures in Afghanistan; AN..... 637
- Raiders of the deep; AN..... 322
- Thompson, Dorothy
New Russia; B..... 160
- Thompson, Sylvia
Battle of the horizons; B..... 547
- Three little kittens. K. Wiese; B..... 718
- Tilton, George Fred
"Cap'n George Fred"; B..... 617
- Tisza tales. R. Schwimmer; B..... 142
- To the foot of the rainbow. C. Kluckhohn; B. 142
- Toussaint L'Ouverture. L. P. Hill; B..... 578
- Tower. W. B. Yeats; AN..... 379
- Towers along the grass. E. Du P. Taylor;
AN..... 665
- Toynbee, A. J., C. A. Macartney, and others.
V. M. Boulter, compiler
Survey of international affairs; AN..... 403
- Trade associations: legal aspects, B. S. Kirsh;
AN..... 579
- Travel-diaries of William Beckford of Font-hill. Ed. by G. Chapman; AN..... 500
- Treasure of Carcassonne. Robida; AN..... 553
- Tree of knowledge. P. Baroja. Aubrey F.
G. Bell, tr.; AN..... 162
- Trench: love story of a favourite. B. Frank.
Tr. by E. and C. Paul; B..... 692
- Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China, 1844-1846. R.-E. Huc and J. Gabet. Tr. by
W. Hezlett; AN..... 324
- Trend, J. B.
Spain from the south; AN..... 143
- Trivial breath. E. Wylie; B..... 185
- Turquoise trail: anthology of New Mexico poetry. Compiled by A. C. Henderson;
B..... 298
- Twelve portraits of the French revolution.
H. Béraud. Tr. by M. Boyd; B..... 690
- 20 hours, 40 minutes: our flight in the Friendship. A. Earhart; AN..... 553
- Two essays on analytical psychology. C. G.
Jung. Tr. by H. G. and C. F. Baynes; B. 664
- U
- Ueber die form des amerikanischen geistes. E.
Voegeln; B..... 493
- Underwood, Oscar W.
Drifting sands of party politics; B..... 228
- Up Eel river. M. P. Montague; AN..... 207
- Urban land economics. H. B. Doran and A. G.
Hinman; AN..... 69
- Unruh, Fritz von
Way of sacrifice; AN..... 20
- Untermeyer, Louis
Burning bush; B..... 18
- V
- V. D., D.; R..... 550
- Van Doren, Carl; R..... 372, 622
- Van Doren, Mark
Now the sky and other poems; B..... 691
- Van Doren, Mark; R..... 377, 457, 549, 662
- van Loon, Hendrik Willem
Life and times of Pieter Stuyvesant; AN. 665
- Van Vechten, Carl
Spider boy; AN..... 275
- Vanity of human wishes. 1749. S. Johnson;
AN..... 50
- Vasco. M. Chadoorne. Tr. by E. Sutton. Pref.
by F. M. Ford; AN..... 377
- Vaughan, Hilda
Invader; B..... 401
- Vernon, Grenville, compiler
Yankee Doodle-doo. Collection of songs of early American stage; AN..... 94
- Viereck, George Sylvester, and Paul Eldridge
My first two thousand years: the autobiography of the Wandering Jew; B.... 578
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
Prophets true and false; B..... 90
- Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..... 44, 429, 494
- Vivas, Eliseo; R..... 458, 624
- Voegeln, Erich
Ueber die form des amerikanischen geistes;
B..... 493
- Vollard, Ambroise
Degas: intimate portrait; AN..... 93
- Voyage of the Norman D., as told by the cabin boy. B. N. Follett; AN..... 300
- W
- Walden, Arthur T.
Dog-puncher on the Yukon; AN..... 381
- Waldman, Milton
Sir Walter Raleigh; AN..... 69
- Walsh, Edmund A.
Fall of the Russian empire; B..... 91
- Walther Rathenau: sein leben und sein werk.
H. Graf Kessler; B..... 496
- Ward, Paul W.
Sovereignty. Study of a contemporary political notion; B..... 231
- Warner, Arthur; R..... 718
- Warshaw, Robert Irving
Jay Gould: Story of a fortune; AN..... 69
- Wars of the godly. R. Maury; AN..... 325
- Washburn, jr., Bradford
Bradford on Mt. Washington; B..... 553
- Way for a sailor. A. R. Wetjen; B..... 918
- Way of sacrifice. F. von Unruh; AN..... 20
- Wayne Wheeler, dry boss. Uncensored biography of Wayne B. Wheeler. J. Steuart;
B..... 663
- Weaver, John V. A.
her knight comes riding; B..... 160
- Weaver, Raymond
Shorter novels of Herman Melville; B.... 622
- We Fight for oil. L. Denny; B..... 65
- Welles, Sumner
Naboth's vineyard: Dominican republic,
1844-1924; B..... 524
- Wells, Herbert George
Mr. Blettsworthy on Rampole island; B.... 576
- Open conspiracy: blue prints for a world revolution; B..... 428
- Wescott, Glenway
Good-bye Wisconsin; AN..... 431
- Wesley, John. See John Wesley. A. Lipsky
- West, Geoffrey
Annie Besant; AN..... 232
- Wetjen, Albert Richard
Way for a sailor; B..... 918
- Weyhe, E.
Spanish art; AN..... 93
- Wharton, Edith
Children; B..... 370
- Wharton, James B.
Squad; B..... 636
- When it's cocktail time in Cuba. B. Woon; AN. 526
- Where it all comes true: in Italy and Switzerland. C. E. Laughlin; AN..... 553
- Whipple, T. K.
Spokesmen; AN..... 232
- Whitaker, Arthur Preston
Spanish-American frontier: 1783-1795.
Westward movement and Spanish retreat in Mississippi valley; AN..... 93
- White, Newman I.
American Negro folk-songs; AN..... 579
- Whither mankind: panorama of modern civilization. Ed. by C. A. Beard; B..... 621
- Whitridge, Arnold
Doctor Arnold of Rugby; AN..... 381
- Who's Hoover? W. Hard; B..... 44
- Wicksteed, Joseph H.
Blake's innocence and experience; AN.. 554
- Wide fields. P. Green; AN..... 22
- Wiese, Kurt
Three little kittens; B..... 547
- W. R. Hearst, an American phenomenon. J.
K. Winkler; B..... 428
- Willis, Irene Cooper
England's holy war; B..... 322
- Wilson, Romer
Death of society; AN..... 162
- Winkler, John K.
W. R. Hearst, an American phenomenon;
B..... 428
- Winston Churchill. "Ephesian"; B..... 161
- Wishnieff, Harriet V.; R..... 401
- Wolfson, Theresa; R..... 46, 430
- Women at the pump. K. Hamsun. Tr. by A.
G. Chater; AN..... 639
- Woman in soviet Russia. J. Smith; B..... 46
- Woman who rode away. D. H. Lawrence; AN. 22
- Woodhead, H. G. W., and George E. Sokolsky, editors
China year book; AN..... 276
- Woodward, W. E.
Meet General Grant; B..... 628
- Woolf, Virginia
Orlando. A biography; B..... 577
- Woon, Basil
When it's cocktail time in Cuba; AN..... 526
- Workers' party and American trade unions. D.
Schneider; B..... 429
- Wrangel, N.
From serfdom to bolshevism; AN..... 527
- Wright, Richardson
Forgotten ladies; AN..... 638
- Wulmoth the wanderer. H. Escott-Inman; B.. 550
- Wylie, Elinor
Trivial breath; B..... 185
- Y
- Young, Art
On my way; B..... 492
- Yankee Doodle-doo. Collection of songs of early American stage. G. Vernon, compiler; AN..... 94
- Yeats, William Butler
Sophocles' King Oedipus. Version for modern stage; AN..... 379
- Tower; AN..... 379
- Young, Norwood
Carlyle, his rise and fall; AN..... 380
- Yet do not grieve. C. O'Riordan; AN..... 638
- Z
- Zeromski, Stephen. Helen Stankiewics Zand, translator
Ashes; B..... 200
- Ziegler, Leopold
Zwischen mensch und wirtschaft; B..... 493
- Zola and his time. M. Josephson; B..... 635
- Zwischen mensch und wirtschaft. L. Ziegler;
B..... 493

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 4, 1928

No. 3287

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	1
EDITORIALS:
William Rutherford Mead.....	3
The Democracy and the Liquor Problem.....	4
Sail Ho!.....	5
Chinese Generals.....	5
Camping on an Ice Floe.....	6
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	7
IT'S ALL AL SMITH. By Lewis S. Gannett.....	8
AL SMITH—CATHOLIC, TAMMANY, WET. By James Cannon, Jr.....	9
AL SMITH—ABLE, HONEST, LIBERAL. By Mary Kingsbury Simkovich.....	10
AMERICANS WE LIKE—XIV. WALDO L. COOK. By Elizabeth McCausland.....	11
A DANISH ADVENTURE. By Signe Toksvig.....	12
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	14
CORRESPONDENCE .....	14
BOOKS:
Song of the Moderns. By John Gould Fletcher.....	16
A Prophetic Book. By Scott Buchanan.....	16
Heart and Head. By Louis R. Gottschalk.....	17
A History of British Labor. By Keith Hutchison.....	17
Repression in Rumania. By J. J. S.....	18
Two Worlds. By Helen Pearce.....	18
Literature and Investigation. By E. C. MacDowell.....	20
Fiction Shorts. By C. P. F.....	20
Books in Brief.....	23
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Labor in the Congo. By Raymond Leslie Buell.....	24

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR

MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

STABILIZATION OR REPUDIATION? Whichever word you choose the fact is the same, but the newspapers have learned a new and more polite vocabulary since the World War. When a European nation makes an arrangement with the United States whereby the former agrees not to pay most of its debt to us according to a method of annual instalments calculated over some fifty years, the device is called "funding." Likewise when a European nation abandons hope of paying its internal obligations at par and gives the monetary unit a reduced valuation in gold, the operation is called "stabilization." It is sometimes an inevitable and therefore justifiable action. Such is the case with France. Ten years after the end of the World War the nation has wisely given up the pretense of ever restoring the paper franc to par and has revalued it at one-fifth of its former worth, or about four cents in our money. Thus the French Government not only repudiates four-fifths of its internal debt but it officially cuts that much off the value of all private French obligations contracted before the war unless payable in gold. We commend the action as an intelligent one and hope it will be the beginning of a new era of sound finance. But it is well to recall that when ten years ago Russia—under as great necessity as that of France—decided that it must get out from under its mountain of debt the action was not called "stabilization" but "repudiation" and is still the ostensible reason for our refusal to recognize the Soviet Government.

THE JULIAN TRIAL in Los Angeles has ended. Its result reveals once more that the American judicial system, when faced with the wealthy and, therefore, influential citizens of the community, often refuses to function. It was over a year ago that the Julian Petroleum Corporation crashed, and 40,000 Southern Californians, most of them of exceedingly moderate means, found that they had been swindled out of from twenty to forty millions of dollars. They had been induced to buy approximately 5,000,000 worthless shares of oil stock which were issued without permission from the State corporation commissioner. When the market became flooded with this "over-issue" the price of "Julian Pete" dropped in a few weeks from $15 to nothing. Of course, the millions of dollars that were taken in are nowhere to be found, although some of the most eminent citizens of Southern California were shown to have received part of the loot. Some fifty-two were sufficiently involved to be indicted—among them Harry M. Haldeman, president of the Better America Federation; Charles R. Stern, president of the Pacific Southwest Trust and Savings Bank; three vice-presidents of the same bank; and Louis B. Mayer, general manager of the Goldwyn-Mayer Production Corporation—but they have all escaped scot-free. The trial itself lasted eighty-three court days and produced eighty-nine volumes of transcript, but did not, according to the jury, furnish sufficient evidence to support the "conspiracy" charge upon which the indictments were based. Thus the eleven persons who were tried were acquitted while the indictments against forty-one other persons were dismissed. Until now we thought that the city of Washington was the sole claimant to the title of the best District of Acquittal in America. This new performance, however, makes Los Angeles a strong contender for the 1928 award.

THE UTILITIES LOBBY is an even more marvelous organism than we realized when we wrote the editorial, The Million Dollar Lobby, in our issue for May 16. Investigation by the Federal Trade Commission reveals it at work in every State in the Union, watching the textbooks in the public schools, helping docile professors to write and publish books that present the private-profit point of view, installing subsidized books in the schools, paying "good" professors fat fees to lecture throughout the country, sending its own speakers to rotary clubs, women's clubs, over the Chautauqua circuits, bullying the Chautauquas into dropping public-ownership speakers, filling the country press with utilities material and getting it even into the dispatches of the big press associations. In three States the Associated Press has been fooled into broadcasting utilities propaganda as legitimate news, and the confidential cheers of the publicity men, revealed in their reports to their chiefs, make rare reading. In some States the propagandists reported the Associated Press hostile, but the director of the Missouri Committee on Public Utility Information was so encouraged by its attitude that he wrote to the Pennsylvania director: "I think word has gone down the line from headquarters [of the Associated Press] to take care of committees on public-utilities information." He had no precise information to support his suspicion, but the impression is one which the Associated Press will do well to counteract. What some of the inside men think of the utilities tactics came out in a confidential letter written by John W. Colton, editor of the American Electric Railway Association Magazine. Colton wrote:

The thing about the utility industry that disgusts me is the lying, trimming, faking, and downright evasion of trust, or violation of trust, that mark the progress toward enormous wealth of some of the so-called big men in the industry. When I see some of these fellows waving the flag, I am filled with not only disgust, but rage, for they are anything but patriots.

MRS. HELEN TUFTS BAILIE, who rebelled against the famous "blacklist," has been expelled from the Daughters of the American Revolution. This not unhappy fate would probably cause her little concern were it not for the fact that Mrs. Bailie has chosen to use her membership in the organization as a weapon with which to fight against bigotry and reaction. Consequently she intends to carry her expulsion to the next annual meeting of the "Continental Congress" in April, 1929, and fight it out on the floor. Meanwhile her trial before the Board of Management of the D. A. R. led Mrs. Brosseau, the president, to say that "it was most gratifying to have it established beyond question that no such thing as a blacklist had ever been authorized by the national society"; and that "what was even more gratifying was to have had this established by Mrs. Bailie's own admission." Mrs. Bailie, while stating that she personally knew only about the blacklists issued in Massachusetts on which she based her original charges, points to protests from various other States as evidence that pressure was brought to bear on local officers of the D. A. R. to prevent them from allowing blacklisted persons as speakers. More extreme measures, designed to prevent meetings held by other organizations at which blacklisted speakers were included, were also taken. In her efforts to set the feet of the D. A. R. on the path of tolerance and decency, Mrs. Bailie is striking good blows for the cause of public liberty of all sorts. More strength to her!

REACTIONARY FORCES won a distinct victory last week with the renomination in the Maine Republican primaries of Senator Frederick Hale and the defeat of Governor Ralph O. Brewster. They were contending for the nomination to the United States Senate. Hale, while weak and insignificant, is the "safe" type of rubber stamp who "sees no evil, hears no evil." The majority of Maine people who have been voting for a Hale for half a century have been led by the stand-pat press to believe that he is of the caliber of Blaine or Tom Reed. In the campaign against him it was developed that not only had he voted to seat Smith and Vare, but was one of the group of Senators which sided with Newberry. Although chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, Hale not only allowed the naval oil reserves to be snatched from under his nose, but defended Denby's action in the Senate and was one of the small minority who sought to secure an indorsement of the action of the oil looters. His labor record is as bad as it possibly could be. Underlying the Maine situation is the grabbing by Insull of all of Maine's water-power sites and his corresponding political activities, which appear wherever the Chicago man has a financial stake. Hale's vote to seat Smith, and against the Walsh resolution to investigate the utilities and the Norris Muscle Shoals bill, makes him highly acceptable to the power interests, which now have a stranglehold on Maine.

GOVERNOR BREWSTER, on the other hand, has been anathema to the power interests ever since he vetoed the Insull bill, lobbied through the Maine Legislature, permitting the export of power. He is likewise objectionable to the State Republican machine for his progressiveness. Those forces were sufficiently powerful to defeat him. The last-minute attack on the Governor by the Bishop of Portland, read from the pulpit of every Catholic church in Maine, for his failure to appropriate sufficient funds to rebuild a Catholic mission destroyed by fire, and the enrolling of many thousands of Democrats hostile to the Governor increased the margin of defeat. The Insull interests will now have their way unhindered in Maine, and their candidate for Governor—Colonel William Tudor Gardiner of Gardiner—seems to be as satisfactory to them and as complacent about their purposes as is Hale. Friends of international disarmament, on the other hand, may find no small consolation in Hale's return to the Senate. For while he votes with the jingoes, and subscribes to their most extravagant designs, no figure in the Senate is quite so helpless as he in transmitting ships from paper to steel. The steady dwindling, and the final utter collapse, of the Administration's naval program may be credited in no slight measure to Hale, who in a Senate battle is as a scout patrol pitted against a fleet of dreadnaughts.

IT IS NO FAULT of the Democratic Party that just before the opening of its national convention in Houston, Texas, a Negro should have been taken from jail there and lynched. Neither are we disposed to criticize too severely the city of Houston, as its past record has been excellent, no such crime having taken place before in more than fifty years. But when Negroes are lynched in the South it is commonly due to the feeling that they are not human beings and that summary violence is the only way "to keep the niggers in their place." A repudiation by the better class of white men of this attitude will gradually discourage lynchings by the less reputable element. We are glad to note that rewards have been offered for the apprehension of the Houston lynchers both by the State and city, and we hope the public indignation in regard to the crime is not mere vexation over the bad advertising which the municipality has obtained but an expression of genuine sorrow for a shameful deed.

OHIO DEMOCRATS are to have the opportunity to choose as candidate for Governor a high-minded and able public servant—Peter Witt—one of the few survivors of that fine group of young men inspired and schooled by Tom L. Johnson during his splendid years as mayor and civic leader in Cleveland. Mr. Witt has stuck to his principles through thick and thin. An anti-war man, he would not surrender his principles in war time, but fought steadily for the liberty of the individual and the press. For years he has served Cleveland in various offices, always bravely, always fearlessly and honestly. A truly civilized State would jump at the chance to put such a man into the Governor's chair. We very much fear that he is too independent and too fine a type for this to be possible. But if it should be, it is fascinating to think what Peter Witt could and would do if he reached Columbus as the chief executive of the State.

TO KILL TWO AND WOUND FOUR MEN with one pistol, in Parliament, adds a new bloody record to Serbia's bloodstained history. Punica Rachich, the murderer, who walked out of the Parliament building unharmed, is a character fit rather for a musical-comedy stage than for real life. He is said to have been implicated in the assassination of the Archduke Ferdinand, whose death brought on the World War, and to have served five years in the Italian army. Certainly, Mussolini is the only man in Europe who can have smiled at the news from Belgrade. He wants Yugoslavia torn to tatters, so that Italy may master the entire Balkan peninsula. It was because of Stefan Radich's opposition to the Nettuno pact, which Italy had forced on Yugoslavia, that Rachich drew his gun. Radich has since the war led the Croatian Peasant Party, which, for obvious reasons, has been peculiarly fearful of Mussolini's expansionism. But it has been more than anti-Italian—it represents a democratic peasant movement and the federal principle of government. Unfortunately after the war Serbia sought rather to absorb her blood brothers who had been within the Austrian Empire than to federate with them. Radich has fought a long, uphill fight for equal treatment for Croatia. If horror at the murder of his nephew should force the old Serbians to grant his demands, it would mean new hope for the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes.

FROM THE COLLEGE of the City of New York comes a strange story none too complimentary to the caliber of its administrative officers. An audience of about 200, it seems, was gathered around the campus flagpole listening to speeches against the dismissal of Simon Gerson from the college the day before. Gerson was a leader of the movement against compulsory military training at the college when, about five months ago, as a condition of his remaining in the institution, he was asked to resign from the office of president of the student Social Problems Club and to refrain from all extra-curricular activity. He handed in his resignation, but since it was not accepted he retained the presidency of the club. Although the faculty must have known of this at the time—a faculty representative sits in at the meetings of the club—no action was taken until a week after the close of college. After five months had passed and after Gerson had taken all of his final examinations except one, he was asked to report to a faculty meeting to be told that he was dismissed and that he could not attend the summer session of the college for which he had already enrolled. It was in protest against this peculiar dismissal that the students assembled. Gerson was in the middle of a sentence which began: "Our struggle is for liberty, for freedom of speech—" when Dean Daniel W. Redman interrupted and asked the meeting to disperse. The students stood their ground until a squad of six policemen, called by the faculty, arrived. President Robinson states that although Gerson was only suspended before, he will now recommend his expulsion "in view of the agitation and disturbance he caused with his Communist friends on our campus."

William Rutherford Mead

THE death in Paris of William Rutherford Mead, in his eighty-second year, removes the last of a trio whose influence upon American architecture is beyond estimation. We are aware of the habit of some of the younger commentators on architecture to sneer at McKim, Mead and White, to regard them as mere copyists, as slavish followers of classic or Beaux Arts styles, but we are not moved to recede from our belief that the renaissance of American architecture dates from Charles F. McKim's return from Paris. True, when Mr. McKim began he joined the Gothic revival. Later he swung over to the classicists. It is undeniable that, as in the Public Library in Boston, the Villard houses on Madison Avenue in New York, and the Agricultural Building at the Chicago World's Fair, the young firm boldly adapted respectively a French, a Florentine, and a Roman model for their purposes. Nevertheless they did, together with Richardson and Hunt, raise the standards of taste in the United States to a degree which perhaps no one can realize who was not familiar with the New York of the seventies—Mr. Mead and Mr. McKim began work together in the metropolis in 1872.

Then, and for a few years thereafter, everybody built four- or five-story brownstone fronts of absolute uniformity and complete equality of ugliness. To depart from this was almost to court social ostracism. It is true that these young men were fortunate that their careers coincided with an epoch of increasing wealth and steadily improving taste, and that they had opportunities—not enjoyed by their immediate predecessors. None the less they guided an artistic movement. They might have been other things than they were, and it must be admitted that they were not always successful—as witness the New York University Club—but what artist ever is invariably at his best?

There has been much discussion of the relative role played by the three members of the firm in designing the buildings that made them famous. Usually the exteriors were the work of Mr. McKim and Mr. White. Mr. Mead was the steady wheelhorse of the firm, the man who remembered that there are such utilitarian things as staircases, closets, bathrooms, and kitchens, and saw to it that they were not overlooked in the artistry of his associates. But Mr. Mead had talent, taste, and ability all his own; we have in mind a charming farmhouse which today bears eloquent witness to his skill. The Engineering Building at Columbia University is another example of work entirely his. These are only two examples. Indeed, the American Academy of Arts and Letters awarded to him in 1913 its gold medal "for distinguished service in the creation of original work," an honor then bestowed for the first time upon an architect.

As a matter of fact, the three partners were extraordinarily fitted to supplement one another; they worked always in complete harmony. Gradually Stanford White became the expert on interior design and interior decoration. Mr. Mead modified, suggested, amplified—always modest, always retiring, never courting praise or admitting that he deserved any, and quite willing that it should go to his more brilliant partners. That it was awarded to him in full measure during his lifetime is a matter for rejoicing. If he was not a prophet in his own country, he deserved extremely well of it.

The Democracy and the Liquor Problem

WHATEVER the Democratic convention in Houston does it ought above all else to take an unequivocal stand on the liquor question. Pussyfooting will help it not at all, even if the unexpected should happen and James A. Reed be nominated, for he, too, is a Wet. As we have repeatedly said, the country needs a referendum on the prohibition issue. The coming election will not directly afford it because, as usual, there will be several issues, especially if Smith is the candidate, since he is bound to be attacked for his Catholicism as well, and for his membership in Tammany Hall. But at least it will help to clarify things if the Democratic platform is as Wet as the Republican is Dry. It will be a step toward a nation-wide referendum. It will keep the prohibition issue in the open, and it ought to be kept in the open until it is settled—and settled right. It is impossible to believe that the country will permit the Volstead law and the Constitution to be merely ignored. That is a contingency against which everybody ought to fight, whichever camp he belongs in. Nullification means only contempt for the law, endless graft, blackmail, and general public demoralization. If prohibition cannot be enforced, it should go.

One of the first steps is for the chief political parties to be honest about it. The Republicans were hypocritical enough at Kansas City, but theoretically brave in becoming as much the Prohibition Party as that almost defunct organization itself. For the Democrats to attempt to evade the issue would be as futile as it would be cowardly. It would deceive nobody. The New York World, the great protagonist of Al Smith, is quite frank about it. "If," it writes, "the Houston convention attempts to hamstring him with a Dry running-mate, or with a Dry platform, or with an evasive one, it will be sacrificing the one real chance of victory to the local interests of the Southern politicians." In the last few days the World has become almost hysterical lest the convention nominate Governor Smith "on a politicians' platform which trifles with the great moral issue that he is identified with." It declares in double-leaded capitals "The Democratic Party Should Not Nominate Governor Smith if it Wants Volsteadism," and it beseeches that party to be against Volsteadism until the end.

The twin but often wiser brother of the World, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, is equally stirred, and in a very able attack upon prohibition calls on the Democratic Party to adopt a platform "unequivocally favoring the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment," and demands that both parties take a stand so clear-cut that the voters will feel that as they vote for Mr. Hoover or the Democratic candidate they are voting on Volsteadism. In Tennessee the Chattanooga News, which is vigorously opposed to Al Smith and to turning "the Democratic Party over to these twentieth-century heirs of Boss Tweed," feels that the World is right that to nominate Al Smith on anything but a Wet platform would be little short of contemptible. The Tennessee paper points out that the New York Times appears to be quite willing for a compromise, and would like to see Governor Smith standing as a Wet on an evasive, semi-Dry platform. That may be consonant with the political philosophy of the Times, but it can hardly be maintained that such a policy makes for honesty, frankness, or sincerity in our public life. We quite agree with the Post-Dispatch that "the besetting sins of political parties, political leaders, and public officials in this country are cowardice and hypocrisy. They are deadly sins. Cowardly evasion is blighting both political and governmental action."

It is not only that cowardice and hypocrisy are the controlling motives of politicians in dealing with this issue. Another difficulty is that those who are opposed to prohibition have no clear-cut program to offer. All those who are opposed to prohibition—except our contributing editor, Mr. Mencken—are quick to say that a return to the old-time saloon is unthinkable. But they cannot unite upon any program, not even the Canadian policy of putting the government into the liquor business, with which to go before the country. Some advocate 2.75 beer, others light wine, still others frankly admit that they want good, hard liquor. All they agree upon is that they do not like prohibition. Some object because it does not work, others because, they say, it cannot work, still others because it works too well. Wets and Drys might well begin by calling upon Congress to conduct a real inquiry into the genuineness of the efforts that have been made in Washington to enforce the law and uphold the Constitution, conducted by such persons and under such circumstances that no one could question its findings. It may take years to get this, but the country needs it. Men may argue until doomsday whether prohibition is good or bad, but at least we should be able to discover whether it is possible.

Meanwhile, we are one with the New York World in its belief that Al Smith is the last man who can afford to pussyfoot on this issue. He has had, until recently, the courage to talk Wet, act Wet, and drink Wet—and we hope his recent statement that he has not changed his belief that the prohibition laws should be changed presages an end to his unnatural silence and a return to the outspoken frankness typical of the man. Despite the fact that a telegram was passed around at a recent convention of social workers in Kansas City, declaring that the Governor was a total abstainer, he is nothing of the kind. He signed the bill repealing the State prohibition-enforcement act, and did so frankly and openly. He cannot possibly avoid the issue if he is nominated. The article by Bishop Cannon, which we print elsewhere in this issue, makes perfectly plain the line of attack which the Drys will use from the hour that he is nominated until the close of the polls on election day. Let Governor Smith be brazen and unashamed. Therein lies not only his only hope of success, but his only hope of keeping a reputation for decency and honesty. He has done enough injury to himself by keeping silent all this past winter, when he should have been rallying independent voters to his side by clear-cut statements of his attitude on national and international issues. If he should consent to run upon as weak and compromising a platform as that adopted in Kansas City, the American people will have to realize that they are being asked to choose between two very ordinary political compromisers.

Sail Ho!

There was a ship—she sailed to Spain,
Oh, roll and go!
There was a ship came home again,
Oh, Tommy's on the topsail yard!

THERE are more kinds of wings than one. While airplanes borne on pinions of aluminum are crossing the Atlantic far above the toss and spume of its waters, other craft are about to skim the ocean's surface carried along by those older wings which generations of mankind have known as sails. In July, for the first time in twenty-three years, there is to be a transatlantic sailing race—from New York harbor to Santander, on the northern coast of Spain. And as two earlier Spanish monarchs, Ferdinand and Isabella, provided the funds for the first transatlantic passage, so have their successors today, Alfonso and Victoria, supplied the incentive for this latest crossing by sail, in the form of two prize cups.

Twenty-three years is a long time between ocean races, and a World War has intervened since the last one in 1905, but it happens that the winner of the last contest, the schooner-yacht Atlantic, will compete again this year. And just as there will be a ship to connect the last race with this, so will there be one to link the modern age of fore-and-aft sail with the older era of the square-riggers. The beautiful bark Aloha, with its towering tiers of canvas rising one piece above another in diminishing size, like the floors of a modern skyscraper, will remind the twentieth century of the nineteenth, when the seas knew such wonderful creations of hull and spar and sail as the Flying Cloud, Lightning, and Great Republic, built on this side of the Atlantic, and the Thermopylae, Cutty Sark, and Sir Lancelot, launched on the other.

Twenty-three years is a long time between ocean races, but there have been longer periods between other contests, for such an undertaking is a big one and there are not many with either the money or the time for an event which in these days must be organized on a purely amateur basis. In earlier years such races were usually in part at least commercial. That is to say, the competitors were usually merchant vessels, commonly sailing on commercial voyages, although sometimes a prize stake was put up to whet the interest. In 1837 the Columbus of the Black Ball Line sailed what seems to have been the first authentic transatlantic race. Her competitor was the Sheridan of the Dramatic Line. There was a stake of $10,000 a side, the two vessels starting from New York. The Columbus won in a passage of sixteen days, while the Sheridan made port two days later.

The first transatlantic race of yachts as distinguished from merchant vessels took place in 1866. It was the memorable dash of the Henrietta, Fleetwing, and Vesta from Sandy Hook to the Isle of Wight. The Fleetwing, owned by James Gordon Bennett, the younger, won in thirteen days, twenty-one hours, fifty-five minutes, after a tempestuous passage.

It was at about this same time that the greatest ocean race in history took place. It was not across the Atlantic but all the way from China to England around the Cape of Good Hope—about 16,000 miles. The famous British tea clippers Ariel, Taeping, Fiery Cross, Taitsing, and Serica all sailed from Foochow within two days of one another, bound for London. Each wanted to beat the others to port with the first of the new season's tea crop. Down toward the Malay Archipelago they raced, reaching for the light winds with lofty multifarious sails—moon-rakers, cloud-scrapers, and star-gazers—through the Indian Ocean, and finally into the boisterous Atlantic. Three of them docked on the same day—the ninety-ninth from China—within one hour and forty-five minutes of one another, the Taeping winning by a trifle. The two other vessels came in only two days later.

Chinese Generals

THE Nationalists are in Peking; but who are the Nationalists? Hitherto Chinese civil wars have been mere personal combats between rival feudal chieftains. But with the entry of the Kuomintang, the Nationalist Party, into the field there seemed at last to be a meaning to the endless wars. Although a year ago, when the party split, the military chieftains seemed to be asserting their power and destroying the civilian character of the new movement, recent months have shown a resurrection of the cohesiveness and unity of the party's younger days. Behind the victorious armies were able civilians, and the future of young China depends largely upon the ability of the party to dominate the three generals who led the armies.

These three generals are Yen Hsi-shan, Feng Yu-hsiang, and Chiang Kai-shek, all men under fifty. Yen has been dominant in Shansi province since the revolution seventeen years ago, and most of that time he has attended strictly to provincial business and has left national politics alone. His was long known as the "model province" and he as the "model governor." His schools were famous throughout China, and his army small. Somehow Yen maintained a puddle of peace in a sea of war, but some four years ago he turned his mint into an armory, and in the civil war of 1926 he took sides with Chang Tso-lin against Feng Yu-hsiang. When events drove Feng into alliance with the Nationalists he joined the hostile coalition of Northern tuchuns, but in 1927 he changed sides, and this year Yen's men were the first to reach Peking.

Feng is the "Christian general," ruthless and able. He teaches his men to build roads, and carry their own burdens, and they march to the strains of "Onward, Christian Soldiers." Probably he has been more impressed with Christianity as a means of maintaining army discipline than as a gospel of salvation; but at one time he certainly found Christianity an invaluable instrument. In 1924, when Feng's chief, Wu Pei-fu, was about to fight Chang Tso-lin on the Northern frontier, Feng suddenly left the battlefield and occupied Peking in Wu's rear—an act of treachery which cost Wu the leadership of China and Feng the confidence which his record might otherwise inspire. In 1926 he was forced to leave Peking to Chang, and for nearly a year his army was penned in the barren northwest of China. Feng himself retired to Moscow, and found encouragement there; but the Russians can hardly have sent large quantities of munitions across the Gobi Desert. Feng's support of the Nationalist cause is recent, and many old leaders of the Kuomintang distrust him.

Chiang Kai-shek was one of Sun Yat-sen's trusted lieutenants. He organized the Kuomintang army in Canton, and led its dramatic advance to the Yangtze River. He forced the split in the party a year ago, then retired to his native village. He was recalled to serve as commander-in-chief of the Northern advance which took Peking, but his own troops were involved in the Tsinanfu disorders, and when the end came Feng and Yen were closer to Peking than he. Now he has again retired to his native village, asserting that he does not want further military power. No one can doubt Chiang's unselfish devotion to the cause of Nationalist China; but he has not always been able to work well in harness.

If these strong men can learn to cooperate, and accept subordination to a civilian government, China's future will be bright. The immediate decision to transfer the Nationalist capital from the disputed city of Peking, and the action of T. V. Soong, Finance Minister, in calling a national conference of bankers and industrialists to discuss economic reorganization, are good omens.

Camping on an Ice Floe

AN ice-floe camping-party as a summer outing will not appeal to many vacationists. The news that trickles back from Nobile and his stranded companions does not inspire one to depart post-haste for the frozen North and its icebergs, in airplane or dirigible. The Arctic is still stronger than men, as it was in the days of the Polaris ice-floe party, which began precipitately on the evening of October 15, 1872, and continued for some six and a half months thereafter—until the ice-floe had almost melted away from under its human load.

The Polaris was a good ship and a sound one. When, in August, she started south from Thank-God Harbor in the uppermost reaches of the Northern seas, threading her way cautiously and timidly amid the expansive ice-fields of that region, she was far better equipped than the airship of today to withstand the rigors of Arctic navigation. She did not have the radio of Nobile's Italia to keep her in communication with a base-ship, but she had other compensations: she had already spent a year in association with the icebergs, proof enough that her extra planking, additional plates of copper, and reinforced beams had made her seaworthy and iceworthy. Yet her crew was apprehensive, for it was a long and treacherous course from Thank-God Harbor south to the open waters of Baffin Bay.

For safety's sake the Polaris had been anchored to a huge ice-floe with which she drifted south at the rate of about twelve miles per day. During this trial marriage—which lasted about a month—the crew of the ship built a small hut on the floe, to be used in case of disaster. On October 15 came a violent storm; the Polaris was jammed against towering icebergs; she shook and trembled from the pressure of the ice and then was raised up bodily and thrown on her port side on the floe. About half of the provisions and supplies on board had been unloaded when the violence of the storm suddenly ripped the Polaris free from her anchorage, breaking the floe itself into several pieces. The next morning nineteen men, women, and children found themselves huddled together on one of the pieces of the floe, but the house that they had built and a great part of the unloaded supplies were gone, while twelve men had been carried off on the ship. These twelve managed to get the Polaris to the nearest land, where they settled for the winter, returning to civilization in the summer of 1873.

With great luck the nineteen on the floe recovered much of the food, some of the navigation instruments, and an open lifeboat that had been lost in the storm. With these they drifted south, hoping daily that they might get back to the Polaris, which they had sighted once in the far distance. But with the passage of November and December these hopes disappeared, and they resigned themselves to the simple life on the floe. Since the winter months were almost completely dark there was little that the party could do except drift along and hope for rescue. The extreme cold of December—the temperature averaging six degrees below zero—and the restricted diet sapped the spirit of the men. Even if they had been ambitious, however, they were too weak to accomplish even ordinary tasks. Most of the time they were too weak to hunt; if they did hunt and catch some animal, it was only with the greatest exertion that they succeeded in bringing it to camp. Fortunately, there were fresh-water puddles near by. It was upon two Eskimos, who caught seals now and then, that the party depended for fresh food; these men withstood the privations better than anyone else, although they admitted that in their entire precarious lives in the North they had never experienced such severe conditions. Without the Eskimos the chances of life for the white men would have been slim indeed.

Thanksgiving and Christmas were celebrated on the ice, the former by opening a can of dried apples, which had been saved for the occasion, and a small can of mock-turtle soup. For Christmas an extra ounce of bread was doled out to thicken the breakfast soup. Conditions grew more and more alarming. In February rations were reduced progressively, until the men were living on a few ounces a day—"the smallest amount with which life could be sustained." There was little improvement in March, when ookooks and dovebies afforded a slight variety from the pemmican and blubber of the winter months. At one time when a nine-foot ookook was shot, according to one of the journals, "so crazy were the appetites of the men that their hands and faces were soon covered with blood—the party looking more like carnivorous animals than human beings."

In early March a storm broke the floe into several pieces. When toward the end of the month it reached fairly open water and was drifting about twenty-three miles per day and growing steadily smaller, it had become less than seventy yards square. Finally, in the neighborhood of Cape Farewell, the floe had to be abandoned, and the nineteen people, with tents and equipment, were packed into a small open boat designed for six men. They succeeded in relanding the same day on a larger and safer floe, but this broke during the night, separating the party. Although the various groups were later able to reunite they were in utter despair and exhaustion—too weak even to talk.

To add to the discomfort, on April 28 and April 29 two boats were seen. Shots were fired and flags raised, but the boats turned their noses and passed slowly out of sight. Finally, with virtually all hope gone and every expectation of oblivion, the Polaris ice-floe party was sighted on April 30, 1873, by a sealer, the Tigress, and picked up off Grady Harbor, Labrador, after drifting approximately 1,500 miles.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

WHENEVER an author writes a book which is not much sold or praised he always puts his knuckles in his eyes and says that he will go and tell posterity. I'm much afraid that there is cold comfort in the threat and possibly some lack of wisdom. Just why should anybody assume that posterity will be all-wise? Of course it may be said, "There is no other court of last resort." Well, it's not good enough. We must invent another.

Some sort of mystic religion is necessary. There must be a final Judgment Day for books and plays and little poems as well as the one which has been promised to pass on human souls. On that great day many cases will be heard, but it does not seem to me as if confusion will be caused by including literature in the province of the court. Often it is not easy to keep book and soul apart. Certain authors, summoned by Gabriel's trumpet, might well be rather bored while litigation concerned no more than their personal and eternal whereabouts. I would not put it beyond some writers to exclaim, upon hearing the glad decision, "Heaven!", "Yes, but what about my three-volume novel!"

There really are certain artists who feel that it is better to burn than to mar. And none of these would accept immortality, save grudgingly, unless it carried with it everlasting fame for their favorite works.

Posterity just won't do. The judgment of five centuries may easily be better than that of the Book-of-the-Month Club and yet it remains human and fallible. "Abie's Irish Rose" ran five years or something like that. It could conceivably live five centuries. Many critics of our own day are much too confident of what judgments the future holds. Probably nobody seriously maintains that Harold Bell Wright will live or even Zane Grey. Most of us are contemptuous of these popular authors. And with good cause, too, as far as I'm concerned. Their point of view is infantile, their style atrocious, and all the stories hackneyed.

But I wouldn't put it past posterity to wink at all these facts. Five hundred years from now some scholar at Harvard may find refreshment in the naivete of Mr. Wright. He may argue that Grey and Wright were far closer in touch with their times than another obscure novelist of the day named Lewis. The first thing you know Freshman English in all the universities of the twenty-fifth century will be demanding "The Winning of Barbara Worth" as required reading and "Riders of the Purple Sage" will be published with footnotes and a glossary.

Ask any group of intellectuals to name a slate for posterity to pick from and it is at least ten to one that the names of the moderns thus supplied will all be passed over. Certainly the precise order of merit agreed on by living pundits will never be respected. Always we keep forgetting that some of the surviving classics were wholly neglected at their time of publication. Since we have so readily swept aside the judgments of our ancestors how can we fail to expect that our own descendants will be equally cavalier with the opinions which we held most dear?

If you say that Willa Cather is a far more accomplished novelist than Edna Ferber I will agree readily enough, but I'll give no odds on the judgment of people yet unborn. With, of course, one exception. Name whom you like among the living and I will gladly offer ten to one that his name and works are dust within a century. If Kipling does not continue I shall be both surprised and disappointed. But there are factors which might weigh him down among the dead men. In five hundred years, perhaps, empires will be unknown, and wars and white men's burdens. In such a period the childish chauvinism of Kipling might well blind the reader to his magnificence as a story teller.

Perhaps they will say, then, that O. Henry really was his superior in the matter of short stories. And if I am anywhere about, even though disembodied, do you think that I will tolerate such monstrous heresy with calmness? Am I and other ghosts of my time to knuckle down and say: "Posterity has spoken. There's nothing more to be said about it"? Just what my brothers in ectoplasm may say and do I can't predict, but let me catch critics in the days to come indulging in such monkeyshines and I will go and haunt them. From walls within their flats will come a groaning and a creaking. And in the halls chains will rattle. It is no use to say to me: "Don't be dogmatic. The thing is just a matter of opinion." Tolerance can be carried to ridiculous lengths. Even in questions of taste a man must make a stand at some point or another and defy not only the yelps of his contemporaries but all the heavy guns which posterity can ever bring against him. It is well enough upon occasion to say, "I think," but there are other situations in which one must be more brutal and change his tentative opinions to the more frank and forthright, "I'm telling you."

At just what point does posterity get to be posterity? "In a hundred years" is a familiar phrase which crops out in discussions about the lasting value of certain modern achievements. But surely a hundred years is not enough. Shakespeare was by no means safe in a hundred years. There is no reference book at hand, but if I remember my dates Colley Cibber took the liberty of rewriting him at an interval longer than that. And the public applauded. To them it seemed that Cibber was qualified to brush up the great one. The windy pieces of Dryden were acclaimed as more than those of Shakespeare even though enough sufficient time had passed to get perspective. We always talk as if posterity were a sort of marble and that certain world figures are safe beyond the change of wind and wealth. Nobody seems to contemplate the possibility that Shakespeare, although running strongly, is on his last lap. Still, we've seen Shaw try to stop him, and though it would be too much to maintain that he succeeded in tripping him up, still from my seat in the bleachers it decidedly appeared that the Bard had been knocked off his stride.

Possibly I am too optimistic in suggesting that this court to sit on Judgment Day will settle all complications. Though a bench of Archangels does suggest an authority transcending that of mere posterity I am not sure that it will be in every case enough. Somehow I seem to see an author on that great day walking out of court, when the case has gone against him, and exclaiming: "And what do you know about literature?"

HEYWOOD BROUN

It's All Al Smith

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

Houston, Texas, June 26

NEWBOYS yelling "All the news about Al Smith" and selling papers with no news of Al Smith; a hotel lobby where huge Al Smith posters grin at huger "Right with Reed" signs; on the floor a thousand sweating men and women, panting, laughing, swearing, hunting for people they cannot find, waiting for the six little elevators that never have room; up and down seventeen flights of stairs an endless, plodding procession of folks who have given up hope of the elevators. On the mezzanine, Al Smith headquarters, Jim Reed headquarters, Texas George, Everybody's headquarters, all armed with glad-hand welcoming committees, campaign literature, candidates' buttons, jammed with weary mobs wandering about wondering what to do next. Trooping from room to room upstairs in the hotel, earnest little groups of women hunting members of the Platform Committee, and behind closed doors solemn gentlemen in shirtsleeves sprawling over chairs and beds guessing each other's minds and playing the poker game known as politics. Thirteen blocks away the vast, dead auditorium awaiting its one week of life—that is what this Democratic Convention looks like as it sweats its way toward the public show.

Most of the delegates have nothing whatever to do. They are mere supernumeraries who will march and shout and wave flags in the mob scenes at the convention. It's all Al Smith. The newsboys know that to yell "Al Smith" sells papers; the singers in chaps and sombreros—part of Jesse Jones Houston hospitality—who push their way into the lobbies sing Al Smith songs; and the great Solid South, hating Al Smith, is ready to see him nominated because it prefers a chance of Democratic victory to any principle.

"Texas for Al Smith," the ribbons read which the girls offer every arrival at the Rice Hotel. But a careful census found only one in sixteen of the ribbon wearers from Texas, and neither Texas nor any other Southern State really wants Wet Catholic Tammany Smith. The great Smith argument is that Smith might win. Wise politicians like Cordell Hull of Tennessee, Joe Robinson of Arkansas, and Pat Harrison of Mississippi sit in their hotel rooms and inform every visitor that they are for a Dry platform and a Dry candidate, but they murmur also that they are loyal Democrats and will support the party candidate. There are rarin', tearin' anti-Tammany, anti-Catholic, anti-Smith men in the delegations, but they won't count in Sam Houston Hall. The Democratic Party wants to win. And Smith wants the nomination. He is not yelling for an argumentatively Wet platform. He is platform enough himself without further form of words. The Norman Mack outburst may have been a blunder but it looks like uncommonly shrewd politics. It gives the Drys a chance to claim one victory. Led by young Dan Moody of Texas they can stage a stirring fight for a law-enforcement platform and win it, and can then with a contrite heart support the son of Manhattan, feeling that after all they have forced a godly platform upon Beelzebub.

Around the corner the Dry women are holding a five-hour "season of prayer" calling on God to save the Democratic Party from the man who wants "to put his foot upon a brass rail again and blow the foam off a mug of beer." I went last night to the Dry mass meeting in Richey's Tabernacle where the "representatives of seven million churchwomen" assured one another that God would block Al Smith's attempt to "steal the United States from the Christian [meaning Protestant] people." Babies cried, the electric fans droned overhead, men and women waved their hats or palm-leaf fans, and one after another overheated spokeswomen for this or that organization compared the Al Smith promises of Northern votes to Satan's offer of the kingdoms of the world, shouted about "the greatest crisis since the Civil War," and the "days of Pentecost," prayed God to put a new vision into the hearts of the party leaders, and told what the women would do to Al at the election. Every one of them knew that Al Smith would be nominated.

After all, what can people expect whose slogan is "A Dry platform and a Dry candidate"? One of the ladies called for a leader who would "dare to be a Daniel." She may have had in mind Dan Moody, but the Boy Governor of Texas, while keeping up his home political fences by shouting for a Dry platform, has made it clear that he does not intend to endanger his national future by getting too conspicuously in Al Smith's way. The Drys do not know where to turn; they have no candidate.

So a somewhat balky Democratic donkey is getting ready to nominate Al Smith. The memory of Madison Square Garden is fresh and a new Democratic code of ethics has been evolved. Everyone is for party harmony today. Harmony there must be at whatever cost of principle. Mrs. Clem Shaver is leading Dry women's meetings, but her husband's office obligingly gives the room number of the convention bootlegger to inquiring delegates and visitors. Galveston is near and the liquor, I am told, is excellent and reasonable; certainly it is abundant. But while the Dry South believes in hospitality, Wet New York is on its best behavior. Mayor Jimmy arrived looking as if he had celebrated Al's nomination ahead of time, but all the Tammany delegates have been warned to be good at the convention. Houston had a little lynching just before the convention opened, but the Mayor and the city council and all good Texans promptly denounced it and pointed out, as an evidence of remarkable virtue, that they had all denounced it. Everyone is for the farmers and for labor and for a sound foreign policy. Indeed, there seems even to be little difficulty about public utilities.

I met on the train two enthusiastic Al Smith delegates from New York. We discussed prohibition and the Catholic issue and the women and then, thinking to make conversation, I remarked that the utilities revelations ought not to hurt Al in the campaign. A painful silence followed. Then the first Al Smith delegate pointed graciously to his pal. "Shake hands," said he, "with the vice-president of the Northeastern Power Company." (I think that was its name.) "And permit me," said the second Al Smith delegate, pointing to the other, "to present to you our up-State attorney."

Al Smith—Catholic, Tammany, Wet

By JAMES CANNON, JR.

IF it were necessary to explain this in a single sentence, I should say: Governor Smith is personally, ecclesiastically, aggressively, irreconcilably Wet, and is ineradicably Tammany-branded, with all the inferences and implications and objectionable consequences which naturally follow from such views and associations. In the issue of The Nation of November 30, in an article discussing Governor Smith as a "Presidential possibility," Mr. Villard said:

Do you believe in electing to the Presidency a man who drinks too much for his own good, and is politically a rampant Wet? . . . Does "Al" drink and does he drink too much? Well, I am reliably informed that he drinks every day, and the number of his cocktails and highballs is variously estimated at from four to eight. It is positively denied that he is ever intoxicated, much gossip to the contrary notwithstanding. He is a Wet, and he lives up to it, and for that consistency he is to be praised. . . . One may regret with all one's heart, as does the writer of these lines, that, being in an exalted position, he cannot set an example of abstinence to the millions whose State he governs, but at least one knows where he stands.

It is now over six months since that statement concerning Governor Smith's personal habits was printed and quoted, and there has been no official denial of its accuracy. It coincides with the private statements of other reliable persons. The facts certainly appear to warrant the asking of this question: Shall Dry America, a country with prohibition imbedded in its Constitution, elect a "cocktail President"?

It is true that a man's personal attitude toward the prohibition amendment and toward the use of intoxicants is not the only important question to be asked concerning his fitness for the office of President of the United States. But one's personal opinion on the principle of prohibition cannot be considered apart from the broader question of loyalty to the Constitution, as long as the prohibition amendment is a part of that Constitution. Furthermore, while it is true that the prohibition amendment does not prohibit the use of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, it is also true that it is the natural, logical consequence of the prohibition law that within a comparatively short time all legal use of beverage intoxicants will be eliminated. There are doubtless some law-abiding citizens who still use no intoxicants except those which they possessed at the time that prohibition went into effect, but that number is small and steadily decreasing. Can any law-abiding American citizen want a man to be elected President who not only disbelieves in the principle of prohibition, but, although sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States, yet will continue to indulge his appetite for strong drink in the Executive Mansion? What an interesting public document for future generations to inspect would be the application of the President of the United States for a permit from the Prohibition Department to move from his residence to the White House an itemized list of the bottles, casks, barrels, and other containers of intoxicating liquor, traffic in which is prohibited by the Constitution which the said applicant is sworn to uphold!

But not only is Governor Smith personally Wet today, but his entire record is Wet. He was a frequenter of saloons while they existed; he put his foot on the brass rail and blew the foam off the glass; in his social and political activities he recognized the saloon as an important factor. As a legislator he not only opposed every measure to restrict the privileges of saloons, but endeavored to remove existing restrictions. He fought the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment and the passage of the Mullen-Gage State Law Enforcement Code, and after that code had been enacted by the New York State Legislature, he labored aggressively and persistently to obtain its repeal. He is now advocating modifications of the prohibition laws to permit each State to determine what shall be the legal alcoholic content of the beverages permitted.

When all his background is considered, it is not surprising that Governor Smith should have persistently and aggressively fought prohibition. Tammany-bred, a pupil, a follower, a protege of Croker, Foley, and Murphy, he is today the outstanding personality and most influential factor in Tammany Hall. It is true that Mr. George Olvaney, the titular head of Tammany Hall, declared on oath before the Senate Committee that Tammany was not a political organization at all, but simply a "patriotic society." But whatever it be called Tammany is, as was declared in The Nation for June 13, a "society held together by the cohesive power of public plunder." Governor Smith has for thirty-three years been a worker in or an official of that society. Nor has he condemned the Tammany graft and corruption which has recently come to light. Indeed, he has only recently been reinstated as a sachem.

Moreover, Governor Smith is ecclesiastically Wet. There was published in the secular press on January 2, 1928, a quotation which has not been denied from the Osservatore Romano, the official organ of the Vatican, stating that "the attempt to enforce prohibition in America has become so useless, not to say dangerous, that it would be better to abolish it, especially since unbridled passion is always more rampant as soon as there is an attempt to enforce complete abstinence." This attack upon the prohibition law of the United States by the Vatican organ is in full agreement with the open criticism of that law by the Cardinal Archbishop of New York and Boston and other Roman Catholic dignitaries.

I concede the right of the Pope, cardinals, archbishops, and other Roman Catholics to declare their attitude as freely as Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, or other Protestant bodies or ministers or laymen upon this question. Nor would I even intimate that these Roman Catholic leaders are not sincere in their opposition to the prohibition law. But it is not surprising, indeed it is to be expected, that this position of high dignitaries of the Roman church will be reflected in the attitude of many loyal Catholics who are members of legislatures, or of Congress, or who hold other official positions. It is a fact that the attacks in Congress upon the prohibition law are made chiefly by men who are themselves Roman Catholics or who represent constituencies with large Roman Catholic populations. Certainly it is likely that Governor Alfred E. Smith is influenced by the views of the Pope and the cardinals on the subject of prohibition.

I repeat that because Governor Smith is personally, ecclesiastically, aggressively, irreconcilably Wet and is ineradicably Tammany-branded, the South's Dry Democrats will oppose him. It is unthinkable that the moral, religious leadership of the South could be a party to the nomination or election of such a man as Governor Smith, thus being guilty of an open betrayal of a great social, economic, and moral reform which was won after years of unselfish labor. If the Houston convention should nominate Governor Smith for President, multiplied thousands of life-long Democrats will decide that Democracy will be better served by the defeat of the Wet Tammany sachem than by his election, and will act accordingly.

Al Smith—Able, Honest, Liberal

By MARY KINGSBURY SIMKHOVITCH

BEING neither a Roman Catholic nor a member of Tammany Hall nor of Irish descent, I am for Smith for President. I do not think that a Catholic is less loyal than a Protestant. Experience is the safest guide. Catholic Supreme Court justices, Senators, and governors have not done us any harm. In fact, the conscious or unconscious desire to class our country as Protestant seems to be at variance with our fundamental law which provides for entire freedom of belief.

The three main objections to Smith are: first, that he is Wet; second, that he is a member of Tammany Hall; and third, that business is safer with a Republican than with a Democratic administration no matter who the candidates are.

The cause of temperance was making great headway when we adopted prohibition. We have now had almost a decade of experience to go on, and no one will deny that the natural result of any prohibition has taken place. The educational process has been replaced by lawlessness. We did not know as much ten years ago about psychology as we do today. Progressive educational ideas, replacing the "thou shalt nots" with positive outlets in the emotional and intellectual life, are now understood more widely. Just as recreational and vocational opportunities are stressed to offset juvenile delinquency rather than a reliance on reformatories and jails, so is education in self-control superior to prohibition. If prohibition is bad social psychology, we must face this fact and ask how it can be honestly met. Governor Smith has not concealed his views on this subject. Is it not possible to take a dispassionate attitude on a question of public policy? Is it necessary to brand any one who desires a modification of the law as unpatriotic or dangerous? Fanaticism, wholly out of keeping with our fundamental constitutional rights, lies in that direction. To enforce the law completely will not be possible for any President, unless Congress votes a sum of money no practical person believes can be obtained. That Smith, if President, would not enforce the law as strictly as funds available would allow, no one believes who knows him and his work intimately.

Smith is a loyal member of Tammany Hall. All organizations have their weak spots. But to make a wholesale indictment of Tammany Hall is to indict the Democratic Party in the city of New York, which is the same as to indict the majority of its citizens. Tammany Hall has had an honorable record as well as a discreditable one. People are members of the organization by neighborly association—I was about to say, almost by the accident of birth. In a sense it is like a large family or clan life, full of mistakes and worse, but also full of sympathy, effective helpfulness, and an intensely realistic understanding of what is practical. Before the social psychologists got busy in their interpretations, Tammany Hall practiced what later the sociologists taught.

Now, Smith was brought up with this crowd. And he is loyal to it as he is loyal to his family, to his church, to his neighborhood, to his city, and to his State. Dependability and clear-sightedness are his major qualities. And he never confuses loyalty, as so many bigots do, with blind agreement and objection to criticism. A real loyalty includes criticism. And that he has given Tammany Hall plenty of it is an open secret. But he has given it from the inside rather than from the outside. That is a legitimate way. "Boring from within" is as reputable a method as opposition from without. Smith has never side-stepped a burden or discarded a responsibility. He has never taken the easier way.

It is often easier to leave a church or family life or a political party than it is to stick and see what changes in these social structures can be effected. All organization is full of defects. The price we pay for it is heavy but in general necessary. I do not say that to get out, to bolt, is not a good way sometimes, too. But that is a question of when and why and how. Smith chooses the old-fashioned, responsible way of sticking.

Finally, there is the argument of prosperity. Many will vote for a Democratic governor who won't vote for a Democratic President. Their idea is that change is disorganizing and disintegrating for business and hence for the country. But though economic security is a primary issue and on it depends a high level in the standard of living, there is to be considered as an even more fundamental issue the whole tone of American life—its regard for honesty in public service, its old emphasis on local responsibility and initiative, its regard for the welfare of the downmost groups which business prosperity has not touched, its ancient privilege of criticism in public life, which the long-continued term in office of any party tends to obscure.

When the Progressive Party of Roosevelt's day went out of business it left the Democratic Party as its only residuary legatee in the field of practical and effective social-minded public criticism. Smith is obviously its ablest leader. With his usual sagacity and common sense, he will by no means desire to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. If he is elected we may therefore expect a maximum of fresh air in political thought and action, with no worry that prosperity will fly out of the window.

Americans We Like

Waldo L. Cook

By ELIZABETH McCAUSLAND

AT ten he was the devoted protector of eight cats. At twenty-two he refused his degree from Tufts on grounds of principle. Still the champion of justice at sixty, he espoused the Sacco-Vanzetti cause.

Always an ardent advocate of reason and fairness, Waldo L. Cook has reaped but a barren harvest after forty years of toil in the vineyards of American journalism. Editor of that historic journal, the Springfield Republican, as famous for its unpopular opinions as Oxford for its lost causes, he has had the reward of those who seek to practice the Horatian golden mean. Temperamentally distrustful of extremes, he is equally the target of conservatives and radicals. Yet he persists in his defiance of categories. "I am not a conservative, I am not a liberal, I am Waldo Cook," he declares. This tenacious insistence on his identity and integrity as an individual explains many things. The New England Bourbons never weary of condemning the prophet in their own country, while the theoretical liberals are often out of sympathy with the pragmatism—call it Yankee prudence, if you will—that hedges about this New England editor.

His instincts are generous, his aspirations are unselfish. But his New England blood will out. Not caution, but strategy, that is the keynote of his character. He will not commit himself to positions from which he may be forced subsequently to retreat. His advance is slow, calculated to the circumstances of the hour. He moves forward, well documented, well reinforced, with lines of communication always kept open. He does not choose to permit his emotions or his sympathies to affect his reasoned judgments.

As a fighter, the best boxer of his time at college, and a football player with a reputation as a slugger, undeserved but classic, he wants to hit when he is all set for the blow and he wants to hit where it will do the most damage. Any midnight he can be seen, swinging his Indian clubs in "editorial-row" corridor, this man of whom an old professor said: "Waldo Cook was one of the best all-around athletes that ever went to Tufts. And I have known them all."

As an editor, he does not believe that a newspaper has to abase itself to live. Causes are not followed because they are popular, but because they are right. The moral fervor of the abolitionist and teetotalist father survives in the son, changed but unabated. Yet there is no fanaticism here, only a constant balancing of what is ideally right and desirable with what can be accomplished. For Waldo Cook has lived long enough to know that while all else changes, life's continuity is unbroken. He does not want revolution. A neat and tidy mental inheritance from his New England ancestors insists on order and logic in human affairs as well as in kitchens and corner cupboards. He does not want the strata of human history and time to slip suddenly and violently, as if in an earthquake. He wants instead a gradual permeation of society by, a gradual consent to, liberal ideas. There is no rashness in him, no desire to pull down the pillars of the temple —at least not as long as there is no other temple to take its place. It is a quality of temperament.

The Fourteenth in a Series of Personality Portraits

These characteristics, disciplined and trained by forty years' experience as reporter, editorial writer, and editor, have produced the man who today is one of the few American journalists who can be counted on to deal honestly and independently with public questions. It is one of the curses of anonymous journalism that credit is not always given where it is due. Woodrow Wilson once labored under the delusion that Samuel Bowles was still editing the Republican when he said, "There's a fine old man up there who's supporting me."

When the Sacco-Vanzetti case enlisted Waldo Cook's support, he cast aside his reticence and shyness. When all else seemed to have failed, a committee composed of John F. Moors, Edward S. Drown, John Lovejoy Elliott, Dr. Alice Hamilton, Paul Kellogg, and Waldo Cook, went to the State House to appeal to the Governor. The Governor's secretary, Herman MacDonald, met the committee.

"Is it true, Mr. Cook," he asked, "that you received $20,000 for writing that editorial?"

"It's a damned lie."

It was a damned lie. Waldo Cook is incapable of embracing a cause unless his reason has been convinced. Bribes do not exist in his cosmogony; $20,000 or $200,000 would be equally powerless to affect his decision.

Nowhere has the man's nature revealed itself more truthfully than in this case. If strategy is his dominant intellectual quality, sympathy and unselfish tenderness are his chief emotional characteristics. These united dictated his course. He never urged that Sacco and Vanzetti were innocent. On that point he did not form a final opinion. But he tenaciously held to his line of attack, reiterating again and again the existence of a "reasonable doubt" as cause wherefore a second trial should be granted. Fearing by an untimely word to precipitate a premature crisis in a hazardous situation, he reserved his big artillery. Down to the time when the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled that it would not reopen the case, he hoped for a new trial on the basis of the Madeiros confession. More than that, he expected a new trial. The decision which sent the case to the Governor was a great shock to him. So obvious were the legal and logical flaws in the case that he could not conceive that they would not be detected by the Governor. He had faith in Fuller.

On both occasions he lost his faith. And when Fuller's decision not to commute the death sentence was announced, he gave at last full vent to the righteous indignation which had been gathering in his breast. Then he wrote We Submit—and Protest, that bitter echo of the 1927 Pulitzer Prize editorial's title, the Boston Herald having by this time renounced all pretensions to moral grandeur and relapsed into a "play-safe" policy.

But he never lost faith—he says it resolutely, even today—in the ultimate victory of truth. Such a faith he needed to sustain him in those days when practically single-handed, a lone editor in a hostile State, amid a hostile population, he battled for what he believed to be right. While Massachusetts echoed to the hysterically insane cry of "support the courts" and the prime issue of the men's guilt or innocence was obscured in a frenzy of fear and hatred, he went his solitary way, presenting his reasoned analysis of the evidence, hoping till the end.

What years devoted to unpopular causes led up to this fortissimo of unpopularity? At Tufts he had taken a stand for principle when he refused to accept the rather unimportant degree of Ph.B. then awarded students in the modern-language course. Believing his work to be fully as good as that done in the classical course, he petitioned for the B.A., and, when this was denied, he refused to take the inferior degree. Later his college was glad to honor him both with the degree he had asked for and with an M.A. as well. At twenty-three Waldo Cook joined the Republican under Samuel Bowles the third; "S. B." he was known to his "bright young men." Young Cook worked the first week for nothing. The second he received $6. The Republican has many traditions. One of these is that good men and true work for love not money. This tradition the Republican still treasures—and, amazing as it may seem, retains the affections of its "graduates." At thirty-one he became a regular editorial writer. Since 1896 he has weathered eight Presidential campaigns. He is perhaps less optimistic that "somehow good will come of ill" than in 1900 when the Republican flung its bonnet over the windmill for Bryan and anti-imperialism. But he is still willing to take up the cudgels in a good cause, witness his frequent editorial utterances to the effect that religion should not be constituted an extra-constitutional qualification for the Presidency, either in the case of Al Smith or Walsh of Montana.

Since he dedicated himself to the editorial page he has seen the rise and fall of many issues—the Philippine question, the imperialism of 1898-1904, the trust-busting of the Roosevelt era, the liberalism of the first Wilson Administration, the social experiment of prohibition, the League of Nations, the Palmer deportation raids, the oil scandals. And in all of these he has taken the liberal side, not extremely, not violently, but with the tactics and measured strategy of the coolly reasonable mind.

A Danish Adventure

By SIGNE TOKSVIG

A FRIENDLY Irishman says that he is struck by two great instincts in the Danes: one, they want everything to be done lawfully and in order, and, two, they yearn to feed their fellow-beings. Thirty thousand Austrian children learned the truth of the second in Danish homes after the war, and another illustration has recently been thrillingly enacted.

Denmark, like other post-war countries, is confronted with a serious problem of industrial unemployment and is solving it, like other countries, by the dole. But, for one reason and another, certain unemployed people are not entitled to the dole, some of them are without a home, and they take to the road to earn a casual living as best they may. In the north of the peninsula of Jutland, where great national movements have often risen, a good number of these wanderers got together not long ago and decided that they would march in a body to Copenhagen and present to the Government a demand for work or support. On March 5 about two hundred of them met in a town called Kjellerup, a place of some fifteen hundred inhabitants. When the Kjellerupians saw the poor "Homeless," as they call themselves, with all their misery revealed by the spring sun, the good burghers did not go in and lock their doors and wait for the swarm to pass on, as they might have done. Instead, the town council offered them the gymnastics hall, well warmed and filled with clean straw, to sleep in. They gave them split-pea soup and noble sides of bacon for dinner in the evening. Private individuals attended to their morning coffee. The town provided lunch, more good soup, and mountains of sandwiches. A collection was taken up by the people, to which four hundred contributed, none less than a krone (somewhat more than a shilling), so that the leaders of the Homeless were presented with about a thousand kroner. Feeling this was not enough, the barber at the corner shaved and clipped for nothing every Homeless who came to him. A tobacco dealer gave out cigarettes by the hundred, and people ran up to the Homeless in the street, hanging clothes on their arms and shoving shoes into their hands. One young man who was in rags was dragged into a shop by a dealer and sent out again, newly outfitted from top to toe.

By this time, not strange to say, the flock had swelled to three hundred. They had elected president, vice-president, secretary, and cashier. They had voted to present the following resolution to the government:

(1) The government must create work and give us regular pay for it, or (2) pay us a dole of two-thirds our regular wages, or (3) get land for us in Canada or Argentina. If it won't do any of these things, we may have to resort to violent means.

And then they hoisted their banners, "Kjellerup to Copenhagen," and "We Demand Work." They cheered roundly for the little town and marched away, everyone hanging out of his window waving them a friendly farewell.

Late that afternoon they arrived at Silkeborg, a town of about ten thousand, and, if you please, Silkeborg had sent out a brass band to meet them, as well as many curious onlookers. But not merely curious. Sympathy ran high. The Homeless were escorted to the gymnastics hall of the main school where tables gaily decorated with fresh tulips and solid food awaited them. The city council and the local committee for children's meals saw to it that they were offered large platters of rice porridge with lumps of Danish butter, and sausages afterward, and other good things. During the evening the trade-union association gave them an entertainment with song and music, and then they were warmly bedded in the same hall. In the morning the cooperative bakery sent around 1,100 rolls, and lunch was likewise arranged for.

At this point the Danish newspapers, especially that enterprising organ Politiken, had stirred the country by sympathetic accounts, and a new element entered. The new element was Lieutenant Clauson-Kaas, a young man of the very best family and prone to impulses which hitherto had been of the most neck-breaking recklessness. The Lieutenant had tried nearly everything: he had run away to the Whites in Finland when he was a mere boy, had later been an aviator in the Danish army, and most lately of all, had amused himself by daring parachute descents. He read the newspaper reports of the Homeless, got an idea, and, as that type always does, immediately converted the idea into action. He wired the Homeless that as they were forming an army they would need a commander, and he wished to offer his services. A return wire invited him to come on, and included a promise of unconditional obedience.

Silkeborg sent the Homeless on their way with speeches and hurrahs, several hundred kroner, and, of course, sandwiches. En route for Skanderborg, their next stop, they were met by the parish council of Ry village and begged to partake of afternoon coffee and cake. While they were seated at this typical Danish refreshment, the young Lieutenant arrived, shining in a smart French uniform, and radiating the smile for which he is now famous. He was greeted with cheers, at once began to organize his troop, and on his motor-cycle slowly preceded them to Skanderborg, a town of about four thousand.

All the people of Skanderborg, or nearly so, were out to meet them and escorted them up to the city hall where the mayor was ready with a welcoming speech, in which he mentioned the justice of their demand and hoped it would be met. Skanderborg had intended to offer them dinner in the hall of the artisans' association, but, as the Homeless were now nearly five hundred, the council had feared the hall might not be large enough, and had made an appeal to private generosity. Five hundred and thirty invitations came from the burghers; more than enough, so that several would-be hosts expressed their disappointment. In practically every house, from the poorest to the richest, tables were lavishly set for the visitors. There were homes which received from ten to fifteen young men. An evening entertainment was provided in the artisans' hall, as well as sleeping quarters. The next morning the local Ford dealer offered to lend them a new Ford and a Daimler to carry the leaders. The mayor made a speech before their departure, thanking them for their exemplary behavior and wishing them luck.

Their "technical leader," the young lieutenant, had already drilled them so well that they swung along firmly and rhythmically. Horsens was the next stop, a town of some twenty-seven thousand, but they consented to delay and eat their Skanderborg sandwiches in a village meeting-hall where coffee was pressed upon them.

Horsens, not to be outdone by lesser towns, sent out a whole orchestra to meet them with gay music. The director of schools greeted them with a speech of welcome on behalf of the city, and offered the school baths for those who might wish to make use of them. They washed, and thereupon dinner was served in the school hall—sweet soup (a Danish favorite) and steak. In the assembly hall an excellent and much-applauded entertainment was given, and there, too, they slept. It must not be forgotten that the Horsens chapter of the Red Cross met the boys with everything needful for sore and wayworn feet, including new socks. The Lieutenant, getting hoarser and hoarser, was heard commanding "Section six on receiving duty for clothes"—for ladies kept arriving with such gifts—and "Section five elect three men to receive cash contributions," and so on. It is really not strange that he was able to persuade his flock to delete the last part of the resolution referring to possible "violent means," and to exchange their red armlets for green ones.

So far, indeed, life had been a dream of sweet soup. But in government circles in Copenhagen bitterness, not to say apprehension, was beginning to gather. Apprehension at least was claimed. No doubt there was some truth in the assertion that Copenhagen would be unfairly burdened if so many Homeless should make it their objective. But there was also the fear that the need of the unemployed was being dramatized too vividly. So much sympathy might not be good for the Conservatives at the next election. And, as the Conservatives are at present in power, they decided to stop the procession. Dignified words were uttered about the possibility of riots, and the Minister of Justice telephoned to Vejle, the next halt of the Homeless, that the town ought not to feed them, and that they were to disband at once, even before they got there. The Lieutenant was threatened with dismissal from his regiment if he continued with them, and sixty policemen were sent to Vejle.

The Lieutenant, game to the end, replied that these people had trusted him, that they had not done a single thing out of the way, and that he would do only what their committee of leaders agreed to. Meanwhile he encouraged them to proceed from Horsens to Vejle.

Vejle also had its civic pride, and, despite the scowls of the Minister of Justice, it carried through the program it had decided upon: a sympathetic speech of welcome by the mayor and a good dinner in the workers' assembly hall; bedding in four gymnastic halls; coffee as usual.

But the sweet dream was over. At a meeting of the whole five hundred the leaders and the Lieutenant reported the result of their negotiations with the Government and asked the assembly if they intended to go on against the formal prohibition of the law, especially since the law had offered to give every man a free railway ticket to wherever in Jutland he might want to fare. And the Government consented to receive their elected deputation.

There were a few wrathful bubbles from the very young, but the other great Danish instinct conquered. All things must be done lawfully and in order. It was decided to disband. A vote of confidence in the young Lieutenant was passed and hoarsely he assured them that the trip had not been in vain, the attention of the whole country had been drawn to their state. The money collected would be equally divided among them. "You are not tramps and good-for-nothings! You are men who want your rights, but you are men who obey the law." A few Communists tried to stampede the meeting by assailing the Lieutenant for his early connection with the Finnish Whites. They demanded no disbandment and on to Copenhagen. For a few minutes disorder reigned. Then the Lieutenant commanded, "All who are ready to disband and get their railway tickets and sandwich packages, troop up!" They all trooped up.

The affair is not over. The legality of dispersing the "army" is being questioned, for while the Danes believe in obeying the law they believe still more in scrutinizing it. As for the effect of the demonstration, it is probably as good as if they had marched across the islands to the capital. At any rate, Kjellerup and Silkeborg and Skanderborg and Horsens and Vejle have had a great time indulging their instinct for feeding their fellow-beings.

In the Driftway

COMPANIONATE marriage, the Drifter hazarded in the issue of May 2, is already legally possible to any couple willing to embark upon an American ship and able to persuade the skipper to marry them on the high seas. The Drifter reached this conclusion after reading the decision of a Chicago judge that no State of the Union authorized sea weddings and such ceremonies were "not void but voidable" upon the application of either party. The eyes of Steven T. Byington of Ballard Vale, Massachusetts, lit upon the paragraph, and he writes to say:

Some years ago the State of New York wanted to improve its marriage law, and enacted a statute by which persons may no longer marry by making a private oral agreement with each other, but, if they do not employ the regular officials, must make their agreement in writing and have witnesses, whereupon the marriage is valid if recorded in the county clerk's office within six months, but otherwise not.

Obviously, when the marriage becomes valid it must be valid as of some certain date, presumably either the date on which the paper is signed or the date on which it is recorded.

One might think, as its validity is not complete till it is recorded, that the marital relationship would begin when the recording was done. But suppose a couple draw up their contract, and then (not necessarily by their fault) the man is killed before it is recorded. The bride records it. Now she is safely married—the law distinctly provides that—but her husband married her after his death, so that she cannot inherit his estate because she did not become his wife till after his death. The conclusion seems unacceptable.

Well, then, let us understand that when it is recorded it is valid from the date on which it is signed. Then New York has a pretty good law for a six months' trial marriage. You sign your paper, put it in a safe-deposit box, and live together till you find out whether you are suited. The paper surely protects you against interference, and if at any time within six months you decide that you want permanence, you record it and you were duly married from the start. If you are dissatisfied, you just move out of the flat and don't record your paper, and that ends all.

* * * * *

THIS leads one to ask how many want freer sex relations. Not many of our youth, if one can trust a questionnaire initiated by Professor C. G. Dittmer of New York University, the result of which was set forth in the New York Herald Tribune. Professor Dittmer obtained data from 147 men and 138 women students. If all that we hear of the wild life and woolly ideas of the younger generation is true, then surely our young intellectuals of the college campuses should cast a formidable vote in favor of less rigid sex relations. But, lo, Professor Dittmer reports, 94 per cent of the men students and 95 per cent of the women declared themselves in favor of legal marriage.

Sixty-seven per cent of the men and 70 per cent of the women said that they were for legalized birth control, but only 73 per cent of the men and 62 per cent of the women favored divorce by mutual consent for childless couples. More striking still were the answers to the final question: "Would you like companionate marriage for yourself?" Only 45 per cent of the men and 33 per cent of the women said that they would.

* * * * *

ALL of which may surprise some persons but not in the least the Drifter. He observes that the average age of the men questioned was twenty years and of the women half-past nineteen. These young folks have grown up on the Saturday Evening Post and the Woman's Home Companion; they believe in love in a cottage (costing $25,000), with a car and a cook, and expect implicitly to live happily ever after. Not among them will you find the belief that love is a fleeting and wayward sprite whom one should not seek to bind too tightly.

* * * * *

THE Drifter regards it as significant and encouraging that so large a minority of Professor Dittmer's witnesses declared for a qualified and partial relaxation of our marriage customs, but he thinks the "ayes" might be stronger in a similar group ten or twenty years older. New ideas do not spread horizontally according to age but vertically according to mind. The theory of a moral and mental gulf between the younger and the older generation is a myth as old as the Garden of Eden and as untrue as the Serpent that dwelt therein. Dick drives his car a bit faster than Dad and Miriam wears her skirts a little shorter than Mother, but the difference in fundamentals between any two succeeding generations is so slight as to be hardly measurable. What we call the moral and mental gulf between them is only a difference in the elasticity of their legs and their capacity to stick out an all-night party. Nature has provided that man shall not progress too fast either toward Gehenna or Paradise.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

It Seems to Governor Sweet

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When one reads The Case of Andrew W. Mellon in The Nation for June 20 one is convinced that corruption must be the chief issue of the approaching campaign. But when one reads Heywood Broun on Protestantism and Prohibition, with its defense of nullification, one finds here an issue far more fundamental than honesty in government. Mellons and Falls may come and go, but observance of law is the warp and woof of our democratic institutions. Under the guise of personal liberty open and flagrant law violation is justified. It is an evil thing for a public official to rob the government, but it is far worse to undermine it by setting at naught its laws and defying its officials. All respect is due those who honestly believe the Eighteenth Amendment a mistake and take all lawful means to change the Volstead Act, but this is a very different method from wilful law-breaking in order to make it appear that the law cannot be enforced. Mr. Broun thinks that prohibition breeds lawlessness. How much law-breaking is due to prohibition per se and how much to open unabashed advocacy of nullification?

The Drys are urged by Mr. Broun "not to engage in a vast filibuster" but to consent to another contest on this issue. Certainly the Wets will be accommodated. I ask in all fairness, however, how long must the people submit to the remedying of the "flaw in the constitutional structure by the practice of nullification"? Suppose Mr. Hoover is elected and an honest effort made to enforce the Volstead Act. Will Mr. Broun obey it and submit gracefully to its provisions? Will he please tell us where honest acceptance of this law begins and dishonest nullification ends? He says "one victory does not give permanent possession." How many victories will?

Clarence True Wilson's call to the church to line up for the battle for prohibition gives Mr. Broun great concern lest "our institutions be undermined by the practice which the Protestant churches have brought into popularity." Heywood Broun is no mean underminer himself. Mr. Wilson's call to the churches to mobilize for an effective Dry campaign would be just about as effective in bringing about a union of church and state in this country as the Senate chaplain's prayers are in evangelizing the members of the United States Senate. The church has always been a bitter and unrelenting foe of the liquor traffic. The saloon has been abolished by the effective work of the organized church. Not all Protestant church members are Dry, but the vast majority are. These are the backbone of the Dry forces, the shock troops of the whole campaign. It was perfectly natural, logical, and proper for Mr. Wilson to call upon the church to get ready for the impending conflict. And the churches will not be found wanting.

Whenever a Methodist conference, a Presbyterian assembly, or the Federal Council of Churches strikes a blow at an unsocial practice or industrial evil someone says the church is meddling, and Mr. Broun does not omit to say so in this instance. He thinks that some time the church might make a pronouncement in regard to the tariff if its attempt to have the Volstead Act enforced should go unrebuked. Just so long as wrong social practices exist in our civilization the church will have something to say. It may be the twelve-hour day in industry; it may be the abridgment of the right to collective bargaining; whatever it is which affects the moral and economic life of the nation adversely, the church will not remain silent. It is the business of the church to keep the conscience of its members sensitive to wrongdoing of all kinds, both individual and social. It will take more than the churches to wage a successful Dry fight. Few large employers of labor have changed their views on the value of prohibition and production.

Colorado was made constitutionally Dry in 1912 through the efforts of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, the Anti-Saloon League, and the churches, aided by the Republican Party. Mr. Broun's effort to classify Catholics as Wet will not be successful. He does well to call attention to the Wet-and-Dry issue as of paramount importance. If the Wets follow Mr. Broun's advice on nullification it will not cease to be an issue in this country for many decades to come.

Princeton, New Jersey, June 19

WILLIAM E. SWEET

Why Drys Should Support Al

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This is the time for all good Drys to brace themselves firmly against the danger of being driven away from the Democratic Party through fear of its Wetness. There is no reason to assume that Governor Smith's personal tastes would obstruct his executive duties, or that a Dry President would mean immediate collapse of bootlegger. With Governor Smith as President Drys would be as free to carry on their fight as before, and time fights with them. The disgruntled toppers must ultimately succumb. If it were merely a choice of driving out by votes rum or "rascals," the latter might perhaps be kept a little longer without irremediable disaster.

But the issue that cannot wait—O Drys, take this to heart—is the protection of natural resources, which when once lost can never be recalled. In comparison to this, with all that it may mean in the spread of power and comfort and enlightenment in the wilderness and the lonely places, how unimportant it seems if a few addicts here and there continue to compass the exhilaration they crave.

Whitman, Mass., June 19

MARGARET A. GAFFNEY

Not Howard, but Harvard

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article The Million Dollar Lobby stated that the gigantic lobby maintained by the Joint Committee of the National Utilities Association, composed of the National Electric Light Association, the American Gas Association, and the American Railway Association, had paid $33,000 to Howard University.

I am advised by Dr. Emmett J. Scott, secretary-treasurer of the university, that "there is not one word of truth in this statement and our financial records evidence no payments of that character for any department of the university." On behalf of the trustees of the university, I must request, therefore, that you will make a correction of your published statement. I am sure that you will be glad to do this.

Washington, May 23

MORDECAI W. JOHNSON,

President

[We are indeed glad to repair this injustice. We are informed by the United States Daily, from whose verbatim report of the testimony we took the statement, that it was due to a typographical error. The testimony was of a payment to Harvard, not Howard, University.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Paradise Enow

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: That's what I say—"What is this talk about Utopia?" In a country where Villard in The Nation and Mencken in the Mercury can be bought at news-stands, one for fifteen cents a week and the other for four-bits a month, what more do you want? Isn't that Utopia enough?

Portland, Oregon, June 15

ALBERT JOURDAN

Contributors to This Issue

JAMES CANNON, JR., is Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and chairman of the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League.

MARY KINGSBURY SIMKHOVITCH, founder and director of Greenwich House, is a member of the Christian Social Service Department of the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

ELIZABETH MCCAUSLAND is on the staff of the Springfield Republican.

SIGNE TOKSVIG is the author of "Last Devil."

JOHN GOULD FLETCHER is a distinguished American poet who lives in England.

SCOTT BUCHANAN is the author of "Possibility."

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK is professor of history at the University of Chicago.

KEITH HUTCHISON is an English journalist.

E. C. MACDOWELL is engaged in biological research at Cold Spring Harbor, L. I.

RAYMOND LESLIE BUELL is the author of "The Native Problem in Africa."

Books

Song of the Moderns

By JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

We more than others have the perfect right
To see the cities like flambeaux flare along the night.

We more than others have the right to cast away
Thought like a withered leaf, since it has served its day;

Since for this transient joy which not for long can burn
Within our hearts, we gave up in return

Ten thousand years of holy magic power
Drawn from the darkness to transcend death's hour.

For every witch that died an electric lamp shall flare,
For every wizard drowned, the clear blue air

Shall roar with jazz-bands into listening ears;
For every alchemist who spent in vain his years

Seeking the stone of truth, a motor-horn
Shall scare the sheep that wander among the corn.

And there shall be no more the spirits of the deep,
Nor holy satyrs slumbering upon the steep,

Nor angels at a manger or a cross.
Life shall go on; to ugly gain or loss;

Yet vaster and more tragic, till at last
This present too shall make part of the past:—

Till all the joy and tragedy that man knows
Today, become stiff gravestones in long rows:

Till none dare look on the mountains ranked afar,
And think "These are the cast-off leavings of some star."

A Prophetic Book

Possible Worlds and Other Papers. By J. B. S. Haldane. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

"POSSIBLE WORLDS" is the name of a point of view concerning science and many other things that has gone with the name of J. B. S. Haldane ever since he wrote a book of winged words called "Daedalus." "Possible Worlds" is also the title of an essay in this book that tells philosophers how to think in step with current science. The other papers are maps of island universes of thought, most of which Mr. Haldane has helped to discover, or for which he is asking a place in the sun of everyman's attention. This is an exciting and prophetic book.

Its style alone would make it exciting. The docile reader soon learns to see a group of diverse facts in somewhat unusual relations as a single pattern, and just when he is feeling a certain warmth of acquaintance with them, Mr. Haldane drops one or two more innocent-looking pieces of information into their midst. Presto! Facts are not what they seemed; they are signs pointing irresistibly to a general and unexpected conclusion. Some solid-looking piece of common sense collapses, and in its place there opens out a new and breath-taking vista. Sometimes this is done in a sentence, sometimes it takes a paragraph, and on review a whole essay reveals such a plot. What is more, this style is not a trick; it is the outward and visible sign of the inward and evasive essence of laboratory procedure that is Mr. Haldane's subject matter. It seems likely that the logician and student of scientific method could learn more about the inductive and experimental art from this sort of exposition than from a whole library of logical theory. For scientific procedure is an art. Mr. Haldane whispers this secret between the lines of the essay entitled Science and Theology as Art Forms, but his style is itself the best exhibition of it.

As one reads on, there arises a suspicion and a question. One is regaled with metaphor and analogy in abundance. The sense of a literary mind with many poetic overtones grows and informs the subject matter. Is this the window-trimming of the ubiquitous popularizer, or do these metaphors and analogies play a necessary part in the intellectual economy of the laboratory? There is an essay relating the fine adjustments of sizes and powers of the parts of living organisms to the functions of transport and communication in the modern political state. There is the essay on Possible Worlds, a Chinese puzzle-box of analogies elaborated into allegories; and Mr. Haldane offers this as a sample of the sort of thinking that is necessary if we are to keep up with science. How far, if at all, does such imaginative thinking contribute to what we like to call hard-headed science? One suspects that there is a closer connection than our prophets of science allow us to guess. Perhaps the danger of popularization is a laboratory problem first; perhaps there is an original sin against logic in the scientific mind for which the mind of the man in the street is now being blamed and disciplined. Or the reverse may be true, that the wishful thinking and traditional biases of the popular mind are the only available source of the ideas which the laboratory sorts and tests, especially since revelation is out of fashion. The laboratory, like other institutions, is the vehicle and transformer of culture, not the undefiled source of immaculate conceptions. Mr. Haldane could answer this question in an interesting and uncomfortable essay.

He is a prophet and moralist as well as a scientist. Science ought to be applied and the introduction of scientific techniques should be hastened. The good life depends on the flexibility of mind and habit that would allow this. In this belief he is, like most prophets, only an acute and up-to-date historian. He is no more than on time in accepting the present rapid trend. Already the standards of the good life that are most effective, say, health and happiness, are defined and, one might add, limited by the present state of science. At any rate, in this country schools, courts, churches, restaurants, drug-stores, and worried mothers talk the language of the laboratory and impress upon us the folkways of the scientific society with only the normal degree of dilution for any rapid process of diffusion. The sad part of it is that the laboratory is slow in providing the necessary materials for making its teachings practicable ways of life. It is time that some scientist counseled caution to allow him to catch up with demand.

Mr. Haldane does not do this, but perhaps he does something better. He is a gay prophet, neither preaching nor kicking us into the new folkways. Rather he holds up dramatic moral dilemmas and asks us to bet on them. With a twinkle in his eye he invites us to follow him in the intellectual hand-springs that he does so well. He is a little satanic in his proposals, but it seems that one travels more comfortably and leisurely with a devil than with an angel these days. In this aspect he represents a new type of scientist which it is well for us to watch. There are many of his kind in the laboratories and there will be more. Perhaps Lucifer will again be a light-bringer and his happy intellect will transform science from a black art into a beneficent art, possibly even a fine art. Mr. Haldane is reassuring if you have any fears for the outcome.

SCOTT BUCHANAN

Heart and Head

Lafayette. By Henry Dwight Sedgwick. The Bobbs-Morrill Company. $5.

Lafayette. By Joseph Delteil. Translated by Jacques LeClercq. Minton, Balch and Company. $3.50.

UNLESS some evidence that is not now available should be discovered, there will be no essential disagreements among the biographers of Lafayette upon the role he played in the American Revolution. Some will insist, more than Mr. Sedgwick, that the laurels the young general won were tributes to his position as a link between France and America rather than to his military ability, but probably all will be inclined to accept him as a capable adolescent, nobly enthusiastic for a cause and commendably ambitious for a career.

There conflict among them will begin, and largely because there conflict began in Lafayette. In his early twenties he found himself at the same time a symbol of republicanism and one of the wealthiest aristocrats in France. He cultivated the pose of republicanism, though never surrendering any of the material advantages of the nobleman. On the one hand he represented the nobility in the Estates General, though he might have chosen to sit in the Third Estate; he refused to join the Third Estate when other liberal nobles were doing so, because his instructions did not give him the power; he shielded the Count of Provence in the famous Favras case, though Favras himself was allowed to suffer the death of a counter-revolutionary; he shot down people who were signing a petition against the king after Louis XVI had repudiated the revolution and attempted flight; he left his army, at a crucial moment, to support a traitorous king against a constitutionally established legislature, and deserted his post because that king was suspended; he helped to overthrow Napoleon, the product of the revolution, to make room for Louis XVIII, the product of the ancient regime; and in 1830, though the leader of the Republicans, he accepted the bourgeois king, because "France was not ready for a republic." On the other hand, he prepared the way for the calling of the Estates General more than any one other man; he gave dignity to the revolution of July 14, 1789, by accepting the position of commander-in-chief of the newly created municipal guard; he failed to make himself dictator when a less scrupulous (or more competent) man might easily have done so; he preferred years of prison and exile to joining the forces allied against France or becoming a henchman of Napoleon; and he led the liberals in their opposition to the reaction under Louis XVIII and Charles X.

There is, of course, no reason why a man who lived for almost eighty years should have been consistent in all the deeds of his long lifetime, particularly when so much of his maturer life was already determined by an impulsive act of his youth. There certainly is no reason, nevertheless, why he should not have felt that his every act conformed to an ideal that he had come to regard with as much habitual and conventional lip-service as a devout Catholic does Christianity. Lafayette's republican creed "took him in." But there is no reason why his probably entirely sincere rationalizations should have taken in his biographer likewise.

But Mr. Sedgwick is taken in. Along with Lafayette he assumes that Lafayette always acted out of motives of the purest democracy. He therefore apologizes for every unrepugnant act of Lafayette; and his apology often takes the form of calling the opponents of Lafayette hard names, which not only begs the question, but is not always deserved (particularly when he hopelessly confuses Girondins and Jacobins and considers all Jacobins ipso facto scoundrels). And so Lafayette comes through in the end with the strength of ten because his heart is pure, even if his head is a little thick. One is not surprised that the very last words of the book are "Lafayette, we are here!"

Mr. Sedgwick has done a great deal of work and learned a great deal about Lafayette. With more critical discrimination he might have written a splendid biography. Even so, his work is a paragon compared to M. Delteil's. M. Delteil sees the conflict in Lafayette—between the man of the head and the man of the heart, as he calls it—much more clearly than Mr. Sedgwick. But that is the only merit his book has. Otherwise it is a series of libidinous images, which perhaps to a better-trained mind than mine would represent the Freudian complexes of the faithful husband and respectable citizen that Lafayette was. Certainly there is very little in it that a mere historian would accept as "fact."

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK

A History of British Labor

A Short History of the British Working-Class Movement. By G. D. H. Cole. Three volumes in two. The Macmillan Company. $7.

THE British Labor Movement has, in the last twenty-five years, inspired many historians of its past and chroniclers of its present. Almost every phase and section has been covered, but never the movement as a whole. The Webbs, indeed, almost achieved this, but their mission was to trace the growth of trade unionism and the many excursions they made into other fields were always subordinated to the main theme. Now G. D. H. Cole has endeavored to give a broad survey of the history of the Labor Movement showing its three main sections—the trade unions, the political organizations, and the cooperative societies—growing up side by side, "deriving their strength from a common necessity and a common inspiration, and, though their paths at times diverge, making for a common goal."

This is no easy task, and one for which 600 pages are all too few, but on the whole Mr. Cole has succeeded admirably. His treatment of the economic background in which the movement developed and the chapters at the end of each volume on the condition of the working classes are particularly helpful. He has, perhaps, devoted too much of his attention to industrial struggles and, at times, treated the political side of the movement in rather a perfunctory way. But this was to be expected, for trade unionism has always been his hobby and, for him, an election can never be as exciting as a strike.

Each of the three volumes of this book covers a distinct period in the development of the British Labor Movement. The first, from about 1800 to 1850, was a time of unorganized mass movements, demonstrations of the newly created proletariat against industrialism rather than against capitalism. The new age of coal and iron covered the green fields with a smoky blanket under which the workers struggled blindly against unknown enemies. In the darkness the labor trinity came to life. With the repeal of the anti-combination laws began the molding of the trade union into the main vehicle for working-class expression. Owen and the Rochdale pioneers gave an ideal and a method to the cooperative movement. The Chartist organizations were the forerunners of the Labor Party.

The second half of the nineteenth century was a period of comparative quiet. The prolonged birth-pains of industrialism were over. Prosperity and constant expansion allowed a steady, if slow, improvement in the workers' standard of living. The Labor Movement lost its elements of revolt. It devoted itself to building up efficient organizations and to pulling down one by one the barriers that stood between the workers and economic and political freedom. It was not a period of intense class-consciousness. The organized workers were the skilled men, the aristocracy of labor, who in doctrine were in harmony with the prevailing liberalism. Only toward the end of the century did signs of sharper conflict appear in the struggles of the semi-organized unskilled laborers, encouraged by the newly risen Socialist groups to make themselves heard.

The period covered by the third volume opened with the turn of the century and the foundation of the Labor Party. This new instrument soon proved its value to the workers. The privileges of the trade unions, attacked at this time by two famous legal decisions, were fully restored by the use of political power. The stimulative effect on the Liberals of the sudden rise of the Labor Party was proved by a mass of important social legislation. The years just prior to the war saw, too, increased activity on the industrial front. Syndicalists and Guild Socialists were endeavoring to transform trade unionism into "a positive instrument for the creation of a socialist society," and their agitation helped bring about a great epidemic of strikes.

The war caused a truce both politically and industrially, but within a few months of the armistice the conflict was renewed. In dealing with these post-war years Mr. Cole directs attention to the coal trade, which, he finds, symbolizes the economic problem with which British labor is faced. Here is an industry, once immensely prosperous, struggling with increased costs and decreased foreign markets. The operators, engaged in desperate competition, have been able to unite only on one point—a determination that the miners should bear the burden of the industry's decay. Two prolonged strikes and innumerable lesser disputes have ended in the defeat and the crippling of the miners' unions. All the other great British industries have been in much the same state of depression.

Under these circumstances the efforts of the workers since the war to defend and improve their standards have encountered increasing resistance. Two events, one political and one industrial, stand out. Mr. Cole hardly does justice to the work of the first Labor Government. He appears to be one of the many who believed that the experiment should not be made. It meant, of course, that labor had to undergo the severe test of adjusting its enthusiasms to the exigencies of the political situation.

When the Labor Government was defeated the labor pendulum swung back to industrial action, a movement which ended in the General Strike. This Mr. Cole describes "as a half-hearted attempt to run a revolution in the spirit of a friendly game of cribbage." Its collapse weakened the Labor Movement sufficiently to allow the Tory Government to pass the reactionary Trade Union Act. Trade unionists have since turned against the General Strike as a weapon. Their half-heartedness in its use arose, perhaps, from a consciousness that while the labor Samson, by exerting his full strength, might pull down the pillars of British society he would undoubtedly be buried in the ruins.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Repression in Rumania

Roumania Ten Years After. By Henry A. Atkinson, R. A. McGowan, John Howland Lathrop, Graham Hunter, and Jules Jezquel. Boston: Beacon Press. $1.50.

WHEN that garbled version of Woodrow Wilson's idealism which is the Versailles Peace Treaty was put into effect, Queen Marie's Rumania received the generous spoils of some 125 per cent increase in territory and almost 200 per cent increase in population. Since this adjustment, whereby Rumania suddenly became suzerain to more than ten million Russians, Hungarians, Jews, Germans, Austrians, and Bulgarians, rather obviously negated Mr. Wilson's ideas on self-determination, the peace pact provided a minorities treaty which the Rumanian Government signed, pledging "full guarantees of liberty and justice to all inhabitants, both of the old kingdom of Rumania and of the territory added thereto, to whatever race, language, or origin they may belong."

Complaints that Rumania was violating her pledges immediately appeared and were corroborated by several investigations. This book is the report of an American commission composed of representatives of various Christian sects which made the latest investigation there. It is a model of detached study and temperate statement; it grants official Rumania every consideration, gives her the benefit of every doubt, accepts every possible extenuating circumstance. Nevertheless it cannot hide—nor does it try—the flagrant persecution and mailed-fist assimilation with which the government has tortured these newly won minorities. It cites policies as well as instances of civic discrimination and religious intolerance. Baptists, Lutherans, Jews, and Catholics—in fact, members of any faith other than the Greek Orthodox, which is the state church—are victims of constant and violent injustice. The mild temper of the commission and the intolerable conditions of the land are both revealed in the declaration that "There have been excesses, acts of terrorism, and such molestation of peaceful elements of the population as to cause continual fear and unrest and generally to reflect badly upon those who are responsible for the peace and welfare of the country."

J. J. S.

Two Worlds

The Seventh Hill. By Robert Hillyer. The Viking Press. $1.50.

Burning Bush. By Louis Untermeyer. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

TO be in the country where the wind itself is moving the grasses, and birds are more actual than anyone's words, is a severe test for a volume that is made up largely of all that exists away from cities. Robert Hillyer's seventh volume of verse achieves the visual reality in such lines as

When fields give up their ebbing green
And two bats interweave their flight,

and

Autumn advances leaf by leaf, in a manner somewhat reminiscent of Hodgson.

His poetry, lacking excitement and that internal fire which causes a poem to detach itself from the page, has an uncommon surety and calm, and his poetic level is high and sustained. Being a mature poet, free from self-conscious detail and the sterile striving of inexperience, he can write as perfect a poem as the second one in the book, When I Say For Ever I Think of the Temple of Zeus, which surpasses all the short poems and many of the long ones. And he can induce an atmosphere as remarkable as this under Meditations:

As I was faring through a wood
Bewildered as I was,
I came upon a wayside rood
That glistered clear as glass.

The poem wanders to a length that breaks the ominous simplicity of the first stanza.

The Farthest Country is Tierra Del Fuego and The Stars Came Out But Her Love Came Never have the characteristic quality of his lyrical ease, in which bitterness and physical frustration find an unrebelling acceptance. But he is by no means repetitive or lacking in versatility. Prothalamion, at the end of the volume, contains passages of startling fineness.

Osirius, slender as young grain,
Comes back to Isis; the shy lad
Adonis wanders by the stream;
And Jesus, innocently clad
In samite, walks beneath the trees,
Half ill-at-ease
That Judas and the Cross were but a dream.

In spite of his unfailing technical achievement and traditional integrity, one feels sometimes that one sentence flows a

BEWARE MY DOG!

Warning from the Wife of a Friend of Mankind

IN the "American Mercury" for May I read the life-story of Jim Tully, and what a hard time he had, when, as a young and struggling author, he brought a manuscript of his first novel to Upton Sinclair, asking help from "the renowned Socialist." "Mr. Sinclair said politely that he would look at it. Then Tully waited, in a fever of anxiety, for days, weeks, months. At last, in desperation, he sent for the manuscript, and it was returned to him—unread. Mr. Sinclair's yard was filled with fierce watch-dogs," and Mr. Tully's messenger "counted himself lucky to escape."

Upon reading that, I went digging into boxes of old letters, with the result that I produced ten letters from Jim Tully to Upton Sinclair, nine of them written several months before the publication of Mr. Tully's first novel. Several are published in the "Haldeman-Julius Monthly" for August. Here are a few sentences: (1) "Thanking you for your kindness in the past, and assuring you that I'll not soon forget the man who saw the first page of my attempt, and who told me to avoid all exclamations and make short sentences." (2) "You are the one man to keep me true in it." (3) "Thanks." (4) "Many thanks for that fine letter to Julius. You see beyond Jim Tully to the ideal you have followed all your life. Thanks again." (5) "I want to thank you sincerely for that big letter you wrote to Mr. Harcourt." (Alfred Harcourt, the publisher.) "I wish you the best of the season, and I thank you again." (6) "If you are willing to write a review, I will see that Harcourt gets in touch with you. This will mean a great deal to me as I am very anxious to get the book in the hands of all the intellectuals and radicals possible." (7) A 553-word review of Jim Tully's first novel, written by Upton Sinclair and published in the "Appeal to Reason," April 15th, 1922; the concluding sentence being: "So here is good luck to him—and if you have a couple of dollars to buy a novel, buy this one!" (8) Carbon copy of a letter from Upton Sinclair to Jim Tully, dated November 28, 1921, stating, "I owned a dog about fifteen years ago, but I never owned a dog in Pasadena, and if your little boy was scared by a dog when he came to see me, it wasn't my dog, and this is the first I have heard about it." (9) A photograph of Mr. Tully, inscribed: "To General Upton Sinclair. 'Yours for the revolution.' Private Jim Tully. Dec. 1, '21." (10) A letter from Mr. Tully, the successful novelist, writing from the Algonquin Hotel, April 4, 1926: "Horace Liveright told me yesterday how wild you were about young Hennessy." (A tramp writer.) "It brought back memories of how lousy you treated me. . . . You at least cured me of the Brotherhood of Man stuff."

Through the years of married life, I have had one serious trouble: the fact that my husband persists in solving the problems of everybody in the world but himself; that he persists in reading manuscripts and trying to find publishers for endless persons who do not know how to write, or who, knowing how, have nothing to say. I hereby serve notice: from this time on I am going to keep a dog. Beware my dog!

Upton's Brotherhood of Man Stuff

"Boston" will be finished in July. It is to be published August 22nd, Boston's great anniversary. It is running serially in the "New Leader" (London), "Ogonyok" (Moscow), and in Prague. Was running in Warsaw, but the government suppressed the magazine. What about Boston?

"Singing Jailbirds," which I have called "Upton's only work of art," will be produced by the New Playwrights, New York, in October. First produced in Vienna, then in Prague, then by Piscator in Berlin; Universal News Service reports "a phenomenal success." Also produced by the Phalange Artistique in Paris; "l'Humanité" reports "le succès a été grand." To be produced in Tokio, unless the cast is in jail.

"Oil!" continues the best-selling novel in Germany: 55,000 in first six weeks. First part issued in Paris; Romain Rolland writes: "I am seized by the irresistible vitality." The novelist, Henri Poulaille, writes in "Le Peuple": "There has not been since the war a single novel which can be put beside 'Oil!': not a single one, not Russian, not German, not French, not English, not Scandinavian. . . . One of the masterpieces of human literature." Amsterdam is reading "Oil!" in the "Notenkraker," Copenhagen in "Politiken." Polish, Hungarian and Japanese editions under way.

Public libraries of Sweden report the books of Upton Sinclair most in demand of any author, native or foreign. Spanish edition of "Samuel the Seeker" out. "Money Writes" out in Moscow; German translation completed. "Jimmie Higgins" a movie in Hollywood—beg pardon, in Kharkov. After nine years an English publisher dares to risk "The Brass Check." Also "Money Writes!"—but cutting out the paragraphs on Kipling. American editions of all these books exist, and may be ordered from me or my husband.

P.S. I think Mr. Mencken ought to pay for this advertisement, as I have to pay for the dog!

MARY CRAIG SINCLAIR, STATION B, LONG BEACH, CALIFORNIA.

little too easily, a little too inevitably into another, and desires the shock of a word that would arrest, now and then, by its implication of a raw emotion.

Mr. Hillyer's In Solemn Pause the Forest Waits has the theme, brought to a slighter realization, of Long Feud, the first poem, and one of the best, in Mr. Untermeyer's volume. There is less hint of calm and little indication of smooth or finished growth in any of his poems; they are too troubled still by "The pitch of loss, the accent of forgetting" that he is adept in describing. His musical sense is strong and his technique varied. The inconsistent and continual stings of emotion that living enforces upon him charge his verse with a frequently upsetting vitality and an undoubted sincerity. He is at his best in this volume, I think, in his elemental pictures, the "shifting rock" "turning on its tireless bones"—

Earth grows skyward; earth grows prouder;
Earth grows more inclined to mock.
Then, one day, a fine, thin powder . . .
And the rock returns to rock.

Positano and Pathetic Fallacy are staccato in thinking as well as in expression. The title poem, Burning Bush, and Unreasoning Heart have the same nervous urge in back of them, but as a poem Team of Oxen succeeds better.

This is earth moving, earth that learned to crawl
Along the glacial wall;
Boulders that rose in their deliberate way
From the raw clay.

Not eagerly, nor yet prepared to know
Where they are meant to go,
The damp soil dropping from their sides, they move
In an uncertain groove.

Thickly, but pressing on as though their bones
Still feel the push of stones,
And fear to rest themselves lest they remain
Dead earth again.

It succeeds so well, in fact, that one would exchange a dozen of the sonnets and Book Reviews for that and Isaac.

HELEN PEARCE

Literature and Investigation

Heredity and Human Affairs. By E. M. East. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

IN comparison with best-selling, omniscient Outlines and popularizations of science by novelists, newspapermen, and poets, the appearance of a non-technical book by a thoroughly qualified specialist is an event of importance. The number of specialists willing to write a general book is small, and smaller still the number who have the ability to write entertainingly. When such a book takes up numerous social questions in the light of deeply grounded scientific knowledge much interest is certain to be aroused. The gloriously iconoclastic chapter that opens "Heredity and Human Affairs" is an essay on religion and life, written with much gusto. There follows a review of the basic principles of heredity, expounded with care and clearness. From the inheritance of specific human traits the discussion follows on through problems of environment versus heredity, the marriage of near kin, sex, race, genius, social scum, immigration, democracy, feminism, mother and child, and, finally and most emphatically, birth control, the main constructive cause toward which the whole book leads.

In general the facts quoted may be relied upon; specific references are frequently given. The opinions presented are based on the findings of experimental breeding, but this does not insure their scientific finality. Mr. East clearly attempts the difficult feat of carrying the calm logic of his laboratory over into human affairs. At times he succeeds. He often disarms by leading off with entirely fair presentations of opposing views and develops his own opinions from the evidence. But in places there are suspicions that the evidence was developed from his preexisting opinions. As a whole the readability of the book gives it a certain distinction, though it suffers in comparison with its predecessor, "Mankind at the Crossroads."

The effect of the great popularity of "Mankind at the Crossroads" has been watched with misgiving, for the phenomenal success of a general book by a student often kills him as an investigator. The great pressure is always toward abandoning the thankless search for new truth in favor of the lucrative writing of more books. When the author is a mediocre investigator this may be a real advantage to society. But when he is a brilliant investigator society is in danger of losing, for the chances are strongly against the achievement of equal greatness in the field of letters. The technical contributions of Mr. East hold such a prominent position that general writing of equal importance would have to exhibit extraordinary literary merit. However strong the publisher's pressure may have been for this second book, it was resisted long enough to complete investigations the importance of which surpasses even his previous work. The scientist still held the upper hand, and now, although the existence of this book shows that the external pressure, combined with an internal flair for writing, triumphed temporarily, it seems probable that Mr. East will remain an investigator.

E. C. MACDOWELL

Fiction Shorts

Georgie May. By Maxwell Bodenheim. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

Pre-war Southern pimps and harlots in a badly written novel, adrip with sentimental outpourings about "respectable society"; but worth reading for a few vivid and brutal pictures of small-town coke dens and county jails. They make one sympathize to an extent with Mr. Bodenheim's fine scorn for the big royalty novelists who confine their satire to rotary clubs and hotel-lobby drummers.

The Old and the Young. By Luigi Pirandello. Translated from the Italian by C. K. Scott Moncrieff. E. P. Dutton and Company. Two volumes. $5.

There seems little enough reason for having translated this dull, sprawling, enormous, old-fashioned political novel, dealing in a prose of unexampled stiffness, with the organization of the pre-war Fasci and the roots of the Sicilian labor movement. The general effect is that of a bad chromo lithograph. There is not a trace here of the essential Pirandello who was still to develop, the analyst of personality and the wizard of metaphysical drama. To Italians, of course, the appearance of this novel must have been an event of unquestioned sociological importance; Americans will be little more than puzzled by it.

Rembrandt. By Sandor Brody. Globus Press. $2.50.

During the last three years of his life Rembrandt van Rijn lived much with certain Jews in the Ghetto of Amsterdam; and among them the old outcast died. This series of expressionistic sketches (for it can hardly be termed a novel) occasionally conveys some of the miserable tragedy of the painter's last years; conveys it without any sentimentalizing and indeed with a certain almost cocky irony. It is difficult to understand why this hasty and uneven book should have been hailed as a European masterpiece; yet it is not without its moments of insight.

The Way of Sacrifice. By Fritz von Unruh. Translated from the German by T. A. Macartney. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This is the German analogue for "Le Feu," an expressionistic notebook of horror with the Verdun offensive as the Moloch-

IN THE ANNIVERSARY ISSUE OF

THE REFLEX

JUNE, 1928

THE SYNAGOGUE, THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL JUSTICE

by ABBA HILLEL SILVER

~*~

PATRIOTEERING IN ZION

by MAURICE SAMUEL

~*~

THE STORY OF A MAN WHO BECAME GOD

by DR. A. CORALNIK

~*~

ENRICO GLICENSTEIN

by FRANCES O'BRIEN

SOIREE ANTI-JUIVE

by PIERRE VAN PAASSEN

~*~

AN AMERICAN YIDDISH TROUBADOUR

by DR. BENJAMIN GRAUBARD

~*~

THE JEWS
IN THE FLORIDA BOOM

by J. A. GREENBERG

~*~

POLYGLOTTONY

by WILLIAM SCHACK

Editorials, Laboratory and Studio Stories, the Theatre, Book Reviews

The best way to secure a copy of The REFLEX regularly is to subscribe for it

Use this convenient
COUPON

The REFLEX

250 West 57th Street, New York, N. Y.

Date _____, 192

I hereby subscribe to The REFLEX commencing with the _____ issue. Price $5.00 in U. S. A., $5.50 in Canada and Europe, payable in advance.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

Make Checks Payable to The REFLEX

N

villain. Written under the most torturing circumstances, it bears the impress of almost unbearable strain, not all of which is communicated to the reader. Von Unruh's unconcessive style has been rendered with an awkward literalness by the tactless translator; so that at most one sentence out of three becomes thoroughly comprehensible.

Daisy and Daphne. By Rose Macaulay. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

An anti-Freudian manifestation. Miss Macaulay has the sure touch that enables her to place firm fingers on the sensitive spot and subsequently to make a correct and clever diagnosis. Occasionally she seems to take her mission too seriously. As for Daisy and Daphne, it is quite a jolt if you have been playing favorite to discover toward the middle of the book that they are one and the same girl. From that time on it is smooth sailing for the reader, but the bipartite heroine goes through a distressing struggle to be something she isn't, only to be defeated at the finish by the combined forces of family and inferiority complex.

Children and Fools. By Thomas Mann. Translated from the German by Herman George Scheffauer. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Nine short tales by the author of "The Magic Mountain," ranging in date of composition from 1897 to 1926. Interesting in themselves, they fail to fulfil the publisher's promise, for they do not really enable us to trace Mann's artistic evolution as a process. Most of them do not quite come off: in each case an emotional theme appears to have been stated which is so suggestive and far-reaching as to defy adequate resolution by the short-story form. To this generalization the longest and latest tale, Disorder and Early Sorrow, is an exception: it is certainly one of the most beautiful and tender fictional treatments of the eternal clashing-generations theme. The translation leaves much to be desired.

Wide Fields. By Paul Green. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

A carefully elaborated sketchbook about the poor white farmers of North Carolina, revealing once more the author's power of creating people through dialogue. The reappearance of familiar characters throughout the book gives this collection of little stories a pleasant sense of unity and reality. Everybody comes out for a final curtain in a sort of index called Little Bethel People which is as good as, if not better than, any story in the book.

Armance. By Marie-Henri Beyle (de Stendhal). Translated from the French by C. K. Scott-Moncrieff. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

This magnificent edition of a great French master now includes translations of "The Charterhouse of Parma," "The Red and the Black," "The Abbess of Castro and other Tales," and "On Love." This is the first English version of "Armance," that minor but extremely interesting study in impotence whose authorship was for many years disguised by the fantastic evasions of the born literary farceur, Stendhal. More than any other of his works, it possesses the characteristic crystalline aridity which is the most potent (and most puzzling) element in his style.

The Woman Who Rode Away. By D. H. Lawrence. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Eleven short stories dealing, as usual, with those terrible intensities that arise between men and women and which Mr. Lawrence's characters are alone capable of putting into words. One feels a monotony of subject matter but absolutely none of tone or treatment. The volume seems to have aroused but lukewarm comment; to this reviewer, on the contrary, it appears a decided and powerful improvement over the tortured vagueness of "The Plumed Serpent." The title story is a near master-

NEW! MODERNISTIC!

$11.75

(Size 48 inches long, 41 inches high)

HERE'S A BOOKCASE that is really useful—

Modernistic . . . True . . . And fits beautifully with any interior. Sectional. Arrange in any shape to conform with space. Holds 75 books easily. Ledges hold vase, telephone, small sculpture, etc. Additional shelves may be bought separately. Price low for booklovers. Unpainted. Paint yourself to suit. THREE DAYS' APPROVAL. Pay on delivery. Satisfaction or money back. Freight free in Greater New York only.

Many other models on display at our showroom

Phone Stuyvesant 7832 or write

MODERNAGE
541 East 17th Street, New York City
FURNITURE CO.

Sail Down

Mother VOLGA

Our Special Tour $390 UP

Sailing July 28 . . . . .

15 OTHER RUSSIAN TOURS

Weekly Sailings . . . . . $340 up

WRITE, PHONE OR CALL FOR LITERATURE

AMERICAN-EUROPEAN TRAVEL BUREAU

Representative of the Official Russian Travel Bureau.

100 Fifth Avenue

Cor. 15th St.

Tel. CHElsea 5124-4477.

TUNE IN THE NATION'S HOUR

WMCA—New York—(370 m.)

Every Wednesday Evening

at 8 o'clock

piece; and there is hardly a phrase in the entire book which does not crackle with electrical force.

Quiet Cities. By Joseph Hergesheimer. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Reading Mr. Hergesheimer after D. H. Lawrence is an illuminating experience. These gentle re-creations of the pasts of several American cities have a lukewarm charm, due almost entirely to the neatly applied "atmosphere," indicative of some very conscientious historical research on Mr. Hergesheimer's part. As for the stories themselves, it is rather a simple-minded apology to term them purposively artificial: that trick was exhausted once and for all by Charles Lamb. In truth, the substance of this book is the self-same romantic stuff which is at last beginning to be recognized as Mr. Hergesheimer's particular hallmark.

Thérèse. By François Mauriac. Translated from the French by Eric Sutton. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

One of the least powerful but certainly the most characteristic of Mauriac's over-praised series of "Landes" novels. It contains in the clearest form his passionate attack on all manifestations of passion (except the Catholic emotion), his disintegrating onslaught on the terrible French institution of the family, and his cold scorn of the provincial male Frenchman. Mauriac, despite his apparently classical form, is really a tendenz novelist: he expresses, with greater clarity than most French writers, certain current psychological and sociological obsessions among Gallic intellectuals. It is to be regretted that he should be introduced to American readers by "Thérèse" rather than by his masterpiece, "Genitrix." C. P. F.

Books in Brief

The Other Side. By Struthers Burt. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

A series of gently indignant essays, originally published in the Saturday Evening Post. Mr. Burt, who loves his country, takes to task Mr. Mencken, supercilious English critics, Bab-bitt-baiters, ex-patriates, the hard-boiled younger generation, and those who are pessimistic about democracy. He believes nations should be more tolerant of each other and that human nature is much the same all over the globe. Almost everything he says is reasonably true and salutary and "gently bred"—to use Mr. Burt's favorite and most-looked-up-to word. It is slightly unfortunate that his sweet humanism should occasionally be a bit irritating, like so much of Matthew Arnold and Anatole France.

These Changing Times. By E. R. Eastman. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This is an interesting account of the development of agriculture and rural life in the United States since 1900. Mr. Eastman, who is editor of the American Agriculturist, knows farming at first hand and is familiar with the everyday problems that confront the farmer. He treats these generally with common sense and not too much of professional uplift. At the same time, he has vision enough to see a future for intelligent farming in this country. When, however, he deals with subject matter outside the realm of personal observation, he is neither accurate nor realistic. For instance, he announces that Russia "is densely inhabited." He argues for rural religion in a piece of rationalization such as the veriest amateur in psychology would recognize. He believes that Slavonic immigrants tend to be lawbreakers above other people. Although his office is in New York, it still shocks him to see girls wearing "too short" skirts and smoking cigarettes. Finally, he maintains the Kiwanian premise that "America has built the greatest civilization of all time."

TRIVIAL BREATH, Elinor Wylie's new book of poems, is compact of beauty, tenderness, and wit. It comes as a cool oasis in the arid desert of many books. It is appealing to all who love letters, all who take an interest in modern poetry, all who wish to enter for a moment an enchanted land. Just two quotations, the first stanza from "Innocent Landscape":

Here is no peace, although the air has faded,
And footfalls die and are buried in deep grass,
And reverential trees are softly painted
Like saints upon an oriel of glass.

and this, to show a different manner, from "Miranda's Supper":

A pair of cameos clasp her throat,
Wherein Psyche, pink and cream,
Slim-handed slants the candle-beam
On Cupid, swooning in carnelian;
Such trifles are antique Italian.

TRIVIAL BREATH, BY ELINOR WYLIE
Designed and made by the Pynson Printers. $2.50

Also by Elinor Wylie:

"The Orphan Angel" and
"Mr. Hodge and Mr. Hazard"

ALFRED A. KNOFF

PUBLISHER, N. Y.

THEATERS

—THE THEATRE GUILD Presents—

"PORGY" || REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

|| JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 5:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

|| GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

—THE ACTOR MANAGERS present—

GRAND STREET FOLLIES
OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th St., West of Broadway.
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

International Relations Section

Labor in the Congo

By RAYMOND LESLIE BUELL

TWENTY years ago the attention of the American people was officially called to conditions in the Congo Free State, then under the personal rule of Leopold II of Belgium, by a resolution of the United States Senate asking the President to assist in bringing to an end alleged atrocities in that territory. Partly as a result of American and British opinion, the Belgian Parliament annexed the Free State in 1908 and terminated the regime under which natives had been obliged to gather rubber for the state and private concessionnaires. Following the adoption of these reforms, the interest of the outside world in Congo affairs began to wane. Nevertheless developments are now going on in this colony which are of interest to all concerned with the government of primitive peoples and with the race problem in general.

In taking over the administration of the Congo the Belgian Government was confronted not only by a tribally disorganized society, but by a people ravaged by disease, probably the most dreadful of which is sleeping sickness. Upon the arrival of the Europeans this disease was restricted to the west coast, but by means of porters and of soldiers who accompanied the Europeans into the interior the disease was spread so that today it is found in nearly every part of the Congo except in Ruanda-Urundi. This disease in some cases results in the decimation of entire villages; in other cases it leads to sterility and to excessive infant mortality. One experienced missionary believes that sleeping sickness has destroyed eight-tenths or nine-tenths of the population of the Middle Congo.

The European occupation has not only extended the scourge of sleeping sickness, but it has introduced new diseases, of which syphilis, tuberculosis, bacillary dysentery, and Spanish influenza are leading examples. At Stanley Pool the death-rate from tuberculosis among natives is more than twice the rate in Belgium. In an effort to combat these diseases the Belgians have organized one of the most effective medical services in Africa. This work, however, has done little toward solving the population problem of the Congo. The dwindling of the native population and its susceptibility to disease are not due primarily to physical causes; they are due largely to the burden imposed upon this population by European industrialism, which has broken down native morale and physical resistance.

The Congo is rich in mineral resources and in the Katanga some of the world's richest copper mines will be found. Altogether about three-fourths of the exports of the Belgian Congo consist of mining products. At the close of the World War, the people of Belgium naturally turned to the Congo as a means of reconstructing a disorganized economic and financial condition at home. In 1921 the Belgian Parliament sanctioned a policy of "industrialization" by authorizing the Congo Government to contract a loan to the extent of three hundred million francs for the purpose of constructing railways and ports so as to open up the whole colony. As a result of this industrialization policy the exports of the Congo have increased from 60,000,000 francs in 1913 to 160,000,000 gold francs in 1925. The value of the stock in Congo companies also stands at an extremely high figure. Thus the stock of the Compagnie du Katanga, which at par is 200, stands at 39,000, while the stock of a dozen Congo companies having a par value of 100 or 200 ranges from 1,000 to 5,000.

The development of any country in the tropics where the whites decline to perform manual labor is dependent upon the native labor supply. Despite the natural wealth of the Congo, its native population of ten and a half million is extremely sparse, having a density of only 11.5 per square mile. European mines and plantations demand a concentrated labor supply which the localities immediately adjacent to these industries cannot provide. Consequently they are obliged to rely upon recruiters who scour the country for hundreds of miles to induce the natives to leave their villages and, after a march of several weeks, accept European employment.

In the Katanga and the Kasai this recruiting is carried on by organizations called Bourses du Travail, which place recruiters throughout their respective provinces. The Katanga mines also receive part of their labor from Northern Rhodesia, where it is recruited by Robert Williams and Company, an English concern. The Bourse du Travail recruits labor in the mandated territory of Ruanda-Urundi, which it transports nearly a thousand miles to Elizabethville. In the other provinces employers rely upon private recruiters. It is the practice of all these recruiters to obtain men from the native chiefs. In most cases they are assisted by government administrators.

The Colonial Charter of Belgium prohibits forced labor for private purposes, while compulsory labor for public works cannot be imposed except by decree. Nevertheless, a system of administrative aid to recruiting has prevailed in the Congo which in effect has resulted in compulsory labor. This compulsion is openly imposed to obtain the ten thousand men necessary for the widening of the Lower Congo Railway. In the summer of 1926 the government laid before the Colonial Council a decree authorizing the imposition of labor conscription for this purpose. It frankly stated that conscription was already being imposed, which it wished to regularize and control by law. But the Cabinet later withdrew the decree on the ground that the Belgian people were opposed to compulsory labor. Nevertheless, the government continues to conscript labor for railway construction.

As a result of these efforts more than three hundred thousand natives are under employment today. The writer personally saw old men with ropes around their necks shipped down the Lualaba River by an administrator to a rice mill at Stanleyville. Practically every district report in the Congo frankly states that the administrator spends much of his time in procuring labor. Members of the Colonial Council at Brussels have repeatedly called attention to the existence of these practices, which the Minister of Colonies has admitted. In a letter written in September, 1925, an administrator who had been obliged to procure labor for the Lever plantations declared that the official was daily becoming "more and more a veritable merchant of men," and that his "villages become empty upon his approach as at the approach of a slave trader." He asked what would the peasants of Belgium say if they were obliged to go to work in the factories of Bohemia?

The government has been especially active in recruiting men for its own mines at Kilo-Moto. In fact, it is difficult for the government to occupy a neutral position on the labor question since, as a result of a policy adopted by Leopold II, the Congo Government not only owns the Kilo-Moto mines but holds a large number of shares in various enterprises, such as the Comité Spécial and the Forminière, which brought a revenue to the Congo treasury of more than thirty million francs in 1926.

In most cases native laborers are obliged to sign a contract compelling them to work for a period of one year, during which time it is a criminal offense to desert. Thus industry in the Congo rests upon a system of virtual compulsion. While on the mines of Johannesburg the death-rate in 1926 was only 9.2 per thousand the rate on many industries in the Congo ranges from 30 to 80 per thousand. These excessive rates are not due to the ill-treatment of labor while under employment. On the contrary, Congo legislation prescribes requirements in regard to housing, food, and medical care which are the most stringent in Central Africa. The high death-rate in the Congo is due to the fact that such a large proportion of the native population has suddenly been wrenched from a primitive native life, and has not been able to adjust itself to the demands of European industry. The death-rate is also increased by the conditions under which laborers are transported to places of employment. A few years ago 54 per cent of the men recruited in the Kasai for the Katanga never reached their destination because of disease or desertion. Upon reaching the place of employment, the resistance of the native as well as his morale is weakened so that, separated from his family and obliged to live in compounds housing large numbers of men, he falls prey to epidemics and especially to pulmonary disease. He also casts off the old rules of conduct which the authority of the tribe imposed and becomes acquainted with vices unknown in the native village. His disrespect for the white men and for the European authority has been increased by the extent to which Belgians cohabit with native women. Travelers frequently express the opinion that native "indiscipline" is greater in the Congo than in any other part of Africa.

The native families left in the villages also lead an unhappy existence. The women are left to the prey of the men who remain behind; children grow up without proper care; the burden of existence resting on the village becomes excessive, in many cases the inhabitants are under-nourished. It is now believed that sleeping sickness can only be eliminated by building up a stable native village life which will increase resistance to this disease. But this policy can only be carried out if some limits to the demands of European industry are imposed.

The opinion has gradually been growing in Belgium that the fundamental solution of the population question lies in the limitation of industrial development. Animated by this view, the Minister of Colonies in 1924 appointed a commission of business men and officials to study the whole labor question. This commission inquired into the question of how many laborers could be taken from the native villages to European labor centers without seriously disturbing native life. It was the general opinion that 5 per cent of the able-bodied men could be taken without a harmful social effect. An additional 5 per cent might without inconvenience be taken for European enterprises located not more than two days' march from the village.

SO YOU'RE GOING TO RUSSIA?

Then let the Open Road settle the question of interpreters, prices, hotels, trains, what to see and whom to meet.

There are a few vacancies in the seven weeks' tour sailing July 14th.

Transit: Eastbound—London, Kiel, Helsingfors.

Westbound—Warsaw, Berlin, Paris, Rotterdam.

In Russia: Leningrad, Moscow, the Ukraine, the Crimea, the resorts of the Black Sea.

Membership limited to eight.

American leadership.

Russian interpreters.

First class throughout Russia.

Inclusive round trip: $725.

THE OPEN ROAD, Inc.

2 West 46th Street

New York

YOUNG CHINA The Nationalists have taken Peking. All China hails the new dawn.

What does it mean—for the generals? The foreigners? The missionaries? The women, the workers, the students?

The present civil war is revolutionizing China, breaking up the ancient stability of the local units, destroying that devotion to the past which was rooted in local customs, local bonds, and local divinities, teaching the Chinese to work together in masses—and creating that national consciousness which China has hitherto lacked. —from Young China, by Lewis S. Gannett.

SPECIAL OFFER: Young China, paper-bound (original price 25 cents).....15 cents
Young China, yellow card covers.....25 cents

By mail, postpaid, from
THE NATION, 20 VESEY ST.
NEW YORK

Yes, this is the same Book-Case as on page 22

many other models on display at our showroom

MODERNAGE
541 East 17th Street, New York City
FURNITURE CO.

The commission also believed that an even larger percentage could be employed in the production of foodstuffs and in portage for short distances. Applying these rules, the commission estimated that the available labor supply (10 per cent of the male population) would be about 267,200, but that the labor demand in 1925 would be 416,500.

In many parts of the Colony the 10 per cent limit is already exceeded, particularly in the Katanga, where nearly 23 per cent of the men are under European employment. Nevertheless, in July, 1925, the Governor General issued instructions that in the future no recruiting could take place among native groups where these limits have been exceeded. In 1926 provincial orders were issued prohibiting or restricting recruiting in ten different districts of the Colony. A further step was taken in December, 1925, when the Minister of Colonies issued instructions to administrative officials to stop "direct recruiting of labor for private employers." Nevertheless, the officials were not prohibited from lending "effective aid by preaching the law of labor" to the natives. During a transitional period the government will "indirectly" aid employers who treat labor well to procure labor; but eventually it is hoped that this "intervention" of the government on behalf of private employers will come to an end. In August, 1926, the Belgian Cabinet went still further and decided to suspend the construction of all public works not yet started and the completion of those under way but not strictly indispensable. The Colonial Council now insists that no new concession be granted unless a labor supply is locally available.

In taking these measures which impose brakes upon the rate of industrial development, the Belgian Government has shown a courage which is unique among the governments of Africa. Nevertheless, the slate will not be clean until government assistance to recruiting is abolished, and until the plantation system of industry which automatically creates new labor needs is subordinated to a system of native production, which has made Uganda and the Gold Coast far more profitable than the Belgian Congo, without striking at the roots of native society. The system of "moral persuasion" and "indirect" assistance to employers in procuring labor is open to even worse evils than those arising out of legalized compulsion—a fact which the government in advocating the decree for compulsory labor for public works in 1926 admitted. While a good case may be made for compulsory labor for essential public works, there is little ethical justification for compulsory recruiting for private employers, and it is a policy which if universally applied will lead to the destruction of the native population. It is prohibited by the League of Nations mandates system and by the League slavery convention drafted in 1926.

While the Belgian Congo has not wholly succeeded in its goal of restricting industrial development to a pace at which it will not ride roughshod over the native peoples, the fact must be remembered that as a legacy from the Free State regime powerful financial interests have become entrenched in the Congo whose interests it would be difficult for any government to impair. In the limitation of recruiting, the partial abolition of government recruiting, and the suspension of public works, the Congo has boldly recognized and attempted to master forces which must be controlled throughout the entire continent of Africa if the native population is to be preserved.

THE MYTH OF ADAM AND EVE

By Paul Lafargue

The Genesis story studied in the light of modern anthropology. Brilliant, fascinating, suggestive. 25 cents, postpaid.

Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago

COUNTRY DAY SCHOOL

OAK LANE Country Day School

New Residence Department for Boys
A large progressive country day school with limited boarding group under competent masters.

Address

WILLIAM B. CURRY, Oak Lane, Philadelphia Pa.

CLASSES IN PHOTOGRAPHY

Studio School of Art Photography

8th Year

SPECIAL SUMMER COURSE

Send for prospectus.

25 W. 50th Street.

New York City

MARITZA'S Peasant Shop

SPECIAL VACATION SALE

Embroidered voile blouses, $5.00; dresses, $8.95; Russian smocks from $8.50 up. Silk dresses and hats, from 25 to 50% reduction. Morocco bags, $3.50 and $4.50. Palestine embroidered pongee dresses for children $3.75 up.

MARITZA, 172 W. 4th St., nr. 6th Ave.

SCHOOL FOR SALE

SCHOOL FOR SALE—DUE TO FAMILY reasons, a long established, well known and successful private boarding school for about 75 pupils is for sale; ample buildings, equipped, and large grounds with baseball and tennis; superbly situated, magnificent views. A really unusual property for sale at a great bargain. Cook, Tappan, N. Y. Piermont 189J.

HEALTH FOOD

DOUBLE YOUR VACATION JOYS

by eating HEALTH FOODS. We deliver free to your door, anywhere within 150 miles, all the luscious NATURAL PRODUCTS at moderate prices.

This Week's Specials:—Best California Walnuts, Pecans, and all kinds of cereals and flours at reduced prices.

Send dollar for box of assorted samples.

HEALTH FOODS DISTRIBUTORS

159 East 34th St., New York City
Phone: Lexington 6926

OPEN SHELF

Visit or Write

THE FRENCH BOOKMAN

202 WEST 96TH ST. (NEAR BROADWAY)

French books and magazines exclusively, low prices. Catalogue, 5c (stamps).

LANGUAGES

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN
75c. Short Course Surprising results
Per Lesson Native Teachers

PRIVATE SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK
Established 1906 Between 85th and 86th Sts.

CONVERSATION—French; Spanish; Italian; German; English; 75c.

INDIVIDUAL ATTENTION; RAPID PROGRESS.

UNIVERSAL INSTITUTE
1265 Lexington Ave. (N. E. Cor. 85th)

FRENCH course by Parisian young woman. Conversation, grammar, literature. Particular attention given to accent. Quick results. New York or vicinity. Box 798, % The Nation.

CAMP GOOD HEALTH

IN THE BEAUTIFUL WATCHUNG MOUNTAINS

where you have everything necessary to make your vacation worth while. For quiet, rest and relaxation, you have mountain scenery, tall trees, laughing brooks, exhilarating air and sun bathing. For healthful activity, horseback riding, swimming, tennis, etc.

Tastily and attractively prepared vegetarian meals.

One hour from New York.

$20 per week—Special week-end rates.

Address: JOHN W. MARSHALL, R. R. No. 3, Plainfield, N. J.

Telephone: Martinsville, 201 F 23

PROPERTY FOR SALE

AN UNUSUAL HOUSE IN SCARSDALE. Quaint,

old and charming, surrounded by shade trees, fruit trees and flowering shrubs. ¼ of an acre of land and yet within 5 minutes of both station and school. Must sell, therefore the amazing price of $17,000. Call 35 Overton Road. Telephone Bertram Block, Scarsdale 1368, or Bryant 9850.

BETHEL, CONN. Two acres truck and poultry farm, six-room house, all improvements. On hill, healthful, beautiful view. Fruit, flowers. Reasonable terms. 22 Reservoir St. Owner.

SMALL country home near Mt. Monadnock, N. H. Sixty acres with house of 8 rooms, bath, electricity, hot air heat; stable; garage; small pine. Four hours from Boston and Springfield, Mass. $7,000.00. Box 809, % The Nation.

Any Change of Address

should be mailed to our Subscription Department at least two weeks before it is to become effective. This will insure uninterrupted delivery of The Nation to you, and will materially lessen the pressure of work in our office. When notifying us be sure to give both old and new addresses and stipulate the exact date upon which you desire the change made.

SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT

The Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 11, 1928

No. 3288

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.....	27
EDITORIALS:
"What Do You Call It?".....	29
Governor Smith the Nominee.....	30
Let's Follow the Horses!.....	31
On With the Dance!.....	32
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	33
THE BIG SHOW AT HOUSTON. By Lewis S. Gannett.....	34
BRITISH INTRIGUE AT THE PANAMA CANAL. By Ludwell Denny.....	36
MY PRIVATE UTOPIA. By Upton Sinclair.....	39
THE SEASON IN MOSCOW—IV. Mise en Scène . By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	40
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	42
CORRESPONDENCE.....	42
BOOKS:
Love Coming Late. By Mary Austin.....	43
A Masterly Survey. By Lord Olivier.....	43
Herbert Hoover Again. By Oswald Garrison Villard.....	44
The Behavior of Museums. By John Cotton Dana.....	44
Russian Women. By Theresa Wolfson.....	46
A Pan-American Novel. By Rodolfo Mayorga-Rivas.....	46
Books in Brief.....	48
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
A Jewish State in the Soviet Union. By Leon Talmy.....	51

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

SMITH AND ROBINSON! Well, we now nominate Jesse Jones of Texas for National Democratic Chairman and Brown of California—there must be a Brown in California—as National Treasurer, and then the Democrats will sweep the country. "We the plain people of America in convention assembled. . . ." Down with the plutocrats, down with snobbery in names. There are Smiths, Browns, Joneses, and Robinsons enough to hold the balance of power in any State. Who says this is not an ideal team? Here is Smith, Catholic, Wet, and Tammany, linked in a trial marriage to Robinson, Protestant, Dry, and anti-Negro. The North and the South being thus joined together—hands across the Mississippi—let no man put them asunder, least of all an outlander from the Pacific Coast. All the Drys can happily vote for Robinson, all the Wets for Smith. All the believers in democracy can vote for Smith; all who believe that Americans are not created free and equal if the shades of their skins are darker can vote for Robinson. Tweedledum, Tweedledee; Tweedledee, Tweedledum. Smith, Robinson, Jones, Brown. Both ends against the middle; the middle against both ends. Long live the American republic!

JOSEPH TAYLOR ROBINSON, senior Senator from Arkansas, and now Democratic candidate for Vice-President, has been in political life since 1903. After ten years in the lower house of Congress he was elected Governor of Arkansas only to be elected to the United States Senate thirteen days after he became Governor. He was reelected to the Senate in 1918 and 1924. During the last three Congresses he has been the minority leader of the Senate. As such he has shown some ability, but no approach to statesmanship. He espoused eagerly the doctrines of Woodrow Wilson after the war and has been known as one of the ardent champions of the League of Nations. It cannot, however, be said of him that his has been an aggressive personality, or that he is endowed with originality or inspired by any very potent demand for reform. The Democratic minority in the Senate has shown itself during the period of his leadership infinitely inferior to the group of Progressives in the Republican Party. For this Mr. Robinson must largely bear the responsibility. In other words, he is a typical Southern politician put on the ticket for the purpose of catching some guileless Drys.

CLAUDE BOWERS is an interesting phenomenon. A journalistic adventurer come out of the West and finding a lodging place on the Evening World—why he should be buried there we have never been able to understand—he promptly did a fine book on Hamilton and Jefferson and last winter made a speech at the Jackson Day banquet of the Democracy, with the result that the good old Democrats there nearly passed away with amazement. They actually found themselves listening to a man who had read some books and had an idea or two, who believed that the party had a background and ought to live up to it. When they recovered from the shock the banqueters nominated him for keynoter at the Democratic Convention. It was a good old-fashioned keynote that he gave the country. There were snappy, sonorous, and ringing phrases in it, and enough references to Jefferson, Jackson, and Hamilton to make old-timers take notice. There was enough lambasting of the Republican corruptionists to satisfy even the editors of The Nation. The radio audience enjoyed it immensely, for it was good old-fashioned spellbinding, and it was true. But not even Mr. Bowers's sense of justice and impartiality could survive the heat at Houston. He glossed over the sins of the Democrats with the intrepidity of a circus acrobat. None the less, the attack went home. The proof of this is that the solemn, hide-bound Republican organs have dwelt pityingly upon his "raking over long-forgotten six-year-old scandals," and have pointed out how impossible it is for Al Smith to go on with that sort of thing. They cite the very Democratic newspapers which apologized for Doheny and Sinclair, and threw mud at Walsh and Wheeler, to show that Claude Bowers was quite out of order. All of which merely proves that Mr. Bowers did a valuable job at Houston.

NOBODY OF THIS GENERATION will see the end of the World War. But its unreason and its partisanship, its sentimentality and its myths have already been reduced so measurably that one must regret any incident which fans old fires. The rebuilding of the Louvain Library through funds raised in this country was an act of international good-will, but that purpose will be more than negated if the inscription which it is to bear is the cause of reviving and perpetuating all the old excesses and absurdities of the war years. Whitney Warren, the American architect who has planned the restoration of the library, wants to adorn it with a Latin inscription which in English means: "Destroyed by German fury; restored by American generosity." The words were approved by Cardinal Mercier before his death, Mr. Warren says, and he insists that they be accepted as part of the restoration plan. The head of the university to which the library belongs has refused to allow the inscription to be put up, Mr. Warren has threatened to resort to the courts, and the press and public of Belgium have begun to fight the war over again. On top of this a telegram is made public from Herbert Hoover to the head of the university. Speaking for the Commission for Relief in Belgium Educational Foundation, the chief donor of the rebuilding fund, Mr. Hoover says that the university is in entire control of the new building and counsels that the controversy be settled so as to "eliminate war bitterness" and "be in accord with mature public opinion."

MR. HOOVER'S TELEGRAM, sent a month ago, is unimpeachable in its wisdom and no doubt reflects public sentiment in this country, although its intrusion at this time may be resented by some Belgians as American meddling. What an unhappy quarrel it all is and how reminiscent of the woman who had her husband haled into court on a charge that he had struck her over the head with a framed motto reading "God Bless Our Home." Mr. Warren's contention that as the architect of the restored library he is entitled to put on an inscription of his choosing and "even after the completion of the building I have the right to insist that the structure shall be maintained as I built it" is so absurd that it needs only to be stated to be laughed out of court. Mr. Warren belongs to a generation which was too old to fight and is more bitter and obstinate than those which did; he is one of those Americans abroad who are more anti-German than the Allies themselves. He would do well to harp less on what Cardinal Mercier approved just after the war and to reflect more on what he might advocate today. Nor is the truth or falsity of the inscription of any consequence. The aim should be to make the restored library what its donors intended, a contribution toward international good-will rather than international controversy. To this end it would seem best now not to have any inscription whatever, especially as the proposed legend is objectionable not only as perpetuating war hatred but as an unduly bombastic insistence upon American virtue. If an approximation of the truth were to be set forth for future consumption we might suggest: "Destroyed by human madness induced by the folly of nationalism and war; restored out of the easily earned, easily given surplus of citizens of a country to which, by lucky accident, the European catastrophe brought unbounded material prosperity instead of irreparable havoc."

ROSIKA SCHWIMMER has won a triple victory. She has obtained a verdict of $17,000 for libel against Fred R. Marvin and the New York Commercial, a daily newspaper now extinct, and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago has reversed Judge George A. Carpenter and soundly trounced him for denying citizenship to Miss Schwimmer. The Circuit Court of Appeals pointed out that the rights of a petitioner for citizenship "are not to be determined by putting conundrums to her." Judge Carpenter had asked her what attitude she would take if an enemy soldier were about to kill an American soldier, and as her answer did not please his mightiness he denied her citizenship—with especial eagerness because she declared herself a non-resistant. For going after Fred R. Marvin and the New York Commercial Miss Schwimmer deserves the thanks of the public. Marvin has been a pest in that he has continually made unfounded and unwarranted attacks upon liberals. He usually so phrased his charges, however, as to make it difficult for those misrepresented to sue.

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE is entitled to the congratulations of all honest men, and especially of those of the citizens of Chicago who are not engaged in politics, machine-gun shooting, or operating vice and gambling rings for its service in compelling Mayor "Bill" Thompson and some of his political associates to disgorge $1,732,272.79. It was a simple game that the 100 per cent American patriot and his gang worked—patriotism and rascality still can go hand in hand. In an expenditure of $28,000,000 for public improvements experts were employed by the city to value the land taken for new streets and to estimate damages due to the improvement. Enormous fees, paid to these experts on the excuse that their services were worth so much, were discovered to have been shared by the Mayor and his friends. The scheme was very much like the organization of the Continental Trading Company and its paying off of the Republican campaign deficit to the satisfaction of the honorable Will Hays. Says the court:

The Thompson group, in its quest for control of the city, county, and State offices, required vast sums to maintain its organization, and for campaign purposes. To meet these expenses . . . the plan was conceived and carried out through which nearly $3,000,000, constituting trust funds of the city, was paid to five experts who contributed a large portion of their fees to help defray these political obligations. More than $2,500,000 was paid to real-estate and building experts illegally. . . . Thompson and Harding [County Treasurer], by their answers, deny the charges of conspiracy, but no evidence was offered to support their denials.

The Tribune sued as a taxpayer and did a first-class civic deed.

HONEST JOURNALISM and honest pedagogy are apparently unwanted at Ohio University, Athens, Ohio. At any rate that seems to be the conclusion from the American Civil Liberties Union's report on the dismissal of Wesley H. Maurer, professor of journalism at the university. Professor Maurer also acted as editor of the Athens Messenger, a local newspaper, which he used as a journalistic laboratory for his students. During the past year, it appears, he endeavored to treat the coal strike of that community impartially in his newspaper and thereby aroused the opposition of certain business interests. Again, at a meeting of a local civic association he asked whether that organization favored or opposed organized labor. The result was that a committee was sent to the Messenger demanding his discharge and shortly thereafter he was informed by President E. B. Bryan of the university that he would not be reappointed, despite the fact, he says, that he had been assured of a position for six years when he left the University of Michigan for this post in 1925.

WE HAVE SEEN NO WORDS of praise for a truly remarkable achievement of the members in the New York City engineering department: their organization into a successful labor union, a union of "white-collar" workers. Surely that is no mean accomplishment. Since its organization two years ago, the Union of Technical Men has grown to approximately 1,600 members and has recently won its first fight for salary increases for the engineers and technical men employed by the city. Minimum salaries in the various classes have been increased from $1,260 to $2,160; from $2,160 to $3,120; and from $2,760 to $4,260. There are still certain grievances to be settled as to the distribution of future pay increases, but the engineers are facing them with greater confidence and more optimism than ever before in their independent, highly praised, but lowly paid lives. The Technical Outlook, a monthly paper issued by the Union of Technical Men, declares: "A strong union is the only guarantee of permanent gain and we feel that the technical men have learned that lesson by this time." If so, that is a real tribute to engineering intelligence.

ADVOCATES OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT may profitably study the strange case of James Sweeney, a "lifer" in the New Jersey State prison. He was positively identified by two eye-witnesses as wielding a pistol in a sensational mail-truck robbery in Elizabeth, New Jersey, by a gang of seven men who killed the driver of the truck and wounded two others. Accordingly he was convicted of murder in the first degree. It was only the jury's recommendation for mercy that saved him from the electric chair. Now, however, it appears that it was all a mistake and that Sweeney is innocent of the crime—as well as two others who had also been positively identified by eye-witnesses from Rogues' Gallery photographs. Of two other men charged with the murder, one was released only last month after having been held in jail eleven months awaiting trial. Sweeney is to be detained in the State prison for two months—a seemingly unnecessary delay—because his application for pardon was not properly drawn.

ISABEL HAPGOOD, dead at seventy-eight, was valuable not only as a translator, in which capacity she was best known, but as journalist and critic. Her translations from the Italian, the Spanish, and the French and from the Russian of Tolstoi, Gogol, Gorki, and Turgenev were carefully and skilfully done, and distinctly enriched our literature. One of the first to insist upon fidelity to the original Russian of Tolstoi and the rest, she set a new standard for translation at a time when Russian books were stealing to us through the French; and this high standard she pressed upon others, too, so that there was no severer critic of a bad version than she. But as an historian and critic of literature, and not the least as the author of a work on the Russian popular epic, she was equally valuable. For twenty-two years she was foreign correspondent, reviewer, and editorial writer for the New York Evening Post and The Nation, where she performed less conspicuous but no less useful service as a connecting link between the literatures of America and Europe.

'What Do You Call It?'

IT is difficult to define the countryman, and possibly no pure representative of the species exists. Yet the country has its character—a character that one coming from the city immediately feels or sees or somehow knows—and so must the countryman have his. And yet what is it? It is not, as novelists frequently imagine, a slowness of speech, a drawl; many farmers, or at any rate farmers' wives, could outbabble the warmest-tongued landlady of the town that lies over the hills, and in every outlying community there is a mouthy man. It is not, either, an envious curiosity as to what is going on in the city; or a partiality to open skies and reflective sunsets; or an aptitude for breaking into "By hecks" and "Gol darns"; or an earthy philosophy; or a thickness (or a quickness) of wit; or a ruggedness of temper. All these things are found here and there, and occur regularly in fiction, yet are far from universal and therefore characteristic. Is there any habit or quality which always distinguishes the dweller between towns?

Probably not, though we have one to propose. It is the fear of new words. In our experience there is nothing so predicable in a farmer as a tendency to shy away from language he is unused to handling. He will let you use a technical term, but he will be glad that it is you who have to use it, and though he knows perfectly well what it means, and knows indeed that there is no substitute for it in conversation, he himself will get around it somehow. "The mare was mighty sick," he will say, "but I got the vet out here and he gave her some of that—what do you call it?—and she was up in no time." Or: "They say a post will last half again as long in the ground if you paint it with—what do you call it?" He means creosote, but no power on earth would move him to speak the syllables. They do not sound to him like real syllables; it is a word foreign to his brain and mouth, a word bristling with connotations of the stranger with horn-rimmed spectacles, the reader, the specialist. He likes better, and indeed likes only, the short words he grew up with, words that stand for things, not abstract laboratory combinations of things. His language in short is English, not Greek.

Now there are countrymen who do not fit this description. But investigation will prove, we suspect, that they have had contact with the city through their children, their papers, their radios, or their books. They have been contaminated by science; they like to know the newest word for the newest thing, and they employ it as naturally almost as do their cousins from the streets. The distinction is not between the rustic and the urban as such, but between two traditions which have never joined. The countryman of whom we were speaking is the conservative in the case; he stays in his valley and nurses the language in its primitive and homely form, drawing its days out until they become centuries of years, tending it and protecting it each season as he would the seed without which no crop could be perpetual. As such we like him—as also we like the brisk townsman who is not ashamed to pronounce a polysyllable and accept a category. If the countryman keeps language alive, the townsman makes it grow; he grafts it, transplants it, and perfects varieties. As in all things else, it takes two people to make a world.

Governor Smith the Nominee

GOVERNOR SMITH'S capture of the Democratic nomination represents a remarkable achievement in American politics—let no man mistake that! Defeated four years ago, he has had a walkover in 1928 despite all the prejudice against him because of his religion, his "Wetness," his affiliations with Tammany Hall. Nor is this to be wholly explained by the fact that, as in the case of Herbert Hoover, there was no one outstanding figure upon whom all those in opposition to Governor Smith could agree. Everyone knows that the Governor's hold upon the country has grown by leaps and bounds since 1924. He bulks far larger in the national life, he holds a much more impressive place in the regard and the affections of the American people. Yet during those years he has not once swung around the political circle, nor in any way campaigned on his own behalf. More than that, he has during the last twelve months more and more retired within himself. He has granted no inspired interviews; he has made no noteworthy speeches; he has even refused to let his stand on great national issues or foreign questions be known. He has declined to strengthen his hold upon the country by going before Chautauquas or taking to the lecture platform, or by engaging in any theatrical performance whatsoever. He has stayed in Albany and busied himself with his job. He has been more than ever Governor of the State of New York.

These have, in the main, been wise tactics—though, as our readers are aware, we have resented his complete silence upon vital issues in regard to which the people were entitled to know where he stood, even in advance of the nomination. It is a bad precedent which he and his rival, Mr. Hoover, have established by muzzling themselves on these issues; it is an unworthy break with a fine American tradition. Nevertheless, the people of the United States have seen that Governor Smith stuck to his desk; that, much as he desired the Presidency, he would neither essay the role of universal preacher after the manner of Roosevelt, nor neglect his work to further his ambition. He has let the nomination come to him, and it has come—by the logic of events, by the absence of a sharply challenging rival, without the expenditure of a large sum of money. He has earned it by his devotion to the people of the State of New York, by the extraordinary ability, enthusiasm, honesty, and devotion he has displayed as Governor, and by his reputation for progressiveness and for profound devotion to the plain people. The party looked upon this man in the Executive Chamber at Albany and decided that he should lead.

It is in many respects a heartening spectacle. For one thing, the convention was far more united than had been thought possible. The speaking—especially the nominating address of Franklin D. Roosevelt—was on a far higher level of ability, sincerity, and honesty than that in Kansas City. The platform, despite various silences and inconsistencies, and the shameful compromise on the liquor issue, is in the main in accord with Democratic tradition. It gravely weakens the party's position on the tariff when it links tariff reform with the question of high wages. It righteously denounces Republican imperialism in the Caribbean and pledges its honor not to intervene in the private affairs of other nations, conveniently forgetting that it was that peerless Democrat and savior of democracy, Woodrow Wilson, who invaded the Republic of Haiti and tore down the government of that country; who used the big guns of the battleships at Vera Cruz to kill men, women, and children in one of the most needless crimes of the century. If it meant what it said the platform would not be bad, as party platforms go. Again, if there were plenty of power-trust delegates for Smith, the all-controlling influence of wealth and Big Business was by no means as pervading as at the Kansas City convention. The bosses were at least far less in evidence.

When this is said, the fact remains that it is the same old Democratic Party with which we have to deal—the Democratic Party of glaring inconsistencies, of hateful compromises, made up of hopelessly divergent elements which, should it win the Presidency, would hamstring it as frequently and as fatally as it was hamstrung during the Wilson Administration. It is the party of the Wets in our large cities and of the reactionary South, which bleats at conventions about the democracy of Thomas Jefferson and then makes a mockery of every one of its pretensions by denying fundamental American rights, guaranteed by the Constitution, to Americans whose skins happen to be dark. It has just hypocritically assailed the Republican Party for its failure to enforce the Volstead law and the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, while the violation of two other amendments to the Constitution is its stock-in-trade in the Southern States. With similar hypocrisy, it takes part in the refusal of the Congress to obey the solemn mandate of the Constitution to reapportion regularly the Congressional districts. It pretends to defend the rights of the farmer, but, aside from a very limited measure of tariff reform, has nothing to offer to him except the same glittering generalities that came out of Kansas City. It is the same old Democracy, no more changed by the nomination of Alfred E. Smith than Tammany Hall has been changed by Alfred E. Smith and Judge Olvany. It has chosen a man who has come from the plain people, who has a genuine enthusiasm for ameliorating their lot, who has made an extraordinary record in this connection while Governor. Yet the fact remains, as we have so frequently pointed out, that he is a candidate of whom the great capitalists are not in the least afraid. No tremor went through Wall Street when he was nominated; there was no break in prices, as there would have been had a really great Progressive been chosen to lead the Democratic hosts.

Much, of course, now depends upon Governor Smith. His refusal to accept the platform's prohibition straddle does him great credit. Had he said nothing about it he would have made it clear that his silence of the past winter was merely opportunism. Governor Smith has now brought the Wet and Dry issue to the front, and the country is surely convinced as to his integrity and courage. It is the wisest tactical move that he could possibly have made.

As a sequel to his message to Houston Governor Smith has the opportunity to write his own platform, to make it clear where he stands, and to have it known of all men that he seeks no vote through compromise, or deceit, or concealment. The only possible hope of his success lies in dominating the situation through his own personality, through the vigor of his campaign, as contrasted with the weakness put upon the Republican Party by the colorless personality of Mr. Hoover and his inability to appear upon any platform. Governor Smith enters the lists tremendously handicapped by his religion—gravely unjust as this is—by his "Wetness" and his association with Tammany Hall; multitudes will everywhere refuse to "turn the White House over to Tammany Hall." He can overcome these handicaps only by convincing the bulk of his fellow-citizens that he is not only a sincere champion of public righteousness, and of the just needs and demands of the plain people, but that he is as brave and downright and fearless as his career at Albany has made him appear to the bulk of the voters of the Empire State. For him compromise will be disaster, for in it the public will read that he is but "another politician," as ready as Herbert Hoover to discard sincerely cherished beliefs in order to win the office for which he has been nominated.

As for this journal, we shall, of course, be influenced, like everybody else, by the events of the next few months. We are ready to go so far today as to declare that if we had to choose between Hoover and Smith, we should be for Smith as the lesser of two evils. But as we said when Mr. Hoover was nominated, and as we shall continue to say even though our readers may be wearied by its iteration and reiteration, we are just as much opposed to the two old parties as we were in 1920 and 1924. We have not one word to withdraw of the indictments of them which we penned during those two campaigns. It is a false, a bogus fight which is being staged by them for the deception of the American people. Neither of them has mentioned the real enemy. Neither of them has joined battle honestly or seriously with the forces that threaten the freedom and the happiness of the individual American, that menace our very institutions. The tremendous forces of our ever-increasing capitalism, of the monopolies which are hourly reaching out more and more to subordinate the means and resources and opportunities of the American people to their greedy materialistic purposes—these are not now challenged by either Republicans or Democrats. Republicans are frankly the mercenaries of those controllers of capital who, as Woodrow Wilson said in his "New Freedom," are the "masters of America." Nothing that took place at Houston allows of the belief that if Alfred Smith enters the White House his party will assume the attitude of radical progressiveness which marked Woodrow Wilson's attainment of the Presidency.

We still do not know whether any new party is to be hoped for or not. It seems less likely than two weeks ago. Yet the opportunity is there. It requires but a leader to marshal the hosts of dissatisfied Americans who will never, never vote for a man who sat for seven years in the Cabinet of Harding and Coolidge and could not lift his voice on any occasion to denounce the swinish corruption in which that body took part; and will never, never vote for Alfred E. Smith of Tammany Hall, the Wet running on a Dry platform. Finally, we would remind our readers, or such of them as are not frightened by names and by epithets, or by fear of "throwing away" their vote when they ballot according to their consciences and not according to compromises, that there is in the field a high-grade, honorable candidate for the Presidency, Norman Thomas, the nominee of the Socialist Party.

Let's Follow the Horses!

THE ethical code of the race-course seems to be in advance of that of the lawyers. When Harry Sinclair was indicted in Washington the Maryland race-tracks barred his horses from their courses. Apparently they concluded that a man branded by the United States Supreme Court as "fraudulent and corrupt" was not fit company for jockeys wearing the colors of high-bred horses. After his acquittal by a petty jury, to be sure, the moral race-track men rescinded their exclusion, but the first act was none the less significant. Their standards were not applied elsewhere.

Did President Coolidge lose moral prestige when he dined with Will Hays shortly after that Presbyterian elder had uncomfortably wriggled through his cross-examination before the Senate oil committee? Have any Pittsburgh clubs taken cognizance of Andrew Mellon's reticence as to Republican oil bonds—a story unearthed only by a chance pencil note found with the Pratt papers, and in spite of Mellon's unsocial secretiveness? It ought to help toward real honesty in high office if, in the future, personal friendship and club acquaintanceship were modified by public disservice.

The legal profession even prides itself that it will defend any crook. In Boston the State Attorney General resigned in order to avoid the disgrace of impeachment, but this Arthur Reading, who was such a valiant aid to Messrs. Thayer, Fuller, and Lowell in the Sacco-Vanzetti case, is represented by leaders of the Massachusetts bar. Possibly it is proper for lawyers to have no concern with the conscience of even such a client. But have the Boston clubs and the Massachusetts bar turned a cold shoulder to these attorneys, as was done to William M. Thompson when through thick and thin he fought the case of Sacco and Vanzetti? What is the rule of social conduct that results in such topsy-turvy behavior?

Leading members of the New York bar held for many months the keys to three-quarters of a million dollars of the covert Continental oil bonds. Senator Walsh and the federal government were engaged in a vain search for this loot. These lawyers, so-called "officers of the court," knew of the search, but kept mum. Their obligation to the State seemed secondary to their duty to a rich client.

Again, did Martin W. Littleton and others of Harry Sinclair's counsel know of the jury surveillance in that case? If so, they should have been held equally guilty with Burns; and if not, they might well have dropped the case on the ground that their client Sinclair had not treated them with candor and confidence. As Senator Walsh pointed out, Sinclair must have lied to his counsel about the Continental bonds. The only alternative is to believe that his counsel knowingly lied to the court. But, when Senator Walsh suggested a protest, the only answer was to call him a "meddlesome Matty."

But how does the bar treat such behavior? Are such lawyers dropped from the committees on legal ethics or from membership in the bar associations? Have their clubs heard of the rulings of the racing stables?

At what point should public chicanery create new personal relationships? A few years ago every divorced woman was ostracized. In high society many names are still stricken from the social lists because of the style of the boot or the cut of the tuxedo. Times change and standards. Even drunkenness is not the same social disgrace that it used to be when drinking was legal. Should not the leaders of wealth be measured by stricter standards than the poor, and should not those who hold high public or professional office bear the moral responsibilities of their leadership? Is it unreasonable to assert that the ethics of the bar do not approach the ethics of the turf as long as the leaders, riding with crooked horses, are allowed to remain the leaders of the profession? Even hard-boiled business men might learn from the racing stables. Some ethical bankers might come to the conclusion that a Doheny or a Sinclair—pronounced guilty by the Supreme Court—ought to be doubtful risks in other gentlemanly ventures.

Let's follow the horses!

On With the Dance!

WE gather from our newspapers that the latest novelty in American amusements is the dance marathon. The New York dailies have been carrying accounts of a dance marathon in Atlantic City, one in Pittsburgh (until stopped by the police), and two in their home town—one for white couples in Madison Square Garden, another for Negroes farther uptown. In addition to these events, which have happened to catch our editorial eye, there are doubtless many others elsewhere in the country that have escaped our notice. In a day of varied and curious championships we do not see why the ability to dance down all rivals is not as worthy of honor and profit as most of our other competitions—including that to be the richest man in the United States or even to be its President.

The usual method of conducting these marathons seems to be to allow fifteen minutes of rest at the end of every hour of dancing, and let the contestants fight it out on that line if it takes all summer. Interest in the affair at Madison Square Garden was mild until it had been going on six or eight days and a majority of the original ninety-one couples had fallen asleep and been put out. Then picturesque incidents began to be reported. Of the ninth day of the marathon the New York Times wrote:

Vera Campbell, a girl of powerful build, has for several days been putting new life into her drooping partner, Dave Auerbach, by kicking his feet, ankles, and shins at critical times. Now her own feet are in such condition that they cannot longer be used as revivifiers on her partner, so she has taken to punching him on the chin and the side of the face when she notices him getting into a torpor.

The only girl on the floor who has avoided foot trouble is Hercules Mary Promitis of Pittsburgh. One of her friends told her that the old bare-knuckle prize-fighters used to pickle their hands in brine and vinegar to toughen them for a fight. He believed that what was good for a bare-knuckle fighter's fist would be good for a dance-derbyist's feet. Taking this hint, Hercules pickled her feet in brine and vinegar for three weeks, and vindicated her friend's reasoning.

On the same day it was reported in regard to another couple:

Helen Schmidt landed several rights on the jaw of her partner, Joseph Tartore, early yesterday morning. They are Couple 16. Tartore's instructions to his partner were to swing on his jaw if he showed signs of grogginess or of trying to quit the derby. The girl loyally did her part and again and again revived the sinking Tartore with sharp rights to the face. . . . In spite of a series of the resuscitating hooks to the jaw, Tartore slipped to the floor yesterday morning at about 4 o'clock. He was pulled to his feet. The girl braced him up temporarily with strong doses of the usual tonic, but he finally became too groggy to move. The sharpest punches did him no good, and the team was eliminated.

But it was not left to the women to practice all the pugilism. For on the tenth day of the marathon we are grieved to read:

Dominick Laperte of Couple 37 blackened the eye of his partner, Charlotte Kush of Johnstown, Pa., in a quick battle yesterday morning. Dominick had developed a stalling technique of his own. He would lean against the bandstand and support himself while pretending to dance. Fearing that he would be disqualified for this, his partner, after arguing and pleading in vain, stamped on his toes and slapped him. Laperte countered with an accurately driven uppercut to the eye. "You're no gentleman," said Miss Kush. "I suspected it before." . . . She kept him apologizing abjectly all through two rest periods, but finally pardoned him on his promise never to forget again while the derby lasted what was due a lady.

On the same day some of the couples, so it was reported, began to grow light in the head—to see visions if not to dream dreams:

Mortimer began to complain that large sums of money were stolen from his tent. He saw a legion of pickpockets and sneak-thieves pursuing him. The girl had dispelled previous hallucinations by short punches to the face and neck. At 4:30 p. m., however, he broke away from her and raced out of the arena in pursuit of a pickpocket. Several men restrained him as he sought to attack an attendant. He was disqualified for leaving the arena.

But the experience of Couple 45 was even more tragic. For this is what happened:

The girl, Olive Goss of 309 East Eighty-ninth Street, after gazing for nearly ten days steadily on the face of Alois Bruhin, began to take exception to it. She tried to push it out of her line of vision. For hours she kept turning it to the right and to the left. Bruhin, a rather nice-looking young man, slowly grew angry at the repeated hints that his face was of the type that sears the eyeballs. The girl grew more vehement. She began to scream with pain every time the countenance recorded itself on her retina. But the girl finally collapsed and the couple were eliminated after covering 206 hours and 25 minutes.

Reading about these stirring incidents roused our editorial curiosity and we decided to have a look. We did. What a cruel disappointment! Nothing exhilarating happened for our benefit. It was as dull as a six-day bicycle race. The couples did not even dance—except occasionally. Mostly they just walked around the floor. And often they stopped to take a drink, to chat with friends among the spectators, to have a facial massage or a shampoo. At such times they merely shifted their weight from one foot to another so as not to be declared out of the contest. Evidently the reporters for the daily newspapers had better luck or better imaginations than we had. How great a debt we owe to the press, which frequently makes the record of life more entertaining than life itself!

It Seems to Heywood Broun

WILLIAM E. SWEET, who was once Governor of Colorado, wrote to The Nation last week to attack my attitude on prohibition. The article which riled him he scarcely can have read. At any rate he missed the point completely. "Whenever a Methodist conference, a Presbyterian assembly, or the Federal Council of Churches strikes a blow at an unsocial practice or industrial evil," writes Mr. Sweet, "someone says the church is meddling and Mr. Broun does not omit to say so in this instance."

But I said nothing of the kind. Any church, including the Catholic, has a right to a political opinion. My objection to the tactics of the militant Protestant sects is that they try to thwart the will of the people in the matter of prohibition by forcing the issue out of the campaign. Having obtained a Dry plank from the Republicans, the Anti-Saloon League and its allies went to Houston and bulldozed the Democrats into a similar declaration. And after this platform had been adopted Josephus Daniels had some reason to boast that prohibition had been eliminated from the election. And so I repeat that in effect the Dry forces are conducting a filibuster. Prohibition ought to be an issue. Possibly the majority wants no modification but surely the minority has a right to vote on the subject.

Again and again the Drys have said that if the Wets wanted any change in Volsteadism they should make their protest at the polls. Nevertheless, the prohibitionists have done their damndest to make this protest impossible. Every referendum has been opposed by the Drys. There is no evidence that the Protestant whips want to have noses counted. Having secured the legislation which they desire, they seem to feel that there should never again be any balloting on this subject. Governor Sweet is addicted to this particular heresy. Speaking of my article, the former Colorado Governor writes: "He says 'one victory does not give permanent possession.' How many victories will?" And this I hold to be a very curious question from a man supposedly experienced in the practices of a republic. Of course the answer is that a public question can never be settled beyond the chance of reconsideration.

For instance, the League of Nations was a major issue in a national campaign. The foes of the League won a sweeping victory, but does Governor Sweet actually think that there is anything in American practice or provision to prevent the question being opened up all over again? He forgets the very history of the prohibition movement. The issue has long been before the people. Repeatedly the Prohibition Party put up candidates and was defeated, but there was no reason why they should not go on trying. Which they did. And likewise the Wets have every right to say "Let's fight this thing out all over again."

It is true that the prohibitionists have one distinct advantage in their present position. They are now intrenched behind an amendment, and the American Constitution is exceedingly faulty in the fact that an extremely small minority can prevent the repeal of any amendment. The frankest way to deal with this situation would be to call a constitutional convention and have a thoroughgoing revision. The founders of this nation were wise but not beyond human limitations. They could not foresee the vast changes which were bound to occur in the nation with the coming of the years. For instance, the wire-tapping case was an excellent example. This presented a nice point of law. Does listening-in upon a telephone connection constitute a violation of the protection guaranteed the citizen against search and seizure in his home? Some of the justices of the Supreme Court felt that it did while the majority held that the constitutional provision could not be stretched to include a means of communication coming into a house from the outside. But after all we shall never know what the framers would have thought concerning this point. They never knew the telephone.

We have boldly scrapped the Electoral College scheme and in time we may do away with lame-duck sessions devised by a group of men who could not foresee the coming of the railroad. Until such time as the Constitution can be overhauled, nullification is a necessary and time-honored expedient. Whether force bills should be introduced to give the Southern Negro the franchise is a matter open to debate. At the moment it would be impossible to command a majority to contest the right of the Solid South to its nullification. There is no need to argue the precise legal status of the methods employed to override the constitutional provisions. No fair-minded man can possibly deny that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments have been scrapped in spirit. There is something more sacred than the Constitution. Every law must rest finally on the will of the majority. Checks may be placed to enforce a period of deliberation, but any man who thinks that a minority can permanently have its way by virtue even of a constitutional amendment is asking something more than human nature can endure or should endure. Nullification is among the inalienable rights of man.

In a recent speech in New Jersey I was honored by Senator Heflin who mentioned me among the martyrs. I won't have it. Tom-Tom can be for me but I am not for him. Here is the report from the Newark Ledger: "Speaking of the 'free press of America' sneeringly, Senator Heflin cited the discharge of Heywood Broun, New York columnist, and said Broun was 'fired because in one of his articles he said that there wasn't an editor in New York who dared to print an article which would offend the powers of the Catholic church.'"

I like the World little better than does the gentleman from Alabama, but he misquotes me first and also misinterprets the incident. I said that editors were timid about offending Catholic readers. Right now I might cite the fact that there was no editorial comment hereabouts against the Pope's criticism of women in athletics. Bishop Manning or Dr. Straton would have been laughed at for the promulgation of the same doctrine. Still, several newspapers took an attitude on Mexico which was not to the liking of their Catholic subscribers. It was my intention in The Nation article of which Heflin speaks to point out that newspapers such as the liberal World are frightened by many shadows. And to the best of my knowledge and belief I lost my job because I said that the World in several issues having nothing to do with Catholicism displayed a lack of courage.

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Big Show at Houston

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

Houston, Texas, June 30

THE big show is over. Having nominated a Wet Easterner for President and a Dry Westerner for Vice-President, the Democrats are pouring home like schoolboys from a picnic.

Bryan swept the 1896 convention with unscheduled eloquence; the Wilson and Clark forces fought it out from the floor at Baltimore in 1912. But in the vast spaces of Sam Houston Hall it is impossible for an individual on the floor to catch the eye or the ear. Acoustics are sacrificed to ventilation; everything depends upon the loud-speakers, and even a leather-lunged orator of the old school would be a failure unless he had a previous arrangement to be recognized and escorted to the privileged post in front of the microphones. And there he does not need leather lungs. One man at the microphone is a whole convention in this radio-electric year of 1928. Joe Robinson, permanent chairman, did not have to raise his voice—merely to move six inches nearer the microphones—when he decided to order the Texas cowgirl off the floor at the end of the Jesse Jones demonstration. Then his words, "The lady will please remove the cavalry from the hall," roared out, drowning three brass bands and ten thousand yelling Texans.

Before a speaker can be recognized he must, as a rule, go before a committee, prove himself safe, and be put on the schedule. The program is rehearsed, amended, and censored a dozen times before it is acted. Claude Bowers's keynote speech was judged, probably, by twenty people before it was printed, and between printing and delivery someone—Senator Swanson of Virginia, it is rumored—persuaded him to omit his denunciation of dollar diplomacy.

A national political convention today is primarily a great advertising stunt. Nothing is decided on the floor that has not already been decided in the hotel rooms; and the formal work of the entire week could be done in two hours. But the prolonged big show advertises the party; it advertises the candidates; it puts favored local celebrities into the national spotlight; it forces into display on the front pages of three thousand newspapers speeches which ordinarily would not get two inches next to department-store advertising; and it glues to the radio the ears of ten million listeners-in who at any other time would tune out as soon as they heard the stentorian tone of political oratory.

It was a good show, here at Houston, but it might have been a thousand times better if the ringmasters had admitted its purpose and hired a few professional stage directors, actors, and advertising men to help them. The advertising men would have cut down the copy for the speeches, and the stage directors would have jazzed up the performance where it lagged. As it was, the interests of three audiences were confused—the relatively unimportant fifteen thousand sweltering in Sam Houston Hall, the incalculable mass of newspaper readers, and the still less calculable radio audience. Whenever an important speaker mounted the rostrum the fifteen thousand had to wait while the camera men, representing the newspaper and radio audiences, had their innings. The great Klieg lights glared, and, in full view of the Houston audience, the photographers gave the speaker his orders. "Lift your right arm," they shouted, and he obeyed. "Now the left." "Throw your head back." And the movie men, demanding action, chimed in with "Shake your fist" and "Move your lips; look as if you was talking."

It is a new age, and it needs a new oratorical technique. Claude Bowers, speaking with his own voice, made a sensation at the Jackson Day dinner in Washington; but at Houston he tried to shout to fifteen thousand people instead of speaking quietly into the microphone, and the result was a strained shriek. Franklin Roosevelt read his eloquent nominating address so slowly and deliberately that he began to bore his Houston audience, but I am told that his voice was perfect for the radio millions. There are other radio problems too. A poor gentleman from Washington came forward at the end of a hot afternoon to second Al Smith's nomination. All the States in the alphabet had preceded him, and all the speeches had been too long, and when he began "I shall be a three-minute man" the hall burst into a pandemonium of impatient cheers. The Washingtonian looked a bit bewildered; then he continued, apologetically, "But in my State thousands are listening in to hear their delegate," and hurriedly read the words which he had prepared for the superheterodynes and crystal sets of the lumber operators and apple-growers of his home State. These conventions need a radio substitute for the "leave to print" of the Congressional Record; speakers with messages which they feel must be delivered to their home audiences should be permitted to go off to a private microphone and broadcast to the home-States without boring the national radio audience and the spectators on the spot.

Good showmanship marked some of the demonstrations, but others were painfully wooden, and there was an unimaginative lack of variety. Parades for Reed, Smith, George, and even Jesse Jones of Texas all looked much alike. It was a canny politician who timed the first big demonstration for Claude Bowers's demand that "the hand of privilege shall be taken out of the farmer's pocket and off the farmer's throat." But the bands were a little slow in taking their cue. There were cheers; the audience stood up; then the excitement seemed to die. I had already jotted in my notes "one-minute demonstration" when a belated band struck up Dixie. At that point an ardent old gentleman from North Dakota danced into the aisle, jigging his State standard and calling to his neighbors to come along. Kentucky's standard followed; then, as the band moved into "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," the embattled farmers of Tammany Hall swept into the aisle and the great demonstration that the heart of Democracy was with suffering American agriculture was on. The band-leaders, at their best, had strokes of genius. When Joe Robinson launched his Vice-Presidential boom by inserting a plea for religious freedom into his prepared speech one band played "The Old-Time Religion" and "Far from the Old Folks at Home."

George Olvany handled his Tammany braves well. It was at his request that the Al Smith demonstration was cut short when it had matched the Hoover picnic at Kansas City. The delegates, behaving like college boys after a football victory, would have been good for another hour despite the sweat pouring down their faces. They always preferred a parade to a speech. Olvany sent emissaries to stop the battles when enthusiastic Smith delegates from other States sought to snatch State banners from unwilling Southerners. It was at his order that the convention bands refrained from playing "East Side, West Side" until Franklin Roosevelt had shouted his climax, "We offer one who has the will to win—who not only deserves success but commands it. Victory is his habit—the happy warrior, Alfred Smith." Even then these unwontedly disciplined sons of Tammany let other States precede them in the Smith parade. George Olvany was a good showman, putting on a play entitled "The New Tammany."

Before the convention opened it was certain that Smith would be nominated, and even the selection of Joe Robinson for Vice-President was sure after the first day. Two days after the platform was submitted an understanding upon all essential planks had been reached. Then for two hot days the members of the Resolutions Committee sat in a furnace-like room in the Public Library and listened to delegates from the farm organizations, the Wets and the Drys, the women and the labor men—but it was stage play. It was rank indiscipline and poor acting when Newton D. Baker showed his indifference by working out cross-word puzzles during the speeches. The Senators were better politicians.

The platform was submitted Thursday evening. On Monday the wording of the contested prohibition plank had leaked out to some of the newspapermen, and it was understood that Governor Dan Moody of Texas, leader of the Drys, had indicated that while, for the benefit of his Texas constituents, he would have to make a fight in the convention for an even Drier plank, it was not to be taken seriously; he would not make trouble. When the hour came Dan lacked the stomach to stage even a sham battle. While the sergeant-at-arms was droning out the text of the platform the tall, sandy-haired Governor wandered about, asking advice of every friend he met. When his moment came he stepped forward uncertainly and announced that he had been in a minority of one on the resolutions committee. Carter Glass of Virginia, he said, had written the plank adopted by the committee, and Josephus Daniels had approved it. Yielding to the superior judgment of his elders, he would not insist upon a vote on his minority resolution.

It was so sudden a shift that Governor Ritchie of Maryland, Wet champion, did not know of it, and set the convention in an uproar by trying to protest against the minority resolution which he thought Moody had introduced. The machinery creaked and the audience could see the wheels go round. Ritchie had not bothered to listen to Moody; he had been told beforehand what Moody would say, and prepared his reply before coming into the hall. Moody upset the play by changing his cue.

The prize play-acting, of course, was the solemn discussion of this Wet-and-Dry issue. The thought of a Tammany delegation supporting a resolution advocating enforcement of the prohibition laws is in itself enough to make Texas's old gray mare laugh; and the Drys were as hypocritical. Honest Drys have been holding prayer meetings in the churches here, but the political leaders on whom they count have been sipping from tall glasses all around the hotels. Texas boasts that it gives the Wets all the liquor they want, and the Drys all the laws they want. The great Houston millionaires who underwrote the convention are militantly Dry in public, but one provides in his hotel a sawdust-floored bar where authentic beer flows free for all newspapermen, and another rents a room to a bootlegger who dispenses, for a price, six brands of smuggled whiskey, synthetic gin, liqueurs, and champagne, to all comers, with or without introduction.

Something seems to happen to honest prohibitionists when they touch politics; they support any hypocrite who will mouth their phrases. After Al Smith had been nominated I met a Texas politician, one of Dan Moody's supporters who fought Al Smith at the State convention. "Pe'son'ly," he remarked, waving his highball with dangerous enthusiasm, "Ah'm a drippin' Wet, but p'litic'ly, Ah want you to und'stand, Ah'm a mod'rate Dry." The candor of Al Smith's telegram of acceptance, frankly setting his own Wet views in a frame of Maryland Free State doctrine, was a refreshing contrast to the mumbling of his supporters and of his political opponents at the convention. It was, to be sure, easy to be outspoken after the nomination, but at least Smith did not wait until after the election.

Despite Claude Bowers's oratorical omissions the platform includes a strong plank on non-interference with Latin-American nations. But the long and sympathetic section on agriculture reaches a very limping climax. The tariff plank, reflecting the industrialization of the South, shows a new hesitation to speak out against subsidizing industry. Neither Muscle Shoals nor Boulder Dam is mentioned, although the water-power plank vaguely declares that "sovereign title and control must be preserved respectively in the State and federal governments." Only when it comes to the sins of the Republicans does the platform cease the endeavor to please everybody and ring out in unambiguous tones. But, after all, more attention is paid to platforms before they are written than after, and Al Smith is the kind of man who becomes his own platform. Now that his astute and pussyfooting friends have won the nomination for him, he has the opportunity to put an end to this mouthing of meaningless phrases.

At Houston two fundamentally different groups within the Democratic Party met, determined to agree somehow, and that undertow made it easy for the leaders of the South and the bosses of the Northern cities, after a show of fight, to agree. The long, dull speeches were at least a sort of propaganda of harmony. Al Smith was not the favorite of the Texans in the galleries, and there were sour looks in all the Southern delegations whenever a Smith yell rent the air; behind the hullabaloo about a Dry plank lurked a lot of bitter hate of Catholics, Irish, and city men. But Al Smith's habit of victory appealed to the Southerners, and they tried to work out a sugar-coating for the bitter pill. Somehow the lesson of Madison Square has sunk deep. The Democratic Party is a sort of racial church in the South, and heresy is a crime. Hoover has promoted Negroes to minor posts in charge of white clerks in his department, and that is worse than being a Catholic. So the real leaders climbed unostentatiously on the Smith bandwagon before the balloting began, and when the votes are counted in November the Solid South, if Houston is a criterion, will be safely, if a little unhappily, in the Al Smith column.

British Intrigue at the Panama Canal<sup>1</sup>

By LUDWELL DENNY

COLOMBIA probably will be the scene of the next international oil explosion. Grave consequences are threatened by the efforts of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, a British Government concern, to get a concession with canal rights flanking the Panaman defenses of the United States.

All the elements of danger are there: Alleged British Government defiance of the "Monroe Doctrine Corollary," conflict between Standard Oil and British companies, Nature blocking petroleum exploitation, primitive tribes suspicious of alien invasion, labor trouble, "Mexicanized" laws and regulations restricting foreign control, disputed land and subsoil titles, foreign financial penetration and diplomatic intervention. On top of this explosive well sits Standard Oil, intending by the grace of the State Department to remain there.

The United States looks to Colombia to take Mexico's place as the source of American oil reserves. No one knows the extent of Colombia's petroleum resources. Apparently they stretch hundreds of miles back through tropical jungle to the Andes. But there is no natural outlet. The Magdalena River, running through the oil country, is too shallow even at its mouth for sea-going tankers. This obstacle for several years retarded subsoil development. Then the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey rushed in where only giant capital can follow.

Robert De Mares, a French engineer, later naturalized, obtained in 1905 a fifty-year concession in the heart of the Carare country. The tract lacked definite boundaries. Standard in 1916 purchased his rights, operating through its subsidiaries, Tropical Oil and Andian National Corporation. Tropical started explorations at once. But the annual production in the period of 1922-1925 was held to about 500,000 barrels. In the latter year a young engineer, Mr. M. M. Stuckey, began for Andian the task of laying 360 miles of pipe-line through the jungle to Mamonal on the coast. In eleven months this feat was accomplished. With eight pumping stations in operation, the line carried 30,000 barrels of crude oil every twenty-four hours. In August, 1927, a "loop" was completed and the daily capacity increased to 50,000 barrels. Production for 1927 was 15,000,000 barrels. Tropical, early in 1928, had a larger daily output than any other one operating company in South America. To construct the necessary pipe-line, Standard had acquired in 1923 a special concession from the Government. The company spent the large sum involved in construction only after assuring itself that the Bogota Government would pursue in the future a favorable legislative and administrative policy.

The chief conflict between American and British companies centers in and around the Barco concession area, far back in the interior against the Venezuelan frontier. General Virgilio Barco at the turn of this century happened to command Conservative troops which defeated the rebel army in Colombia's civil war. He sought reward.

In 1905 he received it in the form of 1,250,000 acres of jungle land. The General lacked capital to develop his domain. In 1916 he sold it to an American-British syndicate. The Americans held a majority interest. Dutch-Shell was indirectly represented. But this syndicate could not solve the transport problem. Then the issue of titles arose to plague them. Colombian titles are described by petroleum lawyers as "the most involved titles of any oil country in the world." The Colombian Supreme Court decided the syndicate's titles were invalid. Too many other persons, native and foreign, were interested in the Barco region.

As a result of these complications, in 1926 Mr. Henry L. Doherty, chief American holder in the syndicate, arranged for the Gulf interests to obtain control through the Colombian Petroleum Corporation. Gulf has 75 per cent interest in this new company. The Caribbean Syndicate, with British and American-Doherty capital, retains 25 per cent.

Under Mellon-Gulf management the old barriers raised by the Colombian and Venezuelan governments suddenly seemed to disappear. Mr. Doherty had tried for years to make headway with the Caracas Government without success. Within less than two months after the family of the United States Secretary of the Treasury acquired control of the Barco fields, Venezuela agreed to permit a pipe-line across its territory. Now there are intimations that the Colombian Supreme Court may reverse itself, making the concession titles valid when expediency permits.

Out of this involved situation Dutch-Shell emerges. The Deterding trust is connected with Caribbean Syndicate, holding minority interest in the Barco tract. Through Equatorial Oil, Dutch-Shell is getting another foothold in that region. Other British companies there include Lobitos and Coastal Oilfields.

But the most active is the British Government company, the Anglo-Persian. An Anglo-Persian exploration party recently marched with a miniature army of mercenaries into the district of a hostile Indian tribe. After a battle the British retreated. Whether they got the geological data they sought is not known. But, it is reported, in their retreat they spread the news that they were American oil men. Since then it is not safe for a Yankee to venture within that tribe's territory. Such amenities of competition, however, are not a British monopoly. Dutch-Shell and Anglo-Persian men have worse things to say about the Americans and the Washington Government.

But recently a controversy developed which is apt to influence Anglo-American relations in that country for many years. Henry Irving Frederick Yates landed in Colombia early in 1927. He began at once to make history. This gentleman is a Briton by nationality, a colonel by title, an agent of the British Government's Anglo-Persian Oil Company by vocation. He arrived with a diplomatic passport and the prestige and immunity which that gives. His way had been prepared by the British Legation at Bogota. He negotiated with Colombian officials. The daring Colonel proposed that the Colombian Government grant to the British Government company a fifty-year monopoly concession for the vast area of national lands adjoining Panama and dominating the Canal approaches. Minister of Industry Montalvo, the President, and the Cabinet agreed. But certain Americans, whose business it is to know what foreign agents do in the Panama Canal region, promptly learned of the secret agreement.

<sup>1</sup> This article forms part of a chapter in Ludwell Denny's new book, to be published by Alfred A. Knopf, "We Fight for Oil."

What was the United States Government to do? Ordinarily its formal protest under the Monroe Doctrine would be quick and sharp. But this situation was not so simple. In the process of protecting that same Monroe Doctrine and its "Coolidge Corollary," the United States at that time was threatening Mexico, allegedly violating Panama's sovereignty with a military treaty rejected by the National Assembly, and "pacifying" Nicaragua with battleships and marines. Washington's exercise of these "duties" had been "misunderstood" throughout Latin America. Anti-Yankee sentiment was running high, especially in the South American republic next to the Panama Canal. President Coolidge had justified his Nicaraguan intervention by a declaration of "special interests." Colombians were asking: "Will our country be next?" Colombian leaders were sending protests to President Mendez, warning against American financial and economic penetration as the first step in the invasion of their country's sovereignty. Clearly it was no time for the State Department to protest to Colombia, even under the Monroe Doctrine.

Open opposition to the British Government's scheme to acquire territory flanking the Panama Canal was left, therefore, to certain Colombians whose own interests were also jeopardized. They protested to their government on the ground that the Colombian constitution and laws prohibited a foreign government from acquiring, directly or indirectly, such rights. Popular sentiment soon forced the Bogota Government, led by the British Colonel, to a strategic retreat. The Colonel belatedly decided he was not an agent of the British Government company after all. He became plain Henry Irving Frederick Yates. He agreed that this was no sort of concession to be given to a foreign government. But that it should be given to Mr. Yates as an individual obviously was an entirely different matter. The Bogota Government was quick to discern the reason of this logic. It thought, however, that others might be less logical. In order to meet any possible objections it reduced the concession area to 6,000,000 acres—along the Panaman border.

But the objections continued. The strategist decided to leave the country. He departed as plain Mr. Yates, but allegedly with a diplomatic passport and with his records and luggage under immunity and seal of the British Government. The British Minister is continuing negotiations for the concession.

The Bogota Government's act in negotiating the Yates-Montalvo concession and its attempt to put the contract into effect over the protest of the Colombian Congress is tremendously significant. Perhaps no more daring gesture against the United States's assumed authority over the Caribbean has ever been made by a South American government. What is behind this, and where will it lead? That is what Washington is wondering.

Perhaps the Colombian Government's share in formulating the Yates contract can be understood, but what about the British Government? This is not a question which Washington officials discuss before the public. Assuming that some responsible officials in London see the international menace of their Government's ownership of Anglo-Persian, perhaps they were not originally aware of that company's clumsy and provocative acts in Colombia. If that is the explanation, why does the British Legation in Bogota continue its efforts to get the concession in Mr. Yates's name? Admitting—what no one believes—that the British Government and Anglo-Persian have no further stake in the concession, what gain to Mr. Yates or any British citizen can compensate for the cost the London Government must pay in international distrust? These are some of Washington's unanswered questions.

These questions are barbed by reports of some American oil men to Washington that their survey showed no petroleum in the concession area—which may or may not prove true. They believe the concession unimportant to any British company—if oil is the only motive.

The American judgment that there is little or no oil in the proposed British concession area south of the Panaman border coincides with the American judgment that there is no gold in the British "gold" concession between the Colombian border and the Panama Canal. The Panama Corporation, a British syndicate promoted by the Earl of Cavan and Sir Alfred Mond, in 1925 obtained from the Panaman Government a ten-year monopoly gold concession. Mr. Richard O. Marsh, explorer and discoverer of the "white Indians," filed charges with the State Department against Great Britain. Mr. Marsh alleged that the British Government through this concession obtained important naval bases in Panama, the right to police territory near the Canal, and exclusive rights to the potential Panaman rubber desired by Americans to block the British world rubber monopoly. Anti-British sentiment was revived in the United States as a result of these charges and sensational press stories.

The Senate passed a Borah resolution "directing the Secretary of War to advise the Senate of all facts and circumstances relative to concessions secured by the British Government in the Republic of Panama." Investigation failed to substantiate the extreme charges. The concession covers 1,150 square miles in Veraguas province, the El Remance mines in that province, and the Darien tract of 3,400 square miles in south Panama. The area includes harbors but no major ports. The concession lands are in no case closer to the Canal than 100 miles. Though the military guard is paid by the corporation, it is "appointed" by the Government. There are other Panaman lands as well adapted to rubber cultivation. The British Government has no apparent holding in the company.

There remain, however, several questions concerning this concession which trouble some Washington officials. First, there is believed to be not sufficient gold in that region to explain under ordinary circumstances the organization of a $10,000,000 corporation. Second, the concession promoters are men who are, or have been, British Government officials. Sir Alfred Mond, former Cabinet Minister, is head of the English Chemical Trust. Mr. Andrew Percy Bennett is former British Minister to Costa Rica, Venezuela, and Panama. But the most important person, from the American point of view, is the chairman, Mr. Duncan Elliot Alves. Mr. Alves will be remembered as head of British Controlled Oilfields, organized under British Government control for the avowed purpose of obtaining Latin America's resources to be held for exclusive British Government service in time of need. Mr. Alves's record with the British Controlled Oilfields and his association with the extensive and apparently valueless tract near the Panama Canal increases the mystery in Washington's mind. That mystery deepens when a British Government company attempts to get possession of another large neighboring territory across the border in Colombia.

The United States Government is especially sensitive to any act in Panama or the Canal region which suggests that a foreign Power is interested. Washington has refused repeatedly to permit foreign commercial aircraft corporations to operate in the Canal Zone. Establishment of air bases by Colonel Yates, as permitted by the proposed Colombian concession, would disturb greatly the American military and naval strategists. Washington's suspicion regarding holdings of foreign Powers extends a long distance from the Panama Canal itself. When a Japanese syndicate was reported seeking to acquire the Magdalena concession in Mexico, the State Department announced it would view with grave concern the "actual or potential possession of a harbor or any other place" by any non-American government in an area which might threaten the defenses and communications of the United States. Yates's proposed concession in Colombia would give to the British hundreds of miles nearer the Panama Canal than Magdalena Bay.

The merest hint of such a British interoceanic canal as is permitted by the Yates concession is considered a threat to basic United States commercial and naval policies. Under no conceivable circumstances will Washington permit construction of any canal connecting the Caribbean and Pacific which is not under absolute United States control. This fixed policy resulted in United States acquisition by the Wilson Administration of exclusive perpetual rights to build such a Nicaraguan canal. The amount paid was $3,000,000. That action was taken because other foreign Powers desired canal rights. Not until several years later was it apparent that the United States could well use for commercial and naval purposes two canals. Protection of these Nicaraguan canal rights, and supplemental naval base rights at Corn Islands and Fonseca Bay, was given by President Coolidge in his special message to Congress as a major reason for military intervention in that country in 1927. Congress in 1928 considered bills for survey and immediate construction of such a canal.

Political conditions in Panama also partly explain Washington's sensitiveness to the Yates contract. While the Colonel and the British Minister in Bogota were trying to obtain territory flanking the Panama Canal, the Panamans themselves were protesting the United States claim to complete sovereignty over the Canal Zone. The Panamans were not only disputing this delicate issue in secret with Washington, they were challenging the United States claims before the League of Nations. Refusal of the Panaman Assembly to ratify the United States treaty, and the prospect of continuance indefinitely of that dispute, heightens Washington's concern over complications or possible foreign intervention in the Canal region as implied in the Yates contract.

This United States policy is well known to the London Foreign Office. Therefore the British expected Washington to protest to the Colombian Government against the concession. In Bogota it was predicted that the United States would protest, and that this would induce the Colombian Congress to ratify the British contract to spite the United States. But Washington for once postponed an opportunity to flaunt its hated interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine in the face of a Caribbean country. Yates-Montalvo strategy was thus forced back to the local issue. Native opposition from the beginning had been aroused chiefly by the Bogota Government's usurpation of power. The President and Cabinet had tried to give away a right of which Congress alone could legally dispose. There was no way out then for the British and the Government except to put through Congress legislation empowering the Executive to grant such concessions. A measure known as the Sanchez bill was written by Minister Montalvo and introduced in Congress in the summer of 1927. Its passage was blocked.

The British then fell into the trap set for but avoided by Washington. Downing Street intervened, demanding, according to the Bogota press, extension of the session of Congress while discussion of an indemnification of $12,000,000 for the expropriation of a British company's mines was pending, assuring the Government that the British Foreign Office would compromise for $6,000,000 provided the Yates contract was approved. El Tiempo reported that the Foreign Minister read the British note in a secret session of the Senate, where it caused great indignation, the Senate deciding to protest it and to reject the settlement, which would be arranged by the Government administratively.

From the American point of view Great Britain's resort to strong-arm methods and the consequent anti-British reaction in Colombia has probably prevented for many months any action on the contract by the Colombian Congress. The British and the Bogota governments, unwilling to admit defeat, introduced in place of the Sanchez measure an Emergency Petroleum bill with a rider empowering the Executive to dispose of national lands to concessionnaires. This rider was defeated by Congress. Under the amended Emergency Petroleum law, the Yates contract must be suspended pending its acceptance by Congress or the passage of a new law empowering the Executive to grant the concession. But the new law apparently permits Yates to begin exploration whenever the Executive desires.

Having succeeded through action of the Colombian Congress in blocking the Yates contract temporarily, Washington feels it can afford to act less abruptly in dealing with Colombia's restrictive oil legislation than it did in protesting Mexican laws—unless, of course, it is faced with an "overt act" of property seizure. Washington, in the main, counts on the American economic and financial hold upon Colombia to check that country's tendency to "go Mexican." In 1926-27 Colombia borrowed $81,500,000 from the United States. At the close of that period Mr. Albert E. Ellis, Assistant Trade Commissioner, cabled the Washington Government from Bogota that the Treasury deficit was over $8,000,000. There followed in April, 1928, an additional New York loan of $35,000,000. Colombia probably is in too deep as a debtor to ignore or to defy United States policy successfully.

In reacting against her alleged bondage to the United States, both political and financial, the Colombian Government apparently has decided that the only escape is to play Great Britain against the United States, encouraging the two Powers to weaken each other. During congressional debate on the Emergency Petroleum bill, Representative Uribe Afanador and other opponents of the measure were charged by Minister Montalvo with acting for American companies. The Minister in turn was charged with representing the interests of Colonel Yates and the British.

My Private Utopia

By UPTON SINCLAIR

TWENTY-ONE years ago I made an effort to start a little Utopia for everyday use, and naturally my thinking on the subject is dominated by that experience. I will begin by telling you some of the things I learned at Helicon Hall.

Among the joys we realized was the opportunity of being alone when you wanted to be alone, and of having friends when you wanted friends. We cannot arrange matters that way in our present world, try as hard as we will. Our work and study hours get interrupted by telephone calls and knocks on the door—we can't let everybody know our habits and whims; and when we want company we have to make journeys in taxis and street cars, and we have to stay even though we find we are bored. But in our little Utopia we had our friends close at hand, and any time we felt like playing billiards we could always be sure of finding some one else in the same mood. On the other hand, if we wanted to be alone, we had our own rooms to which we might retire, with the certainty that no one would come there except by special invitation.

In the next place, we made at least a beginning at solving the "servant problem" in our Utopia. Nowadays, as I hear the ladies discussing it, I realize how large the problem bulks. Some of our married friends are doing their own housework and giving up their intellectual lives because they are so tired of trying to adjust themselves to a stream of untrained and untrainable "domestics" in their homes. There is no need to go into details, because all wives know and all husbands hear. And we really started to solve that problem in our Utopia; we got far enough at least to know that we were on the right track.

Just the other day I read a statement in print that I had founded a colony in which everybody took turns at housework. That is the common impression, and it is not true. We had a quota of regular servants at Helicon Hall; the only difference was that we did not treat them as social inferiors, but admitted them on terms of social equality and even gave them a vote as to how the colony should be run. Among many complaints which I heard on many subjects I cannot recall having heard that any one of our "colony workers" ever abused the consideration we showed. They were always quiet and courteous, and possessed by the spirit of jolly and simple democracy that is a feature of my private Utopia.

There was a pretty Irish girl who had been the maid of all work at my Princeton farm before the colony days; it was a great adventure to her to be transported to Utopia and dance on Saturday evenings with a professor of philosophy from Columbia University. It did not do the professor any harm, I am sure, or keep him from becoming a well-known writer. There was an elderly widow who did housework for the board of herself and a little son. There was an Irishman who had done kitchen work in the homes of the rich, a very humble individual and a devout Catholic, and what he made of our bunch of Socialists and Anarchists and assorted libertarians I never inquired, but he recognized kindness and consideration when he met it, exactly as other humans do. Our little Utopia was big enough so that no one had to tread on any other's toes; and when our "servants" included such individuals as Sinclair Lewis and Allan Updegraff, we could not seriously feel that our intellectual tone was being lowered.

Another problem we were on the way to solving was that of the children. It does not trouble me any more, because my son is grown up; but in those days he was only five years old, and very much determined upon having his share of life. So that made a problem for a young author and wife, and a reason for moving to Utopia. At Helicon Hall the children had a little world of their own, made especially for their convenience, and they led a social life, which is the only kind for gregarious animals. It was a small affair—only fourteen children, and that was too few—we could not afford to employ the experts we wanted, and the mothers had to cooperate. I don't say it was easy, but I do say we made a beginning, and proved that mothers can be educated when they get to the point where they really want to be. It is my belief that community care of children can be lifted to a higher plane than we find nowadays in "institutions," and that with parental supervision it can become something fine and fruitful.

Why didn't my private Utopia last? Well, in the first place, it burned down; we had had only a little money, and had had to take a jerry-built product of the profit system instead of erecting a fireproof structure according to our needs. Also, I had learned that it takes one man to organize such an enterprise and he could not be writing books at the same time. You will claim that as proof of what you call "individualism," but it means no more than this: that the cooperative spirit and technique have not yet been evolved, and that people have not yet learned to be social in their everyday lives. They will learn when they have to—which is when the wage slaves go on strike and refuse to maintain the leisure class and its system of snobbery. Then, very quickly, you will see little Utopias springing up all over the land.

One great trouble with our Utopia was the existence of a set of wolves outside who preyed upon us and left us no peace. I mean, of course, the capitalist press and the reporters they sent out to snoop in our pantry and peer into our bedroom windows. Having lived, before and since then, in leisure-class hotels, I can assert that Helicon Hall was the most "moral" community then existing in America. But the reporters of the capitalist newspapers chose to suspect otherwise and to make their readers suspect it. There was no real harm in the Columbia professor's dancing with the Irish waitress, under his wife's eyes, but the newspaper reports failed to mention the wife, and the professor was worried for his job. So were others—teachers, writers, and professional people. All that is merely repeating the fundamental Socialist thesis, that there can be no peace or safety for any individual or group in our society until there is peace and safety for all.

So you see why I am moved to turn my private Utopia into a public one. I have learned, not merely as a matter of theory but in practice, that as long as the masses of the people are held in ignorance and slavery, as long as they are at the mercy of predatory groups such as newspapers which fill their minds with filth and garbage and keep them subjected to superstition and prejudice—just so long can there be no real beauty in the world, and no peace for any sensitive and humane man or woman. This mob will be told by their predatory masters that they are the most wonderful and intelligent people that can possibly be imagined, and they will believe it, and will be ready to set to work at any moment to slaughter other people who do not immediately adopt their way of life and submit to being exploited by their predatory masters. It happens that I individually will soon be beyond the age where I am liable to be seized by these slave-drivers and compelled to march out and be slaughtered for them; but my son is right at the age where they will grab him—and am I to stay blissfully in retirement in my private Utopia and pay no attention to that fate which is hovering over the young men of the land?

My Utopia is first of all a spiritual thing. It involves a renunciation of that blissful certainty, which so many people cherish, that they are greatly superior to other human beings and therefore entitled to command them and put them to work. So many brilliant society ladies I have known, absolutely convinced that they were "socially" superior to the masses of women whom they didn't know, and to the servants who were compelled by poverty to wait upon them, and to the millions upon millions of men and women whose skins were colored by nature instead of by art. And yet so many of these women of the superior caste are entirely brainless and entirely useless, except that they are bringing up a child or two as brainless and as useless as the mother. The entrance to my Utopia is a pathway strewn with these superior ladies and gentlemen who have been dumped off the backs of the workers and have landed, more or less bruised and muddy, in the ditch.

I am sorry if this sounds impolite and inelegant, but the plain truth is that I don't know any way to realize a world in which I care to live while the masses of the people produce wealth for idlers to consume. I have been as patient and polite as I know how to be during the thirty years or so that my eyes have been open to this situation; I have argued and pleaded with the idlers to get off the backs of the workers voluntarily and permit Utopia to be established in an intelligent and polite way. Their answer has been to organize bands of bullies and rowdies, armed with every sort of deadly weapon, and to turn them loose upon those members of the working class who dare to raise their voices in protest against parasitism and exploitation. They have clubbed and beaten and jailed and tortured and shot and hanged the working-class leaders; when they were preparing to electrocute two of them in Massachusetts last summer, out here in Los Angeles we were not even permitted to protest. Friends of mine went to attend a meeting and found there was to be no meeting because a thousand burly fellows armed with shotguns and clubs were lined up along the street, hustling everybody along, and dragging you off to jail if you tried to halt for a moment. All the leaders and organizers of the meeting were thrown into jail under the charge which our police have invented, "suspicion of criminal syndicalism"; and everybody thinks it is all right, and nobody is doing anything about it.

Such is the private Utopia of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association of Los Angeles. And I sit off in a corner and dream about love and justice and beauty and such things, and it is as if I were smoking opium or going to church and singing hymns about heaven.

[This is the fifth of a series of articles in which various persons describe the world they would like to live in.]

The Season in Moscow

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IV. Mise en Scène

Moscow, June 7

THE exuberance of the dramatic impulse in Moscow finds expression not only in acting and playwriting, but also of course in those various experiments in stage-craft which have attracted a perhaps disproportionate amount of attention in New York and elsewhere. They are so much the most easily described, photographed, and imitated aspect of the whole dramatic movement that the observer at second-hand is likely to deceive himself into believing that he has caught the essential part of it when he imagines or imitates some of the more eccentric Russian stages. But, as a matter of fact, those forms have very little meaning except when taken in connection with the whole complex of which they are a part, and they are likely to convey a very false impression of the whole when they are imitated in the dilettante fashion not unknown in New York.

In this department of theatrical activity the element of mere futuristic extravagance must be taken into account as it must in all the others, but the revolution in theatrical methods found its most important raison d'être in the effort to devise a means whereby the factory workers might act their own plays in the factories themselves. The platform stage was thus, in part at least, a faute de mieux, and the theater of Meyerhold is essentially one of these platform stages moved from the factory into a playhouse, while the theater of the Moscow Trade Unions (which I have already described) has as a stage merely a literal reproduction of a shop like one of those in which the workers first acted their revolutionary plays. Thus it is that even the mechanics of the most typically new Moscow theaters grow out of the conditions which produced those theaters and are justified largely by that fact. Since the Revolution, it is true, nearly every theater experiments more or less with unusual devices, but the more conservative the traditions of the theater the more completely it retains the general method of the old stage-craft while adopting the new devices in a manner that makes it unnecessary actually to destroy the old theatrical form. Thus, for example, though the setting for "The Breaking" (performed at one of the studios of the Art Theater) employs various ingenious devices like the one in which the floor of a small room is inclined at a high angle in such a way as to give the audience the impression that it is looking down upon it from above, nevertheless the whole production could be transferred to the stage of a New York playhouse without difficulty, and it is only in the playhouses whose origin was quite independent of the old theatrical world that the wholly revolutionary methods prevail. There is, in other words, a rationality and an order in the theatrical world of Moscow which it is difficult to grasp from a distance but which one perceives as soon as one has begun to study it at first-hand and which immediately differentiates that world from the often pathetically muddled attempts to imitate it in foreign lands.

I should not wish to deny that even in Moscow the theatrical world has its lunatic fringe, but it seems, unfortunately, that it is this fringe which is most easily and most frequently imitated elsewhere. I, at least, happened to see nothing in Moscow which was quite so desperately "Russian" as the Piscator Bühne in Berlin. Here the most extravagant experiments of the most extravagant Russian theater are not only imitated but perhaps carried to even more grotesque extremes, while nearly everything which makes the revolutionary theater in Russia interesting is somehow absent. Yet down in the midst of the capital of a contented and prosperous society organized upon the familiar European model, it is little more than an incongruity.

In the first place, its method of expression was not developed there and it is therefore speaking an incomprehensible language, while, in the second place, it is without the very thing which more than any other distinguishes the Russian theaters—roots which go deep into the social and intellectual life of the people. An experimental theater whose experiments are more or less controlled by an audience to which it must speak in a comprehensible language of the things which most deeply concern it is one thing; an experimental theater endowed by a millionaire (the Piscator Bühne in Berlin like the Playwrights Theater in New York has such a patron) is quite another. It may claim to speak for the proletariat, but at best it draws most of its audience from either the intellectuals or, what is far more incongruous, from the sensation-seeking members of what Mr. Wyndham Lewis calls "high Bohemia." Its eccentricities have no meaning and there is in consequence no control upon them, so that they flourish in luxurious impotence and the theater becomes only a parody of the one which it is trying to imitate.

Even if one of the revolutionary theaters of Moscow were itself transferred bodily to New York or one of the European capitals it would itself cease to be what it is at home, for the simple reason that it would cease to have that intimate relation with the life of the community which constitutes the essential characteristic of the Russian theater. Existing in a social void it would become, in spite of itself, merely "art for art's sake," or, in other words, the very antithesis of what it was intended to be; and those who profess themselves disciples of Moscow would be far more consistent if, instead of imitating the outward forms of the Russian theater, they would endeavor to achieve a genuine popularity with the masses by presenting plays written for them in forms which they comprehend and enjoy. I remarked something of this sort to both Eisenstein and Lunacharsky, and though there are not many points upon which they would agree they did agree upon this one.

The first duty of a proletarian theater, said both, is to appeal to the proletariat; and as to the Piscator Bühne, Eisenstein was particularly emphatic. It is, he said, not a communist but merely a "scandal" theater.

And what is true of the mechanics of the Russian theater is true also of the institution as a whole. With the possible exception of New York, Moscow is the most active theatrical center of the world, and there is certainly no other where the visitor from New York will find so much that is new and interesting. Yet it is so much a world apart that he will find comparatively little capable of being adapted to his own stage in its present form. One may borrow a few individual stage devices, and there is an occasional play like "The Armored Train" which might be produced abroad with great success, but the Russian theater as a whole is too deeply rooted in a wholly alien social order to be able to exert any influence short of a complete transformation. Dealing with subjects different from those which occupy our dramatists, organized upon a completely different plan from that of our theater, and intended to perform a different function from that which our dramatic institutions are designed to perform, it constitutes a different world which the world of our theater only touches at a few points. It can exist only in a certain kind of society, and it cannot be imitated apart from that society. It will never be successfully introduced into the rest of the world unless all the other institutions of communistic society are introduced along with it.

In conclusion I should like to make some remarks about the nature of the Russian censorship as it affects the stage, but I was able to learn little beyond the fact that it does, of course, exist and that its authority is final, arbitrary, and absolute. A certain amount of latitude—more perhaps than one might expect—is, however, allowed. The workers' distrust of the bureaucracy sometimes finds expression and there is considerable satire in certain plays like "Mandate," where a young member of the bourgeoisie, having unofficially appointed himself a member of the Communist Party, proceeds to terrify all the neighbors with the might of that organization. Everybody trembles when its name is mentioned, and throughout the play there are many not too good-humored thrusts at the powers that be. One might also cite the case of one of the most-talked-of plays of the moment, "The Days of the Turbines," which treats very sympathetically the downfall of a White family and which reaches its conclusion when one of the members having remarked "It is the beginning of a great era" the other replies, "Yes, or the end of one." At one point in the play the Czarist hymn is played, and I am told that it caused so much excitement at the first performance that the censor insisted that in the future the edge should be taken off the scene by having it played in a slightly ridiculous fashion; but nevertheless the hymn is still played and the piece still has its ambiguous end. Apparently, then, the censor allows some criticism of the bureaucracy in order that the gap between the rulers and the ruled may not become too wide, but it is, of course, not to be forgotten that all expression of dissent takes place only by his permission. A certain amount of heterodoxy may find indulgence, but the privilege of propounding it may never be claimed as a right.

[This is the fourth in a group of articles on the Russian theater. The three preceding this appeared in the issues of June 13, 20, and 27. Mr. Krutch will, in later issues, write on the theater in Budapest, Vienna, and Paris.]

In the Driftway

A LETTER appeared lately in the New York Times from a user of the subway and elevated lines of the metropolis which caught the eye and warmed the heart of the Drifter. The letter is too long to reprint in full, but it read in part as follows:

May I ask space to seek new members of "The Society of Quiet Turnstilers"?

Even to those who are weary of joining things, and have highly resolved to join nothing more, I venture this appeal. Will you not belong to The S. of Q. T.? There are no officers, no dues, and no minutes of the previous meeting.

The origin of this society goes back to a letter in a New York paper which I read a year or more ago, from some one whose name I regret to say I have forgotten. This writer said that he, or she, had begun operating the turnstiles of subway and elevated stations without the crashing noise that nearly all passers-through cause them to make. . . .

By resting one hand on the wooden bar immediately in front of the body as one passes through, and thereby easing the stile from smashing violently against its next stopping place, a quiet operation can with very little trouble be achieved. It does not take an entire second's extra time, and delays nobody. It confers a touch upon one's neighbors' sensibilities (and one's own as well) like a contact of velvet when he was expecting the impact of a harsh hammer blow.

I am hopeful that we members of the society shall be able before many more rush hours actually to change the present barbaric, devastating, and utterly unnecessary uproar of the turnstiles into considerate and neighborly approach to peace.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is not as hopeful of an early reform as the writer of this letter. A good many years' residence in the clangor of New York City has convinced him that 50 per cent of the inhabitants identify noise with pleasure, while the rest look upon it as a harmless and necessary aspect of existence, regarding any one who objects to it as eccentric if not cuckoo. The Drifter himself hopes to organize some day the Society of Angry Turnstilers, which will descend upon the subway and elevated railways in a body, bear off the turnstiles on their backs, and inter them in the Hudson River.

* * * * *

A FRIEND of the Drifter ordered a closed bus from a coach company. The latter sent an open one, but followed it with an apology which the Drifter thinks was worth the difference:

We are very sorry to say that we had to disappoint you by sending you a open bus as we had promised you a closed bus but as our closed bus was out on a party the night before and the party was kind of rough whereby they broke three glasses in the doors and also cutting two seats which had to be fixed on Saturday as the next day was Sunday and we could not let a car go out in that kind of a condition. If there was any kind of a way that we could get a closed car on that morning we certainly would have got it as we do not promise one thing and do the other.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Cocktail Presidents

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Shall Dry America," asks Bishop Cannon, "elect a 'cocktail President'?"

Well, the answer is that it has, and it inevitably will. Woodrow Wilson was an avowed Wet, before and after the passage of the Prohibition Amendment. Warren Gamaliel Harding was a dripping Wet in habitual practice, and everyone in Washington knows that he could not carry his liquor as well as Al. Calvin Coolidge is personally Dry, but Washington society does not report that Herbert Hoover turns down his glass when he dines at the Belgian Legation. It is a strange country where bishops oppose men because they preach what they practice.

Washington, D. C., June 30 JONATHAN EDWARDS, JR.

Not for Silver, Anyway

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the beginning, Borah assumed the leadership in the Norris movement and, with much beating of tom-toms, proclaimed he would battle for progressivism in both Presidency and platform.

In the end, we found him pulling shoulder to shoulder with Vare and Hays and Slep and Smoot to put over Hoover and Curtis and the same old platitudinous twaddle.

Somebody, somewhere, once wrote something about: "Just for a handful of silver he left us; just for a riband to stick in his coat."

Chicago, June 15

FREDERIC BABCOCK

Robinson and Millay

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your editorial on Literary Prizes you express a fairly definite satisfaction with this year's Pulitzer Prize awards; and that is all very well as far as personal opinion goes. But when you say of "Tristram" that "it had no prominently close rivals during the year," I find myself challenging you. No close rivals? Have you forgotten "The King's Henchman"? Apart even from its greatness as an opera, Millay's work seems to me more than a mere "rival" to Robinson's poem. It has all the earth-power which Robinson lacks. It is broader, harder, clearer, and its roots go deeper. Millay throws herself into the life that surges through her men and women; Robinson prefers to stand aside, watching, speculating, with smiling, patient gestures. He is a good philosopher in homespun, but he has thin veins; he lacks the life-force that makes for great poetry.

Technically, of course, "Tristram" is very fine. It has fine spots. But it has no real qualities of emotion. A love story without emotions—almost entirely a mental thing. You will say that is because it is "modern," but I doubt that we "moderns" are so "mental," after all. It is possible that, now and again, a white-livered attitude may be mistaken for a sign of cerebration.

There is another thing about the awarding of these prizes interesting to observe: the three most important awards went to books which were popular successes. Whether that means that the public taste is looking up or that the judges are powerless before swift currents is another question.

Cannondale, Connecticut, May 28 JOHN HYDE PRESTON

Books

Love Coming Late

By MARY AUSTIN

Love came to me late having sent on before him
    all his great company.
Young love with his perfumed torch beguiling the senses;
Passion, whose feet when I kissed them blackened my mouth;
Duty that galled me worst
    where the hurt was sorest.

Then with a sound of wings down-edged for silence,
With a stir as of evening primroses blowing wide apart among orchard grasses Secret, contained and aware great Love came walking.
Came and sat down at the loom where I stooped overwearied,
Swift were his hands and light on the shuttle;
And suddenly, as he wrought, duty and passion and youth came back and served him!

A Masterly Survey

The Native Problem in Africa. By Raymond Leslie Buell. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $15.

MR. BUELL'S book more than satisfies the expectation with which its publication has been awaited. It surveys the "Native Problem" in French, British, and Belgian Africa and in Liberia, abstaining, however, from any account of Portugal's dealings, which, in fact, form an integral and essential part of the matter necessary for illustration and reinforcement of the principal generalizations which impose themselves through a perusal of this otherwise extremely complete and impressive critical survey.

Vast as the book is (it must contain, with its notes and appendices, about a million words), no one with a preliminary acquaintance with the provinces dealt with will find a sentence superfluous. Indeed the enormous subject is handled with real economy. The writing is never tedious. Although in different territories similar fundamentals have repeatedly to be dealt with, there are always local differences of substantial importance. The careful studies of administration in the immense areas controlled by France in Africa will be specially welcome to those whose acquaintance has been principally with British African territories or whom the evil notoriety of Portuguese methods and the scandals of the earlier maladministration of the Congo Free State have caused to pay special attention to subsequent developments there. As to the Congo one is impressed with the seriousness and determination with which the Belgian Government has approached the responsibilities which it undertook when the Free State's rule was transferred to it. Mr. Buell's account justifies an opinion that in liberality and intelligence in her African administration, and in the practical application of the principles of the strength of which the infernal rule of the Congo Company was evicted, Belgium is now the most admirable of imperial Powers in Africa.

The book is valuable not only for its well-balanced historical summaries and its analyses of contemporary conditions in their salient aspects, but because it reprints the most important international documents and the cardinal administrative memoranda and statistics bearing upon African imperialism.

There is a devastating chapter about Liberia and the Firestone agreement, which as a Briton, more sensible, perhaps, than most of my fellow-countrymen of the large amount of glass in the structure of my country's imperial policy, I prefer to do no more than commend to the digestion of American citizens as a temperate and justified account of the most ominously cynical deal between Western capitalism and an African people that has transpired since the constitution of the Congo Free State.

To anyone who has had special occasion and opportunities for continuously observing the dealings of white enterprise with Africa during the last forty years this scholarly and unprejudiced survey will be immensely corroborative and reinforcing. The partition of Africa was not a humanitarian enterprise. Mr. Chamberlain described it as having provided Britain with undeveloped estates from which it was her duty to extract raw materials for her own people, opening them at the same time as markets for British goods. The purpose of every other European participant in the scramble was precisely the same. France had added the notion of establishing a reservoir and recruiting ground for her armies.

This modern commercial determination of white men, of which the Firestone Agreement is the latest manifestation, to handle the resources of Africa for their own profit, operates of its own natural virtue on quite simple and self-satisfactory principles. For its economy it needs command of the land: it needs labor to mature and extract produce and to build roads for its transportation. Even when it does not need all the land for its own operations it is prone to take it away from the natives in order that they may not use it for purposes desirable only to themselves, or remain indifferent to the wages white enterprise is prepared to offer. Mr. Buell gives a bird's-eye view of the operation of this economy in every part of Africa which he visited. Further, in order to induce the native to labor for the developer various modes of pressure are exercised ranging from poll-taxes to directly compelled service. In order to reinforce its control, European enterprise usurps the nation's government and destroys his own. Mr. Buell historically documents the course of this process in all parts of Africa, and its reactions.

These processes were let loose upon Africa from fifty to forty years ago. Those who engaged in them were not egregious sinners; they argued that civilization would be a boon to the native; they proved that it was better for him to work at wages than at his own affairs, and they believed that it was good for him to be compelled to work, so that he should not waste so much time in dancing and drinking (pastimes recognized by the cinema as the choicest emblems of our own civilization).

The impulse of exploitation, however, has not been the sole force at work: there has all the time been active also that sane appreciation of the essentials of human life and of the rights of African and other weaker peoples which had already repressed the grosser and more palpable forms of Negro slavery. That influence has been principally kept alive in Africa by the missionaries of all Christian denominations. It has also been effectually represented by a minority of intelligent and high-minded governors. National governments, too, have professed to stand for this morality, but in practice they have been consistently humbugged by the moral ideology of the Development school, and where they have not been humbugged the developers have been too smart for them, and have too often stolen the horse before instructed humane intelligence or public opinion could get to the door. There is also, fortunately, a considerable and distinctly increasing power among the natives themselves of neutralizing, resisting, and reacting against the policies of expropriation, forced labor, and destruction of political freedom which exhibit the crude impulses of the economic school. Nothing is more interesting in Mr. Buell's book than his testimony, in every part of Africa that he deals with, to a distinct turn of the tide. For example, against land expropriation, which the British Government allowed in Rhodesia but is now checking in Kenya, against forced labor, which the International Labor Office is elaborating a convention to control and in time to extinguish, and against the destruction of native self-government, against which some British administrators have from the first set their faces.

Mr. Buell concludes not unhopefully. "Africa is the one continent where by the application of intelligence, knowledge, and good-will it is not too late to adopt policies which will prevent the development of the acute racial difficulties which have elsewhere arisen, and the evils of which have been recognized only after they have come into existence. In the larger part of Africa the white man still has carte blanche to avoid the mistakes of the past committed in other parts of the world if he has will and intelligence to do so." No one who reads this book can feel any doubt as to the leading principle on which alone such development can be imagined possible. The African must be recognized as a human being having a soul and rights of his own.

LORD OLIVIER

Herbert Hoover Again

Who's Hoover? By William Hard. Dodd Mead and Company, 1928. $2.50.

The Presidency vs. Hoover. By Samuel Crowther. Doubleday, Doran and Company, 1928. $2.50.

WILLIAM HARD could not write a dull line if he chose. Usually he writes with an original style and much humor. Hence his campaign biography of Mr. Hoover has a justification—there are now three such in the field, with, we shudder to think, more probably to come. Mr. Hard is an intense admirer of the subject of his book; hence it ought to commend itself to the Republican National Committee. That does not mean, however, that his estimate of the Republican candidate is uncritical. He does not try to conceal some of the obvious weaknesses of his hero, as, for instance, Mr. Hoover's extraordinary sensitiveness to criticism. He "collects the clippings containing them. He broods over them. He sends emissaries to his attackers to explain the righteousness of the event which they have misinterpreted." Mr. Hard contrasts the attitude of Calvin Coolidge who was asked by a friend if he was not disturbed by a Democratic attack upon him in a magazine. "Oh," said Mr. Coolidge, according to Hard, "I remember. The magazine had a green cover. I started reading the article, but it was against me; so I quit."

Mr. Hard admits that that period in 1920 when Mr. Hoover vacillated between being a Democrat and a Republican—because of Woodrow Wilson and the League of Nations—was "an unquiet and inconsistent interlude in his life," from which we are left to deduce that his years in Harding's crooked Cabinet and his service in Mr. Coolidge's represent the quiet and consistent Hoover! Despite one's opposition to the League of Nations one may be pardoned for preferring the unquiet and inconsistent Hoover and dreading the other one who, as Wendell Phillips would have said, is "silent in the presence of sin." As for Mr. Hoover's joining thirty other "magnificently distinguished and magnificently deluded Republicans in issuing a manifesto to the the American people declaring that the best and shortest road to the palace of peace at Geneva was through a White House inhabited by Warren Gamaliel Harding"—why that, says Mr. Hard, was false simply and solely "because Harding at that very moment was irrevocably personally pledged against ever actually taking the United States into the League organism." That explanation satisfies the ever-kindly Mr. Hard. But it leaves the reader gasping with wonder that this great superman of the world, Herbert Hoover, never stopped to ask Warren Harding whether he, Hoover, was telling a lie or not! As for Mr. Hoover's achievements in the Cabinet, notably in standardizing shoestrings, sealing wax, and sticks, and decreasing for all American fishermen "the time between bites," Mr. Hard tells them all delightfully, more convincingly than are his efforts to cover those black spots which have made millions lose faith in his hero.

Mr. Crowther's tribute is more ambitious. It begins with a study of the Presidency, and there we have the gratifying news that "the great advance has come under the Administration of Calvin Coolidge. For he has conceived of government as an aid to progress and not as an obstacle—or as an end in itself." Shades of William McKinley, Mark Hanna, Warren Harding, and every apostle of protection! Next we learn the profound truth that "the political thought of yesterday will not fit the needs of today. . . . It does matter who is President. It matters mightily." From this we naturally wander, after the inevitable recounting of how Mr. Hoover standardized the bathtub, helped to decrease unemployment, and to increase prosperity, to this inevitable conclusion: "In short, that Herbert Hoover is the one man who can now lead to a fuller life—who can lead to the previously impossible state in which poverty in this country can be put on a purely voluntary basis [italics mine]. In the succeeding chapters this will be demonstrated." In other words, this book is a useful summary of what Mr. Hoover has achieved, and paints a highly ingenuous and glowing picture of the way we are going to be standardized and mechanized into undreamed-of prosperity. Which is, of course, the end-all of our national aspirations, the final aim of the Republic. What ass was it that said: "Without a vision the people perish"? Here is Hoover to demolish him.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The Behavior of Museums

The Behavior of the Museum Visitor. By Edward Stevens Robinson. Washington, D. C.: American Association of Museums.

IF museums behaved differently would they have more visitors? There is a question worth trying to answer. The present study of the museum visitor deals with four museums only; it considers the behavior of only 204 visitors; it noted their behavior only in the presence of paintings; it reports that only 23 of the 204 stopped to look at any picture for more than sixteen seconds; and it concludes that museum directors should become experimental psychologists, observe the behavior of their visitors, and from a study of that behavior learn how they may so modify museum management as to make museums more profitable to visitors. The study seems to have been made with care and ingenuity; but the basic question is not answered by the study, as the author seems ready to admit.

The purpose of the inquiry was to discover such facts concerning the reaction of visitors to museums as would enable museum managers so to arrange their exhibits and so to modify their general method as to make their institutions more attractive, more inspiring, and consequently more frequented and more useful than they now are. But the facts selected are not those which most need study. The problem which confronts the open-minded museum manager is not "How does a visitor behave when he comes into a museum?" but "Why does he so rarely come?" It will not be easy to get an answer to the latter question; but it should surely have been possible to get reports from a few thousand educated, intelligent, and cultivated persons on why a museum so rarely persuades them to come within its doors.

Realism in a Presidential Year

THE AMERICAN MERCURY

edited by H. L. MENCKEN

(contributing editor of The Nation) is accepting the challenge of 1928. It is paying its respects to the manners and morals of the two historic parties. It is turning a spotlight on the current realities of our political life—realities which disconcert the tender-minded idealist; realities which the professional politicians would far rather see kept dark.

In the July issue, for example, Mr. Frank R. Kent, author of The History of the Democratic Party, tells exactly how and why

MONEY MAKES PRESIDENTS

Mr. Kent, chief political correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, knows practical politics as few men do, even among politicians. He has been in the front trenches all his life. Here, by cold arithmetic and incontrovertible facts, he shows that the strategic use of money at the right time and in the right place controls elections in a way which the ordinary voter never suspects.

And the July issue (now available) contains much else to make it the ideal beginning of a year's subscription. Note, below, the special combination offer (it saves you $2.40). For a realistic appraisal of the men, the policies, the tactics, the underlying facts of this presidential year, what better can any citizen do than follow The Nation week by week and, month by month, THE AMERICAN MERCURY?

THE AMERICAN MERCURY, 730 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Please find enclosed $7.60, for which send THE AMERICAN MERCURY (beginning with the July issue) and The Nation (beginning with the issue of July 18) for one year to:

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

CITY ..... STATE .....

Additional postage: Canada, $0.50; foreign, $1.00 for each magazine.

N 7-11-28

Several of our larger and wealthier cities have, in the last few decades, erected museum buildings at the cost of several million dollars each; then have acquired by gift and purchase rare and expensive objects at a further cost for each of many thousands more; and then have found that the visits paid to these museums are exceedingly few. Quite extravagant claims are made by managers and advocates of museums of rarities. The most perfect and consequently the most beautiful things ever made by man will, we are told, if visited in a museum and gazed upon with the proper spirit of awe, wonder, and admiration, impart to most of those who thus gaze upon them a certain power which will gradually negative their native tendency to love the mean, cheap, and tawdry—true art being of course assumed to be the kinds of things they have seen in the museum. But the prophecy that an artistic regeneration will follow solemn examination of museum pieces is rarely fulfilled. It seems that most visitors go away from a museum with a keen sense of duty done—which, as Joseph Cook used to tell Bostonians, is “the soul’s own fireside”—but with no exaltation of taste. Museums continue to be built and filled with what man has done in preceding centuries; and meanwhile the citizens hasten daily to department stores to admire, desire, and buy what their fellow-citizens are making and beautifying right now.

It is admitted that museums are built primarily to influence people to good ends—in fact, to educate. This they cannot well do unless the people visit them. A study of the cost of museums and of their upkeep and a glance at the total of their annual visitors suggest that they do, in proportion to the money spent on them, less of that which they are chiefly established to do than does any other educational factor which the city supports.

What can be done about it? Well, I repeat my suggestion that an effort be made to discover, not how we behave in a museum, but why we are so rarely in it.

JOHN COTTON DANA

Russian Women

Woman in Soviet Russia. By Jessica Smith. Vanguard Press. Fifty cents.

THIS is a study of one of the most chameleon-like organisms in modern society—the social family. In a short volume of 200 pages the author presents a moving picture of the Russian woman in industry, in education, in public life, on the farm, and in the family. To the individualist who projects his family ideology into the world about him this must indeed be a strange tale of social adjustments. For in Russia all activity focuses upon the group and its welfare. We in America have long been fed on a diet of articles, theories, explanations of the new morality, the changing status of woman, the new education. It is but a ballyhoo of frantic cries against a national background of laissez faire.

The trends in Russia which Miss Smith describes are equally at variance with their native background. There is, however, a consistent and sturdy growth of sincere governmental concern, a desire to socialize the individual and minimize the frictions which the old concepts create as they are supplanted by the new. The tremendous advancement which has been made in government regulation of women in industry, in politics, in education, and in sex relationships is noteworthy. It is an amazing tale of what has been accomplished in the rehabilitation of a social order. All the heartaches of doffing old customs and ideas and arraying a nation in new social garments built for the ideal figure are to be found in this book. The mujik and his wife squirm and twist in the new garb, but they do not cast it aside. It promises to fit them or they it.

Thus the laws affecting the two and a half million women workers are the most progressive and socially far-sighted to be found in any country in the world. In actuality there are variations, but the laws furnish a norm to which industry is adjusting itself. In most capitalistic countries laws are the crystallization of the customs and experiences of the country. In Russia they are a sort of advance guard to which the social group moves. Miss Smith graphically describes Russian women in different walks of life—their sudden awareness that the nation is with them even though their men-folk in the shop or on the farm may not be. Side by side with the new woman, to be sure, lives the Russian peasant woman with her bundle of fears and superstitions. Even she walks a little more firmly when she finds she may not be beaten by her husband every Saturday night. There is a community organization to protect her.

Miss Smith’s little book is replete with vital sociological material and keen observations. It fills the jaded American economist or sociologist with new hopes.

THERESA WOLFSON

A Pan-American Novel

La Sombra de la Casa Blanca (The Shadow of the White House). By Maximo Soto-Hall. Buenos Aires: El Ateneo.

THE Nicaraguan situation has inspired the only historical novel of international scope ever written in Latin America—a fact which makes “The Shadow of the White House” a literary landmark. Dealing with American-Nicaraguan relations, with special reference to the present tragedy, it is a volume of timeliness and interest. The attitude of the Latin-American toward the United States and its policy of armed intervention in Latin-American affairs is presented with force. Dr. Soto-Hall, born in Guatemala, has passed practically his entire life in Central America, and by his writing has achieved a reputation throughout the Spanish-speaking world.

The story tells how Alberto Urzua, a young gentleman prominent in Nicaraguan public life, comes to the United States when the political party under which he holds office is overthrown in a revolution. He and his two sisters settle in New York. Urzua works for an American firm doing business in Central America. He makes friends with an American judge and his daughter, marries an American girl, and learns to admire the good things this country possesses. Finally, however, he sees enough to convince him of the shadow cast across the highway of international justice by the deplorable partnership of the White House and Wall Street. This time the shadow happens to fall upon his country. Crushed in his heart by this and private misfortunes, he sails for Nicaragua to fight the marines. Someone dear to him follows him—neither his sisters nor his wife. It is Virginia Harrison, the judge’s daughter. She and Urzua had become faithful friends. Meanwhile the judge had died and Virginia, from Kentucky, goes to Nicaragua as a nurse in Urzua’s camp. She arrives in time to receive him in her arms when, struck by a shell dropped from an airplane, the hero ceases to be.

Most of the characters are not difficult to recognize, if only because they are types of men commanding high positions in American imperialism. Mr. Stallson, American banker, is depicted as the power behind a coup d’etat government in Nicaragua, recognized and supported by the United States through his influence. As presented by Dr. Soto-Hall, Mr. Stallson is known throughout Latin America with a different name in each country, but his character and perhaps even his appearance remain the same. The American Senator who writhes with indignation at his Government’s bungling policies in Nicaragua also is presented with exactitude.

Through personages who play in the book parts somewhat resembling the chorus in Greek tragedy, Dr. Soto-Hall undertakes digressions into other Pan-American problems with prophetic vision. Mr. Coolidge had just pronounced his decision on the Tacna-Arica question between Chile and Peru. Fernandez,

"There is an unusual pleasure in store for those who suppress a longing for detective stories and take up 'Power Control' for the 'serious reading' of the month instead of the latest, most depressing realistic novel. . . . Here is a sprightly, vivacious treatment of a serious subject. . . . The powers-that-be may well worry if the glum realists and dour statisticians retire from the stage, and if the jesters, the cartoonists, and the amusing acrobats take their place as critics of the world-that-is. 'Power Control' is full of facts and wisdom, and—praise be!—it is also full of wit and laughter."

—Donald Richberg in the Nation for June 6.

"The authors have said more in favor of greater public control over our public utilities and they have said it better—within the confines of a single popular book—than any one of whom this reviewer has knowledge. 'Power Control' is a model in the art of pamphleteering: temperate and well documented, yet charged with an emotional conviction that brings even the statistics to life. . . . It is hard to see how the picture could be drawn more simply or more vividly."

—Evans Clark in the New York Times.

"The Iron Age merges into the Electrical Age. Already the control of power is a more important matter to the wayfaring man than the control of steel. And it so happens that the . . . twenty largest companies account for 83 per cent—50 billions of kilowatt hours out of the 61 billions generated in the whole unconquerable Republic. . . . If a million people read it, the 50 billion high stepping kilowatt hours might come back home, and make the Age of Electricity a pleasure and a boon. . . . I hope a million do read it. It is a sound, competent piece of work. It measures the fang penetration of the precious 20 in our hides with admirable restraint, and it tells primo and secundo, how to unlock their jaws."

—Stuart Chase in the L. I. D. Bulletin.

"Mr. President, I desire to read from a book recently published, entitled 'Power Control.' . . . The Federal Trade Commission is following the leads given in this book in many of its investigations at the present time. I find the volume one of the most interesting that I have read in some years."

—Senator Carl Hayden on the floor of the U. S. Senate.

We shall be glad to send a copy of "Power Control" and The New Republic till after election, whose combined cost would normally be $4.15, for only

$ 2.00

The New Republic

421 West 21st Street, New York

For the inclosed $2.00 please send The New Republic till after election and a copy of "Power Control" to name .....

address .....

in full .....

N-7-11

friend of Urzua, remarks that the President of the United States has chosen to make both Chile and Peru believe they are right without making either nation's position right; and he indicates what is going to happen next:

The United States will submit an arrangement full of equity and justice. . . . Bolivia is anxious to have a harbor on the Pacific. . . . The North Americans are in a position to help her fulfil her aspirations. . . . They will provide Bolivia with the necessary capital that she may buy from Chile and Peru the disputed provinces. . . . But American capitalists are shrewd enough to render Bolivia unable to pay back. For what, then, are factories of revolutions? For what that new, unique industry? . . . Bolivia will not be able to pay. . . . The great republic will come to own the rescued provinces.

During the dispute between Chile and Peru the Secretary of State of the United States did offer a proposal almost exactly like this one.

"The Shadow of the White House" is not a book written for the historian. It is a novel primarily addressed to the man in the street. But it presents with force and romance the present Nicaraguan conflict and the attitude of the Latin-American toward the United States Government's policies.

RODOLFO MAYORGA-RIVAS

Books in Brief

Reverse English: Some Off-side Observations Upon Our British Cousins. By J. Frederick Essary. W. E. Rudge, Inc. $3.

The essays in this book originally appeared in the Baltimore Sun while their author was serving as London correspondent. In that setting they formed a readable comment on passing events in England, but they are rather too slight to withstand the rigors of transplantation. Mr. Essary's reactions to the British were very like those of less-trained American observers. He admired the politeness of the London police, was impressed by the royal family (though with a good American twinkle in his eye), marveled at the crooked nonchalance of the London streets, and suffered from the native cooking. All in all he enjoyed his stay immensely and returned home firmly convinced that "there is nothing so vital to mankind, so vital to its peace, its security, and its progress as an enduring friendship between these two mighty English-speaking nations." That is a worthy, if somewhat trite, sentiment. But one could wish that Mr. Essary had found a better example of the kinship of Britain and America than their readiness to cooperate in maintaining Western supremacy in China.

New Towns for Old. By John Nolen. With an Introduction by Albert Shaw. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $3.

The Legal Aspects of Zoning. By Newman F. Baker. University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

These two books complement each other admirably, Mr. Nolen's being a completely illustrated account of the most outstanding examples of modern American city planning and Mr. Baker's a scholarly discussion of the law with regard to zoning which is the foundation of much of the American effort in this direction. Without doubt Mr. Nolen's book will have the wider popular appeal and its fascinating photographs of what has already been accomplished should prove stimulating. Particularly valuable is its carefully documented story of Kingsport, Tennessee; Walpole, Massachusetts, and Mariemont, Ohio. Mr. Baker's book, while it lacks these illustrations, is even more important for the student of city planning, and in its own careful, legal manner is exciting as well, for in it can be traced the history of the significant development of the idea that personal property is subsidiary to the common good. The notes of cases appended to each chapter should prove of great value to the real-estate lawyer, the city planner, and the architect.

He was called "A Filthy Little Atheist"

NOTHING could be further from the truth. He was so earnest a believer that he founded a new church in atheistical France, and wrote one of his greatest books to save that nation from losing its faith in God!

He was so deeply religious that his ideas have brought about one reform after another in Christianity as we know it! And they are still at work like a leaven that will eventually influence the whole lump.

Incidentally, he was neither "little" nor "filthy." He stood several inches taller than the man who called him "a filthy little atheist," and his contemporaries testified to the extreme neatness of his person and the simple elegance of his attire.

For Thomas Paine our present-day Thomas Edison has had a life-long admiration. Lincoln worshipped him. Jefferson, Monroe, Madison, Hamilton and Washington were all devoted to him. He was the master-mind of the American Revolution, and later of the French Revolution and a long-drawn-out upheaval in England.

Do You Know the Truth about Thomas Paine?

Why have you never been told about Paine? Because he has enemies still! Every bigot, every bureaucrat is his enemy! They live in terror lest people, reading Paine, become enlightened about their exploitation of ignorance and superstition.

You have been kept "in the dark" about Paine, but now you can read the true story of his amazing life, brilliantly written by Elbert Hubbard.

Send 10 Cents

for your copy of this handsome little brochure immediately, before the edition is exhausted. Enclose this coupon.

THOMAS PAINE NATIONAL HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION,
Dept. 857, 50 West 47th Street, New York City.

Please send me the story of Thomas Paine by Elbert Hubbard. I am enclosing 10c for this fascinating little Roycroft Book.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Reign of Terror, 1793-1794, The Experiment of the Democratic Republic, and the Rise of the Bourgeoisie. By W. B. Kerr. The University of Toronto Press. $4.

Here is something to get excited over—a work in English about the climax of the French Revolution that insults neither that much misunderstood movement nor yet the intelligence of the reader. Dr. Kerr's study has its full share of scholarly qualities, but it possesses in addition a freshness and a tart, ironic flavor. Every page bears witness to the researches of Professor Mathiez of the Sorbonne, whose work has thrown so much fresh light upon the economic conditions of revolutionary Paris as well as upon the aims and tactics of the leaders. The dependence is hardly servile; but basically the two scholars stand together in their sympathetic treatment of the great experiment and in their recognition of the loftiness of Robespierre's ideals, against the smug half-truths with which the orthodox historians have piously travestied the sense of the revolutionary movement.

The Inquiring Mind. By Zechariah Chafee, Jr. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Shortly after the war Professor Chafee published his "Freedom of Speech"—a temperate and scholarly exposition of the subject especially for those trying times. He thus aligned himself with sanity and liberalism, and in the following years was frequently called upon by liberal editors for occasional articles treating the various crises in the struggle for civil liberty. It is these resultant examples of scholarly journalism which he now offers in the main—the philosophical discoveries promised by the title are only a small part of the book. On the whole, it is to be doubted if the miscellaneous articles deserved the permanence of book publication. Some of them represent issues that are no longer urgent or alive; and all are easily available in the files of current magazines. In other words, the present collection is not to be regarded so much as a book as a series of Appendices to "Freedom of Speech."

New England's Outpost. Acadia Before the Conquest of Canada. By John Bartlett Brebner. Columbia University Press. $4.50.

Longfellow's rather over-sweet poem "Evangeline" gave the sorrows of the Acadians, expelled from Nova Scotia in 1755, a place among the classic brutalities of war. Mr. Brebner links with New England, rather than with the government of Great Britain, the origins of this episode and, with a careful use of only original authorities and an entire freedom from the passions with which the literature of the subject is tainted, shows how the last dramatic climax came about. He refrains from the details of the expulsion. His is a study of causes; his well-written book removes the episode from the realm of poetry and passion to that of calm and not too prosaic history. The descendants of New England loyalists in Canada may find perhaps grim humor in reflecting that it was their own fathers who made the beginnings of the game of driving the vanquished from their homes.

The Migration of British Capital to 1876. By Leland H. Jenks. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

Here is a book of immense industry and fine skill. It traces in detail the making of the invisible empire of finance which Britain established in the half-century that followed the Napoleonic War, a really astounding achievement of profitable adventure. To track out the finesse of the changing money market in these intricate adventures required no ordinary research, and the notes at the end of Professor Jenks's book show a mastery not only of the ordinary sources but of masses of banking and journalistic records which nobody has tapped before. Few students in history were even aware of the great collapse of British export of capital following 1876. The story of the financing of Egypt and the capture of the Suez Canal was falsified by all our general historians until Professor Jenks

IVY LEE, publicist, student of public opinion, and adviser to great business interests, has made the kind of trip to Russia that you would like to make and presents the facts about Russia you would like to know in this new book

PRESENT-DAY RUSSIA

by Ivy Lee

What is really happening in Russia? How is the country being run and how do the people live? What is the new system of marriage and divorce? Are the children being educated—or fed? Can trade or any kind of relations with the Soviet state be developed?

Such are the questions Mr. Lee has set up and answered from a frankly capitalistic viewpoint. His conclusions are of value to every American citizen.

"Now I have got something that is really useful. It explains things; it gives me what I have long wanted—an objective account of how things are done."—J. Ramsay Macdonald, former Prime Minister of Great Britain.

"The author writes entertainingly. The amount of information that was secured in so brief a visit is astonishing."—Boston Transcript.

Order from your book dealer, $2.50

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
NEW YORK

worried out the truth. Though such highly specialized work is not for every man's reading, it should find a lasting place in every good library.

Political Philosophy from Plato to Jeremy Bentham. By Dr. Geza Engelmann. Translated by Karl Frederick Geiser. With an Introduction by Oscar Jaszi. Harper and Brothers. $4.

This book contains terse and direct summaries of most of the classics in political philosophy, from Plato's "Republic" to Bentham's "Constitutional Code." Each summary is preceded by an introduction containing historical and biographical material. Better than other texts in this field does the present one succeed in offering the subject in the form of a symposium on the basic problems of politics. It is, however, difficult to concede the claim of Professors Geiser and Jaszi that as a textbook the present work is immensely superior to the available outlines of the history of political ideas. A mere change in the method of presentation is, after all, not of crucial significance.

The Conception of Buddhist Nirvana. By Th. Stcherbatsky. Leningrad: The Academy of Sciences of the USSR.

This bit of close reasoning is meant only for those who are already familiar with the subtleties of Buddhist philosophy and the problems it furnishes modern scholarship. Professor Stcherbatsky, one of the most profound students of Buddhism, makes an attack upon the theory of M. de la Vallée Poussin, another profound student of Buddhism, that "at the beginning Nirvana meant a simple faith in the soul's immortality, its blissful survival in a paradise, a faith emerging from practices of obscure magic." Countering this theory and also, more casually, opinions of A. B. Keith and other distinguished scholars, Professor Stcherbatsky believes that "Buddha . . . proposed, or accepted, a system denying the existence of an eternal soul, and reducing phenomenal existence to a congeries of separate elements evolving gradually toward final extinction." The book is an important, and hence highly technical, study of a major question.

The Forerunners of Saint Francis and Other Studies. By Ellen Scott Davison. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

In this posthumous publication Miss Davison's story of the visionaries who preached and practiced evangelical poverty within and without the medieval church carries the weight of scholarly conclusions, derived from the author's careful survey of the more important printed sources. Yet the book is far more intensive and impressive than any mere array of facts, for, as Professor Shotwell says in his foreword, it is "touched with the historic imagination and informed with sympathetic understanding." A large perspective reveals the causes of the seeming success of the reformers who won churchly sanction, like the Cistercians and Carthusians, and the reasons for the apparent failure of other enthusiasts no more or less sincere, like the Albigensians, who forced from reluctant prelates the punishment of curse and crusade. And a deep sense of the futility of sundry spiritual ideals and aspirations, temporarily triumphant, pervades the forecast of the ultimate wreckage of the hopes of austere founders of monastic orders, Bernard, Norbert, the Stephens, through a deadlier ban than papal anathema, worldly prosperity. Even the incomplete sketches near the end of the book are based upon a wealth of documents duly recorded in the spacious bibliography. Notes and index conclude this consecrated labor of love and friendship.

Thomas Gray: Elegy Wrote in a Country Church Yard. 1751. Samuel Johnson: The Vanity of Human Wishes. 1749. William Collins: Ode Occasion'd by the Death of Mr. Thomson. 1749. Matthew Prior: Occasional Verses. 1702-1719. Oxford University Press. Respectively $1.25, $2, $1.75, $2.25.

Further type-facsimiles in an interesting series.

New York's First Labor Bank

We share profits with our depositors.
Therefore 4<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub>%
Pay
to our Thrift Accounts

All deposits made until July 31st
will bear interest from July 1st

THE AMALGAMATED BANK
OF NEW YORK
11-15 UNION SQUARE

□ T H E A T E R S □

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

"PORGY" || REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

|| JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 5:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

|| GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

THE ACTOR MANAGERS present

GRAND STREET FOLLIES
OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th St., West of Broadway.
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Sat. & Tues.

International Relations Section

A Jewish State in the Soviet Union

By LEON TALMY

OUT in the remote regions of the Russian Far East, in an unpopulated district between the Amur River and the Small Khingan (Bureya) Mountains, some six hundred Jewish pioneers from various parts of the Soviet Union have lately been engaged in clearing tracts of land, plowing virgin soil, laying roads, building barracks and houses, and preparing the country to receive the first few thousand settlers who will follow in the spring of 1929.

Though, at first glance, there seems to be nothing extraordinary in this fact, it is an event which carries with it an historic significance equal to that of the steps of the first pioneers in many a now busy and thriving land. It marks a momentous turning-point in the life of the Jewish population of the Soviet Union and, incidentally, in the story of the particular district which is destined to be linked with the formation of a Jewish state in the system of Soviet republics.

As a matter of fact, this district has not had much of a story. Prior to January, 1928, its very name—Bira-Bidjan—was virtually unknown outside the immediate vicinity. And even there the name has never been used to convey a definite geographical or ethnographical conception. It came into use only recently to denote a part of the Amur country covering an area of some thirty thousand square kilometers traversed by the rivers Bira and Bidjan and bounded on its west, south, and east by the Amur River and on its north by a line running parallel to and north of the railway line connecting the city of Khabarovsk with the Transbaikalian region and Chita. These boundaries have been in force since March 28, 1928, when, by a decision adopted by the Praesidium of the All-Union Central Executive Committee of the Soviets, the district was set apart for Jewish colonization under the supervision of the Comzet, the Government Committee for Jewish Land Settlement, with the view to creating a Jewish national administrative unit.

Within these boundaries lives at present a population of about 27,000, dwelling mainly along the left bank of the Amur across the river from Manchuria and along the railway line which was completed after the war. The interior of the country, a valley covered with luxurious grass, wild roots, bushes, and occasional clusters of trees, as well as the mountainous regions in the western part of the district, has remained practically uninhabited. According to the report brought in by the special scientific expedition of the Comzet, headed by Professor B. L. Brook and under the general supervision and direction of Professor Williams, which had explored the country in the summer of 1927, the prairie lands of the district offer good possibilities for the development of various branches of agriculture, including the cultivation of rice and oil beans. The forest lands extending to the north will permit the development of forestry and the timber industry. The mountainous regions have as yet been little explored, but the data at hand warrant the conclusion that they contain mineral deposits which will eventually furnish the basis for industrial development. The land suitable for crop cultivation will sustain a farming population of 35,000 families and an additional 15,000 families engaged in various auxiliary industries and occupations; altogether, a population of about 250,000 under conditions of purely agricultural colonization. With the further development of the natural resources the country could absorb a population of 1,000,000 or more.

It was on the basis of the findings of the scientific expedition that the Comzet decided in January, 1928, to propose to the highest Soviet authorities that the district of Bira-Bidjan be set aside for the express purpose of Jewish colonization. The expedition itself was one of a number which had been sponsored by the Comzet in connection with its work of settling Jews on the land. These expeditions conducted explorations in several parts of the Soviet Union in quest of a large tract of land suitable for Jewish mass colonization after it became apparent that the free land available for such purposes in the Ukraine, Crimea, and White Russia would soon be exhausted, while the necessity for Jewish land settlement would continue.

The conditions which created this necessity date back to the economic situation of the Jews during the Czarist regime. In the old empire the Jewish population was confined to the so-called "Pale," a number of provinces in which Jews were permitted to live. Within this Pale there was another "Pale" of economic restrictions: Jews had no access to the large industries and, outside of a few old Jewish agricultural colonies in the Southern Ukraine, they were not permitted to live in villages and engage in agriculture. Thus the mass of the Jewish population of old Russia was confined to such economic pursuits as petty trade and small artisanship. Quite apart from political persecution, the economic circumstances of the Jews were so precarious that tens of thousands were forced to emigrate every year in search of friendlier shores and better economic opportunities. Most of these emigrants settled in the United States and Canada. Some went to Argentina, Brazil, South Africa, Australia. With the beginning of the World War this steady stream of Jewish emigration from Russia was stopped abruptly, leaving no outlet for the surplus population. After the war the quota and other restrictions introduced in the United States and in other countries permitted only a trickle of this stream to filter through, while at the same time conditions at home became much worse owing to the physical destruction wrought by the World War and the civil war following the Revolution.

In the Soviet Union the situation was further aggravated by the introduction of a new economic system to take the place of the old pattern into which the Jews had somehow managed to fit. The new system obviated the necessity for most of the economic functions which of old had been a sort of a "birthright" of the Jewish population. Although private trade has not been completely abolished, the economic basis of its existence is surely disappearing as trade becomes concentrated in the cooperatives and state organizations. So also the basis for petty artisanship is slowly but surely giving way with the rapid development of machine industries.

The Soviet Government has been adopting measures to alleviate the situation and to create such conditions for the Jewish population as will give them the opportunity to find their place in the new economic scheme of things.

Attention both inside and outside of the Soviet Union has been chiefly centered on the work of Jewish land settlement. This is undoubtedly due to the political significance attached to Jewish colonization in the Soviet Union by both foes and friends of the work; partly, also, to the fact that for the greater success of this phase of Jewish reconstruction work it was necessary to resort to assistance from outside sources, chief among which was the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee which operates in the Soviet Union through the Agrojoint. The work was put on an organized basis in 1924, when by a decree of the Soviet Government, the Comzet, a government committee for Jewish land settlement, was formed. As a result of the efforts of such organizations, with the material assistance of the Soviet Government, a population of upward of 80,000 Jews has been settled on 302,000 dessiatins of land in Southern Ukraine, Northern Crimea, and White Russia during the four years, 1924-1927. The total Jewish agricultural population in the Soviet Union has reached 175,000 as against some 53,000 in 1913, and Jewish landholdings have increased from 75,000 dessiatins in 1920 to 452,000 dessiatins in 1927.

However, the success attained so far in improving the economic conditions of the Jewish masses in the Soviet Union has not been sufficient to offset the burden of their economic heritage. A large number, roughly estimated at from 600,000 to 800,000 out of a Jewish population of about 2,800,000, are still without any apparent means of existence. Although Jews in increasing numbers are finding employment in the Soviet industries, this channel is hardly sufficient to absorb the natural increase of population. The only possibility which offers speedier relief for the mass of the "declassed" Jews in the Soviet Union is colonization and land settlement.

The political significance of Jewish colonization in the Soviet Union arises from the possibility of the ultimate formation of a Jewish autonomous republic. It has been conceded by all concerned that the success of the work and the interests of the settlers require that the colonization be conducted on a large scale and concentrated on continuous stretches of land. Such conditions would naturally bring about the creation of a Jewish majority in a definite area. Under the Soviet system and in accordance with the national policy of the Soviet Government such a majority would enjoy autonomous rights.

It is this result which may be looked forward to as an outcome of the Jewish colonization of Bira-Bidjan. The exploration of this district and of a number of others was undertaken by the Comzet to forestall the problems which would arise with the exhaustion of the free lands available for Jewish colonization in the European parts of the Union. The district having been found suitable for colonization on a large scale, it was decided by the Government to reserve it under the jurisdiction of the Comzet for the purpose expressed. The decision was hailed with enthusiasm at hundreds of mass-meetings and conferences in most of the Jewish cities and towns, and more than 3,000 families have expressed their readiness to proceed to the colony.

The difficulties with which the first settlers will have to contend will be many. But with modern American technical methods and facilities the task can be made much easier, and it is the aim of the Ozet, the public organization conducting the work in Bira-Bidjan, to introduce such methods, as far as possible, in the very first stages of colonization. In this the Ozet is being assisted by an American Jewish organization, the Icor, with a membership of about 10,000, which has been active since 1925 in the United States and Canada raising funds for the work of Jewish colonization in Soviet Russia. The Icor has arranged with the Ozet to cooperate in the colonization of Bira-Bidjan by introducing American machinery and such American technical experience as it can enlist in order to facilitate the development of a Jewish autonomous settlement on the banks of the far Amur.

Contributors to This Issue

LUDWELL DENNY, who long covered the State Department for the United Press, is now a special editorial writer for the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

UPTON SINCLAIR is the author of "Oil," "Boston," "The Brass Check," etc.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is the dramatic critic of The Nation.

MARY AUSTIN is the author of "The American Rhythm," and other volumes.

LORD OLIVIER was Secretary of State for India in the Ramsay MacDonald Cabinet.

JOHN COTTON DANA is the head of the Newark Museum Association.

THERESA WOLFSON is the author of "The Woman Worker and the Trade Unions."

RODOLFO MAYORGA-RIVAS is a Spanish critic.

LEON TALMY is a Russian living in America.

DOWN THE VOLGA

A Leisurely Voyage
Along the fringe
of Asia.

Special Tour sailing July 28.

$390 up.

16 Russian Itineraries . . . . . Weekly sailings

WRITE, PHONE OR CALL FOR LITERATURE

AMERICAN-EUROPEAN TRAVEL BUREAU

Representative of the Official Russian Travel Bureau.

100 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

CHElsea { 5124
4477

10 Days in MOSCOW and LENINGRAD

Extensions arranged for to visit any part of U.S.S.R.

Free Vis

$450
UP

AUGUST 4th
S.S. ROTTERDAM
AUGUST 10th S.S. PARIS

Going: via London,
Copenhagen, Helsingfors

Return: Warsaw, Berlin, Paris

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

Agents for Official Soviet Travel Bureau

69 Fifth Ave. N. Y. Tel Algonquin 6900

Across Europe to RUSSIA

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 18, 1928

No. 3289

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	53
EDITORIALS:
Middle-Class Women .....	55
Fanny Garrison Villard .....	56
Behind the Power Lobby .....	57
Robert Mantell .....	57
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN. By Heywood Broun.....	58
ARCTIC TRAGEDIES. By John McClusky.....	59
COVERING WASHINGTON. By The Unofficial Spokesman.....	60
HAY AND CORN. By McAlister Coleman.....	61
IN MEMORY OF FANNY GARRISON VILLARD. By William Lloyd Garrison .....	62
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	63
CORRESPONDENCE .....	63
BOOKS:
In Papagueria. By Mary Austin.....	65
America Fights Britain. By Lewis S. Gannett.....	65
Miss Glaspell's New Novel. By Alice Beal Parsons.....	66
A Pretty Mess. By B. H. Haggin.....	66
American Poetry in French. By Joseph T. Shipley.....	68
Books in Brief .....	68
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Opium Leaks Through. By Ellen N. La Motte.....	70

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROUN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

AL SMITH IS TAKING THE LEAD in the campaign. While Mr. Hoover has been conferring with Boss Vare of Philadelphia, smoothing over the differences between his various campaign directors, and making up his mind whether prohibition is or is not an issue in the campaign, Governor Smith has been explaining how he learned to swim in a turtle scow at the foot of Beekman Street, and returning a wounded fawn to a crippled boy in the Adirondacks. A literal-minded game inspector had taken the fawn from its captor and nurse and presented it to the Governor, who announces on the front page of a thousand newspapers that he will send the fawn back "so quick you won't be able to see him for the dust—and I'll give him another deer and a dog to boot if he wants it." That, we submit, is the kind of politics that swings elections. More than any serious discussion of farm relief or world peace it wins votes. Nor do we grudge the Governor such campaigning. It is as natural to him as trout-fishing is unnatural to Calvin Coolidge. He does it without thinking, and it is in large part because he really is a warm-hearted human being that the newspapermen like him as few public personalities are liked, and that he rolls up such amazing votes whenever he runs for office.

IT IS AMUSING to watch the politicians bouncing back into the party folds. There is Jim Watson, who two days before Hoover's nomination was denouncing the Secretary of Commerce as an impossible foreigner; he has seen a new light—or observed a great change in his party's candidate. There is Brookhart of Iowa; he has contrived to weld his allegiance to the farmers with party regularity. There is Fred Zimmerman, Governor of Wisconsin, who used La Follette's erstwhile indorsement to inveigle voters into his camp at the last election; he is now as regular as they make them. Lowden's lieutenant, Lou Emmerson, too, has come into camp, though the former Governor of Illinois thus far sulks silent in his tent. And on the other side of the party fence Dan Moody of Texas, the great Dry champion, is asking votes for Al; so are Josephus Daniels and Carter Glass; even Tom Heflin, though he is still sniping at Catholics, has dropped the name of Smith from his speeches. These men are politicians before all else; the essence of politics is to get jobs for your supporters, and the essential for jobs is party regularity. We like better the stand of George Norris of Nebraska. He condemns both party platforms for their surrender to the utilities lobbies; he does not mention the candidates who are still mum on all issues but prohibition; but he names men in the Senate, some Democrats, some Republicans, who have kept the Progressive faith, and says he will fight for their reelection regardless of party tags and labels.

THE SHAKHTA TRIAL IN MOSCOW has ended. Fifty-three engineers charged with conspiracy and sabotage in the Donetz coal mines have received their sentence: the three accused Germans were freed, eleven Russians were sentenced to death—six with recommendations of mercy, and most of the other defendants were given prison sentences of varying lengths. Rabinovich, brilliant and powerful head of the mining industry, received a sentence of six years; Kuzma, a young engineer responsible for many technical innovations, received three years. The trial was a drama of desperate intensity, marked here and there by scenes of terror and hysteria. There seems to be no doubt that the conspiracy charged by the Government existed or that many of the accused were guilty. None the less, the trial as it unwound its theatrical length resolved itself into a test of the Government's strength. If Krylenko, the prosecutor, had failed to obtain a conviction, it would have reflected seriously on the capacity of the Soviet authorities to control the great industries under their jurisdiction and to wipe out—if they could not keep out—corruption and conspiracy. In this setting the accused engineers fought for their lives. That so many were let off with moderate sentences is to the credit of the judge and the public defender. If some were unjustly convicted, it is not to be wondered at. No German accused of espionage in America in wartime ever faced a more hostile public or a more bitter prosecution.

THE FACTS OF THE CASE were recited adequately in dispatches sent out of Russia by the press associations. But for a vivid narrative of the high points of the trial the interested reader should go to the stories cabled to the New York Times by Walter Duranty. Caught up by the human struggle involved, Mr. Duranty wrote a brilliant drama of moving eloquence. Reading his dispatches consecutively, one gets not only a sense of the emotional heat of the trial, but a sharply drawn picture of Soviet justice in action. Courtroom procedure, the conduct of the Russian press, the manners and temper of the crowd, the psychology of judge and prosecutor and defendant—all emerge from a tale which is told at such length that one shudders in contemplation of the cable tolls. The Times deserves to share credit with Mr. Duranty for an impressive journalistic achievement.

WHEN OPPONENTS OF IMPERIALISM attempted to denounce the war in Nicaragua before a jeering noon-time crowd in Wall Street, sixteen of them were roughly dragged down from their perch on a sedan-top and put under arrest. A few minutes later the old fundamentalist street preacher, H. J. D. Hall, mounted his soap-box on the same spot and held forth unmolested. It may be that the Reverend Mr. Hall has a permit to thunder against evolution and other iniquities of the present day, while the anti-imperialists staged their raid on Wall Street without sanction of the police. But their arrest for "disorderly conduct" was a sham none the less. The speakers were arrested because they were "red," because they denounced American policies, because they took the name of Wall Street in vain. The three principal speakers were sentenced to an alternative of five days in jail or a $25 fine; several lesser participants received lighter sentences. Whatever may be the technicalities in the case, this is clear: free speech will be a joke in America until it is extended to take in those who oppose the policies of the government as well as those who denounce modern science.

TO THE STRAINS OF "ALL MY TROUBLES ARE OVER" and "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" eight hundred Negro convicts marched out of the Aldrich and Flat Top coal mines in Alabama—marking the end of the convict-lease system under which Alabama had leased the services of prisoners to the private owners of the mines. It is to the great credit of Southern public opinion and of Governor Bibb Graves that Alabama has ended this survival of barbarism. The twenty years of its use have been marked by cases of horrible cruelty; one prisoner was beaten and then boiled alive, allegedly by the warden. When this was revealed in 1926—after it had been hidden two years by a false death certificate of suicide—it stirred the Alabamans to action, and the system has now been completely abolished. Along with the campaign against floggings in Alabama and the reduced number of lynchings this strikes the new note of progress in the South.

WHEN JAMES M. COX bought the Springfield (Ohio) Press-Republican in 1905 there were four daily newspapers in that city. Last month Mr. Cox bought the Springfield Sun which had, meanwhile, gobbled up the other two dailies, the Gazette and the Democrat. Thus are four independent dailies reduced to two papers under the control of one man in one city—in accordance with the steady march of journalism from a profession for the expression of opinion to the level of the chain-store business. Further interesting figures about the vanishing Ohio dailies are revealed in Ayer's Newspaper Annual, which shows that there were 175 daily newspapers in the State in 1905; since then thirty-two have disappeared, leaving 143 in the field today to serve a larger population. Oh—if the name of Mr.

Cox has a slightly familiar ring it may be because he was a Presidential candidate not so many years ago.

BIGGER AND BIGGER grow the transatlantic liners. When, twenty years ago, the Mauretania and the Lusitania were built, their 30,000 tons gross seemed prodigious and their speed a marvel. The fact that the Mauretania is still the fastest ship afloat is due less to the difficulty of surpassing her speed than to the apparent lack of a demand sufficiently large to pay the higher fares necessary for faster ocean traveling. For steamships are not built to make records unless thereby they can also make money. On the other hand, steamships of increased size seem to mean increased earnings, for in the last twenty years new vessels have been getting larger and larger, until in the Leviathan and the Majestic the tonnage of the Mauretania was almost doubled. Just as large units are the most profitable for houses and offices ashore, so big vessels offer the most profitable means for supplying the public with the luxurious and complicated appointments at sea for which there seems to be an ever-increasing demand. The Leviathan was completed in 1914 and the Majestic went into service seven years later, so that it is not strange that a larger vessel than either has now been begun.

CONSIDERABLE MYSTERY surrounds the building of this vessel, the White Star Line's new Oceanic. Dispatches from the other side say that the ship, the keel of which has just been laid in the yards of Harland and Wolff at Belfast, will be 1,000 feet in length and about 60,000 tons gross. Thus the Oceanic will be nearly 100 feet longer than the Majestic (915 feet) or the Leviathan (907 feet). The two new liners of the North German Lloyd, which are expected to go into service next year, are said to be about 1,000 feet long also, but they will not exceed 46,000 tons gross. It is said that the type of engines for the Oceanic has not yet been decided upon, but it seems more probable that the information is withheld temporarily so that it may not be known by competitors. For the public at large, one of the chief advantages of the new Oceanic will be that it will put a quietus on the quarrel as to which is the larger the Leviathan or the Majestic. The former was originally about 54,000 tons gross while the Majestic is some 2,500 tons in excess of that. But under American ownership the deck houses of the Leviathan were enlarged so as to give it a tonnage of over 59,000 gross. To many, especially in England, this seemed too tricky to be worthy of acceptance though "Lloyd's Register of Shipping" has recognized the Leviathan's new rating.

TENNIS MUST BE THE INTERNATIONAL SPORT par excellence. Baseball is our own, and cricket is England's; football takes on local color wherever it is played. Golf is at least Anglo-American, but it is not yet a citizen of the world; Briand's fall as Prime Minister in 1922 was laid to the fact that he had so far departed from the Gallie tradition as to play golf with Lloyd George. But tennis. In the men's quarter-finals at Wimbledon five Frenchmen fought each other, two Americans, and one Italian. In the same round two American girls fought against two English women, an Australian, a German, a Spaniard, and a French girl with the Greek name of Nicolopoulo. Argentines and Dutch also played well into the match. And the American Davis Cup team which will soon take up the almost hopeless struggle against the brilliant young Frenchmen met Mexican, Chinese, and Japanese teams in the earlier rounds. Even the Olympic track meets, where the dogged Finns always surprise a world that has forgotten Finland, can hardly match that for cosmopolitanism.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR., has added to his previous notable benefactions a gift of $5,000,000, for the restoration to its pristine Revolutionary glory of the town of Williamsburg, Virginia. This is an altogether admirable undertaking. The town is a most charming historic relic, now marred in spots by cheap garages and candy shops, but with many beautiful specimens of eighteenth-century architecture, including the Bruton Parish Church—the oldest church in America. No fewer than forty buildings still standing were there when the Declaration of Independence was signed. To them are now to be added reproductions of the old governor's palace, the first American theater, and the House of Burgesses in which Patrick Henry in 1765 made his great speech demanding liberty or death. All of the reconstruction is to be under the direction of the Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, whose organization, Colonial Williamsburg, Inc., thanks to Mr. Rockefeller, now holds legal title to every public building, every public square, and practically every business building and private home on the three chief streets of the town. Dr. Goodwin has been fortunate enough to find a map drawn by a French officer on General Lafayette's staff, showing the location of every house and street at the time that he was quartered there. At the head of the wide Duke of Gloucester Street, which is Williamsburg, stands William and Mary College, whose first building, designed by Christopher Wren himself, is being restored. It, together with other old buildings now lost, was occupied by British, American, and French troops during the Revolution and by Confederates and Federals during the Civil War. The old town itself, established in 1632, was the capital of Virginia until 1779. When Dr. Goodwin and Mr. Rockefeller have completed their work, we shall have a town to which Americans by the hundred thousand will go as on a holy pilgrimage. It will be an historical and architectural treat without parallel in America.

SAMUEL ELIOT MORISON, who is writing the official history of Harvard for the approaching three hundredth anniversary of its founding, has unearthed a memorandum by the late President Eliot, notes for a lecture on what equipment a student should acquire in college for success in after-life. We reprint it from the Harvard Crimson:

1. An available body. Not necessarily the muscles of an athlete. Good circulation, digestion, power to sleep, and alert, steady nerves.

2. Power of sustained mental labor.

3. The habit of independent thinking on books, prevailing customs, current events. University training the opposite of military or industrial.

4. The habit of quiet, unobtrusive, self-regulated conduct, not accepted from others or influenced by the vulgar breath.

5. Reticent, reserved, not many acquaintances, but a few intimate friends. Belonging to no societies perhaps. Carrying in his face the character so plainly to be seen there by the most casual observer, that nobody ever makes to him a dishonorable proposal.

What more could be said? And in how few words is put this guide to what Mr. Eliot himself called the "durable satisfactions" of life! We invite especial attention in this day of herd psychology to his demand for independent thinking and independent living. To those misguided college presidents and professors who believe in military training in colleges and universities we commend this opinion of one of the greatest American educators that university training is the exact opposite of military education. One teaches men to think for themselves; the other to subordinate their religion, morals, conscience, and will to the blind obedience they owe to whoever happens to be their commanding officer.

Middle-Class Women

THE clubwomen of Pennsylvania have subjected themselves to a sort of polite psychoanalysis in the form of a questionnaire devised and distributed at the last State convention by Fannie Sax Long, Chairman of Education, in order to "gauge roughly the background, interests, and desires" of the members. One hundred and ninety-nine filled out the blanks, which were not signed. Of these, 186 have been married; 13 are widows, but there is no blank for recording divorces—an unfortunate omission. Among the 186 there are 374 children. Only 163 women described their own education: 61 attended college, 51 went to normal school, 25 to a business college, and 26 to a finishing school. The impressive fact in this record is that only 38 graduated from anything!

In spite of this rather alarming lack of education, 97 women have taught school and 71 done other salaried work; 27 have continued some "regular" work since their marriage, although only 14 of these have received a salary. One hundred and ninety-five women keep house and 152 own their homes. Although 160 own cars (60 drive them) only 90 have a servant and just one has as many as three. One hundred and seven belong to "study groups" of almost as many varieties; 105 follow hobbies, while 133 have gardens—the greatest single interest recorded. Seventy-eight women belong to political organizations and 60 to bridge clubs. Only 13 smoke; 129 describe themselves as teetotalers. Of the 158 women who play cards, only 6 play for stakes other than prizes. Although 112 women go to the movies, 146 approve of the Pennsylvania censorship of films. Twenty-seven women hold public office, of whom 13 were elected and the rest appointed; there is no record of the positions which they hold. Fifty-nine believe they could "explain communism clearly."

As to books, in answer to specific questions, 34 say they have read "Leaves of Grass"; 57, "Sorrell and Son"; 30, "Revelry"; and 19, "Oil." Regarding the latter several women express complete distaste. One hundred and sixty-nine women "enjoy new ideas," and 175 "enjoy new methods." Alas, in spite of this, 97 subscribe to the Saturday Evening Post, 114 to Good Housekeeping, while 6 subscribe to The Nation. (Four of the 6 Nation readers are numbered among the 40 women under 40 years of age.) Such are the figures. Let those who will, analyze them. We refuse to; yet, as we glance through them, a recognizable picture seems to emerge from this questionnaire. Whether we approve of her or not, we see before us the Typical Middle-Class American Woman.

Fanny Garrison Villard

BORN into the inspired and happy household of the Liberator, Fanny Garrison had her being in reforms from the beginning to the end of her long and rarely beautiful life. Often enough devotion to a cause creates only dour, intolerant personalities, bent on imposing their will, their mode of living, upon all with whom they come into contact. The home of William Lloyd Garrison was blessed with the saving grace of humor. Within its walls laughter ruled. Therein was unselfish devotion to one another as well as to the cause to which the father gave his life—gave also that astounding Biblical vocabulary of denunciation which his latest biographer declares to have been excelled by no one in history. Therein ruled serenity and unbounded faith, a never-shaken belief in the possibility of erecting standards of personal conduct to make over the world. There fear never entered, though at any hour the mob might have its way. When complete and surpassing triumph came, it turned no head. It was merely the fruition that all knew and felt must arrive; the only blot was that it came in part by means of the accursed sword.

So Fanny Garrison went out from that home imbued with the spirit of happiness, fortified by absolute confidence in the triumph of every principle to which she gave her devotion, and steeped in the belief that it is the duty of all who have time or means or power to give of themselves for the betterment of mankind. She never thought of compromise; to consider shifting her ground or moderating her language for expediency's sake was as impossible for her as for her father, the strongest lines of whose countenance reappeared, with the years, in hers. This was surely moral and mental equipment enough to enable any man or woman to lead a useful and highly beneficent life. But the fairies which stood about Fanny Garrison's cradle touched her with far more generous wands. They gave her rare personal beauty, grace, and charm, overflowing kindness and sympathy. They ordained that her life should be endowed and perpetually enriched by romance. They made the desire to help radiate from her soul. Were one to set down all the natural talents bestowed upon her, her moving voice, her musical gift, and the rest, those who never knew her would consider the catalogue impossible. A host of friends can prove it true.

Fate was not content to have bestowed upon her the boon of being as a child a part of the great struggle for emancipation and to witness the drama and tragedy of the Civil War. That would have been color and action enough for any one person's years. But to it came for Fanny Garrison the incredible romance that linked her life with that of an impecunious and daring war correspondent. A revolutionist in Germany at fourteen, an adventurer across the seas into the political Utopia of his youthful dreams, Henry Villard found himself nowhere as much at home spiritually as under the roof of Garrison. Together Mr. and Mrs. Villard wandered for years according to the erratic course of the journalist. This was the beginning for Mrs. Villard of that acquaintance with Europe which perfected her knowledge that all men are kin; that the aspirations of all peoples are the same; that the rivalries that lead to the abomination of war are those of statesmen, not of the masses. Seventeen years after their marriage it was given to Mr. Villard to complete a great transcontinental railroad amid a popular acclaim rarely awarded to a hero of peace—only to be cast down from the pinnacle of his fame literally overnight. Tragedy nearly struck hands with drama and romance; but here Fanny Garrison Villard proved that no vicissitudes of fortune could make the slightest change in her or in her point of view. Poor or rich, her nobility met the test.

Always the fact remains that hers was a lovely and inspiring presence. The cause of woman's suffrage gained when, after the death of her husband, she began a new epoch of her life, throwing herself into various reforms. Men who had come to scoff at suffragettes went dumb when this advocate arose who combined in herself every one of the lovely womanly qualities. It is related of her that one rowdy legislative hearing became quiet, respectful, and attentive the moment she began to speak. Here was a great woman, and a great lady; even the coarsest Tammany legislator could see that and sense that hers was a testimony on behalf of her sex not to be denied. Those white hairs above the still youthful face, those flaming eyes, those earnest tones, that noble presence which was the same and at ease in a sweltering children's clinic, or among the most powerful of the earth, commanded immediate respect. And so did her unfailing courage. A turbulent street procession moved her not at all; she was of the few who dared to parade up Fifth Avenue at the outbreak of the war in protest against its folly and its crimes. Throughout American participation in it she bore her testimony against war undaunted, to build up later the only kind of peace society she cared for—one based on the inviolability of human life. It never occurred to her as it did to some of her friends that she might be jeopardizing her social position.

That The Nation exists today is due entirely to Mrs. Villard and her husband, to their generosity, their vision, and their public spirit. It was they who purchased this journal in 1881, when it was about to suspend, and then turned it back to its editors and, jointly and singly, for thirty-seven years thereafter, met its deficits and gave to its successive editors absolute freedom of expression and conscience. Whatever the value of The Nation's contribution to American life and letters during this period, a large share of the credit is hers. Yet one might have lived with her for years and never have heard from her lips one word to show that she had participated in this experiment in free and independent and honest journalism. Even more remarkable is that fact that when the new editor took hold in 1918 with, in some respects, a new program, he found no more ardent or sympathetic supporter than his mother. To few is it given in great age to have an open mind, much less the readiness to accept modern ideas and novel policies. Yet with her it is perhaps not to be wondered at, for her measuring sticks were those of principle; with them she knew how to meet new situations, the latest problems of an ever more complex civilization. Greatest of all is the fact that her faith and ideals never faltered; not even the greatest of human catastrophes could cast down her spirit, or dim the luster of its radiant light.

Behind the Power Lobby

THE public-utilities investigation is adjourning until autumn, when the American people will be so excited about their quadrennial circus that the utilities are certain to slip on to the inside pages. The revelations already made are appalling. High-pressure publicity men have been at work systematically bamboozling the public through schools and newspapers all over the country. They have revised the textbooks, taken over control of school and university instruction, and performed miracles in converting recalcitrant newspaper editors. And although at first the metropolitan newspapers gave it scant space, the news at the last reached the front pages.

But what of it? Has the public waked up and demanded that these professional poisoners be kicked out? Not a bit of it. The very same gentlemen who had been caught spending their million dollars annually to pervert American opinion picked up their bags while the investigation was still on and attended the Republican and Democratic national conventions. What is more, they got what they wanted. By the same methods which worked so well in Congress they induced the platform-makers at Kansas City and at Houston to omit all mention of Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam.

Obviously, we have a long way to go. No university has, to our knowledge, invited any of the cheap little professors who sold their souls to the power trust to depart; no press association has announced the discharge of the men who permitted power propaganda to be put on the wires; and while the National Education Association has been discussing the question of propaganda in the schools there seems to be no concerted movement to throw the textbooks edited by the utilities men out of the schools and to purify the educational system. We have not heard that Ginn and Co., the great textbook publishing house, has canceled its agreement to let the lobbyists see, before publication, any textbooks touching their field of activity.

One reason, of course, is that the revelations have not had the vigorous publicity which would have been accorded them had Senator Walsh conducted the investigation. The lobbyists were canny when they forced the hearings upon the Federal Trade Commission, well knowing that it would provide no such national sounding-board as a Senate committee. Furthermore, Congress is out of session, and the public is absorbed in the Presidential campaign. There are other ugly rumors. The hard-boiled, old-fashioned leaders in the utilities business are said to be rejoicing at the turn the investigation has taken. They never believed in publicity; they do not care about "educating" the public; they want to do their business quietly and mysteriously. They would gladly drop all the expensive publicity men. And the investigation, turning upon these propaganda methods, has not reached the core of the utilities evil: the pyramiding of utilities stocks. William Z. Ripley touched upon some of this frenzied finance in his "Main Street and Wall Street"; but the full story of the manipulation for the benefit of the insiders has never been dug out. That is the real task before the Federal Trade Commission. Decent men in the industry will welcome such exposure. The antics of the professional publicity men are a mere surface scab covering the disorders within the wound.

Robert Mantell

HAD Robert Mantell fulfilled the promise of his early prime, he might have been entitled to a leading place among the greatest Shakespearean actors of this and the preceding generation. But, like so many other brilliant beginners in stage history, he failed to justify the expectations of his most sanguine admirers, bringing them in later years little more than a keen sense of disappointment over glorious abilities misapplied and frustrated hopes. When he made his first professional appearances in this country—especially after his startling display of tragic scorn and passion, as Loris Ipanoff in "Fédora," with which he electrified his audience and temporarily extinguished the rising star of Fanny Davenport, many experienced judges thought that a worthy successor of Edwin Booth, E. L. Davenport, Lawrence Barrett, and John McCullough had been found. At that time he seemed to possess the almost perfect equipment of a great tragic actor. His striking figure and carriage, his rich voice and admirable diction—he had profited by excellent training in English stock companies—his artistic repose and stirring emotional eloquence gave assurance of extraordinary gifts and power. And some of these rare qualities he continued to display, almost to the last, in various plays of high romantic coloring.

Unfortunately his fate decreed that the most important formative years of his career should be passed in Far Western theaters where public taste was more easily gratified by sound and fury than by any artistic cunning or subtleties of interpretation. There he learned to act largely to the gallery, and, in winning easy applause by tearing passion into tatters, contracted disastrous habits, which grew stronger with each passing season, and proved fatal obstacles to his artistic development. This was all the more deplorable because his adoption of violent methods, so apt to win the plaudits of the impressionable crowd, and his neglect of the more delicate, truthful, and convincing expedients that charm the intelligent barred him from the histrionic heights once within his reach. When, in his fuller maturity, he returned to New York with his fine repertory of Shakespearean and other standard dramas he still exhibited occasional flashes of former power and an assured grasp of theatrical situation. But the old magic had gone. His acting, still finished in mechanism and vigorous in execution, was often hard and wooden, lacking alike in insight and inspiration.

In a lean and decadent period of the American theater he kept Shakespeare steadily in the foreground, and the lovers of the noble poetic drama stood by him, although in his representations, often sadly inadequate, the essence of it was too often lost. In characters like Othello, Macbeth, Richard III, or Lear, in scenes of tempestuous passion, he was often exceedingly effective, but in such passages as called for deep pathos, fanciful imagery, or the nicer subtleties of intellectual apprehension he rarely rose above the level of respectable mediocrity. In all that he did he showed himself the well-trained actor of the old traditional school. Of originality, deep thought, or comprehensive imagination he revealed few traces. But he knew his craft, which is more than can be truthfully said of most of his junior contemporaries. He owed his success to the genius of Shakespeare rather than his own.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THE courage of Al Smith of which we have heard so much might turn out to be, upon close analysis, nothing more than effrontery. But even that is a quality for which voters should be thankful. In the matter of choosing, voters rank just a little below beggars. When the Governor of New York first loomed up as the likely nominee of the Democratic Party three facts stood in his way. He was Wet, Catholic, and a member of Tammany Hall.

The precise gravity of these political disabilities is not known to me. Smith chose to tackle first the charge of Catholicism. In his answer to the Marshall letter he said in effect that he was a member of the church under attack, and instead of maintaining that it might be possible for a communicant under certain conditions to separate his political and his spiritual duties he argued that there was no possible antagonism whatsoever. It has been said by some of the Governor's friends that he is not in reality a particularly ardent son of the church. Walsh, so I have been told, is a far more devout Catholic. Indeed in one popular cabaret song along Broadway the suggestion was made that Al could easily get the Georgia vote if "he'd eat some meat on Friday." Al never touched so much as a lamb chop. Whether he happens to be a good Catholic or an indifferent one he has never dodged this issue in any way. It may be observed, for instance, that all the younger members of his family have gone through Catholic schools. In this respect he might have done himself some political good and violated no canon of his faith by sending a son or a daughter to some non-sectarian school. But in no way whatsoever has he soft-pedaled his Catholicism.

In the matter of prohibition Smith has been less forthright but bold enough as American political standards go. The charge that he deceived the convention at Houston is certainly unfair. Before the straddle plank was adopted the Governor publicly declared in a newspaper conference that he had not changed his opinion that enforcement legislation should be modified. His letter of acceptance came promptly enough to let Dry rebels bolt if they so desired. On the whole Smith's letter was favorably received by press and public. Naturally he could not please the stouter Drys no matter what he said, or failed to say, but many people who did not agree with his attitude toward Volsteadism still had a good word to say for his courage.

It is upon his Tammany affiliations that he will receive the severest censure. Many have said, and more will, that it was an insolent thing for Smith to make his first public utterance after the convention in Tammany Hall. More than that, he took occasion to announce that Tammany was all right. Or to be more exact, he asked how any organization could endure for one hundred and thirty-nine years if it was not all right. In this utterance Smith, by inference, assumed responsibility for every Tiger baron from the beginning. At any rate he went into none of the more recent quibbles about old Tammany and new Tammany and the superior virtue of the present set of sachems. George Olvany has been roundly scored for attempting to present the Society of Tammany as an historical association rather than a political machine. If Mr. Olvany sinned he sinned with Woodrow Wilson. The great Democratic liberal upon being criticized for sending felicitations to Tammany explained that he was communicating with the society and not the machine. Smith was better than that. He swallowed the entire Tiger. In effect Al Smith has taken occasion to say to the electorate: "Yes, I am Tammany, Wet, and Catholic. Why shouldn't I be?"

These are admirable tactics. It makes little difference as to whether Smith is personally courageous or not. Circumstances have forced him into the position of being candid. He might readily have drawn himself a little aloof from the Hall. There is no truth in the theory that Al is the darling of Tammany. He could have said with all sincerity that a gulf stands between him and the organization. In the eyes of the average district leader Al has turned "high-hat." He has made a number of appointments distressing to the organization. Tammany does not like his kitchen cabinet of highbrows. And yet any such explanations upon the part of Smith would have been hair-splitting. He came up with Tammany, and if defeat lies ahead of him he must go down with it. There is no point in swapping parachutes in mid air.

But after all this has been said there is no reason on earth why Al Smith's candor should disarm criticism. Up till now he has managed to capture the offensive. Some of the Southern Drys explain almost apologetically that they will not support Smith because he has repudiated the platform of his party. They need no such excuse. No alliance could be more ludicrous than one which included sincere and earnest prohibitionists and Alfred E. Smith. For all the talk below the Mason and Dixon line there is still small likelihood of the breaking of the Solid South. Such a contingency seems to fill even the most ardent Drys with fright. They can screw their courage up to the point of staying away from the polls, but voting for a Republican is still an adventure too monstrous to be considered by any great number of Southerners.

And yet the most cleansing thing which could happen in our national politics would be the fracturing of the too, too solid South. This existence of a bloc has rendered convention corruption inevitable. Since the Republican Party is but a shell in the old Confederacy its delegates may be had for the buying, and many a dirty deal of the Republican bosses has been largely bolstered up by the weight of these rotten boroughs. On the other hand the development of Southern statesmen of the first rank has been impaired by the fact that the South is too sure. Even a political genius could hardly capture a nomination from the Democratic Party if he happened to live in Alabama. Even though there has been a Heflin it is only fair to say that the South has sent excellent men to the Senate in spite of the fact that they might as well have been born in Bulgaria so far as the Presidency is concerned.

Naturally Al Smith is not consciously trying to alienate the Solid South, but he must look to the East for victory. Whatever his motives the Governor may well deserve to be canonized in November as a leader who has forced a new line-up. If that happens even the severest critics of the Tiger will be forced to admit that something good has come out of Tammany.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Arctic Tragedies

By JOHN McCLUSKY

WHILE the papers last week were filled with stirring Arctic news of discovery and of tragedy, there was dedicated in Woodlawn Cemetery, New York, a monument to George Washington De Long, Lieutenant in the United States Navy, who, with two-thirds of the crew of the steamer Jeannette, perished tragically on the north coast of Siberia in 1881. Three commanders of Arctic expeditions, Anthony Fiala, Vilhjalmur Stefansson, and Hubert Wilkins, the last fresh from the triumphant first airplane flight across the Arctic, joined in pointing out how the work of De Long is growing in importance as we study the history of exploration more discriminatingly.

The voyages of Columbus were looked upon as failures for a while, because he had not discovered a short route to Asia. De Long was in the same case. In his day there was supposed to be a great Arctic continent stretching from the Atlantic, where Greenland was one corner of it, to Bering Straits, where another supposed corner had been seen and named Kellett Land. De Long's ship was caught in the moving ice north of Bering Straits in September, 1879, and drifted north-westward right across the location of the supposed mainland. De Long himself, as his narrative shows, felt mainly disappointment. In his own eyes, he was failing to discover a continent, and that was the point of view which the world took also. The alternative theory of the time was that of an open Polar Sea, which those believed in who did not believe in the continent. This De Long failed to find also, which was a second disappointment to him and to the learned world.

We understand now that the reality which Columbus discovered was much more important than the theory which he failed to confirm. The scientific world is beginning to take that view of De Long's achievements, too. He was a pioneer in destroying the chief geographical misconceptions of his time. Moreover, by putting his ship into the ice and drifting with it for two years, he opened the road for Nansen to triumph by the same method fifteen years later. For these and other reasons, it happens that the fame of De Long is gradually coming out from eclipse. It seems probable that when a critical history of polar exploration shall eventually be written, the De Long expedition will come to stand second or third among all expeditions commanded by Americans, and among the first ten in the whole field of Arctic discovery.

The monument and the dedication services to De Long were given added significance by the news, appearing day by day, of the difficult plight of the aviators stranded by the wreck of Nobile's dirigible, Italia. On previous tragic occasions it has been a rule without exception in polar exploration that criticism has been suspended until long after the event. In the ghastliest of all Northern tragedies, when Sir John Franklin died with every one of his 128 companions, the critical judgment of mankind was so paralyzed by the shock that only now, after more than three-quarters of a century, are scholars beginning to point out the incredible incompetence of Franklin. Without a word of criticism at the time, he was permitted to take a foremost place in the pantheon of British heroism although his past record, as well as the tragedy itself, was enough to discredit him.

Unjustly, with perverse human logic, the situation is being reversed in the present situation. That is because Franklin was among the first of his men to die, while Nobile was the first of all his men to be saved. This circumstance has loosed upon Nobile and his expedition floods of criticism that would have been dammed back had he remained on the ice with his men, and withheld for years had he died with them.

Nobile is blamed for the lost lives of his would-be rescuers. Amundsen and five companions in a French airplane have been given up; it seems certain that they must have come down in the North Atlantic before they reached the comparative safety of the Arctic floes and, therefore, must have died from exposure or drowning within a few hours. Nobile is blamed, too, for the lost lives of his comrades. The Swedish scientist Malmgren and his two Italian companions, who left the party to walk ashore, are supposed to be dead because they are known to have been without firearms or other means of securing food. The six of the Italia's crew who drifted off with the crippled dirigible are presumed to be dead or dying. Even if they landed on ice they were inexperienced men unprovided with the gear needed for a reasonably safe walk ashore. It may be long before we know certainly how great a tragedy must be charged against the Nobile expedition.

You need both equipment and skill to walk safely over floes like those north of Spitzbergen, but you need more of the second. De Long, with half a dozen invalids in his party and one man blind, reached land over several hundred miles of that kind of ice in 1881. Nansen in 1896, northeast of the Nobile location, made shore with his one companion, though it was more than 100 miles. Stefansson, in 1914, far from Spitzbergen, but under similar conditions, reached land from a floe also more than 100 miles at sea. Wilkins and Eielson, when their airplane fuel gave out north of Alaska in April, 1927, walked 100 miles to shore. All these trips were made at the same time of year as Nobile's ill-fated expedition.

These were experienced men. Their uniform safety and success on the kind of ice on which Nobile fell raises pertinently the question whether the radio is an unmixed blessing. They had no radio. Accordingly they trained themselves, equipped themselves for emergencies, and saved themselves. The Nobile party had a radio and apparently considered nothing except sitting tight and pounding out S O S calls. Probably they had no other choice; the consensus of opinion among Arctic students seems to be that Nobile was right in thus depending on the radio. Nansen, Stefansson, and Wilkins, all of them still living, probably agree with that. At least they have published no criticism. But like many blessings, the radio has its drawbacks. In the case of the Nobile expedition it may yet sacrifice more lives than it saves.

Covering Washington

The Nation's Biweekly Washington Letter

By THE UNOFFICIAL SPOKESMAN

Washington, D. C.,
July 7

IMAGINE the consternation among the junkers who helped nominate Herbert Hoover when it dawned on them that their candidate was a Quaker. They had given little, if any, thought to his religion prior to his nomination. They simply accepted him as a man of action not much given to churchgoing. Then to their amazement, the spirit suddenly moved him on the very first Sunday following the convention and he attended services in the modest little Friends meeting-house in I Street, not far from the White House.

Quakers, they recalled with misgivings, are supposed to be against war. During the late war to end all war Quakers were accepted as conscientious objectors and exempted from combatant service. The I Street meeting-house includes in its congregation some of the most dangerous pacifists to be found anywhere in the United States, including Frederick J. Libby, president of the National Council for the Prevention of War. Occasionally, these pacifists gather there and the things they say in opposition to war cause Mrs. Brosseau to tremble violently for the future of the republic. What a place for a man aspiring to the Presidency of a government with the greatest war budget ever enacted by any nation in normal peace times!

Had something been put over on the patrioteers? How could Hoover, a Quaker, ever take the oath as commander-in-chief of the army and navy in case of war during his Administration? With his Quaker principles, how would he regard the gigantic war preparations of the Coolidge Administration for which $760,000,000 was voted at the last session of Congress? A pretty state of affairs, indeed, just as the boys who fatten on war contracts were smacking their lips in anticipation of the new $4,000,000,000 naval-building program and $500,000,000 for the replacement of ammunition in the army!

Their apprehensions, however, were wholly groundless and soon happily allayed. Discreet feelers promptly drew from Mr. Hoover's official spokesman the assurance that the Republican Presidential nominee wasn't that kind of a Quaker. He belongs to the fighting kind, and there is nothing in his religious beliefs to prevent his becoming the commander-in-chief or signing a declaration of war if such an emergency arises. After two Sundays' attendance at the I Street meeting-house, Mr. Hoover changed his place of worship to another Quaker church of a slightly different sect on Irving Street. Mr. Hoover wanted to avoid the curious crowds which gathered to see him, his spokesman explained. In the Irving Street congregation, we are told, the pacifists are not so numerous and virulent.

* * * * *

IT'S queer how candidates for high office "get religion" and hit the sawdust trail as soon as they are nominated. Calvin Coolidge thought it necessary to join a church soon after he entered the White House. Not to be outdone by Mr. Hoover's example in churchgoing, Charley Curtis, the Vice-Presidential nominee, stepped forward in the somewhat unexpected role of champion of the Puritan Sabbath. To cameramen who sought to photograph him in the Topeka streets on the Sunday following the convention, he held up a protesting hand and exclaimed solemnly: "No! No! boys, remember this is Sunday." Irreverent Washington, remembering Warren Harding's praise of Charley as "the best poker player in the Senate" and Charley's own devotion to the Maryland race-tracks, could not restrain its mirth.

* * * * *

FOR the enlightenment of readers of The Nation who fear that Mr. Kellogg's outlawry of war may interfere with Mr. Coolidge's own friendly little war with Sandino in Nicaragua, we hasten to extend the assurance on no less authority than Mr. Kellogg himself that there is no cause for worry. The proposed new multilateral treaty, the State Department assures us, has nothing to do with real war; it applies only to theoretical war, and then not too seriously. The Nicaraguan war, being a real one, naturally is not affected. To the Washington Bureau of the Baltimore Sun we are indebted for this light upon the correct meaning of the treaty:

The military operations of the United States in Nicaragua would in no way be affected should the United States become a party to the multilateral treaty for the abolition of war, it was said at the State Department today. The United States is operating in Nicaragua under provisions of the Monroe Doctrine, it is contended, and that doctrine would not be set aside by the proposed treaty. The State Department contends that the military forces chasing Sandino, the Nicaraguan rebel leader, are engaged in the protection of American lives and property, which, it asserts, is a legitimate undertaking.

So, you see, the outlawry of war is meant only in a Pickwickian sense.

* * * * *

TO those who wondered why the power trust was so frantically anxious to escape a Senatorial inquiry last winter the answer ought now to be entirely plain. If the Federal Trade Commission can cause such an astounding outpouring of disclosures what would a Senate committee led by Senator Tom Walsh have done? Already the stench from the Federal Trade Commission's inquiry rises to high heaven, and the end is not in sight. No such impudent and far-flung attempt to debauch the mind of the nation has ever before been uncovered in the history of America. Each day's grist from the inquiry furnishes a new list of schools propagandized, textbooks doctored, teachers bought.

Perhaps nothing in the whole avalanche of disclosures has so completely let the cat out of the bag for the utilities interests as the correspondence of John B. Sheridan, publicity director of the power trust in Missouri. Mr. Sheridan's conscience frequently bothered him, and in one of his letters to Thorne Brown, managing director of the National Electric Light Association's Middle West Division, he wrote impatiently:

What can we do when the financiers will inflate, over-capitalize, sell securities based on blue sky or hot air, and rates must be kept up to pay returns on said blue sky and hot air? Mr. Brown, the bankers in the electrical industry do not appreciate what a fat thing they have had in the last seven years. Huge profits for the bankers; increase in rates for the customers.

No, Mr. Sheridan hasn't been fired—not yet. We fear, however, that he has just about outlived his usefulness to the power trust and had better be looking about for a new job.

Hay and Corn

By McALISTER COLEMAN

BEFORE ever the floods came down last year to break the levees of the Southland there was a man who had foreseen their coming, and had worked out, to his own satisfaction at any rate, a practical plan for preventing their tragic repetition. It was a flying divot on a little roll on a prairie golf course outside of Chicago that first set the active mind of Arthur J. Mason to work on the problem to which he has since devoted his life. This problem is none other than checking the falling away of America's Corn Belt into the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. Mason had recently retired from a most lucrative business as contracting engineer on the day fifteen years ago when he chipped off with his golf club that bit of prairie dirt. Much of his work had been done in steel, and he felt that he had come to a time in the industry's development when there was a dearth of the pioneering spirit. Above all things this man is a pioneer with a constant vision before him of a new and orderly society, such as hovers in the rear of every engineer's mind. So when he picked up the prairie earth from the tiny mound and discovered that it was vastly inferior to the rich black soil of the lower lands on the course, he began to speculate. When he got back to his country house twenty-five miles out of Chicago, he took a shovel and went across the fields to the tracks of the Illinois Central railroad. There are some 200 feet of virgin soil on either side of these tracks forming the original grant of land made to the railroad by the State and never touched by plows. Here and there for a distance of thirty-five miles Mr. Mason dug up this black land and then crossed the fence along the right of way and dug in the neighboring fields. The soil from the plowed fields was plainly inferior to that in the right of way. To Mr. Mason this suggested at once that two things had been happening to the formerly rich lands of Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, which form the Corn Belt of the nation. Little by little the seven inches of vegetable mold upon which all our agriculture rests was being worn away by heavy rains that swooped down upon the high places of the prairie and sent the soil away to the South in tawny streams, and this war of attrition on the soil was being aided by mistaken agricultural processes.

He sat down to consider the general agricultural situation which confronts the country today. "In every one of us," he said, "there is a sneaking love for the soil. The pioneering spirit does not die easily, no matter what one's profession. It was strong in me and I found that it gave me an outlet, a new way of spending such talents as I have."

He studied climate. He began to compare the climate of the Midwest States with European climate. Nowhere in Europe, he discovered, was there a parallel to the heavy rains and severity of weather that hung so continuously over the American Corn Belt. Mr. Mason was born in Australia and spent much time in England. He is a cousin of Robert Browning, the English poet, and a thorough cosmopolitan. He has lived under all sorts of climatic conditions and is convinced that nowhere outside of America, with the possible exception of Asiatic Russia, are there such extremes of heat and cold as we Americans go through every twelve months. As Mr. Mason says,

We think of London as a place of perpetual rain. But as a matter of fact there are twenty-six inches of rainfall in London to forty inches in New York. The point is that London rain is soft and mild. American rain is heroic, bold, and savage. It tears at the soil, sending it away in yellow floods. It swoops down at the most inopportune times for the farmer, often setting at naught an entire year's work. It is hard to make Americans realize the effects of such a severe climate upon agricultural life. While we brought over to this country all the traditions of European agriculture, to most of which we still cling, we have not been willing to modify our viewpoint to meet the altogether different climatic conditions on this side of the Atlantic.

He has sought for something that would give agriculture the continuity of factory production, that would get the greatest possible service out of costly agricultural machinery. He has found what he believes to be the ideal solution of the problems of both the conservation of the soil and the fuller use of agricultural energy in none other than the humble alfalfa. Now, after thirteen years of intensive experiment with alfalfa, he is going up and down the land urging the farmers to replace corn with hay. In the first place, he points out that corn is a soil waster. Corn growing in plowed land not only does not hold soil together but helps the process of erosion because there is no time after the last cultivation of corn for a protective crop of weeds to grow.

As for the plowed land, God help it! [says Mr. Mason]. You see it constantly slipping down hill. The beautiful, fine mold appears more a jelly than solid land. The richer it is, the deeper it is, the worse the sheet erosion in the spring. One thing is fairly sure: we must abandon the cultivation of corn as it is now carried on. We must shift to a form of culture which keeps the soil bound together and protected by some form of sod. Of all such plants alfalfa stands head and shoulders above the rest. If our corn lands were converted into alfalfa fields, we could support twice the weight of domestic animals we now do; and this is the purpose the Corn Belt lands now serve, namely, the support of domestic animals.

Figures collected by Mr. Mason give a very different view of the function of agriculture from that held by the average man. The figures show that whereas the average wheat crop grown for eating by human beings weighs some 18,000,000 tons, crops grown for consumption by domestic animals, namely, oats, corn, hay, and pasturage, weigh 429,000,000 tons; so that as a matter of fact the chief purpose of agriculture is the feeding of animals and not primarily the feeding of humans.

But a new problem arose when he came to consider the profitable raising of alfalfa. The chief difficulty with the alfalfa crop has always been one of curing it. It is difficult to get rid of the water in the crop in order to save it in a wet climate. It occurred to Mr. Mason that a great number of things which are eaten are still appetizing when smoked. And he began to devise machines which would evaporate the water out of the hay and give a product that would be acceptable to domestic animals.

Today he can start one team cutting hay in the morning and in ten hours have twenty tons of dry hay in the barn. Furthermore, after it is cut, the hay never touches the ground. In fifty minutes it arrives in the barn dry and in fully ground form. Not only does this process yield a concentrate that is palatable to animals, but it opens the way to what is really a revolution in the farm life in this country. It provides that continuity of production for which he was looking. It gives the opportunity for profitable group efforts to the American farmer. Mr. Mason says:

No other process than farming still relies upon the sun for drying. In every other industry of any importance drying is an artificial process. In the steel industry, for example, profits depend upon the number of furnaces in blast. In the making of salt, it would be absurd to suggest that the sun should dry the product. Why cannot we take over into agriculture the new processes of drying that work so successfully in other industries?

On his Illinois farm, over several hundred acres of good soil, Mr. Mason sowed alfalfa. Then he set up a plant consisting of mowers and field wagons which hold 2,500 pounds of green crops and, traveling with the mower, receive their load while moving three miles an hour. Finally comes the drying machinery. The drier itself is 160 feet long. Into this the green crop is unloaded. A machine cards it, much as one cards wool, into a traveling mattress of alfalfa eight feet wide and ten inches thick. Hot gases from coal-burning furnaces are driven twice through this mattress as it moves at a rate of five feet per minute. Finally, the mattress is ground up and blown by hot air into the barn. The new agriculture calls for the work of a farmer and six assistants on units of 600 acres. Mr. Mason believes that it will lengthen the harvesting time of a farm to 210 days a year in place of the present sixty-five days a year. His operations show that seven men using these modern methods can produce a crop with a gross value of $80,000 per year. Furthermore, he has found that the crop, because it is possible to cut it much earlier, has a higher protein value and a higher percentage of digestibility.

Here is his working schedule for a modern farm. From April 15 to May 15 he would gather winter rye; from May 15 to October 15 he would work on his alfalfa; from October 15 to November 15 there would be cowpeas and soy beans to attend to. Quite a different schedule from that which is now undertaken by the farmer who depends upon corn alone. Mr. Mason has cut down the operation of harvesting hay from what sometimes takes three months to one hour. And at the same time he has shown a way to lengthen the farmer's productive days enormously. Normal high-grade haymaking involves eight operations: cutting, windrowing, cocking, loading and hauling, stacking, baling, and grinding. Whereas, by the use of Mr. Mason's machine, the operation is completed in one continuous process.

Here, then, is a man with an idea—an idea, incidentally, that has proved itself time and again—which may very well change the entire aspect of life in the great Corn Belt of the United States. Like all engineers, he is distrustful of any sort of farm relief that depends upon political measures. He does not think that the farmer can be saved by flats of any nature. He wants not only to get back to the soil but to keep what soil is left and use it for profits which seem almost incredible in the light of the present poor returns to the American farmer. The implications contained in Mr. Mason's work have a wide range. For one thing, they denote the passing of the individual farmer, the coming in of more and more machinery to agricultural life, the factory process, if you will, as applied to crop raising. But Mr. Mason is not so much interested in farm life generations hence as in the immediate problem, first, of conserving the soil of the Corn Belt, and second, of making farm life at once more interesting and more profitable to those who live it. When one begins to speak of Utopias, this engineer has a way of taking out his pencil and making charts for you full of figures taken from his actual experience. It is this "feet-on-the-ground" attitude that has kept him steadily on his self-appointed job since that distant day when he knocked the divot off the prairie roll.

In Memory of Fanny Garrison Villard

By WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON, Jr.

No conscious art released the mystic gates
That opened wide to her triumphant way,
Unless the art of living day by day
In amity propitiates the Fates.
Perhaps it was her gentleness and grace,
Or her high radiance, by courage crowned,
That made her words of pleading so resound
When she stood champion of sex or race.
The daughter of a war-torn, stormy age
Of rapt reform and fratricidal feud,
She strove with passionate solicitude
To make world peace a human heritage.
She sensed a point of light in dawn's dim skies;
Her soul, prophetic, saw the high sun rise.

In the Driftway

WHEN the Drifter wrote in the issue of June 27 that his readers had not been generous in offering advice to the man in San Antonio, Texas, in search of a hobby, the announcement was premature. As usual the Drifter failed to realize what a wide world this is and how irresistibly a great journal like The Nation penetrates to its every cross-road and gasoline filling-station, including the Scandinavian. The Drifter failed to consider, too, that readers of this magazine think twice, and then ruminate for quite a while, before they speak—a commendable habit. In the last week or so a sheaf of letters has accumulated, coming from as far west as Santa Monica, California, and as far east as Dublin, Ireland. From the latter city Lilian Duncan writes:

Since your correspondent in San Antonio, Texas, agrees with me about croquet and hiking, he must be a person of taste and discernment; and so my sympathy goes out to him in that he hasn't got the Dublin Mountains to hike in. Racking my memory for something else a person so gifted might like, I remember a happy time when I had a garden, and, taking it up at first boredly under stress of circumstances, found it of absorbing interest. Perhaps Texas is one of those places where everything just grows of itself and you lie under the tree and let the fruit drop into your mouth; but, if there is any kind of plant that can be cultivated there, your hobbyless waif should try growing it. Someone else can do the heavy digging, if any.

Failing gardening, what about carpentry? He could torment his wife (again, if any) by making her all sorts of fittings and gadgets she didn't want and wouldn't know where to put.

* * * * *

THE pleasures of bee-keeping, already urged in this column, are also stressed by Laura Way Mathiesen, who confesses that in addition she is an artist, has a few pedigreed dogs, and has just acquired a goat. Which sounds like quite a hobby. E. D. Abbott of Spokane, Washington, suggests "that fine, old, and fundamentally American pastime, archery." "Or how about whittling?" he adds. "Surely if Cal Coolidge would rather whittle than be President, one could choose no nobler example to emulate." Scientific investigation, already proposed by one correspondent, is advocated by another who suggests this specific problem:

Why does the hydrogen atom have a single proton in the center and a single electron revolving around it? Why does the helium atom, first discovered on the sun through the spectroscope, have four nuclei with two electrons revolving around them, and how does the formation of four grammes helium, from hydrogen, produce energy as great as though eighty tons of coal were burned?

The Drifter gives it up. He never was good at conundrums.

* * * * *

MEANWHILE the editor of the Omaha World-Herald, in his pages, takes the Drifter to task for not recommending angling, while the man in San Antonio who started all the shooting writes in to complain of the Drifter's animadversions upon his town:

It is inevitable, following your remarks, that I rise to the defense of my home city. San Antonio, be it known, and emphatically, is a place to drift to, and not from. Despite the influx of Eastern capital and Iowan farmers, there is still magic in the streets and atmosphere of this semi-Spanish city. A vociferous minority protests against its Americanization, and is holding its own against the Chamber of Commerce slogan "The biggest city in the biggest State" and its concurrent street-widening and skyline-building campaigns. The next ten years will tell the tale—San Antonio will still be among the individual cities of America, with a distinctive old-world milieu, or it will have joined the ranks of standardized cities. Until that time, I'll stick here, and invite you to visit us before progress removes our ancient landmarks, straightens and widens our streets, and changes our pronunciation.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Cooped

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am sitting in the Democratic National Convention. Franklin Roosevelt is nominating Smith. Thousands upon thousands of people are listening to him. The vast hall is packed. The white faces of the crowd look like an infinite field of white squashes. In one corner—in the gallery—there is a section of specially reserved seats. These seats are approximately one hundred in number. The section is marked "For Colored People." And it is separated from the rest of the hall by chicken wire.

Houston, Texas, June 27

B. HARD

Senator Norris on a Third Party

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Democratic Convention was controlled just as the Republican Convention was controlled. The same interests which controlled at Kansas City controlled at Houston. What are the people going to do about it? Are we not up against a stone wall? Have the people any avenue by which they can bring about the defeat of the great political machines that always control our national conventions? The ordinary suggestion is to organize a third party or run an independent candidate for President. This is a beautiful theory, but, for practical purposes, it is a will o' the wisp.

We are confronted with the antiquated and worse-than-useless electoral-college system of electing a President. The two old parties have complete organizations from the township to the White House. The great mass of people outside of these organizations have nothing to do but to choose between two evils.

In order to run an independent candidate for President or to organize a third party it would be necessary to form an organization in practically every congressional district in the United States and to select candidates for Presidential electors. We have neither the time nor the money to do this. It should be as easy to run an independent candidate for President as it is to run an independent candidate for Governor in any of our States.

I have tried several times to interest forward-thinking people in a campaign to abolish, by an amendment to the Constitution, this antiquated electoral-college system and to provide for a direct vote, but people do not seem to see the importance of it, and the machines of our great parties do all they can to conceal the true conditions. As it is, machines control both dominant parties, keep up a sham fight, arouse partisan feeling, and make the people believe the country is being saved when they are only pulling monopoly chestnuts out of the fire. The campaign turns on false issues, and the people always lose.

The fundamental issue in this campaign is not farm relief, although that is very important. It is not the prohibition issue, although that is also important. The real question involved is, Shall the great trusts, particularly the water-power trust, control the destiny of our republic? When this trust is in control it will take care of all subsidiary questions, like prohibition and farm relief, and it will do it so effectively that none of these subsidiary questions will be solved for the benefit of the common folks.

The question comes up again, What are we going to do about it? It seems to me about the only thing we can do is to call the attention of the people to the fundamental difficulty—our electoral college. If this impediment were out of the way there would be no great difficulty in any Presidential campaign for the people to win control of their own government. Moreover, if this reform were brought about, the machines themselves would be more careful about foisting upon the people undesirable platforms and less desirable candidates.

Washington, D. C., July 2

G. W. NORRIS,

United States Senator from Nebraska

Drunken Car Drivers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The editorial, The Price of Speed, in your issue of May 30 states that "considerable progress has been made in reducing accidents by revoking licenses for drunkenness" and that this, together with the publication of these revocations, has subdued the recklessness of hotheads and users of intoxicants.

After considerable time spent in investigating the results of the Massachusetts law which requires the revocation of the license for one year after conviction for "driving under the influence of liquor," on the first offense, I have come to the conclusion that this law in most instances is ineffective in ridding the highways of drunken operators because most people of this type, and in this condition, will drive whether they possess a license or not; in fact, many of the most frightful accidents are caused by those who have never had a license. The evil result of this law, however, is that it is used by a certain number of the police as a means of blackmail, intimidation, and persecution, and has caused a large amount of suffering on the part of some of the most careful drivers.

Most judges here will convict unless it is positively proved that the defendant has partaken of no liquor within five hours previous to arrest, and then only one drink, contending that a person is under the influence of alcohol until it is completely eliminated from the system to the last vestige. The testimony of the arresting officer and his fellow-officers from the station is accepted as sufficient proof of guilt, and as the defendant is held five hours at the very least without being admitted to bail and without any communication with the outside world, it is impossible for him to refute their testimony.

Cambridge, Massachusetts, June 5 CALEB J. BUFFUM

That D. A. R. Gas Bomb

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The latest D. A. R. gas-bomb has filled the air with smoke, and was indeed carefully calculated to bewilder the public.

Let me say at once that at no time did I make admissions relieving the officers of the onus of blacklisting. Their attempt to clear their honor is a tour de force of casuistry. I introduced reliable evidence proving the existence of official D. A. R. blacklists in Kansas, Massachusetts, and Michigan. I also introduced evidence that an Honorary President General had explained to a member of the society that when the chapters were found fault with for inviting certain speakers and requested "advice," national officers promulgated lists for their information. In fact I submitted enough evidence to merit a week's careful consideration. My own testimony was, of course, confined to my personal knowledge of D. A. R. blacklists in Massachusetts (and it was conclusive), but because I had never seen such a list actually in the hands of any officer of the National Board—though I had talked with one who admitted them—Mrs. Brosseau publishes her unwarranted statement that my "admissions" cleared the society of blacklisting!

The verdict and this official statement were given to the press the day following my court martial with a nervous haste that speaks for itself. No amount of quibbling can suppress the truth. The D. A. R. and blacklisting are forever associated in the public mind. The society has been severely injured by the equivocations of its national officers, and will never be more than a laughing-stock while these women steer its course.

Cambridge, Mass., June 27

HELEN TUFTS BAILIE

Mr. Marshall and Al Smith

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of June 20 you do me the injustice of referring to what you designate as my "attack upon Governor Smith in the Atlantic Monthly," and of implying that the "attack" is continued in the book, "The Roman Catholic Church in the Modern State."

Neither the letter nor the book is an attack on Governor Smith or intended as such. On the contrary, the letter paid high tribute to his character and services, and the book expressly recognizes his convictions in respect to church and state as "lofty and characteristically generous." In demonstrating that these convictions are irreconcilable with the present de fide doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, and that the respective doctrines of that church and the modern state can be reconciled only by the church officially conforming its belief to Governor Smith's notable declaration, my book ought to be relieved of all suspicion of an attack on him.

New York, June 16

CHARLES C. MARSHALL

Contributors to This Issue

JOHN MCCLUSKY is the pen-name of an authority on the Arctic.

MCALISTER COLEMAN, columnist and writer on labor conditions, is a contributing editor of the New Leader.

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON is a grandson of the famous Abolitionist and a nephew of Fanny Garrison Villard.

MARY AUSTIN, poet, novelist, and critic, lives at Sante Fe, New Mexico.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS, a frequent contributor to The Nation and other periodicals, is the author of "Woman's Dilemma."

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY is a literary critic who contributes frequently to current magazines.

ELLEN LA MOTTE is the author of "The Opium Monopoly," "The Ethics of Opium," and other books.

Books

In Papagueria

By MARY AUSTIN

Very far there
In Papagueria
Stands ocotillo, the torch flower,
It is swaying to the wind's song,
On the tips of its tall stems
Like a scarlet bird
It dips and rises;
Like the bird's mate, dim breasted,
Its shadow follows
Delicately over the yellow sands.

Very far there, the bisnaga,
The great barrel cactus
Is swelling with the summer rains.
Leaning always toward the sun,
Clockwise its shadow goes,
While the young men gather bisnaga blossoms
For their maidens to fasten in their hair;
They are singing, "What are bisnaga spines to me Whom love is forever pricking in the side!"

Very far, in Papagueria
It stands, the sahuaro
In its arms there, the red hawk's nest,
The blue lizards and the woodpeckers
Are running up and down.
Would I were there now,
Gathering crimson sahuaro fruit
For the syrup-making;
Drinking sahuaro wine with the old men,
Prayer feathers fluttering.
Would I might hear again
The night-singing mocking-bird
Climbing up and down his ladder of sound.

America Fights Britain

We Fight for Oil. By Ludwell Denny. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

"AMERICA Fights Britain," Mr. Denny might have called his book. It is more than a story of oil; it is a story of vast international intrigues which statesmen on neither side of the ocean have dared to discuss openly. It is the story of a conflict hitherto waged by British and American oil companies with the active and hardly disguised support of the two foreign offices—in Russia, in India, in Mesopotamia, in Europe, in Central and South America, in the United States itself. This is the kind of conflict which has made wars in the past; and today, says Mr. Denny, "War is possible. War is probable—unless the two empires seek through mutual sacrifice to reconcile their many conflicting interests." Those who preach that war between Great Britain and the United States is unthinkable, he warns, hinder rather than help. When, in the not distant future, American oil production begins to decline, when the price of gasoline goes up in the United States and Americans discover that Britain controls the great untapped reserves of the world—then the public, unless forewarned, will be easy meat for the Hearsts and Bill Thompsons.

This sounds like sensational jingoism. It seems strange from a man who was once a European correspondent of The Nation and is now an expert on foreign affairs for the Scripps-Howard newspapers. But in the interim Mr. Denny covered the State Department and the Washington embassies for the United Press, and his book is heavily documented with official and semi-official papers. Part of the story lay easily at hand. Pierre de la Tramerye and Davenport and Cooke had told the story of the British-American fight for Mesopotamian oil, and Louis Fischer of the struggle for Russian and Persian oil; and the federal Oil Conservation Board had issued sufficiently alarmist statements on the danger of exhausting our own oil reserves. Sir Edward Mackay Edgar boasted nine years ago that America had recklessly run through her oil legacy while Britain had obtained control of all the likely or probable oil-fields outside of this country. But much of the story is new.

Sir Edgar was premature. He did not know how vigorous an offensive the Standard Oil and the State Department could wage. Mr. Denny's book is, for the most part, the story of that offensive. Oil history moves fast, but this 1928 story includes three exceedingly important chapters hitherto untold. There is, first, the romantic story of the leap of Venezuela in six years from thirteenth place among the oil-producing nations of the world to second; and the story of British-American rivalry in Venezuela. There is the amazing tale of British politico-economic penetration in Colombia, close to the Panama Canal, a story almost unbelievably sensational, but told with a studied effort to avoid emphasis upon the alarmist aspects of the intrigue. And there is, finally, the amusing story of the effort of Sir Henri Deterding, the Napoleon of the British oil world, who himself had bid in vain for monopoly control of Russia's oil exports, to convince the world that the Standard Oil Company of New York was a band of sinners because it succeeded in buying Russian oil cheap and undersold Deterding's own oil in the East.

How consistently the State Department has supported the big American oil companies throughout the competition for foreign fields Mr. Denny painstakingly reveals; it will be a surprise to many. The story of Mexico's oil laws takes its place in relation to other struggles waged by the State Department, and the oil companies, with Colombia, Argentina, Spain, and other countries. But our own State Department, vigorous as its support has been, seems rather amateurish in comparison with the businesslike work of the British Foreign Office, which has had decades of experience at empire-building and does not lightly admit a new world rival to terms of equality. Hitherto, Mr. Denny thinks, the youth of the American empire and the stench of the oil scandals have kept the American people dull to the international struggle. But the passion stirred up by Hoover's denunciations of the British rubber monopoly shows what could and would be done if the American people found oil prices rising because of Britain's monopolistic control of foreign oil. The talk of the new American naval program, American capture of British foreign markets, and America's increasing control of world credit, he points out, tend to weaken the Die-Hard opposition to compromise on the other side of the water; and the fact that Britain does hold three-quarters of the world's oil reserves, as well as a near-monopoly of rubber and other essential raw materials, together with the fact that the American empire is based upon peace-time industry, should dull the edge of American aggressiveness. The British, hitherto, have been more militant than we because their needs have thus far been greater than ours, but in motive and method oil companies on both sides have fought alike, and unless some Anglo-American compromise is reached, Mr. Denny thinks, the drift is steadily toward war. Such a compromise, he suggests after years of daily observation in the State Department, would tend to take the following form:

Naval parity and joint control of the seas; a free hand politically for Great Britain in her colonies and spheres of influence in exchange for a free hand for the United States in Latin America, with Great Britain ultimately to get out of British Honduras and Jamaica and immediately stop concession-hunting in Panaman, Colombian, and other territory commanding the Panama Canal; Britain to agree not to encourage dismemberment of China and not to seek special commercial advantages there; the United States to hold the Philippines, and to that extent prevent Japanese expansion or further nationalist revolt in the lower Far East and India; the United States to scale down its high tariff wall to let in British goods, and hasten war-debt cancellation; both governments to practice the Open Door policy in regard to raw materials and markets in their territories and spheres of influence, except in strategic areas such as Panama and Suez; relaxation of restrictions against British shipping in American coastwise trade; freedom for nationals of each country to form international commercial combines; abolition of the British exclusion policy preventing American ownership of petroleum lands, and equitable division of joint exploitation by British and American oil companies of new foreign fields.

A breath-taking program? Yes, and it is a breath-taking book, a sensationally realistic book, boldly facing unpleasant facts. If Mr. Denny's suggestion that the two empires must choose between such an improbable compromise and war seems incredible, then read the book, face the facts yourself, and see if you can do better.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Miss Glaspell's New Novel

Brook Evans. By Susan Glaspell. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

THESE are writers we like in much the same reasonable and unreasoning way in which we like our friends. We like the way their minds work, and the way they take the world. We are at home with them. Miss Glaspell is one of the writers I like in this way, and the fact that I like her in this way is the most important of the confused mass of impressions which I have about her new book.

This new novel of hers, the first in a number of years, is a wise and tender book that gains both its strength and its weakness from simplification. Like Martin Mills in "The Madeleine Heritage" Miss Glaspell is concerned with the effect of a particularly alive and unconventional individual on several generations. Her method of simplifying the five related episodes of the book to one emotion and its consequences saves her from the genealogical morass in which Mr. Mills eventually mires his reader. Without any abruptness or dry compression, and without losing the invaluable appearance of events taking place before the reader's eyes, Miss Glaspell has contrived to make each of her five episodes tell the maximum of story in a minimum of space.

Yet simplification has other perils than the pluperfect tense and the anemia that she so skilfully avoids. Perhaps the chief of them is naivete. It seems absurd to use the word of any aspect of a book so full of tolerant wisdom as this. Yet there is naivete in Naomi's failure to know in advance how Mrs. Copeland will receive the news that although Joe is dead something of him lives on in her. There is naivete in her failure to know how her father will receive the same news. Even the conception of Naomi as a person suffers from this oversimplification. We see her first as an otherwise unindividualized young girl who has given herself to her lover, who is unable to understand the horror aroused in the neighborhood by the knowledge of the prospective child whose father has been accidentally killed, and who consents to let Caleb Evans make an honest woman of her only to give her child a home and a name, and to buy for herself a photograph of the dead Joe from his angry mother. We see her again as a work-worn woman in the forties who denies herself everything for her daughter, who is willing to precipitate a situation which will make it impossible for her ever to see her daughter again in order to save her from the ascetic life-denying influence of the pious Caleb, and who has never regretted the supposedly shameful fact that she once knew love. Naomi must of course have been many other things than these. In knowing her only in these aspects we know a profoundly moving story about her, but we do not know her. We would not recognize her on the street. We might live in the same house with her for years and never know that this was the Naomi of the story. We don't even know much about her as a lover, except that she welcomed love. Caleb is more individualized, and yet in the end Caleb is little more than a stock figure, as are all the other characters in the book.

But with these stock figures Miss Glaspell has done extraordinary things. Within their limitations they live with hot intensity, they grow with the years, and they continue until the end to influence each other in ways so unexpected and so contrariwise that we accept them at once for the rough and tumble of reality. It is more than poetic irony that makes the child for whom Naomi has sacrificed her life regard Naomi's enveloping affection coldly and give all her affection to Caleb; it is a profound understanding of those obscure family irritations and repulsions which play the villain in so many lives. Not until years after Naomi's death, when Brook herself was in her forties, did the sacrifice bear its fruit. Yet even here, at the crucial point of the book, it seems to me that naivete is mixed again with its fine understanding.

It is of course after the individual resolves to dare freedom that the real story begins, for freedom is a very large order, and the regulations that hedge it about have sprung rather from many other individuals' inability to cope with it than from perverse piety, perverse piety itself being only one of the countless rebounds from that hard smooth wall. In this book Miss Glaspell, like so many writers of the modern primitive school, works up to freedom laboriously, and then stops as if the goal were gained.

There is fine craftsmanship in the book. Many of the scenes, especially that in which Brook leaves her mother, are beautifully done. But the writing is the shirt-sleeves variety that came in with the generation which shook itself free of Howells and James and which scoffed with Mencken at Johnsenese. Its purpose, that of permitting the new writer to come closer to reality than the litterateurs who preceded him, has been so abundantly served that it seems as if we could now quite safely give up our backwoods fiddle for a real violin.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

A Pretty Mess

Music Education in America. By Archibald T. Davison. Harper and Brothers. $3.

TAKING appreciation of the best in music as the end of education, and adequate experience of it as the means, Professor Davison claims that actual education does not achieve the end because it does not use the means, preferring tangible results. In private education the tangible objective is the playing of an instrument; and what happens is that the purely mechanical problems of the instrument, with the wretched music invented solely to provide repeated opportunities for their solution, claim attention to the exclusion of real music. The instrument comes, then, to be regarded as the whole of music, and usually with disastrous consequences. For even success with the instrument may leave the student unable to appreciate music; but, more often, the result is failure and distaste, and then in abandoning the instrument he abandons all music. Attempts to make the business more palatable have succeeded, but only in so far as they have deferred to the principle that experience of music, properly guided, should precede study of its technique or of the technique of an instrument.

In the elementary school, again, instead of the child's having its attention directed entirely to what is attractive in the best music—instead, that is, of his being taught to sing it by sound, or just to listen to it—he is made almost at once to read music. His attention, then, is claimed by problems of technique, and by the exercises invented for technical purposes, "little more than mechanical collections of notes, bearing only the outer semblance of melody." And mere listening is omitted as unproductive.

The secondary school, in which music is frequently omitted altogether, much to the children's relief, is the proper place for training in music appreciation. This requires a well-educated musician with "faith in the capacity of youth to perceive and enjoy beauty without the aid of . . . devices which are calculated to enhance interest, but which, in reality, distract attention from the music itself." Instead, in the absence of these conditions, the children are again given inferior music and distracted from any musical content by irrelevant stories (not to be confused with explanations of form and style, which should follow thorough acquaintance with a composition). And tangible results are achieved by the music memory contest. "Now, if some ten or twelve movements were selected, with the understanding that at the contest sixteen bars drawn from any part of one of these movements would be played, there would at least be some assurance that the children had heard and become acquainted with all the music. If, furthermore, the children were asked to identify the composer and the type of several pieces previously unheard by them, but which were the work of musicians represented on the contest list, we could speculate that the children had been taught something about musical style." But, in fact, "it would be impossible for any class to learn even superficially in the given time all the compositions specified on a contest list; the result is that each teacher undertakes to win the prize by forcibly feeding his charges with perhaps two hundred and forty measures of music (the first eight bars of thirty compositions)."

As a result the college is compelled to supply omissions and remedy defects of previous instruction. It should instead set a real standard for such instruction by means of entrance examinations, and train teachers who can observe this standard. The result would be "a logical and continuous plan of music education" which will "bring our people . . . to a real understanding and love of music."

One important matter Professor Davis leaves undiscussed: instruction in the playing of an instrument. A person, let us say, wishes to master the piano sufficiently for public performance or for private needs. A fair test of instruction is that the alleged means have some demonstrable connection with the desired end; yet, absurd as it may sound, this is the one test most instruction cannot stand: beyond a certain common minimum of essentials the methods are so much hokum. To account for the supposed results of the methods one need only reflect that in the mere doing of something a person acquires the ability to do it, a technique even of an inefficient sort, an efficiency even in this technique; and that it is such a technique which enables a student to overcome the obstacles imposed by a method, e.g., by unnatural hand positions. One should reflect that it is difficult for him to know what he is really doing, and easy, therefore—so long as he succeeds in doing it—to believe he is doing what a method says he should. It tells him to do this or that for pleasant quality of tone, and he produces tone of pleasant quality; he continues, therefore, to do what he must to produce the pleasant quality, and to believe that he is doing what often cannot be done or, if he can do it, what is either useless or dangerous, e.g., the current system of sadistic idiocy linked (wrongly, I am sure) with the name of the pianist Leschetizky. In other words, from considerable instruction one benefits most by ignoring it.

B. H. HAGGIN

New York's First Labor Bank

We share profits with our depositors.
Therefore 4<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub>%
Pay
to our Thrift Accounts

All deposits made until July 31st
will bear interest from July 1st

THE AMALGAMATED BANK
OF NEW YORK
11-15 UNION SQUARE

10 Days in MOSCOW and LENINGRAD

Extensions arranged for
to visit any part of U.S.S.R.

Free Vis
$450
UP

Across Europe to RUSSIA

AUGUST 4th

S.S. ROTTERDAM

AUGUST 10th S.S. PARIS

Going: via London,
Copenhagen, Helsingfors

Return: Warsaw, Berlin, Paris

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

Agents for Official Soviet Travel Bureau

69 Fifth Ave. N. Y. Tel Algonquin 6900

THE MYTH OF ADAM AND EVE

By Paul Lafargue

The Genesis story studied in the light of modern anthropology.
Brilliant, fascinating, suggestive. 25 cents, postpaid.

Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago

Have You Read These Books?

- |  |                        |
|--|------------------------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> The Professor's House | by Willa Cather        |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Some Do Not           | by Ford Madox Ford     |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Dark Laughter         | by Sherwood Anderson   |
| <input type="checkbox"/> The Great Hunger      | by Johan Bojer         |
| <input type="checkbox"/> The Moon and Sixpence | by W. Somerset Maugham |
| <input type="checkbox"/> O Genteel Lady!       | by Esther Forbes       |

We will be glad to send you any TWO of the above books FREE. Cut out this advertisement, check your choice, and send it along with one new subscription to The Nation (at $5), secured outside your immediate household. The books will be sent to you free and postpaid.

American Poetry in French

Anthologie de la nouvelle Poésie Américaine. Eugène Jolas.
Paris: Kra. 25 francs.

INTEREST in things American has spread so widely in France since the war that Eugene Jolas, editor of the Franco-American quarterly transition, issued in Paris in English, has deemed it timely to present to the French public an American anthology. Choosing to be inclusive rather than representative, he has translated some 126 poems by 124 poets. The younger radicals are numerous, but from E. A. Robinson to Robinson Jeffers, from Eli Siegel to Isidore Schneider, from Leonie Adams (alphabetically) to Elinor Wylie, hardly a known name is omitted.

However accustomed one may be to reading poems in another tongue, one is invariably startled to discover what happens to familiar, favorite verses when they are bent to translation. It is easy to quote from any such anthology many lines that seem awkward, as it would be to draw, from this one, many that seem most fit; both cullings are irrelevant, unless we remember that the new version is intended, not for us who know the original, but for readers to whom the present rendering is probably the first, to whom the present idiom is native and natural. If we approach the volume with this in mind, judgment is likely to give way to curiosity: What are the poetic powers of the two tongues?

"The Oxford English Dictionary" contains almost 415,000 words; the French "Littré" not quite 210,000. It has been said that, in French, one word may mean many things; in English, many words may mean one thing. While this may annoy the English pedant, it fortifies his compatriot artist; for, even where similarity is so great that the second word does not mark a fine distinction, the terms will have gathered, through the history of the language and the race, different connotations. Urquhart out-Gargantuas Rabelais. This word-nimbus (as notably in the Saxon home-words, emotional, with their paired Norman school-and-court-words, intellectual), this halo of poetry, is of course untranslatable: in Edna St. Vincent Millay's "O world, I cannot hold thee close enough," "hold close" becomes "serrer fort"; Ralph Cheyney's "I am sick of circles, barring out, binding in" becomes "Je suis fatigué des cercles qui m'empêchent, qui m'enchaînent." Besides this finer subtlety of suggestion, English has greater power of emphasis: variable word-order permits flexibility and stress the French can attain only by roundabout devices: "Death's dark nipple" (Babette Deutsch) turns into "la mamelle noire de la mort"; T. S. Eliot's "carefully caught regrets" must be "regrets soigneusement gardés." French (regular) poetry, furthermore, enjoys, instead of the thump of the foot along the line, a subtler syllabic rhythm of varied pause and stress; no beat, but a quieter pulsing. In view of this, the proffered translation of Vachel Lindsay's "The Congo" is a remarkable feat; the limitations here indicated being, of course, inherent in translation, and in no respect unique with the present venturer.

For M. Jolas has already established himself as a poet both in French and in English, and comes with sympathy and skill to his difficult task. I find but one questionable interpretation in his volume: in God's World—

Thy woods, this autumn day, that ache and sag
And all but cry with color—

"cry" is translated as "weep" (pleurer) instead of "cry out." There are, on the other hand, many verbal felicities, especially in rendering concrete images. "The long resounding marble corridors, the shining parlors with shining women in them" (Harriet Monroe) is caught in "Les long couloirs de marbre qui résonnent, les salons luisants avec dedans des femmes resplendissantes." The exact simplicity of Alfred Kreymborg's "Old Manuscript" is all preserved, and the strange intensity of the close of Jeffers's "Roan Stallion." While there is seldom an effort to retain the form of the English poem, M. Jolas occasionally, as with Robinson's "Richard Corey," deftly renders a regular form. His most frequent successes, however, are with the freer forms; as the brief introductory notices reveal, his heart is with the radicals. Throughout the volume, none the less, he maintains a general faithfulness, and achieves a poetic quality, that make the "Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie américaine" an excellent first view of our poetry for the readers of France.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

Books in Brief

Morale Sclorum of John of Garland. Edited by Louis John Paetow. University of California Press. $4.25.

Thirteen years ago Professor Paetow edited and translated "The Battle of the Seven Arts." Now he has performed the same service for the "Morality of Students," another thirteenth-century satire on the state of learning of the times, written by a professor of the University of Paris. Five manuscripts, now edited for the first time, together with their glosses, form the basis of the text. As in the earlier volume, the text is accompanied by an excellent translation into English, so that even those who have no interest in Latin texts may share in this illumination.

Examples of San Bernardino. Chosen by Ada Harrison. Illuminated by Robert Austin. Oxford University Press. $4.

A beautiful limited edition of stories drawn from the sermons of a fifteenth-century Franciscan preacher brings with it the shock of incongruity that is associated with so much of our later-day medievalism. This is an excellently presented volume of shrewd, vivid stories, well chosen for interest and illustrated with a fine simplicity. But one recognizes with difficulty the San Bernardino who appears in this guise; he is hardly the evangelist, of canny power to awaken popular meetings and to save himself from the occasional well-directed attacks of enemies, who moved up and down Italy emblazoning it with his famous device of the name of Jesus, conducting public burnings of trinkets and calling in, unhesitatingly, the aid of superstition when other means failed to further his divine mission. These are some of the exempla such as all preachers of the period used to simplify the moral issue and to rouse the auditor to interest. What surprises one is that the selections from the works of this man should have dissolved his resolute fanaticism in a gentle sweetness. A fuller translation might have held less of aesthetic possibility, but a more vivid personality would have appeared—and the Middle Ages might have been saved some of the whimsy of our modern reading of it.

Ireland and the Foundations of Europe. By Benedict Fitzpatrick. Funk and Wagnalls Company. $4.

Mr. Fitzpatrick comes nearer exemplifying a tradition than explaining a culture. There survive letters in which Irish scholars of the Middle Ages had to be rebuked for supposing Ireland the center of learning; we are offered here a solemn presentation of just that boast in modern guise. It is regrettable that the author is so swept with enthusiasm that he feels none of the reasonable doubts. Unsolved controversies are resolved, usually with poetically felt conclusions and usually without the statement of facts; that a man was called Scotus seems to be enough to show that he was Irish; if records show he came from England there were Irish colonies in England, and if he was learned, pious, or strong there is already presumption for working him into the tradition. In this fashion the survey proceeds from Colombanus through Scotus Eriugena to the twelfth century. There is glamorous material here; it appears, however, only as formula permits it—all boasting and praising of Irish is to be taken literally and all Continental depreciation is to be interpreted. There is some correction for these exaggerated tendencies in an excellent bibliography.

The Last Bohemia. By Francis Carco. Translated from the French by Madeleine Boyd. Henry Holt. $3.

A delightful, splendidly sentimental ragbag of reminiscences by one of the most picturesque of the group of pre-war Bohemians who once ruled Montmartre and Montparnasse. What a group! And what amazing stories are told of them—Utrillo, Max Jacob, André Salmon, Roland Dorgelès, the tragic Modigliani, Pierre MacOrlan. Out of that group were born exciting literary and artistic movements—cubism, the roman d'aventures, French-wing futurism. But Carco, a born atmospheric writer, avoids all this and gives us instead an unforgettable, mad picture of Bohemian raggedness and splendor, the smell of the bistros, the sad trek from Montmartre to Montparnasse which heralded the decline of the last Bohemia.

Jay Gould: The Story of a Fortune. By Robert Irving Warshaw. Greenberg, Publisher. $3.50.

This is a breezy yet convincing biography of the "five-foot consumptive Napoleon of finance" whose utterly unscrupulous genius for turning everything he touched into gold makes King Midas and Aladdin look like third-raters. The book might well be read as a companion-piece to Mr. Asbury's history of New York's gangsters. If this is done, the reader will discover that Mr. Asbury's wharf-rats and cutthroats seem positively virtuous when compared with Mr. Warshaw's suavely fiendish multimillionaire.

The Empire-Builder. By Oscar M. Sullivan. The Century Company. $2.50.

Viewed either as fiction or fact, this "biographical novel" about James J. Hill fails to satisfy. As a work of fiction it is thin and jejune, and as a biography it is highly sentimentalized. Example—Hill is favorably compared with Leonardo da Vinci.

Urban Land Economics. By Herbert B. Dorau and Albert G. Hnman. The Macmillan Company. $4.

This is a pioneer work, covering the many complex land problems that have arisen out of urbanization. Both economic theory and current practice are dealt with. An interesting concluding chapter deals with the future of American cities, which will be, the authors believe, of four types—the generalized city, the specialized industrial city, the specialized commercial city, and the residential city.

Sir Walter Raleigh. By Milton Waldman. The Golden Hind Series. Edited by Milton Waldman. Harper and Brothers. $4.

This is a commendably judicious, temperate, and generally competent book. Mr. Waldman, as editor of a series of biographies on great explorers and adventurers, has set a high standard for his associates.

Cromwell. By G. R. Stirling Taylor. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

A shrewd, hard-headed, wise, and witty volume that is only slightly marred by repetitions, and that shows a vast amount of knowledge easily borne by its jaunty author. Cromwell's early teacher, it appears, "took some trouble to convince his fellow-citizens that the Pope of Rome was Antichrist; which, after a few generations of Renaissance popes, was either self-evident or immaterial." Cromwell himself had "the mind of a fanatic, who can make himself believe what is not true—which is a great help in practical life"; and the net result of all his mighty struggles was that "he had convinced England that another Stuart, with all his tyranny, would be better than another Cromwell, with all his liberty."

THEATERS

—THE THEATRE GUILD Presents—

"PORGY" || REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

|| JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 5:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

|| GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

—THE ACTOR MANAGERS present—

GRAND STREET FOLLIES
OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th St., West of Broadway.
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Tues. (Pop.) & Thurs.

The most powerful book in its appeal to humanitarians since MOTHER INDIA!

Condemned to Devil's Island by BLAIR NILES

A fictional biography, the first book in English to describe the tortured dwellers in infamous and mysterious Devil's Island Penal Colony. Mrs. Niles tells with almost unbearable realism the heart-rending story of thousands of men cast off from civilization and left to endure a life starved of sex and hope until they are released by death or sent home as broken men.

PROFESSOR HARRY ELMER BARNES writes Mrs. Niles: "I know of no other study in any language which presents an adequate picture of life in the convict colony. Your book is veritably an international event."

"It reads better than most novels. Yet the inescapable thing about it is its overwhelming veracity." — N. Y. Herald-Tribune.

Illustrated
3rd Printing
At Bookstores
$3.00
HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Ave.
New York

Opium Leaks Through

By ELLEN N. LA MOTTE

London, England, June 1

AT the meeting of the Opium Committee, in September, Signor Cavazzoni, the delegate from Italy, presented his memorandum. This was an elaborate plan for preventing the leakage of drugs into the illicit trade. It was unwelcome, because there is no desire on the part of the drug-making nations to close these leaks—to interfere with their profits, in other words. But Signor Cavazzoni took them up on their often repeated expressions of regret over the illicit traffic, and presented them with a minutely worked-out scheme for controlling drugs after they leave the factory, by which each kilo could be followed to its ultimate destination and it could be discovered at what point and through whose hands the drugs got loose.

A small subcommittee was appointed to study this unpopular plan and to make its report to the eleventh meeting of the Opium Committee, which began on April 12, 1928. The composition of the subcommittee made its decision a foregone conclusion—Great Britain, France, Holland, Switzerland, and Germany, the biggest drug-making nations in the world. With Cavazzoni, of course, thrown in as a sop, just to prevent the thing from being too obvious.

This subcommittee went over the Cavazzoni scheme item by item and point by point, and tossed out each one with such comments as "We do not think it necessary to do this," or "For the present such measures would appear superfluous," and "This proposal was accepted in principle, but with reservations." So on, all the way through. You see, if the Cavazzoni plan had been adopted, it would have ruined the drug trade. The factories could have continued to make drugs by the ton, as they are doing now, but there would have been no way for them to escape. There is no object in intensive manufacture, unless there is an outlet. So the subcommittee leaped on this plan like a mongoose on a snake, and broke its back. As a substitute, just to show their honorable intentions, they brought in a model set of rules, or code, which they hope all nations will adopt. Cavazzoni remarked drily that these "model rules" appear to be those already in existence in most countries, under which the illicit trade is doing so well!

In spite of his defeat, Cavazzoni is not discouraged. The killing of his control scheme at least reveals the state of mind of his enemies. Their position is now well defined: Unlimited raw material, such as opium; unlimited manufacture of drugs; and now, wide-open channels into the illicit markets.

This recent meeting passed off peacefully, but several revelations of great significance occurred. One was as to the manufacture of codein, which came about in this manner. One of the three assessors, Mr. Brenier, has a passion for making graphs. He hung up at one end of the conference room a large graph, about six feet square, done in colors, showing the production of raw materials, the manufacture of drugs, consumption per capita, exports and imports—every phase of the entire opium problem was squeezed into that one crowded chart. At once the British-

India delegate said he did not want it displayed—it was probably wrong. Mr. Brenier insisted that it was based upon the figures sent in by the various governments in their annual reports. Some discussion followed, and in the end a vote was taken as to the fate of this graph—the French delegate wanted it reproduced in small size and distributed to the committee—and the vote turned out in favor of producing it. Those opposed were the two British delegates.

The day came when the little graphs were ready and given out, and then Mr. Brenier, with his fishing-rod, took his place at the end of the room and explained his little graph. He said you could tell at a glance what it was about, but his explanation took two hours. Naturally, no one was much interested. Presumably they all knew the facts, and it was no treat to have Mr. Brenier, in his enthusiasm, call attention to them. But Mr. Brenier went on and on, pausing while the translator turned his remarks into English, and then returned again to the charge, while the delegates got more and more bored and restless. Finally, the German delegate could stand it no longer. He broke in with a remark that the graph was all wrong. The big square showing the manufacture of morphine was too small. It should have been twice the size, and most probably larger still. True, it was based on the figures sent in by the different countries, but the reports were not accurate. They only reported the amount of morphine which remained as morphine; they did not report the morphine which had been turned into codein.

Codein, it should be said, is a drug which does not come under either convention, and hence is not recorded. All the factories of the world are now turning out codein because this drug, not coming under the conventions, can circulate freely in all countries. This immense and intensive manufacture of codein represents the effort being made by all nations to capture the international markets. Germany, which makes 20 tons of morphine a year, turns 70 per cent into codein; England, 50 per cent; Switzerland, 33 per cent. In all, said the German delegate, at least fifty or sixty tons of morphine are made each year and fully half of that amount—probably more than half—is turned into codein.

How the German came to offer this gratuitous bit of information one cannot imagine. Had he kept silent, no one would have given the show away. Was it pure boredom on his part, his irritation getting the upper hand as he sat listening to Mr. Brenier's interminable explanations? Or is it a sign that the heretofore solid opium bloc is disintegrating, and that Germany, the greatest morphine maker in the world, is going to turn over a new leaf?

Cavazzoni at once sprang into the opening thus offered. He asked how the committee could meet year after year and talk about the alarming increase in illicit traffic, knowing all the time that at least thirty tons of morphine (changed into codein) were flowing freely from one country to the other, neither accounted for nor recorded. And, he added, the committee has just thrown out my scheme for stopping illicit traffic, part of which included thorough supervision of the factories. What proof is there that the morphine they say is made into codein is really made into codein? As codein can pass over all frontiers, one wonders if customs officials ever open the boxes labeled codein. And if they do open them, how is a customs official to tell the difference between morphine and codein, which look alike?

Are these boxes of "codein" ever submitted to a laboratory examination? These revelations show why the United States has such a large drug problem; and why smuggling from Canada is so easy.

Another trick of the drug profiteers is the making of morphine-esters. These are made by treating morphine with an acid. An ester is an innocuous drug that can be exported and imported freely. A manufacturer can import a ton of one of these esters, take it to his factory and remove the acid, and at once he is in possession of a quantity of morphine which is not accounted for or recorded, and which can be slipped out into the devious channels so well known to the smuggling fraternity. It is only in the last three or four years that these esters have come to play such an important part. The best known is benzoyl-morphine. The number of esters is unlimited. The only country that has taken any action against them is Japan, which forbids their manufacture and their importation. It was the British delegate who raised this question of the esters—he said the situation was exceedingly serious, and asked that benzoyl-morphine be put on the list of drugs controlled by the conventions. But to ask for but one—benzoyl-morphine—while leaving 99,000 other combinations at liberty, is hardly sufficient.

The truth is, the two opium conventions, the Hague and that of Geneva (not yet in force), have the bottoms left out. These two drugs, codein and the esters, are morphine derivatives, not opium derivatives, which is where the catch lies. Opium derivatives (morphine and heroin) come within the scope of the conventions, but morphine derivatives (a second remove) do not. And as the Dutch delegate remarked at this meeting, "We left them out on purpose." If the Hague convention and the Geneva convention are thus wide open, the only thing to do is to call another international opium conference and draw up another convention, less like a sieve. But what is the use of that? With bad faith, you can do nothing.

Much valuable publicity has come through the public meetings of the Opium Committee. But now, one fears, even this may be withdrawn. The Geneva convention requires but one ratification before coming into effect; and this means the establishment of the Central Board. The committee has avoided any discussion as to the allotment of work between the Opium Committee and the Central Board, and because of this evasion one fears that to the Central Board (whose first requisite is secrecy) will be submitted all the valuable statistics which have heretofore been discussed by the Opium Committee. It is no wonder that the opium bloc wishes to retire into obscurity, but the tactics of the Opium Committee, which the public could follow, do not inspire much confidence in the Central Board, which the public cannot follow. Its constitution makes no provision for open meetings, and it will dole out whatever information it thinks fit. True, it is to be composed of men who are "impartial" and "independent of their governments." But when you see governments which as governments do not make a penny from the drug trade yet continue to shield it, you begin to wonder. One wonders if "commercial interests" do not dictate the policies of these governments, and whether these same "commercial interests" cannot likewise influence the impartial and independent gentlemen who will compose the Central Board. Bad faith and a convention without a bottom do not seem an ideal foundation for a body whose first requisite is secrecy.

DOWN THE VOLGA

A Leisurely Voyage
Along the fringe
of Asia.

Special Tour sailing July 28.

$390 up.

16 Russian Itineraries . . . . . Weekly sailings

WRITE, PHONE OR CALL FOR LITERATURE

AMERICAN-EUROPEAN TRAVEL BUREAU

Representative of the Official Russian Travel Bureau.

100 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

CHElsea { 5124
4477

OPEN SHELF

Visit or Write
THE FRENCH BOOKMAN
202 WEST 96TH ST. (NEAR BROADWAY)
French books and magazines exclusively, low prices.
Catalogue, 5c (stamps).

Song of Tribute to

SACCO and VANZETTI
(Approved by JOHN HAYNES HOLMES)

Words and Music—10c { 100 copies . . . . . $ 3 500 copies . . . . . 10

MAYDELL PUBLICATIONS

470 Stuart St., Boston

A Call for Thinkers to Direct the World!

Send 10c for The Infinite Nebula, War's Only Solution, The Education of the World's Youth, other articles by different authors.

Away from the tedious trend of trite thought!
LEONARD GENOVESE,
455 Beach 72nd Street,
Arverne, N. Y.

VOCATIONAL SERVICE

GERTRUDE STEIN, INC., 18 E. 41st St., N. Y. C.
Lexington 2593

Unusual secretarial and social service positions. We are glad to hear from Nation readers who need workers or who are looking for positions.

RESTAURANT

The Old Russian Inn

wishes to see its old Friends
in its new home

COOL AND AIRY

23 W. 49th—N. Y. C.

Tel. Circle 10442

HEALTH FOOD

NOW YOU HAVE TIME TO READ

up on Health and Dietetics. We have the most up-to-date books on Health and Health Foods, as well as the largest selection of HEALTH FOODS. We send free, within 150-mile radius, by parcel post. This Week's Specials: Buckwheat flour and groats and natural brown hullless barley, at reduced prices.

HEALTH FOODS DISTRIBUTORS

159 East 34th St., New York City
Phone: Lexington 6926

MARITZA'S Peasant Shop

SPECIAL VACATION SALE

Embroidered voile blouses, $5.00; dresses, $8.95; Russian smocks from $8.50 up. Silk dresses and hats, from 25 to 50% reduction. Morocco bags, $3.50 and $4.50. Palestine embroidered pongee dresses for children $3.75 up.

MARITZA, 172 W. 4th St., nr. 6th Ave.

COUNTRY DAY SCHOOL

OAK LANE Country Day School

New Residence Department for Boys

A large progressive country day school with limited boarding group under competent masters.

Address

WILLIAM B. CURRY, Oak Lane, Philadelphia Pa.

LANGUAGES

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN
75c. Short Course Surprising results
Per Lesson Native Teachers
PRIVATE SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK
Established 1906 Between 85th and 86th Sts.

CONVERSATION—French; Spanish; Italian; German; English; 75c.
INDIVIDUAL ATTENTION; RAPID PROGRESS.
UNIVERSAL INSTITUTE
1265 Lexington Ave. (N. E. Cor. 85th)

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:

Mail your classified ads so they reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.

Rates: $3.08 for one half inch (30 words) minimum. Additional lines of 6 words 62 cents each.

PROPERTY FOR SALE

WHO WANTS THIS BEAUTIFUL HOME
IN BERGEN COUNTY?

6-room house, steam heat, all improvements. Laundry in basement, attic, garage, plot 50x165. $8,500. Also a 6-room house, as above, large garage, all kinds of fruit, beautiful grounds, 175x175. Terms, Owner, E. H. M., Box 137, New Milford, N. J.

UNUSUAL opportunity for one who can act quickly. Due to change of professional plans, owner must sacrifice French Colonial house, on corner lot, 80 x 200, on choice residential avenue, 42 minutes' commutation from downtown. 12 rooms, all improvements, 2-car garage, newly decorated inside and out. Will sell with furniture and new car. Very reasonable terms. Box 812, % The Nation.

WRITER'S mountain home in good condition, furnished, with grounds of 13 acres. Deer, fox and bear hunting. Total price $2,000. Terms, Address Box 12, South Wardsboro, Vermont, for particulars.

FOR Sale—In Adirondacks, 3 acres, 8 room camp. Garage. Price $1,200; part cash. Over 100 other camps and cabins to pick from. Write for booklet, Earl Woodward, Hadley, N. Y.

85TH ST., 330 West. Sacrifice immediately, 8 room beautifully furnished light apartment, $700. 5 rooms rented. Good lease. Good income. L. Underwood, Endicott 1286.

FOR SALE OR RENT

M.D. OPPORTUNITY. House 6 rooms and M.D.'s bath, improvements, garage. Ideal for M.D.'s office and residence. Formerly occupied by M.D. Reasonable. Central New Jersey town. County seat. Box 813, % The Nation.

HELP WANTED

WEEKLY publication of national standing desires Secretary and Office Manager for Managing Editor. Must be first class stenographer, able to compose letters, and conversant with two foreign languages. Apply by letter to Box No. 800, % The Nation.

WOMAN operator of a small tea room for business girls in Chicago hopes to discover a young woman assistant with a Nation outlook. The specification does not preclude a keenly practical head nor a sparkling eye. An essential is a readiness to turn a hand to anything from a paint brush to a service tray, a double-boiler to a ledger or typewriter. The hours are, however, not long, late nor necessarily dull. Box 814, % The Nation.

WANTED—Alert men and women to represent The Nation in every community. Our circulation is on the up-curve and our commissions are as liberal as our editorial policy. If you would like to earn extra money by making friends for The Nation, write to Department 11, % The Nation.

S

U

M

M

E

R

CAMP
TAMIMENT

FOR ADULTS FOREST PARK, PA.

Every modern facility for outdoor sports. Sixteen Tennis Courts. Dancing. Safe, delightful bathing. Entertainment. Dramatics. Excellent food. Occasional lectures. Reasonable rates.

Write Forest Park, Pa. Tel. Stroudsburg 71R2

For Refreshing Rest
in Real Country

Take a vacation at Topstone Farm, in the seclusion of the Connecticut hills, where quiet back-country roads, hillside pastures, woods, old orchards, brooks and ponds invite you. There is room for a limited number of guests. Hiking, swimming, horse-back riding, sun-bathing. Only 1½ hours from New York.

TOPSTONE FARM

Write: R. F. D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn.

Telephone Ridgefield 648

We shall appreciate your being recommended by someone we know.

FURNISHED APARTMENT

93RD, 317 W. (Drive)—Beautiful 4 room elevator apartment, 2 bedrooms, all light, completely furnished, very reasonable. Fadiman, Riverside 7988.

APARTMENT WANTED

TEACHER with daughter ten, wishes small apartment near Hunter College. Give full particulars. Box 811, % The Nation.

POSITIONS WANTED

ARCHITECTURAL DRAFTSMAN (West Indian) desires practical experience. Will work for small wages. Ernest Mair, 211 W. 146th St., N. Y.

INTELLIGENT young Negro desires employment. Will go anywhere. Box 816, % The Nation.

FOR SALE

MAHOGANY four-post bed and coil spring are for sale at a very reasonable price. The bed is three-quarter size, the posts about 5½ feet high. Can be seen by appointment. Phone Mr. Fisher, Whitehall 7730, or write Box 817, % The Nation.

FOR A SUPERB SUMMER VACATION
Come to IDEAL
of SMALL CAMPS

Capacity Limited—Inspiring Adirondack Setting—Every Desirable facility for sports. Surpassing accommodations. Unusual Social Events. Wholesome Food.

The camp for discriminating vacationists. RATES, per week $32.50

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
WARRENSBURG, N. Y.

City: 1440 B'way Tel. LONGacre 5432

WEEK-END or VACATION in BELLE HARBOR at VILLA GARDENS
IDEAL FOR COMMUTERS

Surf bathing—clean beaches—no crowds—one house from ocean. Home atmosphere—modern building—hot and cold water in every room. Thirty-five minutes from Penn. or Flatbush Avenue Stations. Every facility for relaxation and recreation. Special rate $15. Friday Dinner to Monday Breakfast inclusive; good service—excellent food. Information will be furnished on request for weekly or season rates; moderate.

Phone Reservations—Belle Harbor 0518 or Rector 4918, or write

VILLA GARDENS—149 Beach 127th St.
(ROCKAWAY PARK) BELLE HARBOR, L. I.

FOR those seeking a haven of rest, beautiful country, tennis and wholesome food; $25.00 per week, 1½ hours from Grand Central.

Hil-Bert House, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
H. Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 15-J

THE LESTER HOUSE

Roscoe, N. Y., Sullivan County

TENNIS, SWIMMING, BOATING

GOOD FOOD. RATES $25 PER WEEK

SUMMER PLACES FOR RENT

SUMMER Bargain—Rent old Colonial house near Sound, commuting distance, New York. Six weeks $200. Write James Myers, Cos Cob, Conn.

SHARE COTTAGE

ENGLISH COUPLE would like to share charming cottage in Westchester, commuting distance. Terms reasonable. Box 818, % The Nation.

CHILD-CARE

UNIVERSITY GRADUATE, thoroughly experienced, will care for normal child over 2. High, healthful location, vicinity New York. Genuine home surroundings. Best references. Terms moderate. Box 815, % The Nation.

Any Change of Address

should be mailed to our Subscription Department at least two weeks before it is to become effective. This will insure uninterrupted delivery of The Nation to you, and will materially lessen the pressure of work in our office. When notifying us be sure to give both old and new addresses and stipulate the exact date upon which you desire the change made.

SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT

The Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 25, 1928

No. 3290

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	73
EDITORIALS:
What Is This Kellogg Talk About Peace?.....	76
The Sacco Record.....	77
Arctic Heroes—and Others.....	77
Literary Cliques .....	78
FULL CIRCLE. By Hendrik van Loon.....	79
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	80
MR. LORIMER AND ME. By Sinclair Lewis.....	81
CHICAGO BULLETS. Anonymous.....	82
WHEN RACES INTERMARRY. By Earnest Albert Hooton.....	84
SUMMER SCHOOL. By Lorine Pruette.....	86
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	87
CORRESPONDENCE .....	88
BOOKS AND MOVIES:
An Infidelity. By Garreta Busey.....	90
The Radical. By Ruth Lechlitner.....	90
Americans All. By H. L. Mencken.....	90
"George, Be a King." By Robert Livingston Schuyler.....	91
The Innocence of Father Walsh. By Harold Kelloock.....	91
Figures of Earth. By John E. Lind.....	92
The Canadian Granary. By C. McKay.....	92
Books in Brief.....	93
Moving Pictures: The Russian Contribution. By Alexander Bakshy.....	94
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Communism in China. By Pearl S. Buck.....	97

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

TO NAME J. J. RASKOB chairman of the Democratic National Committee was a characteristic piece of Al Smith strategy. It was surprising—Raskob had listed himself in "Who's Who" as a Republican, and his name had not been prominent among the candidates—and it was bold. Smith has a genius for making headline news. There is no doubt of Raskob's capacity. By sheer ability he has lifted himself from a $5-a-week clerkship to his present position as millionaire chief of the General Motors Corporation, which has put the Cadillac, the Buick, and the Chevrolet where they are in the automobile world. Presumably the organizing talent which has made history in the motor world can adapt itself to a political campaign. Presumably, too, Raskob has friends who will help to grease the wheels of the Democratic campaign. He is a vice-president of the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Company—Irénée du Pont, president of the great Delaware munitions firm, has already announced his support of Smith for President. Raskob's appointment should do much to stifle business fear of a Democratic President, and start the flow of campaign contributions.

RASKOB LIKES AL, and Al likes Raskob. But Raskob has hitherto been a Republican; he openly supported Coolidge in 1924, and later came out for his renomination. What brings him to leadership of the Democratic Party? So far as one can discover, only his fondness for Al and his opposition to prohibition. He is an open, avowed Wet. By selecting him to lead the campaign, Al Smith has again insisted upon prohibition as the dominant issue of his campaign. That means, probably, sacrificing Dry border States in a bid for support in the Wet States of the East. This may be good strategy; the ballots will tell. To a degree we admire Al Smith for such frankness; he makes no bones of defending Tammany, and he is increasingly outspoken on prohibition. In comparison with the pussyfooting politicians who either evade the issue or drink in private and support the Volstead Act in public he shines like a sun of sincerity. But his selection of Raskob is to a considerable degree an abandonment of the progressive elements which have given Governor Smith a large part of his popular backing. Raskob is head of one of the greatest open-shop, anti-union corporations in the country. To name him may prove that Wall Street need no longer fear the Democratic Party; but it seems also to mean that progressives need not look to Smith for support. Since George Norris of Nebraska has refused to lead the Middle Western Farmer-Labor effort to form a third party, more and more liberals who take their economic principles seriously will vote for Norman Thomas, the Socialist candidate for President.

MEANWHILE MR. HOOVER remains magnificently mute. He has announced that he will have nothing to say until he is notified of his nomination on August 11. He will appear on the rear platform of his private train, and he will bow and smile. He will confer in private with his advisers and with President Coolidge. But the public will have to worry along with only the rear-platform smiles, the movie and Sunday-supplement pictures to feed its curiosity. It may be that the public, fed on a diet of tabloids, has been reduced to liking its candidates to be purely ornamental; but we confess that we have an old-fashioned preference for a man who speaks out. We should like to see the Republican candidate for President face a battery of hard-boiled, cynical reporters and tell what he really thinks about farm relief, the "experiment" of prohibition, Nicaragua, Muscle Shoals, and the power-trust propaganda. We should even like to listen in while the tabloid reporters sought his views on the Tunney-Heenan fight, Nobile's rescue, horned toads, the secret of Babe Ruth's hitting, the mystery of Lowenstein's disappearance, and how and where he learned to swim.

INVESTIGATION HAS DISCLOSED what everybody knew: that Southern post-office jobs are regularly sold outright in return for contributions to Republican campaign committees. Bascom Slemph, once a Congressman, later secretary to Calvin Coolidge, and still later official delegate-collector for Herbert Hoover, was one of the post-office brokers in the old days, and his letters insisting upon the contributions were printed in the Congressional Record. The practice dates back to the carpet-bagging days just after the Civil War. Little has been done about it in the past, and we suspect that little will be done now. Postmaster General New has served notice that he will dismiss any postmaster or letter carrier who admits having paid for his job. That seems to us cruel and futile. The postmasters and letter carriers did not implore the Republican committeemen to let them pay for their jobs. They were assessed. They were informed that unless they made "voluntary contributions" they would have no jobs. The responsible sinners are the men who profit by these sales. As the New York World points out:

The organization in the South is an important part—sometimes a decisive element—in the mechanism of Republican Party control. The ten Southern States which the Republicans never carry . . . hold, even under the revised representation, 144 delegates in national conventions. These were the delegates who in 1896, bought up by Mark Hanna, swung the St. Louis convention to McKinley instead of Tom Reed. They were the delegates who in 1912 made the Taft-Root steam-roller effective. All but three of them lined up in a solid phalanx at the last convention for Hoover and assured in advance his victory over the combined opposition.

In other words, Mr. Hoover owes his nomination in large part to these petty post-office sales. Has he anything to say about it?

A MAN OF SEA-GREEN HUE, Robespierre, led a revolution in France, and now it is James A. Maxton, the "sea-green incorruptible" of the House of Commons, who leads the Left of the British Labor Party in revolution against the Right. "For some time," states a manifesto signed by Maxton and "Emperor" A. J. Cook, "a number of us have been seriously disturbed as to where the British Labor movement is being led." Events since the general strike of 1926—wherein Cook played a leading role—cause them to fear that it is not heading toward that "socialism in our times" which they feel is the only worth-while goal for Labor. In particular they oppose the peace conference between the Trade Unions Congress and Sir Alfred Mond's group of employers. For Maxton and Cook such attempts at compromise and reform are not only futile but illogical; for them there can be no compromise between capitalism and socialism. If the Labor Party is content with gentle reform policies, they believe, it is but another liberal party with a different name. Their manifesto declares that they "no longer can stand by and see thirty years of devoted work destroyed in making peace with capitalism."

WE COMMENTED recently [June 27] upon the adverse effect upon the political fortunes of Governor Fuller of the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. But it would be of more practical value if this blot upon the justice of Massachusetts should lead to a general revulsion in the United States against capital punishment. Such is the effect, we learn from a Berlin dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune, of what the correspondent calls Germany's Sacco-Vanzetti affair. Two years ago Joseph Jakubovsky was executed on a charge of having murdered his four-year-old son. Jakubovsky was a Russian, and in spite of the fact that he spoke imperfect German he was not allowed to have an interpreter. The chief evidence against him was that of a neighbor who has since been removed to an insane asylum. Since the execution there has been a growing belief that it was a miscarriage of justice. Baron Kurt von Reibnitz, an aristocrat and the Socialist Premier of the State of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, is leading a movement to clear Jakubovsky's name. Several of the jurors have said that they did not expect the Russian would be executed, as capital punishment has been on the wane in Germany since the republic. When the Reichstag meets again an effort will be made to do away with the death penalty in the German penal code. The Socialists will use the Jakubovsky case as an argument against judicial murder.

COTTON MANUFACTURERS of New Bedford who opened their mills and summoned their employees back to work after twelve weeks of strike were given a dramatic rebuff when 18,000 strikers appeared at the mill gates but only thirty workers returned to their machines. The victory of the strikers in keeping their ranks virtually intact after three months of hunger is all the more remarkable because the National Guard and special police details were at the mill gates to protect and encourage strike-breakers. The strikers conducted themselves with such scrupulous respect for the law that the National Guard was immediately withdrawn. The left-wing group among the strikers, with two leaders in prison, continues to suffer at the hands of local police, but the morale of the strike is unbroken. Strike relief is meager, but all who apply are given some food. Now it is the manufacturers' turn to crack. Persistent rumors of a split in the owners' ranks give hope for a strike victory in the near future.

ADDRESSING THE MOTION-PICTURE publicity men recently, Mayor Walker intimated that for the coming Presidential campaign "the industry had been delivered into the camp of one of the major political parties." This suggestion was promptly attacked by Louis B. Mayer and other officials of the industry. The news reels, they said, were like newspapers—offering space to all sorts of topics without discrimination. Erce† C. McAteer, Assistant Director of Visual Education in the Los Angeles city schools, seems to disagree. In the Educational Screen for June she explains how the movies have counteracted un-Americanism in the past and how they must proceed in the future. Primarily, she says, the movies should carry the message of pride and patriotism. "For such a purpose we have such films as 'The Big Parade,' 'West Point,' and . . . our news reels showing . . . our powerful navy and a hundred and one other objects of pride." Miss McAteer fears that if we do not watch out the "stream of subversive Bolshevik agitation" will sap the foundations of our country. Now "What influence . . . can motion pictures exert on the mind of the growing child to counteract in part such subversive influences?" They can, she suggests, "do much . . . by showing the miserable failure of communism in Russia . . . the starvation, hardships, deprivations, and degradations suffered by that people." With Miss McAteer as director it should not be hard to obtain such a picture on almost any lot in Hollywood. But would it prove that the movies are never used for propaganda?

GOOD-WILL MISSIONS seem to be one of the chief products of American enterprise and business capacity: good-will fliers to South America, Lindbergh in Mexico, Central America, and the islands of the Caribbean, and now an invitation from the American-Russian Chamber of Commerce to aviator Chukhnovsky, Professor Samoilovich, and the rest of the Russian expedition for the relief of Nobile to come to America as the guests of the chamber. Never since the Revolution has Russia stood so high in the estimation of the rest of mankind. All people of all classes in every country have waited with breathless eagerness for the news day by day of the sturdy Krasin and the daring aviators who finally succeeded in saving all but five of the 21 explorers and would-be rescuers who have been taken off the ice here and there in the Arctic. Certainly now is the time to crystallize this widespread but rather imponderable "good-will" into a solid sentiment. It is of such stuff, deftly handled, that decent international relations are made. It is from this, too, that trade and profits flow. We congratulate the chamber on its imagination and enterprise; and we await with eager delight the day when the Bolshevik heroes shall ride up Broadway amid showers of ticker-tape to be welcomed on the steps of City Hall by Grover Whalen in his finest top hat.

A TWENTY-TWO-YEAR-OLD LAD was struck by a bolt of lightning; a forty-eight-year-old veteran became President of Mexico for the second time—and it is hard to tell which event seemed more important to the Mexicans, or which was. For young Emiliano Carranza symbolized a 1928 Mexico in a flaming, dramatic way; the "Mexican Lindbergh" was living evidence that boys who grew up in an ancient Spanish environment on the ruins of a still more ancient Aztec civilization could play heroic roles in the new mechanical age. He removed that inevitable sense of amazed inferiority which peoples of the richest old cultures feel when faced with the self-assured Anglo-Saxon who has grown up among machines and can almost make a flying machine out of a canvas tent and a junked Ford car. And the thought of a Mexican flying alone over the mountains, deserts, and seas from Mexico City to Washington did much to dispel the cocksure superiority with which Yankees have been wont to regard the land across the Rio Grande. That boy who met death alone in a Jersey thunderstorm did as much to establish mass good-will between two peoples as a dozen diplomats—although perhaps it was Dwight Morrow who saw what Carranza's flight might do and sent him forth. Obregon's return to power as successor to his friend Calles means little change; he has proved himself an able administrator, and presumably he will not break sharply with any of Calles's policies. One can only regret that his campaign for reelection was scarred by the armed revolt, and subsequent execution, of his two chief rivals.

GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN was ninety years old on July 20. It is startling to realize that a man who resigned from one British Cabinet on a point of conscience fifty-eight years ago and from another forty-two years ago is among our contemporaries today. A generation has grown up too young to recall even that one of Sir George's sons resigned from still another Cabinet on another point of conscience only fourteen years ago—Charles Philips Trevelyan, who, with John Morley and John Burns, left the Asquith Cabinet because he would not compromise with war. A younger son, the poet Robert, was a conscientious objector. The third son, George Macaulay Trevelyan, historian of Italy, saw things differently. Statesman, poet, historian—the three sons expressed three sides of their father's rich life. One of the most terrible indictments of British rule in India ever penned is contained in his "Cawnpore," published sixty-three years ago. In that account of the Sepoy Rebellion he wrote that the Indians learned too late that our soldiers could kill within a year more heathen than our missionaries had converted in the course of a century; that our social-science talk about the sacredness of human life and our May-meeting talk concerning our duty toward those benighted souls for whom Christ died meant that we were to forgive most of those who had never injured us and seldom hang an innocent Hindu if we could catch a guilty one; that the great principles of mercy and justice and charity must cease to be eternally true until the injured pride of the mighty nation had been satisfied, its wrath glutted, and its sway restored.

That is the rebel spirit that has made England morally great. We salute Sir George on his birthday, and congratulate him and England that the race and the spirit of the Trevelyan is still strong.

"PREHISTORIC" DOES NOT MEAN so much in the Arctic as it does in Mesopotamia. Little was known of the Bering Sea before the Dane whose name it bears explored it in the year 1725, and its barren islands have never been thoroughly studied. The four prehistoric mummies discovered by the Stoll-McCracken expedition may help to solve the mystery of the Indian migrations from Asia, or they may merely add one more chapter to our knowledge of the North Asiatic peoples. They date, the dispatches report, from the "Stone Age." But the Stone Age in the Arctic is recent enough to be historic. The mummies, for all we yet know about them, may be less than two hundred years old. They are not, apparently, even mummies in the ordinary sense of the term. Presumably they were like the other "mummies" hitherto discovered in the same region, at least one of which was preserved in alcohol and sent to a museum. It was the stories of these "mummies" which sent the Stoll-McCracken expedition on its way; it has found precisely what it sought. Arctic soil preserves better than alcohol or formalin or even the mysterious fluids of the Egyptians. A person buried three feet beneath the Arctic sod should reveal even his complexion after 10,000 years; and this is no guess of science, for mammoths at least as ancient have been discovered in the snows of North Siberia with their flesh so perfectly refrigerated as to be edible.

GIOVANNI GIOLITTI, who has just died in his eighty-sixth year, was known as the "Old Fox" of Italian politics; he had participated in every conceivable parliamentary combination on every side of every political fence. The first of his five premierships began in 1892, and ended in a scandal that led to his impeachment. Ten years later he came into office again, with the support of the Socialists. His greatest achievement was, probably, the wide extension of the suffrage—but even that has gone by the board under Mussolini's sway. Giolitti vigorously opposed Italy's participation in the World War and was accused of being pro-German. In fact, he merely foresaw that participation in the war could bring Italy nothing, and believed that "sacro egoismo" dictated a watch-and-wait policy. The misfortunes of the peace brought him back into public favor, but his policy of balancing one parliamentary group against another did not supply the necessary vigor. First, he supported the Socialists; then he indorsed Mussolini. Still later, he became the leader of a rather futile parliamentary opposition to the Mussolinian dictatorship, and his last public act was a bold denunciation of the new Fascist electoral law. But, shifting so often, he had forfeited public confidence. Opposition to Mussolini will have to be built around men who have not trimmed their sails to so many political storms.

What Is This Kellogg Talk About Peace?

ARTICLE I

The High Contracting Parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

ARTICLE II

The High Contracting Parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which shall arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

THOSE are the magnificent words which form the heart of what is coming to be known as the "Kellogg Peace Pact." Read by themselves, they outlaw war. The Covenant of the League required its members to agree to submit all disputes to arbitration or inquiry, and not to resort to war until three months after the arbitral award or report, but it left the gap that war might then be declared. The Kellogg pact seems to close that gap. Unqualified, it would constitute a new era in international relations.

Unfortunately, it is not unqualified. Mr. Kellogg's note of June 23 substantially accepted the French reserves to his original treaty. We have no quarrel with his acceptance of the French plea that if one nation goes to war in violation of its solemn pledge the others would automatically be released from their obligation toward it. We agree with him that it would have been well to understand this without saying it, rather than to incorporate in the documents an express expectation that some of the Powers may violate their promises. His express acceptance of this principle is, furthermore, an implied indorsement of the League Covenant and the Locarno pacts.

Mr. Kellogg's acceptance of an undefined right of self-defense is another matter, opening the gates to such interpretation of his pact as may leave nothing of it. "There is nothing in the American draft of an anti-war treaty," he says, "which restricts or impairs in any way the right of self-defense. . . . Every nation is free at all times and regardless of treaty provisions to defend its territory from attack or invasion and it alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense." But what is the use of outlawing war if each nation is left to decide for itself "whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense"? Did anyone ever hear of a nation declaring war without insisting that its war was essentially a measure of self-defense? The words are particularly ominous when one recalls President Coolidge's declaration at the United Press dinner on April 26, 1927, that "the person and property of a citizen are a part of the general domain, even when abroad." There is no form of international skulduggery which could not slip safely through the loose net of those words. We need definition of the words "war" and "self-defense" if this pact is to mean anything at all.

Mr. Kellogg's letter of June 23 simply ignored the significant passage in Sir Austen Chamberlain's note of May 19. But it raised questions which, once raised, cannot be forgotten unless explicitly disavowed. Sir Austen said:

There are certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety.

His Majesty's Government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions cannot be suffered. Their protection against attack is to the British Empire a measure of self-defense. It must be clearly understood that His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect. The Government of the United States has comparable interests, any violation of which by a foreign Power they have declared that they would regard as an unfriendly act. His Majesty's Government believe, therefore, that in defining their position they are expressing the intention and meaning of the United States Government.

Well, are they? Mr. Kellogg has not said, that is, directly. But in explaining that his pact would have no effect upon the Administration's private war in Nicaragua he has by implication agreed with Sir Austen's generous reservations. Presumably Britain, despite his pact, would be left free to adopt similar means to prevent "interference"—whatever that may mean—in "certain regions of the world"—which, while undefined, certainly include Egypt, the Sudan, the Arabian Peninsula, and the Persian Gulf, and perhaps also Afghanistan, Tibet, and the Malay Archipelago. In return the United States is free to use such means as the State Department and the Marine Corps may judge opportune to maintain the "welfare and integrity" of Latin America, and to guard it against "interference" or "attack."

This needs clearing up. As Lord Cecil of Chelwood says in the London Spectator: "To renounce war only in cases of minor importance is to refuse to renounce it at all. If Great Britain reserved certain questions in the manner indicated, other nations would undoubtedly do the same, and the renunciation of war would be reduced to an empty and meaningless formula."

Another Englishman, Henry N. Brailsford, has remarked in the New Republic that "the extent to which, without the sin of 'war,' one may trespass on one's neighbor's territory, bombard his towns, slaughter his citizens, blockade his coasts, and coerce his government to do that which it would not spontaneously do is one of the most surprising discoveries of our refined civilization." The Western Powers have never been technically at war with Soviet Russia although they have occupied her soil, blockaded her ports, and caused the deaths of some hundreds of thousands of Russians. Our operations in Nicaragua have not been, in Mr. Kellogg's eyes, "war," although they have been conducted by 5,000 men in uniform, equipped with modern ammunition and accompanied by squadrons of bombing planes. It was not "war" when Japan sent 5,000 troops 600 miles inland to Tsinanfu and used three-inch cannon and Stokes mortars to reduce the walls of the old Chinese city to dust, killing several hundred Chinese in the process. Nor was it war when British gunboats bombarded the defenseless city of Wanhhsien, 1,200 miles up the Yangtze River.

We want more light on this Kellogg Pact. We want to know precisely what it does outlaw. We want a definition of "war" and of "self-defense." If the peoples of the world, told that their governments had signed a treaty that outlawed war forever, should discover that all that had been outlawed was the use of the word "war" and that their governments intended to continue acting precisely as they had always been acting, the disillusionment might be painful for all concerned. Perhaps it would be better to have no peace pact than one of so dubious a character. Analysis of Mr. Kellogg's explanations of his treaty is certainly leading many to a dispiriting suspicion that perhaps the whole affair is intended rather as an election-year gesture to warm the hearts of the American people toward the Republican Party than as a real forward step in international relations.

The Sacco Record

WHATEVER we of this generation and country believe in regard to the guilt or innocence of Nicolo Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, a feeling is crystallizing that their arrest, trial, and execution are going down into history as one of the world's great judicial cases. It is safe to say that never before have so many persons been interested in a judicial proceeding nor so many convinced at its termination that injustice had been done. Unlike the Dreyfus case, there was no final clarification of the facts. Who committed the murders at South Braintree, Massachusetts, in 1920 is still (and probably will remain) a mystery. Thousands of persons today believe that the "good shoemaker" and the "poor peddler" were executed not because of evidence of guilt, but because the ruling class feared their political and economic ideas so greatly as to be unwilling to give them justice, and as the years pass there is reason to believe that the number of persons holding to such belief will grow rather than diminish.

Even among those who are most convinced of the guilt of the two Italian anarchists there is a realization now that the doubts of others will not down. The Boston Herald would hardly repeat at this time its fatuous comment, printed just after the execution, that "the time for . . . discussion is over. The chapter is closed." On the contrary, the discussion seems likely to survive the centuries and Sacco and Vanzetti, like Joan of Arc, are destined to become legendary figures. The chief concern of this generation, and its only chance of influence, is to give the legend as authentic a source as possible.

To that end both sides in the controversy should welcome the public spirit of the small group which has undertaken to print in full the record of the case, the first volume of which has just appeared, published by Henry Holt and Company. This first book contains 1,092 pages and there will be five other volumes of about the same size. The set will be sold for $25. The volumes will contain the complete court record, beginning with the trial in 1921 and including all subsequent proceedings in appeal. The minutes of Governor Fuller's advisory committee are to be included, as also the record of Vanzetti's trial for the robbery which took place in Bridgewater, Massachusetts, in 1919. The six volumes are wholly documentary, containing no expressions of opinion or comment. The original text of the record is followed, even to misspelled words and errors in punctuation. The committee which is sponsoring the publication consists of Newton D. Baker, Emory R. Buckner, Charles C. Burlingham, John W. Davis, Bernard Flexner, Raymond B. Fosdick, Charles P. Howland, Victor Morawetz, Charles Nagel, Walter H. Pollak, and Elihu Root. In a prefatory note to the first volume the committee says:

The Sacco-Vanzetti case is without doubt an historical trial. As such it promises to be the subject of controversy and discussion for many years to come. It is important that the complete record of all the proceedings in the case should be available and accessible to historical students. Very few copies of the record are now in existence, and these practically not within reach of inquirers. Without the record, comment and criticism must be partial, if not partisan; with it, there can be no excuse for misrepresentation through ignorance or design.

Probably few persons will undertake to read the some 2,500,000 words of the six volumes, and not many will care to buy them for their private use. But hundreds of persons now and in subsequent years will have recourse to these volumes for reference purposes and they will be invaluable additions to the collections of public libraries. The publication of the complete record of the Sacco-Vanzetti case is an important contribution toward making the legal proceedings of our generation more understandable to the future than the great trials of the past are to us today.

Arctic Heroes—and Others

THE Arctic has given the world—and taken from the world—a long list of heroes in these days of slow waiting since the airship Italia stumbled and crashed on the ice off Northeast Land on May 25. It gave us, first, Amundsen the explorer, who with five men set out by plane to the rescue of the stranded Italians, disappeared into an empty and silent sky, and has not since been found or heard from. It gave us Lundborg, who flew to Nobile and his companions, coasted to a stop on the uneven ice, and lifted the Italian general to safety; who then returned to save the others, only to crash and himself wait through fourteen days of hardship until a companion, equally daring, swooped down and saved him. It gave us Sora, leader of a desperate attempt to save Nobile and his men by traveling overland with dog-sled and skis. It gave us the Krassin and her crew, shouldering her slow, indomitable way through the ice, saving the lives, at last, of all five men left behind on a moving, melting piece of ice when Nobile was rescued; and of Mariano and Zappi who had accompanied Malmgren in an effort to reach land on foot. It gave us the two Swedish fliers who, on instructions from the Krassin, rescued in a daring descent Sora and one of his comrades, nearly dead of starvation. It gave us Malmgren who, with a broken hand, led Mariano and Zappi on foot toward land, only to lie down when exhaustion overcame him, give his companions the entire food supply, and bid them leave him to a slow death in the ice. If any greater hero has emerged from the bitter fogs of the North, it is the Russian flier Chukhnovsky who has just been rescued by the Krassin from the shore near Cape Platen where he was stranded with four of his crew. Before he fell, he had flown day after day over the regions where the Italians and their rescuers were wandering; he had sighted Mariano and Zappi and, even after he himself had been forced to the ice, he had radioed their position to the Krassin and had given directions for their rescue. He had sighted another party and reported its location to the Krassin; probably it was Sora and his companions, for their rescue was effected according to directions radioed from the Russian ice-breaker. Now that its human salvage has been disposed of, the Krassin intends to start with him on another search for the men of the Italia's crew who floated off to almost certain death with the damaged bag of the airship, and for Amundsen and his five followers.

These men are only the more notable among almost 1,500 who have been engaged in the heroic fight to save the lost Italians, and to save those who have vanished in the effort to save them. But sometimes, out of danger and the demands of a desperate crisis, comes something other than courage. There is no use pretending that Nobile and Zappi and Mariano, who left their companions and made for safety, are heroes. In Nobile's behalf it may be said that he probably believed his crew would be saved shortly after he was; but this is poor praise for a leader of an expedition. About the two Italians who abandoned Malmgren the less said the better. Nor do the efforts from Italy to make these acts seem respectable help. No sooner had Nobile taken flight from the piece of ice which held his comrades, than dispatches, dated not from King's Bay but from Rome, explained that the General had allowed himself to be saved in order to organize and direct the rescue work.

It was for this alone that General Nobile was taken off the ice pack by the Swedish airplane before his five companions, it being the general feeling that it would be best for him to sacrifice his natural inclination to remain with his men to the last and go to put his experience at the disposition of the rescue expeditions.

Instead he went to bed and has been ill—genuinely ill, no doubt—ever since.

Italians are as brave as other men, as capable of generous sacrifice. Other Italians have played a daring part in the efforts to save their countrymen. Even now several Italian aviators are scouring the frozen coastline in search of the Amundsen party. Yet Italy must share the blame for the fate of the Nobile expedition. Irrespective of the actions of the men themselves, the trip was a grandiose gesture, comparable to others we have learned to expect from the melodramatic regime in Italy. It was a huge display advertisement intended to blazon on the sky the story of Italy's daring. Its scientific purposes were from the beginning hidden under a fanfare of crosses and flags, of champagne and newspaper publicity. And, as a result, the world has been turned into a rescue mission and, if heroes have been discovered, heroes have also been lost. By an ill-prepared stunt, Nobile seems to have succeeded in killing some fourteen men, including one of the world's greatest explorers and a young scientist of promise. The money and effort that have been spent are not to be counted in the balance of lives wasted and hearts made sore. Nor of reputations lost. Mussolini's flamboyant braggadocio must be held, in part at least, responsible for this tawdry failure. And if Soviet Russia gloats a little over the heroic rescues effected by her ship and her aviators, she can hardly be blamed. It is one of the nice ironies of history that Mussolini's countrymen should have been saved from a death by freezing and starvation by the fliers and seamen of the Socialist Government of Russia.

Literary Cliques

IT is fashionable to reproach literary persons by saying that they flock together, and once a flock has been singled out for notice it is fashionable to imply that deep, dark things are done whenever its members perch on the same bough of the sacred wood. The feeling seems to be that they should seek separate trees and live like owls.

Now a writer is by definition a lonely person. Good work is done in solitude of some sort or other—and Emerson made it clear just how many sorts of solitude there may be, and how populous some of them are. But the writer is also of necessity, we believe, a creature who must have company from time to time; the more regularly the better. Before he writes, and after he writes, he must talk; and what better than a friendly group with whom to talk, a group where he will be understood, where he does not have to parade as perhaps he does before the public, where he can relax and at the same time gather strength? It is out of such a necessity at any rate that cliques—if we must use the reproachful word—have been born from time immemorial. For there was never a time when they did not exist; they are plentiful now and they always will be.

What harm they do it is difficult to see. There are collections of charlatans, to be sure, who meet only to flatter one another and who go forth only to review one another's books not unfavorably. But whom do they harm? If they are charlatans they will never be heard of again; it would be hard to prove that they keep good authors down; and indeed they give themselves a kind of fatuous pleasure of which it would be cruel to deprive them. We are thinking rather of the fruitful association of good minds—of Socrates and his cronies; of Sappho and her school; of Catullus and his young poet-friends; of Horace and Virgil; of the troubadours and the minnesingers; of Dante and those innumerable poets who clung about him and addressed good poems to him—good because of that fact and no other; of Ronsard, Ben Jonson, and their respective camps; of the English Cavaliers; of Swift, Gay, Pope, and the other members of the Scriblerus Club; of Goldsmith and his fond fellows; of Coleridge and all those of whom it has been said by the professor of poetry at Oxford that it was impossible for them in his presence to be ordinary; of Emerson and the other Transcendentalists; of the crowd that collected to produce the Yellow Book; of William Butler Yeats, "Æ," and the rest of those Irishmen who made a national literature out of their coming together; of the Georgians; of the anti-Georgians; of the American community who in the last decade revamped American poetry; and of the Fugitives in Tennessee. These were cliques, and so for that matter was the Brontë family a little clique by itself—a trio of girls on the Yorkshire moors who read German novels in communion and then out of that communion produced great novels of their own.

The only distinction between cliques is between those that succeed and those that do not. The latter become stale and ridiculous, and so deserve the opprobrium generally visited upon the word. The former simply produce memorable art—and it is the art that most people remember, rather than the fact that those who created it once consorted in the sacred wood. Indeed this fact is never widely known. Good cliques form by necessity and for work, not by vanity and for advertising.

For millions of years man sat peacefully at home and was contented.

But one day he said "This is too slow"; and he made a machine that would carry him around the earth at the rate of 30 miles an hour.

Next he made a machine that would carry him around the earth at the rate of 300 miles an hour.

Finally he devised an electrical contrivance which would carry him around the earth so fast that he was home again before he had left.

Then he came to the conclusion that it was all pretty much the same and remained peacefully at home for the rest of eternity. Q. E. D.

Handwritten signature: Hans Keller 1928

Full Circle

It Seems to Heywood Broun

A LONG about this time of year people trail off to England, to Paris, out on Long Island and up into Westchester. They are looking for the glory of the summer, among other things, and I do not know any more striking example of the blue-bird fallacy. Where on the wide earth does summer put on a better show than right here in Manhattan? This is not an attempt to contend that Broadway has better cabarets than the Berkshires. Nor will I pretend that it is always necessary to sleep under blankets here on the upper West Side. But I will boldly declare that a tree in town is worth a dozen to be seen in the forest. The sapling which grows and thrives in a backyard must have character as well as grace. This is a tree of determination. It has an individuality denied to timber all hedged about by fellows. Better a chestnut in Manhattan than a tall oak upon some far New England slope.

I said chestnut because that's what my tree happens to be. As a matter of fact, there are three plainly visible from my back window. Two are the property of neighbors. I merely have the use of such branches as trespass beyond the fence. Our grove behaves in civilized and sophisticated fashion. These backyard trees never go into wild hysterics at night because the wind blows. I think this is sophistication, but the fact that apartments tower all about may have something to do with it. Though at least one hundred windows open out upon them, the trees are not in any way self-conscious. Quite calmly they fulfil the schemes of nature from bud to leaf, no matter how many gaze upon these intimate details of family life. One thing the country possesses is lacking with us. Not many birds come down the canyon to perch upon our tree tops. Sparrows don't count. Still no wood ever rang with such a profusion of melody as that which animates our block. The music studios are all about and each afternoon Butterfly pines and dies and Mimi moves to heaven on a high note.

You might think that all these constant reminders of the tragedy which dogs the steps of opera heroines might grow a little mournful, but I never mark the songs and think only of the singers. It is my guess that these are mostly girls come out of Kansas or the far Dakotas to batter a way into the golden city. When Joshua fought at Jericho he sounded blasts upon the ram's horn and the walls came tumbling down. And just so I hope the barriers will crumble before the assault of these gigantic and big-voiced Butterflies. Surely there was no note ever sounded in the Jericho Expeditionary Force more lusty and sustained.

Of course, I realize that Joshua went into battle with bright eyes and lifted head because he knew the Lord was with him in his adventure. But whether it comes from God or the bracing wind of Kansas the thought of victory is quite obviously within the heart of every member of the singing battalions along this block. In the winter and in the fall doubt may have wormed into some of the solos, but in the summer the golden horseshoe of the Metropolitan seems to glitter on every window sill.

And because of this speculative element I hold it is more fun to live in a lane of sopranis than among the best of thrushes out where the thicker woods begin. A thrush may sing you a good song, but after all he has no future. He will never be a front-page bird. And that could happen to some of our songsters.

I know that in any given case the odds are tremendous, but this is a city of long shots. Far down the block, just at this minute, someone sings "Chanson Indoue." I don't know much about voices, but as it rackets back and forth among the fences this is a pretty sound. Maybe it will be one of the great voices of America within a year or two years and it is my privilege to listen without benefit of either ticket or complimentary pass. I need do no more than stop pounding the keys of this typewriter, an act of abnegation which I am ready to perform at the drop of any hat.

Still, when I sit back to loaf and listen, remorse assails me. Ambition is blooming epidemically all along the alley. Those who do not sing or paint are writing great American novels. Late into the night the clicking continues. One does not miss the woodpeckers who live in the birches north of Stamford. I prefer the novelists. It is a poor bird who will devour his own nest. Anyhow I don't want to sit here idle while literature is being turned out all around me.

Even at a distance it is possible sometimes to get an inkling of the precise quality of the competition. Not all the work we do along this block is literature. A masterpiece walks across the keys with a bolder tread than any article which is commissioned. One can detect by sound in just which flat there sits an unhappy soul who's working under pressure. The columnist, the essayist, and the novelist each has his own peculiar tempo. Often I detect the fact that there is reluctance and even protest in the touch of the fingers on the keys. I make the guess that the girl up on the ninth floor across the way is not really gunning for posterity this evening. This piece of hers will set no walls to tumbling down. God is not with her and she knows it. She is experimenting with cheap fiction because she owes money to the butcher.

But on the fifth floor everything is very different. In the room behind the drawn blind punishing blows are being struck at a machine no longer new. The carriage of the typewriter is wheezing and panting in an effort to keep up with the thought of the writer. That girl certainly knows her own mind. No part of this monograph will be devoted to an explanation of the difference between the male and female touch on the machine. That is too simple. And so I repeat it is a girl upon the fifth floor and one who seemingly writes without a trace of inhibition. Can this be a document fit to rank with the great confessions of literary history? Is it possible that she is about to tell all?

She has not quit for as much as two seconds to make a search for the right word. In fact all the words in the world seem to be pouring down upon that sheet of paper. Certainly there should be ample emotion in that story. The composing hands create as great a clang as if she were performing with a hammer on an anvil. Possibly she leads attack upon injustice. It could be that the writer is protesting against some mighty wrong. Her back and shoulders contribute to the vehemence of every sentence. Good girl! Hit the knaves and rascals once again!

But all this energy is rather distressing. I have a lot of work to do. I ought to be tuning myself up into some sort of frenzy of inspiration just like that. Maybe she isn't doing anything of importance. Perhaps it isn't a story at all. Even with the most powerful creative urge in the world the rhythm sounds a little too regular in its beat to be original composition. Suddenly the solution of the mystery comes to me in a flash of intuition. The thing is clear as any Morse code. She is writing over and over again, "Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party."

Mr. Lorimer and Me

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

Utopia: 1. An imaginary island, the seat of an ideally perfect social and political life; described by Sir Thomas More in a romance. 2. Hence any state or place of ideal perfection. (Gr. ou, not; topos, place.)

ANYWAY, so say Funk & Wagnalls, and, without going into the question as to how an ideally perfect life may differ from one unideally perfect, or three-quarters ideally perfect, it may be interesting to consider that the word "Utopia" has come to mean something totally other than this exact definition. For whereas once Utopia was a place or a state avowedly unattainable, it has come to indicate now a condition of society which may sometime actually exist.

The date of that sometime is vague. Various authorities place it between 1933 and 19935. But it is coming, of course; it is to be heralded by a socialist (or prohibitionist or feminist or fundamentalist or osteopathic) sweep in the American elections, and thereafter all young men and women (the old ones will immediately be killed off) will go about in flowing garments of soft wool, dancing on village greens to be created in the middle of New York, Berlin, and Sauk Center, speaking with melodious eagerness to one another about single tax and sculpture, and loving freely but without jealousy. In that amiable era there will be no arthritis, oratory, trout that break leaders, or persons who snicker: "Lissen! I seen Cal Smith walking with Phrobisha Brown!"

If I believed that such an ideally perfect and innocent time were coming in my lifetime, I should commit suicide at once. I can imagine nothing more horrible than a world in which no one was hard-boiled and mean; in which every one beamed like a Y. M. C. A. secretary, insisted on helping all the brethren who damn well wanted to be left alone, and conversed with mellifluous omniscience about Keats, the quantum theory, S. Parkes Cadman, four-wheel brakes, S. A., and Chateau Yquem. For imperfect humanity, it would be intolerable. It would be like sitting through eternity listening to the Archangel Michael recalling your every foolishness, while the Dominions beside the Throne sang regularly, every seven seconds, like energetic but slightly humorless crows, "Hallelujah."

Matter of fact, I don't believe my Utopia would vastly differ from that of Mr. George Horace Lorimer of the Saturday Evening Post. It is true that for the last six or seven years George has caused to be printed articles and editorials, also verses by that really charming wit, Mr. Arthur Guiterman, suggesting that my books and myself are the spawn of an unpatriotic would-be high-brow. But—aside from the fact that George may be entirely right—it does not for a moment keep me from remembering that he was the best boss that, as a free lance, I ever had. He read the MSS promptly, he paid promptly and magnificently, and personally he had the kind of splendid charm which makes one think of him as the prototype of the Big Brother.

Now, Mr. Lorimer's Utopia, I fancy, would consist of a world of delightful and miraculously convenient little homes; of people competent in their jobs; and, for vacation, the Canadian wilds, the South Sea Islands, and dinner in Paris. I don't know that I can in any way improve on this Utopian vision.

It is obvious, of course, that George is not very pleasant to Polish Jews, Italian anti-Fascists, and Scott Nearing. But, good Lord, who among us is not inexcusably unpleasant to certain divisions of mankind—to Mencken, or John Roach Straton, to bridge-players or Communists, to Greeks or Christian Scientists? And he does so superbly know that most men and some women will continue forever—till that day, a few million years from now, when we shall cease to be the planetary fleas—to rejoice quite as much in their jolly ordinariness as in their poetic superiority.

I'm awfully sorry, but I do not believe that mankind will ever be ideally perfect. I am convinced that in the year of Our Lord 19935 there will still be old women who peer out between curtains in the hope of discovering titillating improprieties; there will still be people who serve and people who give orders; there will still be radical Nations and conservative Saturday Evening Posts, for both of which reasonable people will give equal thanks.

The assumption of Utopianophiles is that most people long for security, perfect justice, wisdom. Yeah? Did Lindbergh have to fly the Atlantic? Does a New York millionaire have to carry a pack and sleep in a tent in the wilderness during his vacation? Did the dying consumptive Guynemer have to wangle himself into the air service? Did the Gene Debs, who knowingly compelled the Right Sort to send him to jail, desire an on-the-green-dancing-and-generally-artistic-and-soft-hearted-William-Morris Utopia?

I am frequently credited with being the worst crab, next to Father Mencken and Father Nathan, in our Beloved States. I am informed by innumerable preachers and editorial writers that I'm all for anarchism and bombing and general hell to pay. Actually, I like the Babbitts, the Dr. Pickerbaughs, the Will Kennicotts, and even the Elmer Gantrys rather better than any one else on earth. They are good fellows. They laugh—really laugh. I have for them only three Utopian ideals: that they should know a little more about history; that they should better comprehend the difference between Irish stew in America and fried mushrooms at Schoener's in Vienna; and that they should talk of the quest of God oftener than of the quest for the best carburetor.

It is perhaps impractical and Utopian to expect them to attain such virtue, but it is my only Utopismus.

[This is the sixth of a series of articles in which various persons describe the world they would like to live in.]

Chicago Bullets

ANONYMOUS

[A special grand jury in Chicago is investigating murders, vote frauds, kidnappings, and other crimes incident to the April primary elections in which Mayor "Big Bill" Thompson, State's Attorney Crowe, Governor Len Small, and their henchmen were defeated. The inquiry has met almost insuperable difficulties; witnesses have received anonymous threats and move in constant fear of assassination. Many persons have failed to come forward to testify.]

The article which appears below is a fragment of evidence which will not be presented in the inquiry. The writer, whose identity obviously must be protected, was one of 200 University of Chicago students who volunteered to act as watchers at the polls in some of the worst wards. With the backing of all the reform organizations and the Bar Association, they sallied forth to insure an honest election in Chicago. This article bears eloquent testimony to the results in one ward.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

THE Nth Ward contains many Negroes and some Jews. The result is Jewish management of Negroes, who in many cases are so ignorant that they cannot read or write their own names. In this precinct the Board of Election was composed of three Jewish men, one Jewish woman, and one Negro woman.

About the only thing that was done according to law in this precinct on election day was the opening of the polls at 6 a. m. I arrived at 5:55 a. m. to find a long line of Negro voters outside trying to get in so that they might vote and get to work on time. It was almost impossible to force one's way into the polling place—a room hardly large enough to hold the election board with comfort. Only three voting booths were used, as that was the maximum number that could be crowded into the room.

Imbued with the high ideals preached to us by a member of the Citizens Association at the previous day's meeting, and with the dignity of being a deputy of the County Court with the promise of the court's full protection, three other watchers and I undertook to see that the election board conducted the voting in accordance with the rules of the election commission, whose little book of rules we proudly displayed and consulted.

One of the Republican judges, a shy lawyer by trade, made a practice of taking the ballot of each Negro who came in to vote into the booth and marking it for him without bothering to ask the Negro if he had any preference in the matter. He was warned that the practice was contrary to law. He gave an ugly sneer and wanted to know "who the hell" we were. We showed him our little papers issued by the County Court. At this juncture the Democratic judge, a very loud-mouthed Jewish woman, called me aside and said she was glad we watchers were there as she thought the "Republicans planned to cheat." She insisted that she be allowed to go into the booth with the Republican judge to help mark the ballots. He became furious at this and pulled his gun on her twice, but we watchers took her part and he was helpless for the time being. After this had gone on for some time he became enraged and called one of his party workers, the son of the precinct captain. I overheard the word "gang" in the whispered conversation they held—and "gang" means only one thing in Chicago.

Being young and foolish, with a strong desire to live, I hastened to the nearest telephone, telling the Negro policeman on the corner to be on the watch for trouble. "Boss," he said, "I ain't taken no sides, I ain't, an' I can handle anything that happens." He looked big enough to handle almost anything, and he proved to be the only honest person about the place, but some one had him removed later in the day. My telephone report to the election commission brought the response that an officer would be sent out immediately.

About half an hour after my return to the polls seven large cars with screaming sirens, drawn curtains, and "America First," "Crowe for State's Attorney" signs plastered over the sides, drew up in front of the polling-place. Men swarmed out of them and surrounded the Negro policeman, who at that moment was having a dispute with the precinct boss and his son about passing out sample ballots and "America First" literature in front of the polling-place. They told the policeman to "lay off." He persisted. They told him what fine shots they were and pointed to machine-guns and shot-guns in the cars. Shooting was avoided by the precinct boss, a likable old Jew, who "never protected no murderer." The leader of the gang elbowed his way into the polling-place and asked his fellow-gangster, the election judge, "What's the matter here?" Before he could be told, the election official, sent by the commission in answer to my call, arrived. I drew him into a back room, explained the situation, and told him that a bunch of gangsters were outside. This information subdued him wonderfully. But he walked back into the polling-place and, pounding on the table, declared "This election must be conducted honestly."

Upon the appearance of this election official with his guard of county police, the Republican judge told his friend the gang boss to take his gang around the corner to the saloon and to wait until called. (I was later informed that this gang leader was the largest bootlegger on the South side of Chicago.) As soon as the election official was gone, the judge came over and took my name and wanted to know "what the hell" I thought I was doing. "If I knew for sure you called that election guy, you son of a —, you'd go for a ride right now," he added.

I was watched from then on. The other watchers were called into the back room by the precinct captain, his son, and the Republican judge, and plied with wine. Levinsky, the Republican judge, could not imagine anyone being such a fool as to want an honest election, so he tried to find out from the other watchers just what my game was, and my price. The precinct boss would not stand for any rough work if things could be arranged in some other manner. The result of this parley was soon evident. Levinsky came toward me, smiling and holding out his hand. When he released my hand he left a crumpled paper in it, which proved to be a $10 bill. My first thought was "marked money," a trap, so I handed it back so fast that the bill fell to the floor, and despite his efforts was plainly seen by several bystanders. My fellow-watchers were beginning to think it was time they tried to bring me to my senses; I had not yet been told of the discussions in the back room about my conduct. One of the watchers asked me to go out with him to get breakfast, since it was 10 o'clock and we had not yet had a chance to leave. We started for the nearest cafe, and were carefully followed.

My fellow-watcher began by telling me in what danger I was. He said that he had told Levinsky I was just faking a concern about an honest election so that I might claim to have earned my pay; that only this story had prevented Levinsky from calling his bunch of toughs back to get me. He said further that, if I did not change my attitude and prove to Levinsky and his crowd that I was not a hostile spy, I was sure to be "taken care of," and that neither he nor the other watchers would do anything to help me for fear of what might happen to them and their families.

I began to realize that I was in no position to choose if I wanted to go home whole. On our way back the old precinct boss hailed us and bought us some cigars. Smoking one of these, I returned to the polling-place to find the gang paying another visit. They were standing in line waiting to vote names which the Republican clerk copied from the registration book and handed to the precinct captain, who in turn took them just outside the door and handed one name to each man, who proceeded to vote that name. At this early hour of the day they were taking the names outside before giving them to the gangsters to vote, but as the men returned about every hour they soon did away with this formality and the names were handed to the men openly in the room. Sometimes the same man would vote twice without leaving the room. One amusing incident occurred early in the morning while the Democratic judge still showed signs of being honest. Two of the gangsters got mixed on the names given them to vote, both claiming the same name, and they nearly had a fight when the woman judge refused to give either of them a ballot.

After each visit, Levinsky would go out to the cars with "the boys" and would hand the leader "something." Later in the afternoon, on what proved to be the gang's last trip, a fight occurred between the gang leader and Levinsky in front of the polling-place. The gang leader demanded his money for the boys who had voted. Levinsky said he was broke and that they would have to wait for it. The gang leader declared that the agreement was cash for each time they voted, and he would not go without it. From the tone of the voices I expected something more than a word battle, but again open trouble was avoided by the precinct boss, who smoothed matters over and induced the gang to leave.

What was I doing during these open violations of the law, violations which I was supposed to prevent? I was playing the good fellow to everyone—and doing it with some success, though they were still suspicious of me. The precinct captain's son asked me to go home with him for dinner. I made some lame excuse, whereupon he took me to a cafe for dinner and on the way back insisted that I stop at his house for some wine. While there, he showed me his guns, the little pearl-handled pistol he has carried with him continually since the time a rival gang tried to kidnap him and his father, and finally his girl's picture. He is a law student and expects to get his degree at the University of Illinois within the next year. He told me about the many battles he and his dad had waged for control of the precinct, and how they had never failed to carry their precinct for the "right" candidates; about the fun and excitement he got out of the scraps; and about the job that was promised him in State's Attorney Crowe's office as soon as he graduated. It never occurred to him that Crowe might be defeated.

It was apparent on my return to the polling-place that the Democratic woman judge had finally surrendered. Levinsky was getting worried, for, in spite of all the ballots he had voted illegally, he was still far short of having the required number of voters on the books. He knew perfectly well that unless he delivered the necessary number the machine would find another man for his place. The Democratic woman judge's husband was the Democratic boss of the precinct, and he likewise knew that he must deliver the goods or be cast aside. What was simpler, this being a primary and therefore no contest, than for the two sides to get together and cooperate in the matter? Levinsky told the Democratic judge that if she would shut up about what he did, he would let her do as she pleased. The bargain was struck while I was gone, but I accidentally stumbled on the results of the scheme. To get to the toilet at the rear of the building one had to walk through the little room behind the election room. There on the table I saw stacked at least two hundred Republican ballots which the precinct captain, his son, and the owner of the building were busily engaged in marking. I understood better then why Negroes were sent to that room to vote and came back so soon with the ballots properly folded. Later that afternoon the ballot box was unlocked and, in plain sight of all, a bushel-basket full of marked ballots was carried in and placed in the box. The Democratic judge and watcher were both conveniently looking out of the window at that moment. I found it desirable to walk out and talk with the officer on duty. Planted in front of the polling-place on the ground was an American flag. As I stood there a little yellow cur came along and mistook the flag for a tree. The officer gave the dog a kick and remarked that even a dog should have more respect for the flag. I thought of the men and women inside.

Not long after this we heard gun shots to the south. We found out shortly afterward that just a few blocks away the Negro, Granady, opponent of Morris Eller, had been shot and killed. On being told of this, Levinsky remarked to the precinct boss, "That's the reason the boys didn't come around again."

The polls finally closed and the ballots were removed from the box. The precinct captain then took charge. The Republican ballots were separated from the Democratic ones. The Democratic boss took charge of the Democratic ballots, the Republican boss doing the same with the Republican ones. Then the party workers systematically went through all the ballots and erased the votes unfavorable to the candidates for whom they were working. The votes were never counted; the total number on hand were cast en bloc for each party's machine candidates and the ballots were to conform. During the time the ballots were being changed an election official came to see if two of the watchers were on the job. Finding the curtains drawn and the doors locked, he knocked. The two watchers went outside to report. One of the clerks glued his ear to the door to hear what was said, while I was covered by a gun from the coat-pocket of Levinsky. The watchers reported that everything was O. K.

Levinsky gave the police officer (who had watched the proceedings complacently) and myself the returns, though he and the precinct captain had some difficulty in agreeing upon the number of votes they would give to a certain judge; one of them liked him and the other did not. In nearly all cases he reported a unanimous vote for the machine candidates and then he copied the figures he had given me so that "they would both be the same." The Negro worker protested that such a unanimous report was likely to cause suspicion, but he was told to mind his own business.

After filling out the required report blanks we watchers shook hands all around and prepared to leave. Levinsky followed us outside. He said, "Boys, be careful what kind of reports you make, and remember, don't report me as being a judge, because I'm not going to sign the returns. And don't forget that our gang never fails to get the guy they're after, even if it takes ten years." With that he slipped $12 into our hands, "just for a little treat," and was sorry that that was all he had, because there had been "so many expenses today."

When Races Intermarry

By EARNEST ALBERT HOOTON

RADICALLY different races usually develop quite distinct forms of civilization. The racial hybrid does not inherit a culture; he must cast in his lot with one of the parent civilizations or evolve a mixed form of his own. In the former case he is likely to lose his physical and cultural identity by being reabsorbed into one parental stock; he simply leavens one parental lump. When a few individuals of two radically different races interbreed in an area of isolation and under primitive conditions, their progeny, if left to themselves, will develop not only a hybrid physical type and a bastard culture but possibly also a new race and a new civilization. Such a process has frequently been completed in prehistoric times, but today it is a rarity, largely because the development of transportation has obliterated the geographical barriers which formerly isolated human groups. People prefer to marry their own kind if they can reach them. Modern pioneers bring their women with them or go back and fetch them.

In the middle of Southwest Africa there is a prosperous colony of hybrids descended from Boers and Hottentots. The center of this pasture-land area is a town called Rehoboth in which live more than 3,000 hybrids, together with many of their Hottentot and Negro servants. Dutch immigration into this region began about 1760. Because of a scarcity of Boer women many of the men married Hottentot girls. Those who did so were disowned by the Boers who had kept their stock pure, and the principals of the mixed marriages and their hybrid offspring became segregated from both parent stocks. The hybrid children were brought up to respect their mixed origin, and the only marriages countenanced were with persons of similar descent. Consequently the lack of recent admixtures with European and Hottentot blood has preserved for these hybrids their social integrity. They settled around Rehoboth about 1860, numbering at that time approximately thirty families and 300 souls. They increased rapidly and most of the families have a fairly accurate knowledge of their ancestors for several generations back. There were about forty Boer ancestors of the original colony and a considerable number of other Europeans contributed blood during the early period of the settlement.

Professor Eugen Fischer, a distinguished German anthropologist, has made this Rehoboth colony the subject of a careful study and has embodied the results of his investigations in a book which must be ranked as the classic work on the subject of race mixture.* The data of the present article are derived from Fischer's admirable research.

The early Boers preferred to marry Hottentot girls rather than Negro girls because the former belonged to a free people with a good deal of property in cattle. The Kaffirs and Damara were slaves in the service of the Hottentots and Herero. The Hottentots are a primitive pastoral people who migrated into South Africa some time before the arrival of the Europeans. They seem to have originated from an admixture of the pigmy Bushman hunters with dark white Hamites and possibly with some Negroid stocks. Hottentots are not Negroes, but show a peculiar mixture of Negroid and Mongoloid characters which is also to be observed in their Bushman progenitors. They are small, almost dwarfish people, with yellow skins. Their hair is tightly curled in tiny spirals and grows in tufts or "pepper-corns" with bare spaces of scalp between the clumps. Their noses are as broad as those of Negroes and as flat as those of Mongoloids. Their malars or cheek-bones are very prominent and, with their pointed chins, impart a triangular shape to their flat faces. The eyes are narrow-slitted and slanting, and often show at the inner corner an obscuring fold of skin called the "Mongoloid fold." The women tend to develop at maturity huge deposits of fat on the buttocks—a feature known as steatopygia. It is not entirely a secondary sexual character because the men also show it to a minor extent. Steatopygia is found today only among the Bushmen and Hottentots, but it was prevalent among the prehistoric Europeans of the glacial retreat, as we know from female figurines of ivory and engravings belonging to that period. Possibly this deposit of fat on the buttocks is analogous to the hump of the camel—a sort of reserve larder accumulated in time of plenty and drawn upon when food is scarce. It may be a special adaptation acquired by a race of primitive men at a time when conditions of living made feasts alternate with famines. Perhaps it has been preserved in the Bushmen and Hottentots because of their sojourn in arid areas of Africa. At any rate, their almost pigmy stature, their steatopygia, and their mixture of Negroid and Mongoloid features make the Hottentots and Bushmen a sharply defined physical group.

The Boers who married the Hottentot women were probably of mixed European stock—medium to tall in stature, brunette to blond in complexion, with long faces, narrow noses, and straight or wavy hair. Professor Fischer divides the Rehoboth hybrids into three groups: those in whom Dutch and Hottentot blood is present in about equal proportions, those in whom European blood predominates, and those who have a majority of Hottentot ancestors. The physical characteristics of these hybrids are of great interest.

*"Die Rehobother Bastards." Jena: Eugen Fischer. 1913.

Hybrid vigor is manifested in the stature of the Rehoboth people, for they are taller than either the Hottentots or the modern Dutch. The men in whom European blood exceeds the Hottentot are taller than the Scotch, who stand at the head of the peoples of Europe in their bodily height. Weight in the males is a little below that of Europeans of the same stature; the women are slender in youth but tend to become fleshy with the onset of middle age. The fatty deposit on the buttocks, which is so striking a feature in Hottentot women, develops in the female hybrids when they reach maturity, but only to a moderate extent. This steatopygia is absent in the men.

In facial features European characteristics tend to dominate, although there are many exceptions to this rule. Particularly marked is an increased length of the face, which in the "European" group of hybrids exceeds the averages of both parental stocks. The projecting cheek-bones of the Hottentots are smoothed down in the hybrids, and the flat Hottentot nose is replaced by one with a more elevated bridge, although the great breadth of the former is often retained. The slitlike Mongoloid eye with its inner fold occurs in the hybrid children, but usually disappears in adult life. Lips are thin, thick, or medium, according to excess of European or Hottentot blood in the hybrids, or equal proportions of each.

The skin color of the Rehoboth people is brunette, white, or "olive," much like that of Southern Europeans. Here again there is a gradation according to blood, the "European" group showing the lightest complexions. Children sometimes have rosy white skins, but occasionally are very dark. In these hybrids the skin darkens with age. Tanning is so pronounced that it often results in the exposed parts of the body being darker in the adult hybrids than in the Hottentots.

All degrees of curly hair occur, but none have absolutely straight hair. Hair form follows the proportions of blood mixture. Occasionally pepper-corn hair may be seen in children—sometimes blond pepper-corn hair. In both sexes body hair is sparse as in Hottentots, and the men have very scanty beards. Hottentots have jet-black hair both in infancy and during maturity. The Rehoboth people usually have light hair or even blond hair in childhood, but it darkens with increasing age. No adults have blond hair, but in the "European" group various shades of brown are common. Eye color is prevaillingly the dark brown invariable among the Hottentots, but blue eyes are frequent among the children and sometimes persist.

In general the presence of pigment in hair, skin, and eyes seems to dominate or prevail over the less colored condition. Curly hair asserts itself at the expense of straight hair. The more highly evolved facial features of the Europeans usually survive in the struggle for existence, but each individual is likely to be a blend of characters from both parental stocks.

North European children mature sexually at a relatively late age, whereas Hottentots, like most tropical peoples, ripen early. The Rehoboth hybrids resemble the Europeans in this respect. As a result the child marriages so common in Negro Africa are unknown here. Men marry between the ages of twenty-five and twenty-seven years and women between the ages of twenty and twenty-three years. The women are excellent mothers and marriages are very fertile, averaging 7.4 offspring for each union. Fischer says that 276 marriages of pure Dutch in Cape Colony yielded an average of 6.3 children. The fertility of Hottentots is not known, but is probably large.

These Rehoboth people live to a good age and enjoy excellent health. They are not particularly subject to any disease. They are very strong and are said to show greater powers of resistance to hunger, thirst, and disease than either of the parent races. They are greatly inbred, but from consanguine marriages there has resulted no diminution in fertility nor in quality of offspring. Fischer found only five feeble-minded children in the community and these did not come from strongly inbred families. No intelligence tests were undertaken at Rehoboth, but one gathers that the hybrids are by no means stupid. They may have produced no genius, but the output of morons is encouragingly small.

Before the Germans took over the rule of this part of South Africa the Rehoboth hybrids had evolved their own form of government. It consisted of a "captain," primus inter pares, and a council of five elders. This council had sweeping executive, legislative, and judicial functions. It seems to have been substantially similiar to the form of tribal government by chiefs and elders common among American Indians and other primitive peoples.

There are two distinct social strata at Rehoboth. Those who call themselves "the good old families" are rich or, at any rate, well-to-do. They look more like Europeans and have more European blood and more energy than the members of the lower class. They monopolize the places in the council and impart tone to the colony. A man of the lower stratum can never marry a girl belonging to one of the aristocratic families. Adhering to the upper crust are families which have a good deal of European blood but not much property. The proletariat has more Hottentot blood, less property, and fewer genealogies. It complains of oppression by the upper class.

These hybrids are a pastoral people. At first all land was held in common, but later a man acquired the land upon which he built his house, together with a garden strip. Ultimately a part of the common land was sold by the council to discharge the public debt and the rest was divided, apparently on the principle that "to him that hath shall be given." The well-to-do have town houses and dwellings on their farms. They own many cattle and employ numerous Hottentots and Herero as herdsmen. Perhaps from the Hottentots they have inherited their great love for cattle and their skill as breeders. They practice very little agriculture. The poorer men are often carters or carriers. Among these are also found the carpenters, shoemakers, and masons.

The rich have rectangular stone houses of the Cape Boer type; the poor have round Hottentot huts made of the original mats and stakes or of modern material such as kerosene tins. But no matter whether it is a stone mansion or a tin hut, the door of the dwelling always faces east (a Hottentot custom), and the houses are not arranged along streets as in Boer towns, but higgledy-piggledy. The rich have imported European furniture, but even the first families squat on the floor when no strangers are present.

European clothing is worn, as a rule, and inordinate modesty prevails. The women wear a cloth tied round their hair like Hottentot women. It is considered shameful to remove this cloth. Out-of-doors a sunbonnet surmounts the head-cloth.

These hybrids are fairly clean people. On Saturdays the women scrub up in good old Dutch style. They are good needlewomen and efficient housewives. The men are rather lazy and sit about smoking most of the day. Both sexes are considerably addicted to tobacco, alcohol, and coffee.

Sex morality is probably not inferior to that of many rural communities of Europe and America. Formerly the girls were very free with white strangers, hoping for marriage; but now unions with whites are prohibited. Illegitimate children still occur, nevertheless.

The children retain Hottentot traditions and play Hottentot games. They used to learn German in the mission schools, but Hottentot is the primary speech and Cape Dutch is the secondary tongue. The hybrids have no literature, no folk-lore, and no drama of their own. Most of their remedies are Hottentot, and their burials are a mixture of Hottentot and Christian rites. But they use Dutch names. Like the maternal race they are very fond of nicknames and give names to all of their cattle.

Thus at Rehoboth before the World War the crossings of Boers and Hottentots had given rise to a people physically sound and prolific, which had worked out its own material salvation. When the dregs of two races unite, one can scarcely expect their progeny to tread the heights of human endeavor. But when, as in the present instance, sound representatives, even of diverse races, intermarry, they are likely to have a vigorous and abundant issue whose cultural achievements will be commensurate with the mean of their inherited abilities, individual and racial, and with the possibilities of their physical and social environment.

Summer School

By LORINE PRUETTE

TEACHERS are unquestionably one of the most repressed groups in a modern world of labor. Theirs is a polite slavery. Teachers must be refined; they must not cry out, even when their toes are trod upon. In fact, they seldom want to cry out. You see, they really are refined. They sink into a spineless dependence upon a system that may cast them forth at any moment, on the flimsiest excuse. Jealous individualists, they will not combine or cooperate with one another to exert the power they undoubtedly possess. The greater number of subordinates are women, the greater number of bosses, men; the women assume and the men foster a semi-paternal relationship in which the teacher is supposed to be a good girl and do as she is told, not bothering her head about anything beyond the present day, leaving all important problems to father, who is omnipotent and omniscient and will give to each of his children according to her deserts. Teacher under principal, principal under superintendent, superintendent under commissioner, commissioner under the group of politicians who gave him his job. Fear everywhere and everywhere opportunity for petty tyranny. One of the most amazing of these tyrannies is the compulsory summer school. I have heard teachers groan over this, much in the manner of the small boy who groans because papa says he must chop the wood for the stove all week; but I have never heard of anyone who actively protested.

Out of the pitiful dole paid to teachers for eight or nine or ten months, a portion must be set aside to take them to summer school. Few industries attempt to specify what the employee shall do with his unoccupied time. Not so the schools. The paternal system appears to justify any invasion of personal rights. And so they come, in increasing, swarming hordes, these pathetic seekers after—what? Knowledge, wisdom, technical information? No, they come to hold their jobs. They come because they dare not stay away. Look at them.

This woman is so old that her progress up the hill to class is a daily marvel, a triumph over inconceivable obstacles. She takes notes with great care. What will become of the notes when she goes back to teaching fractions to the fourth graders?

This girl is not as young as she seems, but her rouge and vivacity make a good disguise. She is teaching tiresome little brats until she finds a man, and the summer school may help her to find one. If she sits quietly through her courses she will probably pass them, since nearly everyone does pass in summer school. She signs up for three dull courses which she hopes will not require any work and then devotes herself to the unofficial campus course. There are quiet nooks upon the campus where a man and a girl may briefly know the authentic satisfactions from such simple things as a moon and a fleeting caress. Chemistry and economics and the principles of pedagogy have no meaning here. Even if she fails in her courses her summer will not have been wasted.

This woman is a triumph of dulness. Under no conceivable circumstances would she be accepted by a reputable college—in the winter. They will all accept her in the summer. By and by she will roll up the credits for a college degree. She teaches penmanship and she is studying recreation, learning all about play activities of primitive tribes and the behavior of young infants.

This man is a school superintendent. He got his job by a combination of rather brutal aggressiveness and the capacity to use soft soap at the proper moments. Twenty years ago he sewed his mind up in its eternal swaddling clothes, but he has suddenly decided to "get educated." He encourages the professors by telling them about cases that have come under his observation.

This man has left his wife at home, very unhappy. During the winter he has been so rushed with teaching and administrative duties that he has scarcely realized he has a wife and family. When summer comes he gives her a perfunctory kiss and goes off to school. He is very ambitious and certain to get on in his world. Of course he believes that everything he does is for his family.

This man is ill, definitely ill. Three months out of doors would put him on his feet, but he cannot have three months. His superintendent knows he is ill, but has ordered him to come to school just the same. The rule must not be broken. It does not matter about the man.

It is not necessary to describe the upper 10 per cent who are actively reaching out toward something which the summer school may conceivably give them. They will at least hear of new books; now and then their lives may be illuminated by a fresh and startling thought. Some are thirsty for facts. Their winter chores have been arid for them; in the summer school they enjoy what is for a few a genuine cultural oasis. In addition to this small group who may be termed students is the woman's-club group, the persons of either sex who like to feel that they are "keeping up," whose interests are seldom in the subject but rather in the acquisition of names and crucial details which will enable them to decorate their conversation. It was this group that put psychoanalysis over as a language. Then there is the occasional college student who is trying to get through four years in three and the all-too-frequent college student who has flunked his winter courses and is taking them over. All of these may have reason and justification for their coming. Summer school offers another chance; it is designed for the underprivileged and the thwarted; and its development is a natural part of our democratic philosophy. It is not with summer schools in themselves that I am quarreling, but with the theories back of compulsory attendance.

Let us grant for the moment the desirability of universal schooling. As a wealthy society we can afford to extend the non-productive years almost indefinitely. We have pushed up the finishing point from the fifth grade to the eighth grade and are reaching out toward high-school graduation as the norm. Our assumption is that the teachers for all these millions of children have to be "educated," whatever that may mean. Lacking any better standard the college degree is becoming increasingly popular as the trademark of an educated person. This leads us at once into difficulties, for the colleges are almost universally declaring that intelligence of a fairly high order is required of their applicants. It is obvious that if all the persons with the ability required for college graduation deserted all other professions and went into school-teaching there would probably not be enough of them to man the schools. In comes the jerry-built degree from the summer school. It has as fair a sound as any other degree, but it is not as good. It cannot be, despite the best efforts of the authorities in charge of summer schools. All the laws of learning point to the gradual accretion of knowledge. Six weeks of work five days a week give nearly as many hours as eighteen weeks of work twice a week, but the process is not the same. The result is not the same, in actual learning or the beginnings of wisdom, but the degree is the same.

Not only does the summer school tend to pull down the standard of the winter school but, in its complicated aspect as a compulsory institution, it damages the integrity of the professors. Are you going to flunk that nice old lady, who might almost be your grandmother, when you know that she cannot keep her job unless she gets her certificate and that she cannot get her certificate unless she passes your course? She may not have understood what you were driving at, but she will continue to fill her allotted functions in the third grade quite as well as if she did. This man will get his job if he gets his degree. To be sure he has learned little, but who are you to throw a monkey-wrench into his life? Another teacher would grade him differently, of that you can be sure, unless you are so unaware of psychology and of statistical reports that you ascribe some peculiar validity to your own grading system. Perhaps you work out a compromise by which if he is young and stupid and lazy you flunk him, and if he is old and very much in earnest you pass him, hoping for scholarship's sake that he may die before he achieves too many degrees.

The summer school is of course a makeshift, but a makeshift that will probably be improved as its administrators and instructors are able to improve it. For 60 per cent, at least, of its students a two-weeks' "inspirational" chautauqua would probably work as well or better than the present system. But for a little group of rebels the summer school of today fulfils a particular function. Here come a few young men and women of ability. They have been thinking all the winter, repressing themselves, fearing to express what they are thinking. They have been held down in their polite slavery and here, suddenly, is comparative freedom and anonymity. Young men, grown old in the restrictions of a principal's job, declare with sudden bitterness that the family and the community cannot expect the schools to be free of sex problems since we are now keeping everybody in school, even the potential prostitutes, to the ages of fourteen or sixteen or eighteen. Young women with a frightened air voice the heresy that in organization there is strength. Rebels find one another in the crowd and the tiny flame of revolt is fanned. The summer school, with its intermingling of people from all parts of the country, contains within it a perilous germ. Slave looks at slave and wonders what will make them free. The omniscient fathers of the school system do not know what their more wayward children may be learning at this compulsory source of inspiration. They will not learn too much biology or too much chemistry, but they may get an idea. Ideas have been known to explode.

In the Driftway

LOST, strayed, or stolen. Such is the fate of 50,000,000 milk bottles a year in New York City (of 300,000,000 in the United States), so a recent newspaper paragraph stated. That means a mortality of eight bottles a year for every man, woman, and child in the metropolis. The dealers estimate that only a fifth of the loss is due to breakage; the other bottles are sunk without trace. It seems incredible. It is incredible, or would be to one unfamiliar with the incredibly careless, hurried, and wasteful way in which New Yorkers live. But the Drifter, who knows somewhat of life in the great city, is disposed to condole with the milk dealers rather than doubt them. Milk bottles are said to be made of especially good glass, in order to withstand rigorous boiling and rough handling, at a cost of five cents apiece.

* * * * *

A CORRESPONDENT of a New York newspaper writes to say that in Boston purchasers of milk are charged four cents for any bottle not returned. He suggests a similar system in New York. It might be worth trying, for a loss of 50,000,000 milk bottles at five cents apiece means an extra charge of $2,500,000 a year upon users of milk in New York—that is, everybody—for their carelessness. Yet this would stop the holocaust only partially—just how much, the Drifter would not dare to predict. For at present persons who buy milk occasionally at grocery or delicatessen stores, instead of having it delivered regularly at their doors by the milk companies, have to pay a deposit of five cents on each bottle. And are those bottles returned? Ye-e-es, some of them. But the money lost on those which aren't would send a corps of missionaries to Africa to instruct the benighted heathen how to live the civilized life—as exemplified, let us say, by New Yorkers and their conservation of milk bottles.

* * * * *

IN the issue of May 2 the Drifter quoted a decision by a Chicago judge, nullifying a wedding contracted at sea, to suggest that it seemed practically to open the road for legal companionate marriage. But according to Bernhard S. Levey of Syracuse one should not pick New York State as one in which to obtain a dissolution of matrimonial bonds entered into at sea:

Whether or not the courts of Illinois refuse to recognize sea weddings as valid I cannot state, but I do know that other jurisdictions, of which New York is one, recognize them as entirely valid, and neither void nor voidable, unless a marriage between the same parties would have been void or voidable even though contracted in the manner prescribed by their laws, as would occur in the case of incest, infancy, insanity, etcetera.

* * * * *

THE letter of Mr. Levey takes issue also with the method of achieving legal companionate marriage in New York State suggested by Steven T. Byington, which the Drifter quoted in The Nation of July 4:

Mr. Byington's commentary would be correct if he had limited it to that hectic period between 1902 and 1908 when marriages known as "common-law" marriages were verboten. But Mr. Byington, like Mr. Blackstone, has been amended and repealed by subsequent legislation and decisions.

At the present time common-law marriages are perfectly valid, and if man and woman cohabit as man and wife they are irretrievably lost. A common-law marriage does not even require an oral agreement, but is constituted solely by the acts of the parties.

Thus also the sea wedding is valid as a common-law marriage, even if the ceremony were not considered sufficient to constitute them man and wife.

* * * * *

OH, well, it looks as if New Yorkers would have to realize their companionate marriages in the same way in which they obtain their liquor.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Asleep About Al?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Concerning the true significance of Al Smith you have been asleep. His nomination is a stirring victory for tolerance and liberalism. His election would promise more for democracy than anything else that could possibly happen at this period. Are you to remain non-constructive, non-influential onlookers while the liberal millions mobilize for Smith?

Asbury Park, June 29

WILLIAM TAYLOR

In Praise of Hoover

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have known Herbert Hoover well for thirty-seven years, in America, Australia, and Europe, and in him I have the greatest confidence. Hoover, a young Quaker lad, was the first student to reach Stanford University in 1891. He is an idealist in certain ways and the most practical of men in certain others. He never likes to talk or write on theoretical matters, nor to tell beforehand what he will do. In whatever he undertakes to do, no matter how difficult, he has been ultimately successful, and some of these matters, as you know, are the most complicated ever undertaken in the face of indifference or opposition.

I do not feel at liberty to quote the words of a friend as to current matters. I may, however, refer to the matter of feeding Belgium. Lloyd George was opposed to it. "If the Belgians starve, it will be the greatest charge against Germany." Hoover's reply was that if England lets them starve it will be the greatest disgrace to England. And he had his way, though Asquith called him "a very impertinent" young man. At Berlin he won over von Jagow, to whom he said: "I am trying to feed the starving Belgian people. It is as easy as to feed a sick cat with milk, through a forty-foot bamboo pole, in a cage occupied by two roaring lions." His success in diplomacy in France was equally marked, but in a different way. His assistant, our Vernon Kellogg, now of the Research Council, was granted the equivalent of $50,000,000, each month, to feed the people in the devastated districts.

Hoover is a man without complexities, unselfish, devoted to relieving suffering, and with an uncanny insight into financial matters and the detection of trickery (usually known as politics).

In 1908 I met him in Australia. He was just about to resign a salary of $100,000—$5,000, he said, as a mining engineer, and $95,000 as a financial manager of mines. He was to go back to London to do some literary work (translation and publication of Agricola, "De Re Metallica") and hoped then to return to his home to find some public work which he could do as it ought to be done, the salary being a minor matter. He had run through mining engineering, which had yielded nothing to him save the amassing of money (of which he had all he needed).

I know of no one who ever worked with or under Hoover who does not in a way worship him.

Palo Alto, California, June 15

DAVID STARR JORDAN,

President Emeritus, Leland Stanford, Jr., University

Norman Thomas for President

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was delighted to read your few words of commendation of Norman Thomas, the candidate of the Socialist Party. The Nation should logically be enthusiastically supporting Mr. Thomas, considering his personal qualities and the wholesome platform on which he is running. I have been somewhat disappointed at its timidity along this line and sincerely hope that the hint in your editorial represents a trend toward aggressive and prophetic advocacy of his candidacy. Why should not The Nation accept its own challenge and become one of the leaders "to marshal the hosts of dissatisfied Americans who will never, never vote for a man who sat for seven years in the Cabinet of Harding and Coolidge and could not lift his voice on any occasion to denounce the swinish corruption in which that body took part; and will never, never vote for Alfred E. Smith of Tammany Hall, the Wet running on a Dry platform"? Why is not The Nation fighting for Thomas for President?

New York, July 7

FRANCIS A. HENSON

The Anti-Saloon League

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This is about William MacDonald's review of Peter Odegard's "Pressure Politics" in The Nation for June 13. I like "Pressure Politics" because it is truthful; it tells some things about the Anti-Saloon League which I wish were not true, but the league is a human institution, and I suppose that even the best of us have done things which we would not do again. The review is not truthful in the impression it gives either of the Anti-Saloon League or of "Pressure Politics." Under the title The Protestant Terror it gives the impression that "Pressure Politics" tells the story of a malign organization using contemptible methods and skating on thin ice in its compliance with the law. I read of "a record of political scheming, intimidation, misrepresentation, and blackguardly tactics used in behalf of a so-called moral reform"; "the work of Protestant terrorization"; "its ring leadership, its secret funds, its contempt for corrupt practices acts." Finally there is the suggestion that "the prohibition bosses cannot, with full hearts, give thanks to Almighty God . . . that Mr. Odegard should have been permitted to write and publish this notable book."

If I may claim the honor of being a "prohibition boss" this is funny. I read the manuscript and encouraged its publication. The league gave Mr. Odegard free access to its records and files. I hope that freedom of speech is not a mere formula with me and I believe that I reflect the opinion of the Anti-Saloon League in approving the publication of all the truth in which there is any legitimate public interest, including the parts which are painful with those which are pleasant.

Mr. Odegard seems to me to have used an almost obvious method in the development of his subject. In any given subdivision he states the blackest case that has been made or alleged against the league. But before Mr. Odegard gets through he judicially presents the facts in extenuation, or counter-accusation, or refutation. I believe that Mr. Odegard leaves the fair-minded reader with the feeling that a dispassionate and judicial treatment of the league presents it as an efficient organization, manned by officers who are socially minded and without motives of self-interest; that there are revealed remarkably few human derelictions in view of the number of persons concerned, the bitterness of the controversy, and the partisan animus of the inquisitions and attacks upon the league.

Mr. Odegard's preface is to the point. "Political parties," he says, "invariably include adherents whose wills are hopelessly at variance upon all but a very few questions. . . . It is this situation which has engendered the pressure group. . . . Without organization, in the modern state, the individual is lost and his influence is negligible. . . . To deny the churches representation in this latter [corporate] sense is not only to defeat real representative government but to deny our public servants the counsel of an important body of public opinion."

Like many critics of political action by the church, Mr. MacDonald does not differentiate between political action by the church in behalf of the church and such action in behalf of human welfare. It seems to me that the liberals who deplore the participation of the church in political affairs are only putting water on the wheel of the part-time Christians who sit in the pews and want the preacher to stick to the Gospel for fear that his social or political views will conflict with their ethics of industrial exploitation and the like. If the Protestant churches took an effective position in behalf of world peace or an equitable adjustment in the industrial relations in the coal mines, would that constitute another "Protestant Terror"?

New York, June 20

ORVILLE S. POLAND,

Head of legal department, Anti-Saloon League of New York

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your reviewer of the history of the Anti-Saloon League argues that the league's was minority rule because

"hardly more than two-fifths of the population of the United States, during the period of the league's greatest activity, could be regarded as church adherents, and Catholics and Jews, representing between them about one-half of the total church membership of the country, have with few exceptions held aloof."

The "World Almanac" for 1914 gives the population of the country for 1913 as 97,028,497, the church members as 36,668,165, of whom the Catholics (twelve kinds, but the Roman Catholics are about 96 per cent) and Jews make up 13,481,684. It adds, "The aggregate of 36,668,165 represents actual church membership, and includes all Catholics (communicants, but not unconfirmed minors). It does not give all persons affiliated by family ties to Protestant bodies. The larger of the Protestant bodies may claim twice the number of their communicants as nominal adherents."

So the Catholics and Jews are nearer a third than a half, and the total of confirmed church members (excluding babies) is about two-fifths of the total population (including babies). If we exclude from the population those who are below the age at which members are commonly received into the church, the church members are about half the people; and everybody who has been concerned in the affairs of a Protestant church knows that the number of adults who are not merely "nominal adherents," but take an active part in the support of the church of which they are not members, is large.

Ballard Vale, Mass., June 12

STEVEN T. BYINGTON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I avail myself of the opportunity of commenting on two communications taking exception to statements and alleged implications in my review of Odegard's "Pressure Politics."

On the basis of figures in the "World Almanac," Mr. Byington thinks that the proportion of church members to population should be about one-half, instead of about two-fifths as I stated, and that Catholics and Jews should be reckoned at about one-third instead of one-half. I never quarrel with the "World Almanac," and the case against the league is bad enough without misrepresenting any of its features. I am greatly obliged to Mr. Byington for his correction.

Mr. Poland seems to think that I am opposed to the participation of the churches in politics or other public matters. I am not in the least opposed. What I object to is the activity of the Protestant sects, in contrast to Catholics and Jews, in fastening upon the country, under the leadership of the Anti-Saloon League, a prohibitory regime which I regard as an insult to intelligence, a fatal blow at political and personal liberty, and the greatest corrupter of public and private morals that the country has ever known. Mr. Poland, of course, does not think so. If I interpret aright a passage in his letter, he seems to imagine that unless the churches are free to go in for prohibition as they have done, they will be estopped from expressing themselves, or allowing the preachers to express themselves, on such a matter as industrial exploitation. This seems to me very faulty logic. No church, or any other organization, has a moral right to enslave the minds and befuddle the consciences of a nation, or pray for the success of a program whose consequences, as we see them today, have been unparalleled lawlessness, crime, bribery, and hypocrisy.

Mr. Poland further suggests that I have misrepresented Mr. Odegard's book by making it out a different kind of book from what it was intended to be. I have not the pleasure of knowing Mr. Odegard, nor do I know what kind of book he intended to write. Judging the book from its contents, I gather that he intended to write a detailed and impartial history of the Anti-Saloon League, and I think he has performed that task with thoroughness and distinction. The main question, however, as I see it, is not what he meant to do, but what the record which he has examined shows about the history and methods of the league. On that point the record of facts appears to me to sustain all the criticisms which I passed upon the league.

New York, June 25

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Books and Movies

An Infidelity

By GARRETA BUSEY

I cannot live with it—not every day!—
The hard unyielding fact that you are dead.
Always to sit and face it, eat its bread,
And drink its tears. . . . Oh, I have run away
And come again to this wood-shadowed strand
(I think we walked on violets before!)
Searching for trace of you along the shore.
But now your feet go printless on the sand.
And now reality within my door
Blots up the morning sun and chills my bed
And mocks at me for every thing I do,
And I may not escape it any more.
How strange a thing to find that I am wed
To iron fact, being in love with you.

The Radical

By RUTH LECHLITNER

Leap, Sword, red blade from my brown thigh—
Lean thigh and naked—cut your way:
Thin scarlet digit to the stars
Through massed and measured density.

Fall, Sword: this weight is not your own,
But the blood-heavy, vital chain
You carved in circles that I must Count link by link—and break again.

Back, pit! Back mocking maw of death!
—Who bent this line I thrust out straight?
What dark Will bade me loose my sword
And free myself . . . too late?

Americans All

Prophets True and False. By Oswald Garrison Villard. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

THIS book has a great deal that is new and pungent to say about the twenty-seven men and women it discusses, but it has even more to say about its author. No more singular man breathes the hot, blistering air of this incomparable Republic. Damned high and low for contumacy, heresy, subversion, sedition, even treason, he is actually one of the few Americans left who believe in the traditional American scheme of things, or have any hope for its future. There is a fine indomitability in him, and a breezy touch of the Berserker: he is not to be put off by defeats and disasters. Though his days are chiefly given over, like those of any other libertarian in a society of slaves, to viewing with alarm, he yet manages to preserve a romantic optimism, almost boyish in its innocence. Not long ago I met him on one of the gory battlefields that journalists frequent, and he spoke casually of the near approach of his sixtieth birthday. I confess that I was shocked. Villard near sixty? It is impossible to imagine it. He will always be of the age that dreams of honest politics—i. e., edible cobblestones, white blackbirds—and leaps to the summons of high adventure.

But do not mistake him for a moon-calf. The man is a veteran campaigner, despite his hold on youth, and has seen many a hero fall. His book is packed with the fruits of his experience. There is no futile speculation or gaudy theorizing in it; it is direct, specific, harsh, realistic. The men and women he discusses, in the main, are men and women he has known intimately and seen with clear eyes. They never appear as the mere embodiments of ideas; they are done in the round, and with due care for the warts. Some of them, indeed—for example, the preposterous Colonel House and the almost fabulous Hearst—turn out to be all wart, but that is not often. In the typical portrait there is a mellow mood, and justice is tempered with compassion. Mr. Villard cannot quite bring himself to sending his liberals to the hulks, even when, as in the case of Robert Lansing, they turn out to be wearing false-faces, or when, as in the cases of Borah and Franklin K. Lane, they desert in the face of the enemy.

The chapter on Borah is one of the best in the book. It was written before Borah's spectacular spiritual suicide at Kansas City, but a premonition of that colossal folly is in it. The man emerges mysterious—but not as mysterious as he was before. Something has been done to clear up the riddle of his baffling vacillations, his long series of treasons to his followers and himself. The statesman recedes into the background, and there appears an actor—an actor of high gifts and one often cast in heroic roles, but still mainly an actor. The big scene is what he is always thinking of. When it has been played out he loses interest in the drama. Borah cut his long hair before he went to Kansas City to embrace Fess and Jim Watson, Smoot and Vare, the Anti-Saloon League and the Ohio Gang, but he remained the scenery-chewer to the end. In some future edition of the present book, I suspect and prophesy, he will move over from the company of Reed and Walsh and take his place with Wilson and Hughes. But meanwhile justice is done to him, and there is a moving evocation of what he might have been.

Revaluations are the sad and principal concern of all liberal historians. Their heroes are forever turning out to be politicians, and hence open to reason behind the door. Even since "Prophets True and False" went to the printer Frank O. Lowden has flitted into the shadows, a mere baffled job-seeker at the end. But a couple of sturdier souls remain, and when I say a couple I probably mean one, to wit, George W. Norris. Mr. Villard's chapter on him is an eloquent tribute to the one Liberal in our politics who has stood fast through thick and thin, and I am inclined to think that it will not have to be changed, no matter how many editions this book runs through. Norris, at least, is safe. There is something archaic and romantic about his steadfastness, and Villard gets him upon paper with great skill.

But the best chapters in the book, I think, are those which deal with frauds. The brief treatise upon Colonel House reduces that erstwhile Machiavelli to a scarecrow clad in ribald rags, and the portrait of Hearst is at once the most revealing and the most devastating ever done. Here is political journalism at its very best. It unearths facts that do not lie upon the surface, and it sets forth their significance with a sure hand. When Villard has had his say about such men there is nothing left to say: they are depicted with such overwhelming vividness that they really live and move. And so through the gallery—La Follette, Leonard Wood, Henry Ford, Henry Cabot Lodge, Bryan, old Charley Curtis, Donahey, Dawes, Hoover, Al Smith—all the flitting figures in the current comedy. There is praise for some and bitter excoriation for others, but all the portraits carry the same conviction. A passionate desire to get at the truth is in them. They constitute a contribution to American political literature whose value is apparent instantly.

Mr. Villard is shy of rhetoric, but he knows very well how to write. He gets his effects simply, but with the quiet assurance of an old journalist. Few men of his time have known American politics and politicians better than he, and none has dealt with them in a more illuminating manner. He is not impartial, thank God! He detests frauds, and he still searches the highroads, with sixty years upon him, for honest men. Now and then, as in the case of Senator Norris, he finds one. But there is not much good hunting for hopeful liberals in the greatest free republic the sun ever shined on.

H. L. MENCKEN

"George, Be a King"

The Correspondence of King George the Third. Edited by Sir John Fortescue in six volumes. Volumes III-VI. The Macmillan Company. $8 each.

THE papers contained in these volumes extend over a little more than ten years, from July, 1773, to December, 1783, a period memorable in the history of the British monarchy and empire as witnessing George III's experiment in personal government, its ignominious failure, the loss of the American colonies, and the international humiliation of Great Britain. By far the greater part of the documents, as of those which Sir John Fortescue published in the first two volumes of the "Correspondence" (reviewed in The Nation February 29), come from the Royal Archives at Windsor Castle and have not previously been printed. The papers relate almost entirely to political and public matters, but they throw much light upon the King's personality. If some exponent of the "new biography" should decide to try his luck with George III, he would find here a rich harvest of illustrative material.

The King's patriotism, his devotion to what he conceived to be British interests, is apparent throughout. But equally evident is his inability to appreciate other points of view than his own. Those who agreed with him and told him what he wished to hear were men of spirit and intelligence; those who expressed different views were dishonest or ignorant. When General Gage predicted that vigorous measures would bring Boston to terms the King commended him as "an honest determined Man"; when later he urged the suspension of the coercive acts which Parliament had passed his advice was dismissed as "absurd." Like most men George III was not aware of his own prejudices, which were numerous and tenaciously held, and though he was virtually the head of a political party he never grasped the fact that he was a partisan. He saw the Opposition leaders as dangerous demagogues but himself as the father of his people, and when he was forced at last to accept these men as his ministers his mortification was unbounded. He contemplated abdication, and a message announcing his resignation was actually drafted and is preserved among his papers. It never occurred to him that those who sought to diminish the influence of the Crown might be as patriotic and virtuous as himself.

The old unreformed English Constitution, with its rotten boroughs, sinecures, pensions, and secret-service money, was in his eyes "the most beautiful Combination that ever was framed," and those whom history calls reformers were "Faction leaders and Ruined Men." He wrote to Lord North in 1774—with royal disregard of punctuation: "I owne myself a sincere friend to our Constitution both Ecclesiastical and Civil and as such a great enemy to any inovations, for in this mixed Government it is highly necessary to avoid novelties we know that all wise nations have stuck scrupulously to their antient Customs why are we therefore in opposition to them to seem to have no other object but to be altering every rule our Ancestors have left us." It was the least lovely features of the Constitution, however, for which the King reserved his greatest admiration. He always found it easy to believe that his own interests and the nation's were identical, and there is no doubt that the old Constitution treated the royal family handsomely. When an actress with whom the Prince of Wales had become entangled threatened to publish some compromising letters which His Royal Highness had written to her unless she received the tidy sum of £5,000 as hush money, it was convenient to have this item charged to the account of "Special Service." The King, it should be said, deplored this "shameful scrape" and remarked that he "never was personally engaged in such a transaction," but he saw no impropriety in having the nation pay the high cost of princely indiscretion.

In his introductions to the several volumes of the "Correspondence" Sir John Fortescue looks at men and measures through the King's spectacles. He sees the Whig leaders, especially Chatham, Fox, and Burke, as factious and disloyal demagogues, giving aid and comfort to rebels and paralyzing Great Britain in her hour of trial, and he finds nothing good to say about the rebels. It is no doubt true that American patriots and British Whigs, in their interpretation of the Revolution, have been too hard on George III, and no sensible person would find fault with an attempt to redress the balance. It is likewise true that in our own day well-intentioned advocates of Anglo-American understanding and cooperation have been guilty of a good deal of sentimentality as well as bad history. But can it be said that Sir John is either giving us good history or that he is manifesting good intentions when he writes: "If we can imagine Belgium, in this year 1927, upon a civil inquiry as to the payment of her debt to England, rising in violent indignation and calling Germany to her assistance, we may form some idea of the feeling which the Alliance between France and the revolted Colonies must have raised in England in 1778. Definitely the Americans turned their backs upon the Mother Country, and joined with the old inveterate enemy against her. They committed themselves, in fact, to hostility against England for an indefinite period, a period which is not yet ended?"

We know what to think of those elements in our own country that delight to fan the embers of an ancient animosity, but here is an eminent English scholar, a former president of the Royal Historical Society, enlisting under the same unholy banner.

ROBERT LIVINGSTON SCHUYLER

The Innocence of Father Walsh

The Fall of the Russian Empire. By Edmund A. Walsh, S.J., Ph.D. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

FATHER WALSH writes of Russia with the flaming innocence and wonder of a tabloid editor handling a Snyder murder or the misadventures of a Peaches Browning. Indeed, he dwells upon scenes of murder and destruction with such voluptuous detail that the news editor of any tabloid might well consider putting his cub reporters to school at Georgetown University, where Father Walsh is Regent of the School of Foreign Service. In "The Fall of the Russian Empire" thirty sanguinary pages, more than one-tenth of the text, are given to a description of the murder of the Czar and his family.

The book purports to cover primarily the rapid dissolution of the Czarist regime and the brief interregnum before the Bolsheviks seized power. The story is broken by long historical discursions and by melodramatic alarms on the perversions of the new regime. Father Walsh's emotional naivete in dealing with personalities and events attached to the rule of the Soviets suggests the attitude of Senator Heflin toward the Roman Catholic church. Ten years of Soviet rule are summed up by him in the airy phrase "the Bolshevik sits grinning in the throne-room of the Kremlin, munching sunflower seeds." Lenin, by implication the Kaiser's agent and leader of a Jewish conspiracy, is introduced as "an undersized, bald-headed Russian exile, of a semi-Mongolian cast of countenance," and this is supplemented a few pages later by a quotation describing him as "one of the most fearless, crafty, and wilful maniacs of our time."

This sort of scholarship may be calculated to split the ears of the groundlings in extremely unsophisticated audiences, but it seems curiously inadequate for a volume described by its publishers as "an authoritative history." For instance, Father Walsh writes: "Dzherzhinsky, chief of the dreaded Cheka, executioner of 1,800,000 victims." This grotesque figure, originally 1,776,118, was casually invented by a Czarist propaganda bureau. It appeared in a dispatch from Riga to the London Times, September 1, 1922, as coming from "original Bolshevik sources." In fact, the source was no more official than the name "Gordon" blown in a bottle of bootleg gin.

In describing the attempt of General Kornilov to overthrow the Kerensky Government and set up a military dictatorship, Father Walsh proceeds with a similar naive disregard of his sources. Of the attempt he says: "The inner history remains obscure." In his book, "The Catastrophe," which Father Walsh cites as a source, Kerensky makes it clear that while his British allies in the great crusade for democracy were giving him bland assurances of support, they were actively financing Kornilov's attempt and even printing the propaganda of that military adventurer and distributing it from their diplomatic cars. This delicate attention, wholly ignored in Father Walsh's narrative, is one of the most interesting bits of "inner history" of that troublous time.

One might cite many other examples of Father Walsh's innocence. Leningrad is for him "a decaying, half-deserted city." In fact, its population under the urban census of 1923 was 1,067,328, and under the general census of December, 1926, it was 1,614,008. Even in matters geographical Father Walsh's innocence obtrudes. Writing of Russia's outlets he says: "Both Petrograd (sic) and Archangel lead into the narrow straits dominated by Denmark and Sweden." Archangel is, of course, on the White Sea, with its sole outlet on the Arctic Ocean. Aside from these two ports, frozen nearly half the year, Father Walsh states that "the only other hope of free exit is by Vladivostok, five thousand miles distant from the heart of the empire." Apparently the author never heard of the all-year ocean port of Murmansk, 875 miles by rail from Leningrad. Nearly $50,000,000 worth of American cotton alone passed through the port of Murmansk last year.

One may conclude that emotional innocence is a rickety foundation for "an authoritative history." Father Walsh promises a later volume dealing exclusively with the Bolshevik regime. It should prove of interest.

HAROLD KELLOCK

Figures of Earth

Growing into Life. A Magna Charta of Youth. By David Seabury. Boni and Liveright. $5.

VARIOUS have been the ceremonies observed throughout the ages to celebrate the attainment of puberty. Quaint customs obtain even today in less inhibited climes—a sort of juvenile saturnalia usually prevails during which a license is permitted which both earlier and later had been bootless. Ordinarily these rites are conducted by the elders of the tribe, under whose disillusioned though mayhap envious eyes the maturing are initiated into the privileges of adulthood.

In America it is far otherwise. For the youth of our era require no extraneous help for their induction into life: their elders fulfil only the role of disapproving chorus. The rites of adolescence are performed in boarding-school dormitories, Ford coupes, cabarets, river boats, dim-lit parlors, and vestibules.

Are the youth of today happier? For a happy childhood really matters, Samuel Butler to the contrary notwithstanding. There is, perhaps, no answer to such a question. But at least there is more of an effort to understand childhood and adolescence. The child is no longer regarded as a miniature adult, but as plastic clay from which are to be molded the figures of earth which shall glorify or malign the species.

In his very ambitious book Mr. Seabury has attempted to cover the whole field of the mental hygiene of youth. He has attacked the subject with characteristic thoroughness. In fact, he has made too good a job of it. For it will indeed be a meticulous parent or teacher who will follow him to page 715. Those who do will be well rewarded, however, by their better insight into the mechanisms of character.

In his appendix Mr. Seabury has placed a number of charts designed to help in the study of the personality. It is doubtful just how much value such methods have in dealing with human problems. The diagram is all very well as a temporary aid to a lecturer, but efforts to reduce psychological problems to geometrical designs have more intellectual interest than pragmatic value.

This is, however, a minor point. Mr. Seabury has shown quite clearly how morbid methods of thinking, unwise parental examples, the formation of unhealthy conditioned reflexes, and other pathological factors can so distort the personality as to result in an intensely unhappy, inefficient adult, while a little attention to these factors in their nascent state can bear fruit in a well-balanced personality.

Throughout, Mr. Seabury's book is illustrated by many examples, drawn from life, mostly of cases actually studied by him. There are several appendices and a glossary. On the whole a book well worth reading, but with its subject matter so presented that it is to be feared that its legitimate audience will forever remain inaccessible.

JOHN E. LIND

The Canadian Granary

Pooling Wheat in Canada. By Walter P. Davisson. Ottawa, Canada: The Graphic Publishers. $2.50.

THE story of the rapid growth of the Canadian wheat pools which in their third year marketed through a central selling agency over 60 per cent of the Western wheat crop and 30,000,000 bushels of coarse grains is made available to the general public in a book of about 500 pages, abundantly illustrated. The author, a former pool official and for twenty years active in agrarian movements, is frankly a propagandist of the pool plan. He regards the organization of the wheat pools as the greatest achievement in the rather epic story of the conversion, within a space of forty years, of the Canadian prairies into the greatest export granary in the world.

The Canada Wheat Board, a war creation to prevent profiteering, gave the growers an idea of the working of a government-controlled, compulsory system of centralized wheat marketing. When this board was abolished in 1920 some growers protested; others began to agitate for a similar marketing agency, with grower control and voluntary contract. The agitation made little headway until 1923, when a Canadian record wheat crop of 470 million bushels was thrown on the market in a disorderly rush, breaking prices below the cost of production in many cases. An extensive system of cooperative elevators built up through twenty years of effort was of no help in stemming the grain stampede. The growers saw the need of a marketing system to control the movement of grain through the elevators. Aaron Sapiro was brought in, and the "gospel of orderly cooperative marketing and self-help as preached by him ran across the prairies like a flame," writes Mr. Davisson. Organization of pools was undertaken in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, members signing a contract to place the control of the marketing of all their wheat in the pools for five years. A central selling agency was formed with a $20,000-a-year executive, and connections were established in the principal grain markets. This agency handled about 50 per cent of the 1924 crop, paying pool members an average of $1.45 for Northern No. 1, against an average of 98 cents paid by the trade the year before.

The pools deduct two cents a bushel to acquire elevators, and now control a big chain of country elevators, seven terminal elevators at the head of Lake Superior, and other large elevators at Buffalo, Vancouver, and Prince Rupert. Six per cent interest is paid on deductions for elevator purposes.

Mr. Davisson does not think the pool will be tempted to try artificially to inflate prices, as that would first restrict sales and then bring more land under wheat. The pools, he points out, are pledged by the charter of their selling agency to strive to preserve for both growers and consumers their proper economies, and he quotes statistics to show that prices of bread in England were not changed because the pools advanced the growers' price nearly 50 per cent.

The pool way, the author predicts, will prove an instrument to induce a juster balance between town and country and a powerful urge to farm diversification, spreading the risks over many products and energizing the winter months. The author devotes much space to the propaganda and tactics of the opposition forces arrayed against the pool plan, and admits that the cooperative spirit will not have smooth sailing among the polyglot population of the prairies. "The greatest battle in history is joined," he declares.

C. MCKAY

Books in Brief

The Spanish-American Frontier: 1783-1795. The Westward Movement and the Spanish Retreat in the Mississippi Valley. By Arthur Preston Whitaker. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

In this volume Dr. Whitaker furnishes a bird's-eye view of the tangled aftermath of the American Revolution. His story deals with the dramatic struggle between Western frontiersmen and Spanish cavaliers for the control of the region lying west of the Appalachian Mountains, south of the Ohio River, and east of the Mississippi. It will appeal to the reader who knows Western history as well as to the specialist who wishes to become versed in archival explanations of diplomatic maneuvers. Through its pages flit such picturesque figures as Baron de Carondelet, the inept governor of Louisiana, the obtuse Spanish statesman, Count Floridablanca, the enigmatical and intriguing American, General James Wilkinson, the fortunate Carolinian diplomat, James Pinckney, and John Sevier, the typical American frontiersman. This interpretative study of the Old Southwest during a critical period makes plain that the contest for that portion of the Mississippi Valley was largely won by aggressive, opportunistic pioneers whose rude philosopher believed that a fool could sometimes put on his clothes better than a wise man could do it for him.

Degas: An Intimate Portrait. By Ambroise Vollard. Sixteen illustrations. Greenberg. $3.

This study of Degas is built upon the same informal basis of suggestive conversation as underlay the author's preceding studies of Cézanne and Renoir. But it is not equally successful; the method supposed to illuminate the high lights of character falls short of its purpose here and reads too often like pointless gossip. Perhaps the fault lies in the fact that M. Vollard could not bring to a character study of the irascible Degas—for the book is in no sense an evaluation of his art—the same sympathy and admiration that he had for the Master of Aix. The attempt to prove that Degas's nasty temper, which created for him the contemporary picture of an ogre who detested most men and all women, children, dogs, cats, and flowers, was only the result of a defense mechanism to cover an innate good nature is weak and gratuitous. Why bother?

It would have been much wiser to display frankly and proudly his unrelenting attitude toward the world.

The Harvest of the Year to the Tiller of the Soil. By L. H. Bailey. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

In Dr. Bailey's philosophy is much of that spiritual apprehension of the soil which in the minds of ancient men must have been responsible for the concept of the Vegetation God. Mankind, Dr. Bailey holds, sustains not merely an economic but an ethical and a spiritual relation to the earth. This point of view, first enunciated in "The Holy Earth," is applied in "The Harvest" to the economic problems of agriculture. These should be solved, he maintains, not on a political basis, but by the scientific method. He advocates a conscious public policy in respect to agriculture, rather than a mere attempt to meet specific difficulties as they arise. Further, he urges urban people to "develop an interest in agriculture as a human and social subject, and not desire its betterment merely to enable the farmers to purchase more goods."

Spanish Art. Burlington Magazine Monograph. E. Weyhe. $15.

This is not a "story of Spanish art." It realizes what almost all of the popularizing outlines hardly ever approach: a readable and interesting introductory study to a complicated subject, sacrificing nothing to dignity and offering the best in scholarly research. There are nine essays on painting, architecture, sculpture, and the minor arts, each written by an authority in his special field. It is cheerful to find that scholars have learned to write so well; the essay on painting, to take only one, is a masterpiece of succinct presentation. One regrets perhaps that as many as six of the nine essays are devoted to the minor arts; but then it is particularly in the field of ceramics and metal works that Spain proves herself superior to the larger countries. This volume, like the earlier monograph on Chinese Art, is exquisitely printed and extravagantly illustrated with fine color and half-tone plates.

Negro Drawings. By Miguel Covarrubias. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

This is the second collection of drawings by Covarrubias to appear in book form. Those who were not convinced by his first book, "The Prince of Wales and Other Famous Americans," that a caricaturist of great distinction lives among us will no longer be skeptical. Herein upon an ebony background shuffles the colorful pageant of Harlem life, snapping its fingers, writhing in bawdy and eccentric dances, moaning "blues," shooting craps, getting religion. Covarrubias sets down what he saw with such an unerring feeling for character that one whoops with delight at the sheer shocking truth of his types. The humor resides, as Frank Crowninshield points out in an excellent critical introduction, in the draftsmanship itself, relying on no situation obviously farcical or employing no "clever legend." In other words, the humor of Covarrubias lies in his power to divine the comic intention of the Almighty who fashioned these people in the first place. The drawings aside from their humor have genuine aesthetic value. They are admirable in design, and those which are executed in wash, oil, or tempera are most satisfying in their three-dimensional authority. In addition to the introduction by Mr. Crowninshield is an amusing and enlightening preface by Ralph Barton.

Human Waste in Education. By Anna Y. Reed. The Century Company. $2.50.

Containing some truths and many half-truths, both mixed with a large amount of prejudiced opinion, this volume leads up to the astonishing conclusion that children should not be compulsorily retained in school beyond the age of fourteen years and that, especially for those who are backward in their school work, industrial life is a safer and more educative regime. Work, the argument runs, produces the desirable qualities of thrift, industry, and resourcefulness, while compulsory school attendance, on the other hand, breeds truancy, idleness, and delinquency. It is the old justification of child labor dressed up in the new clothes of modern psychology and educational research—clothes which do not fit and have the appearance of being borrowed. Educational leaders and psychologists will agree with much that Dr. Reed says regarding the failure of our schools and the need for individual treatment of children. The remedy offered by educators, however, is not to open the doors of industry to such children but to change the schools. Dr. Reed's alternative is not a surprise to those who have followed her child labor pronouncements during the last ten years.

Yankee Doodle-Do. A Collection of Songs of the Early American Stage. Compiled with an Introduction and Notes by Grenville Vernon. Payson and Clarke, Ltd. $5.

Mr. Vernon has no illusions as to the literary value of these lyrics from American plays written between 1760 and 1860. The writer of the book of the early American comic opera was no more a poet than is his modern descendant. To provide rhyming lines on which a tune could be hung was—and still is—the major object of the librettist. Mr. Vernon has reprinted the airs where the music is available, and in some of these rippling melodies one catches far-away echoes of Haydn and Mozart. In general whatever enjoyment the songs gave was owing, as in our day, to the musician rather than the poet.

Karl Goldmark: Notes from the Life of a Viennese Composer. Translated by Alice Goldmark Brandeis. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.

Karl Goldmark has set down elsewhere what he wished to say about music; here the factors in his musical development are described primarily as an integral part of his life-adventure. There is something of the typical hero of romance in this penniless youth, who by a wise mixture of tact and audacity and we presume personal charm, is enabled with comparative promptness to marshal his gifts before an enthusiastic public. An old man of eighty tells the story; we seem to listen at his knees, affectionately and yet in awe; for he lived in a great period and moved as an equal among figures that have begun to assume the appearance of myth.

Columbus. By Marius André. Translated by Eloise Parkhurst Huguenin. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

Since Columbus is one of the most romantic of all legendary heroes, some "new" biographer was in duty bound to debunk him: to make him seem common, ordinary, "human," and all that sort of thing. M. André uses almost every trick that typifies the thoroughly conventionalized unconventionality of present-day biography. He takes particular delight in pointing out the many fabrications that Columbus and his worshipers invented—and then he himself calmly fabricates a whole series of spicy dialogues, after the fashion of M. Maurois et al.

The Borgias: Alexander VI, Caesar, Lucrezia. By Guiseppe Portigliotti. Translated by Bernard Miall. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

Most recent scholarship, both Catholic and Protestant, has been rather favorable toward the Borgias; it has stripped off much of the fresco of romance that once made them alluring and has succeeded only in making them rather dull. This latest biographer attempts to rejuvenate the faded Borgian glamor—the hair-raising tales of poison and unnamable sexual crimes—but he is even duller than his predecessors. Yet he argues so well and his pages bristle with so many authoritative citations that one might accept his deductions if they were not invariably unfavorable to this famous triumvirate of sinners.

Spring Plowing. By Charles Malam. Woodcuts by J. J. Lankes. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Rural poetry by a writer of marked skill and subtlety who has not, however, learned yet to conquer the tendency of any rural poet toward rural cant.

Moving Pictures

The Russian Contribution

JUDGING by what has been written in America of such Russian films as "Potemkin," "Czar Ivan the Terrible," and "The End of St. Petersburg," the proper way of expressing oneself on the subject of Russian movies is by beating the big drum and shouting at the top of one's voice. Screaming, for those who like it, is also permissible. Perhaps all this is as it should be. Perhaps it is natural that discussion of films, as of everything else connected with Soviet Russia, should be tinged with a certain amount of sensationalism. The enhanced interest in and appreciation of Soviet art—if such is the effect of this sensationalism—is all to the good.

But what is one to do if, like the present critic, one has no talent for beating the drum? Apparently one will have to be content with a dispassionate discussion of the merits of Soviet films irrespective of other considerations.

At the outset let this important point be properly understood. Whatever other qualities or defects Soviet movies may have, the very fact of their Soviet origin is in a sense an artistic quality. This "Soviet origin" has rightly come to be regarded as the emblem of fearless grappling with reality, of tearing down the shams which have been set up by the class-prejudices of the bourgeois world. There is such a thing in art as the pathos of stark truth, and today Soviet films seem to be the chief providers of this rare and hence so invigorating article. Nor is this all. The "Soviet origin" is entitled to credit for another artistic quality of importance: it is responsible for an independence of outlook which refuses to bow before established conventions and is always ready to test new forms, new methods, and new ideas.

How much of the appeal of Soviet films is due to the characteristic difference of this matter and manner, and how much to their intrinsic artistic qualities, is not a question to be easily answered. It would seem that the shouting and screaming should be ascribed in the main to the appreciation of the "difference," while the intrinsic appeal of the films, where it is present, is to be regarded as a contributory factor helping to enhance the very characteristics which make Soviet films so startlingly "different."

For our part, we accept with gratitude the stark truth of Soviet films and the ardor for social justice in the light of which this truth is bared. It is possible that the day will arrive when nakedness of life by reason of its very familiarity will cease to impress in the movies as it has ceased to do so in modern literature, not to mention the nakedness of body in primitive communities. But for the present the Soviet starkness impresses, and we are thankful. There are scenes in "Czar Ivan" and "The End of St. Petersburg," as there were earlier in "Potemkin," which almost stagger one by their undisguised ghastliness and brutality. Yet one welcomes even the brutality when one remembers such Charlotte Russes from Hollywood as John Barrymore's "Tempest" (incidentally, in Hollywood the French Revolution of the popular fiction still passes for the last Russian Revolution. The scenes of tribunals and crowds, and the stock phrases about "aristocrats," seem to come straight from "The Two Orphans" and such popular romances).

Our gratitude to the Russians for the manner in which they present their material is somewhat less fervent, being tempered and conditioned by considerations of intrinsic artistic quality. In "Potemkin" the story of the mutiny as told on the screen catches something of the pulse of drama. Its emotion is conveyed through the physical appeal of various forms of movement direct to our senses. "Potemkin's" tempos as revealed in its suspenses, climaxes, and pauses thread the story

First and Only Work of Its Kind!

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT

Edited by H. B. LEES-SMITH, M.A., D.Sc.

*Foreword by J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, LL.D.,
Former Prime Minister of Great Britain*

"THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT," just published in Great Britain, is a work of international importance. It deals not only with the tremendously significant British Labor Movement, but also covers the social, political and industrial movements of the leading countries of the world.

This valuable and impartial work has been produced by some of England's foremost economists, writers and public men. Among the contributors are Sidney Webb, Viscount Haldane, George Lansbury, Arthur Henderson, Lord Parmoor, John R. Clynes, J. H. Thomas, the Bishop of Manchester, Philip Snowden, etc. Of this Encyclopedia, Mr. MacDonald says:

"Here we have something of sober authority, something that can be depended upon, something written not with a political but an intellectual object."

Brilliant biographies and interesting illustrations add to the usefulness of this new source of information.

Our price for imported sets of "THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT" is the same as charged in Great Britain, that is, $15 for the set of three large and handsome volumes, charges prepaid. Free brochure mailed on request.

LEWIS COPELAND COMPANY, INC.

Exclusive American Distributors

119 West 57th Street

New York City

DOWN THE VOLGA

A Leisurely Voyage
Along the fringe
of Asia

Special Tour sailing July 28
$390 up

Delightful All-Russia Tour
Special Sailing August 11th

VOYAGE to Leningrad and Moscow, nerve centres of the Soviet Republic, to ancient Kiev, Odessa, the Crimea—Riviera of Eastern Europe, oriental Tiflis, Baku, the far-sung Volga, Nijni Novgorod. The globe seems to turn before one's eyes.

15 OTHER RUSSIAN TOURS

SAILINGS WEEKLY—VISAS ASSURED
Tours of one week to one month or longer on fast steamers of Cunard, French, or Holland-America Lines.

First Class accommodations throughout Russia.
SELECT ITINERARIES for $390 and special parties. All expenses up.

WRITE, PHONE OR CALL FOR LITERATURE

AMERICAN-EUROPEAN TRAVEL BUREAU

Representative of the Official Russian Travel Bureau

100 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. CHElsea 5124-4477

Save Arkansas!

SHALL EVOLUTION BE OUTLAWED?

Another American state is menaced. The first anti-Evolution referendum ever held occurs in Arkansas, November 6th. Orthodox Christians, organizing rural ignorance, seek to emasculate education by denying children the truth of Modern Science. There is no opposition, except a group of compromising, camouflaging, scared-to-death pussy-footers, who dare not attack Christianity or the Bible, behind which the Enemy takes refuge.

The American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, therefore, from necessity, declares war on both parties. As ammunition, the A. A. A. A. uses the two most powerful anti-religious tracts ever written:

"GODLESS EVOLUTION"

AND "THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE" By CHARLES SMITH, 4A President

These Atheistic masterpieces (4-page folders of 8,000 words each) will be broadcast throughout the state and wherever the Church invades the School.

A fund of $10,000 is needed at once to save Arkansas from intellectual darkness—from the disgrace into which Tennessee and Mississippi have fallen. Mr. Smith, a native of the state, will return there to direct the campaign. We must stop the Fundamentalists. The 4A appeals to every Evolutionist for aid in this important fight.

Send membership (dues, $1 a year), order for tracts (100 for $1; samples free) and CONTRIBUTION to the SAVE ARKANSAS FUND to

WOOLSEY TELLER, 119 E. 14th St., New York City

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

with a throbbing dramatic unity which is felt as if it were physically alive. It is thus that "Potemkin" achieves cinematic dramatization, albeit in a manner that is still faltering and crude. But the achievement itself is a triumph of art, and this is "Potemkin's" justification for being regarded as a landmark in the progress of the movies.

Nothing approaching this achievement can be claimed either for "Czar Ivan" or "The End of St. Petersburg." The former picture, conventional in its story, is also largely conventional in its form except in one scene—the scene of the Czar's orgy which shows a certain originality in the rhythmic treatment of the dance. For this scene Tarich, who directed the picture, deserves all credit. But the chief honors of the film go to Leonidoff for his extraordinary impersonation of Ivan the Terrible. Nothing so subtle and yet so dynamically expressive had ever before been seen on the screen. Leonidoff does not merely register an expression. He gives it suspense and movement, which make it a part of the whole drama. The screwed-up eye and the concealed smile with which he watches the humiliation of a boyard offender are unforgettable, and represent the high water-mark of cinematic acting. The characterization of other actors is also excellent, but the film as a whole, striking in many ways as it is, lacks cinematic unity and in so far fails in fashioning out of its interesting material a truly cinematic drama.

"The End of St. Petersburg," though less conventional in its story and general treatment than "Czar Ivan the Terrible," is nevertheless even less impressive as a drama. This is rather surprising, as the material is there and the director Pudovkin gives innumerable instances of his ability to see things in an original and revealing light. All the same, the picture seems to be singularly lacking in substance. The story, which begins with a promise of picturing the downfall of the old world, soon resolves itself into a purely schematic and somewhat abstract recounting of the familiar factors which brought about the revolution: the callousness of the masters, the brutality of the war, the starvation of the people, and, finally, the victorious rising. The life of the masters is only hinted at with one or two deftly satirical touches; and the life of the masses is also only barely outlined in purely schematic and needlessly monochrome scenes. The feature that distinguishes "The End of St. Petersburg" and places it considerably above the average product is the passionate fervor of its photography. It is a camera-man's picture with all the camera-man's search for the most characteristic angle and sometimes the most symbolical object. But a motion picture is more than merely a sequence of still views, however quickly they follow one another and however expressive is their arrested symbolism. In "The End of St. Petersburg" there is perhaps more of this literary symbolism than the picture can hold.

"The End of St. Petersburg" is worthy of all the enthusiasm that has been showered on it if only for its striking "difference" from the Hollywood article, which it shows in its fearless and earnest tackling of life and in its mordant penetration into the visual substance of its human world. As a photographic record of the reconstructed events of the Russian Revolution it is superb. As a dynamic narrative—as a cinematic drama—it is loosely connected, jerky, and often flat.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

KEITH ALBEE CAMEO THEATRE 42 St. & B'way WEEK Beg. Sat. JULY 21

FILM ARTS GUILD presents "GREAT OUTDOORS FILM WEEK"

CAPTAIN "Hunting Big Game in Africa"
H. A. SNOW'S

Remarkable Film Record of a Gun and Camera Expedition into the Dark Continent

AND ON THE SAME PROGRAM

"The Arctic Seal-Hunt"

A Timely Photoplay of Man's Struggle with Nature in the Frozen North

Trotsky breaks a silence of four years—his amazing book has just been published!

There is brilliant oratory, keen political thinking, and merciless polemic in this book, all the documents of which are suppressed and outlawed by the Stalin régime, and came out of Russia "underground." The main section, dealing with the problems standing between the present régime and the socialist society of which they dream, will undoubtedly take its place among the classics of socialist thought. $2.00

THE REAL SITUATION IN RUSSIA

by LEON TROTSKY

Translated by MAX EASTMAN

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

383 Madison Avenue

New York

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

"PORGY" || REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

|| JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 5:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

|| GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

THE ACTOR MANAGERS present

GRAND STREET FOLLIES
OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway.
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Tues. (Pop.) & Thurs.

International Relations Section

Communism in China

By PEARL S. BUCK

FOREIGN optimists have said that communism could never succeed in China, and the Nationalist Government now has decided against allowing the Communists to continue as a part of the Revolutionary Party. Indeed, they have adopted the most extreme measures against Communists in all sections of the country under their control. But although Russian propagandists and agents have been forcibly ejected from China and although thousands of Chinese Communists have been killed by the Nationalist Government, the Communist cause on the whole continues to prosper, and he is a blind patriot who denies it. The newspapers almost daily carry headlines concerning new Communist uprisings, and the butchery with which Communists were treated in Canton has not served to daunt them in other places. In Hunan and Honan recently whole communities, men, women, and children, have been massacred by bands of peasants calling themselves Communists, and the same has been true in other sections. Shanghai itself is admittedly teeming with Communists, who, except for the rigorous surveillance of the police, Chinese and foreign, would certainly come forth with something more than the placards they usually satisfy themselves with at present. I say "usually," because I have before me a newspaper reporting that, recently, a few blocks away from me five Chinese were killed by a group of Communists, because one of the hapless persons was suspected of giving information to the police concerning one of the Communists.

When one studies the forms which communism is now taking in China one realizes that it is not Russian but Chinese communism. Things are being done as communism which for centuries have gone on under other names. Russian propagandists and agents, as a matter of fact, have taught the Chinese working and idle classes very little beyond the name Communism, or Kung Ts'an T'ang. Funds were undoubtedly furnished from Russia for a time, but there is no guaranty that they are still being furnished. Yet the thing grows and flourishes, and if one dared prophesy in China these days one would prophesy that this "communism" is going to increase, certainly for a time. More certainly, it is the greatest problem ahead of the Nationalist Government.

Were it a foreign thing it could be easily wiped out. Foreign ideas of any sort have taken no deep root in China as yet. But the communistic ideas in China have their roots in something far deeper than Russian propaganda—in the Chinese habit of mind and in the ancient wrongs of the common people, with which foreign treaties and international relations have nothing to do. Indeed, when one reads the handbills and literature of these Communists in China, one finds almost no reference to the presence or oppression of the foreigner. The posters and books are all against the government, the militarists, the rich, and the imperialists of their own country.

These are no new complaints. Class feeling in China has always been strong. China has been a country of notoriously corrupt rulers, but it has been a common thing for the people in a district to rise up suddenly, arm themselves with knives and farm implements, and, sweeping down upon their local official, to tear up his court or "yamen," kill him and his family, plunder his goods, and go home with a sense of duty done—all because the official had gone beyond the limits of corruption regarded as permissible.

Modern implements of war, however, have enabled the militarists and officials to arm themselves and their retinue, while the people have remained unarmed. The resentment of the people has increased accordingly. Anyone who has traveled through interior China and has talked with people of all classes realizes that every rich man, even long before the days of the present revolution, held his possessions but lightly, and every poor man hoped and expected that at any moment he might become rich. In every period of political or local disturbance the poor rose and plundered the rich and often killed them and their families if any resistance was offered. Many a fortune has changed hands overnight, and many a wealthy man been made a beggar and thankful at that to have his life spared. The average Chinese feels that such changes are to be expected, that there is no redress for them, and that, after all, there is a sort of rough justice in allowing someone else to enjoy the riches for a time.

The secret societies with which China has been permeated from earliest times are another root of communism. It is almost impossible to estimate their number. Certainly the majority of the male population belong to some such society, demanding the highest loyalty of its members and in many cases exacting the death penalty for any defection. The present Communists have a typically Chinese organization and embrace in their ranks many of these secret societies. Within these secret organizations for many centuries possessions have been held in common and the members are sworn to help each other to the utmost. A very ancient society of this kind is the "Ts'ai-ch'ing," made up of men and a few women who have no regular employment but band together to extort money from anyone they can. They do not mind murdering to achieve their ends. This society originated many centuries ago as a self-protective society, but it quickly degenerated into a predatory group, and now is one of the strongest communistic groups in the country. It is closely organized into varying ranks, each having a leader and "students" or apprentices. All money is held in common. The society has its own language, its own book of laws, and its own god. Many of the members are farmers and peasants, but most are idlers about cities and towns. A few rich people join it in order to protect themselves from its depredations, paying a percentage of their income into the general fund. Another such society, even more communistic in that it recognizes no distinction of rank within the group and calls all men "brothers," is the Red Spears, an ancient society now rising with fresh strength in many parts of China.

Thieves and robbers of course have such associations, and the police are often compelled to bicker and make bargains with them rather than to arrest for crimes committed. The safest protection for a private citizen is to pay a retainer to the chief of the thieves rather than to the chief of the police. The Chinese mind accepts such conditions as normal, and allows to robbers, bandits, and criminals the right to live and pursue their calling as recognized, although not honored, parts of society. One finds almost universal sympathy toward bandits. The tendency is to blame society rather than to condemn the bandits. Particularly are the rich blamed for the crimes of the poor, who may choose to rob rather than to work.

One of the most famous Chinese novels, written some six hundred years ago, gives a very clear picture of what still persists as the bandit situation. The novel deals with a group of robbers—in every case the leaders took to the trade because of the injustice of the rich or of some official, and the author's sympathy is clearly with the robbers. For recent editions of this novel a modern Communist has written a preface, claiming that the book is one of the earliest treatises on communism. It shows, he says, how society, even in those early days, was so organized that the poor had no chance of a share in the goods of life unless they took it by force. The author, Shih Nai-an, in his own preface to the book, stoutly maintained that he wrote only to amuse. But the earnest young Chinese of this generation will not have it so, and the book is enjoying a real renaissance in its new guise.

In spite of rigid class divisions the Chinese have been the most democratic of peoples. There was always a chance for a man to rise in position through scholarship or military skill. The humblest man could compete for high place if he had brains and persistence. People early became accustomed, therefore, to the idea of change of class in society. Indeed, the Chinese have enjoyed such extreme individual freedom that one wonders if they will ever be able to endure the legal restrictions of an ordinary modern republic. The bond between ruler and subject has been of the slightest, many times scarcely going beyond the payment of an annual tribute, and local autonomy has been carried very far. The first reaction of the average Chinese to any new kind of control is to rise up against it in indignation. Toward the end of every dynasty one finds just such an insurrection as is now taking place in so many rural districts in China. Groups of bandits organized, waxed strong, and brooked no control of any kind. Self-protective societies rose to oppose them and grew strong in turn. Many times the emperors themselves came from the ranks of these societies. The first emperor of the East Han dynasty, for instance, was a common man. The first of the Sung emperors was of the lower ranks of society. The first Ming emperor was a cowherd. It is no alien thing to the Chinese mind, therefore, for a man of lowly station to rise to the very throne itself. It is not without reason that every coolie feels himself a potential president.

To this habit of mind which sees no wrong in using force to seek redress for individual grievance against society, or in forcing the rich to give up their possessions on demand, there is added the impetus of years of actual injustice to the poorer classes. It has been the ideal of the rich man in China to spend his entire time in the pursuit of pleasure—perhaps because he has felt keenly his uncertain tenure of goods! The years of continued internal warfare have rendered it almost impossible to make safe investments. But this spectacle of prodigal spending for food and clothing and pleasure has brought the increasing number of the poor to the point of madness.

Class discontent in China has been directed particularly against the unequal division of property, particularly land. The Chinese are not unused to the idea of land held in common. Thousands of years before Christ there was a division of land which allowed for one-ninth of the total area being worked in common. Since then there have been other similar divisions. The Communists who speak of sharing the land and the profits therefrom appeal to an ancient tradition, and it is quite true that in some parts of China today famine has forced small landholders to sell their land to large owners, and it may be true that a redivision of the land is indeed necessary.

So the Chinese needed no one to teach them how to rebel against organized society, and they needed no one to teach them to kill ruthlessly for what they wanted. One is appalled in reading the novels of China, those true mirrors of the people, to see how carelessly life has always been given and taken. As one Chinese put it, "Our life is but a killing back and forth." It needs no Russian explanation to make one understand how a Communist secret society can sweep into a community and wipe it out overnight without sentiment and without regret. The T'ai-pings of the middle nineteenth century were ultra-Communists before bolshevism had ever been heard of. The one new thing which has been added to the modern communism of China is the denial of the rights of the family over the individual and the virtual breakdown of all family ties. Yet even this can scarcely be considered wholly new, since from ancient times the communistic secret societies set their demands for loyalty in many cases even above the family. But certainly the new freedom in the sex relations is very new, and this innovation may perhaps be attributed to Russian influence.

And because communism, so-called, in China is but a fresh recrudescence of an old form of revolt, it seems improbable that any measures, however severe, can immediately eradicate it. It has become, by long usage, a state of mind habitual to the average poor man of China.

Contributors to This Issue

SINCLAIR LEWIS is the author of "Main Street," "Babbitt," "Arrowsmith," "The Man Who Knew Coolidge," and other novels.

EARNEST ALBERT HOOTON is professor of anthropology at Harvard University.

LORINE PRUETTE is the author of "Women and Leisure: A Study in Social Waste."

GARRETA BUSEY is a poet and critic of poetry.

RUTH LECHLITNER is a New York poet.

H. L. MENCKEN is editor of the American Mercury and a contributing editor of The Nation.

ROBERT LIVINGSTON SCHUYLER is professor of history at Columbia University.

HAROLD KELLOCK is with the Soviet Union Information Bureau at Washington, D. C.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY is the author of "The Theater Unbound" and other notable studies of the drama and the cinema.

PEARL S. BUCK is familiar with conditions in the old and the new China. Her husband is a teacher of economics in the University of Nanking.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 1, 1928

No. 3291

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	99
EDITORIALS:
Life Is Cheap in Mexico.....	101
The Defeat of the Coal Strike.....	102
"Amateur" .....	103
Martin and Life.....	103
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	104
DIGGING GRAVES IN MEXICO. By Carleton Beals.....	105
ALVARO OBREGON. By Ernest Gruening.....	106
PLAYS IN CENTRAL EUROPE. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	107
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .....	109
CORRESPONDENCE .....	109
BOOKS:
For a Few Hours. By Marie Luhrs.....	111
To a Friend. By Babette Deutsch.....	111
Schoolroom Chaos. By Norah Meade.....	111
Houdini. By R. F. Dibble.....	112
The Theory of Liberalism. By Lewis Rockow.....	113
India: Beautiful and Terrifying. By W. Norman Brown.....	113
Books in Brief.....	113
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Germany's Red Front. By Agnes Smedley.....	116

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

TOM MOONEY AND WARREN K. BILLINGS have rounded out their twelfth year in prison. These years have sped by swiftly for most of us. "Is it possible," we say, "that Mooney and Billings have been shut up so long?" To the two prisoners, victims of perjured testimony and the unbelievable reluctance of those in power to right a wrong, the years behind bars have gone by on slow feet; helpless and baffled, these men have waited and watched their youth drop from them. And still the authorities evade and decline and offer substitutes for freedom. A new drive to release Mooney and Billings is being initiated with an appeal for pardon to Governor Young of California. The appeal is being presented by a delegation headed by Frank P. Walsh, Clarence Darrow, Arthur Garfield Hays, and Fremont Older. It is known in advance that the Governor has no wish to pardon these two victims of California mob rule. He is likely to offer parole, but Tom Mooney is reluctant to accept an incriminating compromise. On this point we take the liberty of quoting from a personal letter he recently wrote to the editor of The Nation:

My attitude with respect to parole is that I would rather rot and die in prison than to accept it; that I am absolutely innocent of this crime. To accept parole is tantamount to an admission of guilt and would make of me a conditional prisoner of the State for the remainder of my life. . . . I have asked for a pardon and will accept nothing short of that. The rules governing paroles are unbearable to any self-respecting freeman—they are humiliating and degrading.

Let every person who prizes his own freedom join the appeal to the California Governor. In him alone rests the power of pardon.

IF THE POWER ISSUE is not prominent in the campaign yet, there is good reason why it should be. Recently the Public Service Commission of New York State, most of whose members were appointed by Governor Smith, refused to allow any protest from consumers against the joining of the Brooklyn Edison and Consolidated Gas companies into one billion-dollar corporation. In this case, which involves an inflation of assets of over $100,000,000, the commission took the position that only stockholders were interested and entitled to a hearing. This is the Farthest South to date in the breakdown of the pretense that regulation protects the consumers. Morris L. Ernst, representing the Public Committee on Power in New York State, which includes editors of The Nation and New Republic as well as prominent Republicans and Democrats, stated that unless in such combinations contractual guaranties could be obtained from the companies that the expected efficiencies would be shared with the public, the whole pretense that regulation protects the consumers should be dropped. It will be remembered that the Federal Trade Commission discovered evidence to show that the utilities were the most active exponents of the efficiency of regulation, and that President Cortelyou of the Consolidated Gas and President Sloan of the Brooklyn Edison had their hands in the peaceful penetration of schools and press with power propaganda. This case is clearly an attempt to "cash in" on the work they have done in that direction. The commission, which seemed at first disposed to aid them entirely, to brush away any opposition and discussion of the issues involved, has now taken under advisement the idea of listening to consumers' objections. Governor Smith will certainly be called upon to answer for the ineffectiveness of regulation of power companies in his own State.

BOSTON IS STILL "the poor farm of journalism." On July 17 all its morning newspapers led with the sensational news that more than two hundred factory workers in half a dozen plants had collapsed shortly after the noon hour the day before, violently stricken with some form of poisoning. All the victims had partaken of box lunches supplied by the Waldorf Lunch System, Inc., one of the chain restaurants which operate in greater Boston and other cities. The Ford plant in Somerville was forced to suspend for the rest of the day, so large was the proportion of its employees affected. By a prodigious effort of journalistic side-stepping every Boston newspaper managed to avoid mentioning the name of the concern which supplied the lunches—surely one of the vital and essential facts in the story—referring merely to "a local chain restaurant." The Associated Press story, however, went out without deletion. The United Press dispatches, on the other hand, suppressed the name of the Waldorf chain. Possibly the Boston United Press correspondent had obtained his journalistic training in Boston.

BURLINGAME
PUB. CO.
U.S.

ELEUTHERIOS VENIZELOS seems to be a sort of political cat, with at least nine political lives. He led the uprising against Turkey which made Crete a part of Greece in 1896, and headed a revolt against Prince George of Greece in 1905. But he returned to favor, and he became Prime Minister of all Greece in 1910, holding the post for five years, until his ardor to enter the World War led to a break with King Constantine. Exiled, he remained in politics; and in 1917, aided by the French, he first established a rival government in Saloniki, then ousted the king and, with the aid of French marines, became Greece's first President. He was the strong man of the Balkans at the Paris Peace Conference, and won for his country a paper empire in Asia. But, despite Lloyd George's support, he could not hold Turkey against the Turks; the disastrous defeat of the Greek army and the burning of Smyrna in 1920 seemed to end Venizelos's career with a great smoky smudge. Not at all. In 1924 he returned to a short-lived premiership, only to retire, disgustedly announcing that he was through with politics forever. Yet he is in the premiership again, and has forced the unwilling President, Admiral Koundoriotis, to dissolve Parliament and change the electoral law so that the Cretan may rule untrammelled. It is a far cry from the days when Venizelos was hailed as the builder of a new Greek democracy. His Royalist opponents accuse him of violating the constitution to consolidate his power; the radicals agree, but add that he is acting as the agent of American capital. His first acts in office were to end the strikes among the longshoremen and the workers in the American tobacco factories, and to alter the Diomides plan which gave English bankers a preference over a Franco-American group competing for the new Greek loan. But enemies and friends agree that no man in all Greece has a more passionate desire to see his country great.

WITH THE EXCHANGE OF NOTES between the Austrian Chancellor, Dr. Seipel, and Signor Mussolini, the question of South Tyrol is restored to the background as far as official Vienna is concerned. Mussolini has succeeded in getting his formula accepted. Dr. Seipel admits that "he has never ceased to regard the South Tyrol question as a purely internal Italian affair and to recognize that the Italian citizens of German nationality must approach Rome with their requests and petitions." The Chancellor declares that Austria's interest is a purely cultural one. "If any irresponsible persons should indulge in anti-Italian agitation, the Federal Government will proceed against them by every legal means." Mussolini is thus assured that the bullying of the South Tyrolese by Giarrantana and his satellites in Bozen may continue without further protest from the Austrian government. No wonder that the Lavoro d'Italia sneers at "cosmopolitan Vienna, this capital without a soul or an ideal." The Austrian Government cuts no very heroic figure.

IT IS NOT THE FIRST TIME in history that Vienna has passed indifferently over the amazing loyalty of the Tyrolese, but on this occasion she has the excuse of complete helplessness. Rome, however, cuts no more heroic figure than Vienna. What she has done is something very like what, in ordinary life, is called blackmail. The war-cripples, after a six years' struggle, have just been awarded the pensions which Italy was bound to pay them under the St. Germain Treaty; to obtain their rights, the cripples had to send a detachment to Rome. Meanwhile Austria is waiting for her creditors, who granted her relief in kind and a little money in the starvation days of 1919, to agree to her seeking a fresh loan in the international markets. Italy alone has been blocking the way. On her purely formal consent a price was fixed—the Austrian Government was called upon to eat humble pie. It has done so, and Italian opposition to the much-desired loan will be withdrawn. Rome celebrates the emptiest triumph imaginable. Not merely is Austria's weakness a byword in Europe; the protests against the bullying of the South Tyrolese have not come from Vienna, but from the capital of Tyrol itself, Innsbruck. It was anything but the wish of Dr. Seipel that the Tyrolese deputies should speak their mind in the Vienna Parliament, but they forced his hand, and will do so again whenever they think it will serve their conationals now ruled by Italy. Furthermore, it is not the protests of Vienna but those of Munich and Berlin which really cause Italy concern. And these capitals are not very good subjects for international blackmail. All that has been achieved positively is a little further loosening of the very slender bond attaching Tyrol to the Austrian Federation. Perhaps Mussolini desired this. He would do well to reflect that if that bond is ever severed, it will profit not Rome but Munich.

JOHAN A. HOBSON, our contributing editor, was seventy years old on July 6. Our readers know the rich wisdom of his writing, but we would share with them the appreciation of the Manchester Guardian, which ranks him in the great tradition of Adam Smith, Ricardo, Bagehot, and John Stuart Mill:

A student and scientist by nature, he has never relinquished his original interest in the fundamental problems of economics; yet his passion for social justice drew him early into political journalism and dictated a career that could not be pursued in an academic post. Hence his unique influence on his time; in the world of theory he has insisted on the importance of relating study to practice, in the world of practice he has shown the importance of theory. He found economics a little remote and abstracted; he directed its attention to unemployment, economic waste, and urgent problems of poverty. He found reformers empirical, and compelled them to face the theoretical issues that their proposals raised. One of the most provocative and stimulating critics of his generation, he worked out the constructive basis and justification of the practical social legislation of the last generation.

Fortunately, as the Guardian says, the time has not come for a final assessment of his position. His is still one of the youngest and most stimulating minds in England.

ELLEN TERRY the actress is only a tradition to most of the readers of these lines; she dipped below the horizon many years ago. But Ellen Terry the woman remained to the end a living, glowing personality even to the youngest of the younger generation of newspaper readers. Age finally forced her retirement from the theatrical stage but nothing could or did force her retirement from the larger stage of life until death took her from it on July 21 in her home in England. The vivid, captivating personality that had been the great factor in her success on the stage maintained for her a devoted circle of friends, and flashed forth from time to time to the newspaper-reading world, up to her last illness in her eighty-first year. Of Ellen Terry the actress we hope to say more later; of Ellen Terry the woman it is enough now to quote the lines she herself penned for her friends when she foresaw the end was near:

No funeral gloom, my dears, when I am gone,
Corpse-gazings, tears, black raiment, grave-yard grimness,
Think of me as withdrawn into the dimness.
Yours still, you mine,
Remember all the best of our past moments and forget the rest,
And so to where I wait come gently on.

IT WAS THE LAST of the ninth, with two out and two on bases and the visiting team two runs ahead. Lena Blackburne ordered the White Sox hurler to pitch to Babe Ruth. Ball one—wide. The next one came shoulder high and a white dot flashed through the sunshine far up into the right-field bleachers. Babe Ruth, half mobbed by worshipers, trotted home with the ball game. And why shouldn't he be mobbed by worshipers? What is worship for? This middle-aged ball player, a pitching hero for the old Red Sox thirteen years ago, counted out by sports writers again and again, hit six home runs in six days from July 15 to 20, and on the latter date was twenty-nine games and nine home-runs ahead of his astounding record of 1927. We are glad that the American League has decided to change its rules so that the man who is voted the most valuable player in the league may win the honor a second time. An old hero is as worthy as a new one.

Life Is Cheap in Mexico

HUMAN life is cheap in Mexico. It always has been cheap. Carleton Beals in his "Mexico: An Interpretation" has given us an unforgettable picture of human sacrifices to the terrible snake-wreathed god, Huitzilopochtli, in Aztec days. For four long days the black-robed priests cut up the victims while a vast crowd watched. The Spanish conquest brought new forms of human cruelty—Cortez's massacres, the Inquisition, murderous slave labor in the mines. And when independence came to Mexico the movement was led by landed aristocrats who objected to crown interference with their prerogatives. Efforts of her peons to release themselves from medieval shackles time and again have been drowned in blood, and the coming of foreign capital meant no change in that. Mexico has a tradition of violence.

It should not occasion surprise that Alvaro Obregon was assassinated. Rather is it surprising that he and Plutarco Elias Calles have so long escaped the assassin's pistol. For these two men have made enemies in remolding their country. For a decade they have fought through one revolution after another, and in the intervals of peace have waged a peaceful war against irresponsible generals, feudal landlords, and the church that was associated with them. Obregon had been in prison under men who did not hesitate to assassinate their political opponents. He and Calles had been jointly responsible for the death of scores of their opponents by more or less thinly disguised military tribunals.

It is little more than half a century since our own country was madly engaged in a larger-scale civil war than Mexico has ever known; and at its end a political assassin shot down the man who seemed most likely to be able to heal the breach. Twice in the intervening years Presidents have been shot in office. The long story of the United States's relations with Mexico shows no hesitation in resorting to violence to gain our own ends. We should be slow to judge Mexico harshly.

Yet there is no doubt that Obregon's death is a setback for progress in Mexico. The Nation is under no illusions as to Mexican political institutions. Elections have never been free; the masses of Mexico have not yet the kind of social freedom and education without which political democracy is mere stage play. But Obregon and Calles had broadened the popular basis of support of the state, and through practice in the stage play of democracy the Mexican people have been progressing toward its realities. It has been a dictatorship only slightly checked by a parliament through which Obregon and Calles have governed Mexico for eight years; but their dictatorship has observed most of the forms of constitutional government and steadfastly aimed to make dictatorship less and less possible. They have reduced the army and subordinated its personal chieftains to the civil officials, sought to develop mass education, to free both agricultural and urban laborers from the grosser forms of economic exploitation, and have relied upon such organized groups from the bottom of the social scale for support in a crisis. And this liberal dictatorship had lived and grown in strength through a series of violent tests wherein foreign capital and munitions aided the dissident groups in Mexico. It has not been a pretty struggle, but looked at in historic perspective many of the mistakes fade out and the outlines of a great liberating movement appear.

It would have been a symbol of progress in Mexico had Calles been able peacefully to transfer the civil power to Obregon. The rancors of past conflicts made that impossible. We do not yet know the precise motivation behind the assassin's act, but that it was rooted in the social struggle is clear. In such a crisis, with Mexico's anarchic potentialities, Calles will have to continue in power. If he leaves the Presidency it can only be to stand behind the authority of some weaker man. It is a tribute to his character that almost no one doubts the sincerity of his desire to give up power, as no one doubts the necessity of his remaining.

It may seem harsh to say it, but there has been no moment in the last ten years when Mexico could as well afford the sacrifice of Obregon. Ambassador Morrow and President Calles have put an end to the mutual suspicions which meant that every difficulty in Mexico was seized upon by interested Yankees for their own profit. There is no hint of American interference today. The difficulties with the oil companies are on the highway to settlement; the financial groups interested in loans to Mexico are sympathetic with her government's problems; the main outlines of her program for agrarian reform are accepted. Even the dispute with the church shows prospects of settlement. One group of diehards among the Mexican Catholics had held out against the moderate majority, hoping that Obregon's advent to power would change the Calles program. That hope has been rudely shattered by the gun of a Catholic fanatic. If the Vatican now accepts the Calles-Ruiz plan and the priests return to legal functioning in Mexico, the assassination may after all herald an era of unprecedented peace.

The Defeat of the Coal Strike

THE coal strike has been lost. What had been common knowledge for several months was finally admitted by the Policy Committee of the United Mine Workers on July 19 when it allowed separate districts of the union to accept a wage scale below the level of the Jacksonville agreement. This Jacksonville agreement, which called for a wage of $7.50 a day, was the whole issue of the strike.

A fearful wreckage is left in the wake of the fifteen months' struggle. The once great union of mine workers has lost at least two-thirds of the bituminous miners of the country, and those who are left must accept humiliating conditions in order to return to work. In a few districts the strike will drag on for a time, but only with the object of saving the union, through local agreements, from complete destruction. The Illinois miners may emerge with a fairly powerful district union; in Ohio and Pennsylvania the disaster appears to be quite complete. In the mountains of Pennsylvania are thousands of miners and their families who have been living in tents and barracks for months on a few cents a week. Many are sick but unable to get doctors or medicine.

These starving miners of Pennsylvania are the casualties of one of the most futile strikes in our history. Morally they were right in their contention that men who risk their lives in the black heat of the coal veins are entitled to $7.50 a day—in any sane society they would be among the most highly paid people. But this is not a sane society and the leaders of the United Mine Workers should have known that. The miners were fighting for justice in an industry which is an insane chaos of over-production, bad management, and pauperizing competition. They were beaten before they began to strike.

They were beaten by non-union coal. Before the strike started two-thirds of the bituminous coal supply of the country was coming from the non-union mines of West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and other States. The union in Pennsylvania had begun to crumble. The big Pittsburgh Coal Company, with fifty-four mines in one district and a Mellon on the board of directors, had adopted an open-shop policy and continued to operate. Scores of union mines were shut down because they could not compete with their low-wage rivals. It was estimated that some 200,000 superfluous miners were working irregularly in the industry—and about 200,000 miners went on strike.

Last spring the left-wing faction of the union tried desperately to spread the strike to the non-union mines through its "save-the-union" movement. It failed and the strike collapsed. Now the left-wing contingent is continuing a drive for a new national union, but its best leaders have left it and the chances of success are slight. The most useful thing it has done in the strike is to teach the miners that an injunction can be defied en masse and that no court can keep an entire community in jail.

Was the strike justified? The question cannot be answered by a yes or no. Given the elements of power, demagoguery, and stupidity in the organizations of owners and miners, and the strike seems to have been inevitable. Many mine owners who had agreed in 1924 to pay their miners the Jacksonville scale of $7.50 a day connived with their workers to operate on lower wage-scales in order to keep their mines running in competition with the non-union mines. President John L. Lewis bellowed against the practice, but he never faced the issue squarely; perhaps his own members would not allow him to. They had shouted their slogan "No reduction in wages" so often that they had become intoxicated with it.

The economic competition of the non-union mines left Mr. Lewis and his machine only two logical alternatives: to organize those non-union fields or to grant substantial concessions to the owners of union mines. Mr. Lewis did neither effectively—although the miners in Illinois did increase their output without an increase in pay. The mine owners were more unreasonable than Mr. Lewis; in fact, it is doubtful if a perfect labor leader could have prevented the strike in the face of the owners' determination to force it.

It is obvious that some new pattern of control is needed for the bituminous coal industry. The Nation has often suggested the necessity of a national reorganization of the industry for the sake of the consumers, the miners, and the owners, but we have entertained no illusions concerning the prospects of such a reform under a Republican or Democratic Party. The most that can be hoped for under the present regime is a set of timid suggestions for regulation—such as the program of the United States Coal Commission.

Meanwhile there is no use in marking time. The repeated disasters in the coal industry give an opportunity to educate public opinion toward an intelligent plan of social control. A significant alternative to the present system of control has been suggested in a book from the Institute of Economics by Walton H. Hamilton and Helen R. Wright, "A Way of Order for Bituminous Coal," just published by Macmillan. The Hamilton and Wright plan proposes a national coordination of the industry under a federal corporation as the first step away from chaos. The plan is not state socialism and it is not private capitalism but a combination of certain elements of both.

Hamilton and Wright would have all the bituminous mines in the country owned by a Federal Bituminous Coal Company, which would be granted exclusive control of the open market by the United States government. The technical ownership of this corporation would be in the hands of the present owners of bituminous mines, who would receive 5 per cent debentures for their investments—but this ownership would not mean control. The miners and consumers would do the controlling through a board of directors chosen by labor unions and trade organizations, with certain representatives of domestic consumers chosen by the President of the United States.

A dream? Yes, but a hard-headed dream by economists who have previously won an enviable reputation as analysts of the coal industry. To the mine owners it will seem like a piece of major surgery performed without anesthetics. To others of us, who believe that minor operations will never cure the sickness of the coal industry, the plan seems full of common sense.

“Amateur”

Amateur, n., one who cultivates an art or pursues a study from love or attachment, and without reference to gain or emolument.—Webster's Dictionary.

THUS the dictionary. But, according to the officials of the United States Lawn Tennis Association, an amateur is a person who may play tennis six months in the year, supported by his friends and admirers; attract large, paying crowds to stadiums maintained by the officials of the U. S. L. T. A. and their friends; write, for pay, about tennis in general; but who never, never, never writes about a match in which he himself is playing unless at least three days have elapsed between the match and the appearance of the article. And so they have declared Tilden, the greatest tennis player of our generation, a professional, and ruled him out of the Davis Cup matches.

It is ridiculous. “Amateur” sport has become an elaborate stage setting. The rules that hedge it about are as artificial as an eighteenth-century drawing-room conversation, and nowhere are they more artificial than in tennis. Tilden has been writing about tennis for years. If he is a professional today, he was a professional last week and last year. And in one sense, of course, he is, and has been for years, a professional, as all the Davis Cup players are, and must be professionals. Tilden and Hennessey and Lott, like Lacoste and Cochet and Borotra, Baron Morpurgo, and the rest of the international tennis stars, make tennis their major profession. It happens that the talent of tennis-playing does not fall exclusively upon the wealthy. Tennis genius sprouts among boys and girls who have to earn their livings. Sometimes rich friends, and sometimes the promoters of the matches, subsidize them, directly or indirectly. More decently, they set out to support themselves without violating the elaborate codes of professional amateurism. Cochet and Brugnon keep a sporting-goods store; that is permissible. Helen Wills writes books, with the aid of a “ghost,” and draws pictures; and that is permissible. Tilden appeared on the stage with a racket under his arm; and that was permissible. But Tilden also wrote for the papers; and the wealthy patrons of the sport considered that reprehensible, and set out to make life miserable for him. Now Tilden is an artist who lives for his art. So, grumpily, he accepted rules that he despised but came as near violating them as he dared. He may have violated the letter of the rule at Wimbledon; and if he did doubtless the committee was right in suspending him as an amateur, though there is a clear suggestion of personal animus in the fact that they did not do so until his closest friends on the committee had sailed for France.

But what nonsense it all is! The tennis tournaments support commercial ventures like the stadium in Paris and our own tennis bowl at Forest Hills. The Olympic games are managed with just such professional skill and ballyhoo as make money for Tex Rickard in what is frankly known as professional boxing. Only the players are forbidden to make money. Does anyone suppose that the boys who this summer represent the United States in the Olympic games themselves earned the money to pay their passage? By any common-sense standard Tilden is no more professional than they. It would seem sensible to use words that fit the facts.

Martin and Life

THE retirement of Edward S. Martin from the editorial staff of Life merits more notice than has been paid to it. In a humorous journal he has for forty-five years maintained a serious editorial page of unvarying stylistic excellence, a page that, save for the war years, grew mellow as time passed. Often it sparkled with humor; usually it was marked by unusual sagacity and understanding, and by criticism which in a few clear sentences went to the heart of questions. Sometimes, though not often, he really lifted the roof of the dwelling of the politicians and let us peep inside. But always his writing was a delight—easy, graceful, remarkably effective. It was an ideal style for an essayist, and when Mr. Martin discovered that he gave us a group of volumes beginning with his “Windfalls of Observation” down to his “Reflections of a Beginning Husband” and “Unrest of Women.” Between these came various volumes of verse which helped to win for Mr. Martin his large and devoted following. That he should finally have come to fill acceptably the Editor's Easy Chair of Harper's Magazine, the Easy Chair of George William Curtis and William Dean Howells, was but just and proper.

One of the original founders in 1883 of Life, Mr. Martin and his associates decided upon serious leading articles, cutting loose in this respect from the tradition of the Continental humorous weeklies, and of Punch, which continues its efforts to mold public opinion by indirection rather than direct editorial comment. It is an interesting fact that the present managers have decided to continue this feature and have engaged Mr. Elmer Davis to do his best to fill Mr. Martin's shoes, interesting because they have changed Life in almost every other respect and have so altered the tone that we rather suspect that Mr. Martin found himself out of touch with the new day in the office in which he had outlived his early associates. We cannot but bemoan the change because there was a dignity and charm about the makeup of the old Life that set it apart. Never a radical journal, its sense of humor and judgment deserted it in the war years, in which it fell for every one of the conventional lies, Mr. Martin being profoundly influenced by his close personal friendship with him whom H. L. Mencken has dubbed “the preposterous Colonel House.”

This seems to leave the field open to a humorous political weekly. An American Punch could, we suppose, not succeed; the original in England maintains its standards of excellence with amazing skill. But it does seem as if, despite the cartoons in the daily papers, there should still be a field in America for a humorous weekly, with a wise and discerning editorial page, with pencils to unveil the shortcomings and the hypocrisy of our present-day politicians, and to celebrate their merits precisely as was done in earlier days by Puck and Harper's Weekly. We realize that most journalists will shake their heads as they read this. We base our hope upon the belief that personality still counts in journalism. Edward S. Martin's long career, and his host of ardent friends would seem to prove our point, even though his was naturally an old-fashioned liberalism of a type now outworn in this changing world. People read him, whether they agreed with him or not, not merely because they admired his style, but because they believed in his sincerity and honesty and his effort to be detached and judicial.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

UPON the precise letter of its code the Lawn Tennis Association is technically correct in disbarring Tilden from Davis Cup play. It is also fair to point out that Tilden had accepted the regulation against which he offended. In the player-writer controversy of a season or so ago the stipulation was laid down that no amateur might write of a tournament in which he himself participated until three days after the event. He could, however, write freely about My Favorite Strokes or delve into the past and do Memories of Whitman and Larned.

To me the distinction is not at all clear. Indeed it seems to me a small matter that the association appears to be technically within its rights. The whole thing is silly and for an obvious reason. All amateur organizations are attempting the impossible, and sport unfortunately has been enlisted as a contributor to the vast sum of American hypocrisy. It is the contention of athletic mentors that no man should profit financially by playing any game and remain an amateur. This may be a splendid ideal, but it is no longer feasible in the modern community. First we should have to abolish the radio, the motion picture, and the daily newspaper. To the champion in America comes increasingly a tide of publicity. In this country publicity is a definite medium of exchange. With publicity one can buy both food and lodging. It is the key to the city and also to the suburbs.

With the best intentions in the world a tennis champion cannot avoid making money out of his prowess. If he happens to be a surgeon a certain number of patients will stray in anxious to have their tonsils out by the hand of the man who saved the Davis Cup. As a lawyer he will be visited by clients who would never have heard of him except for his cannon-ball service. The bond business is filled with young men who are capitalizing their previous position in the sport-page headlines. Rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief; in not one of these occupations can the mighty athlete move and divest himself entirely of his glory. Accordingly the question gets down to the amount of direct appeal the champion may employ in cashing in his publicity for money. Obviously the distinctions must be finely drawn. Tilden would not be permitted to stand in the show window of a sporting goods store and demonstrate his back hand. That would be considered very justly too palpable a sale of his tennis talents. Nevertheless, he could write a series of syndicated articles for newspapers on How to Play Tennis. A number of amateurs in good standing are doing just that.

Where is the line to be drawn? Various cases come up which are so intricate that eventually lawn tennis must be limited to Washington, D. C., in order to have the Supreme Court handy for decisions. As well as a linesman it will be necessary to assign a lawyer to each match. In the face of these difficulties there is one remedy which never seems to come up. What would happen if no line at all were drawn? To the moguls of amateur sport such a proposition seems as outlandish as electing Trotsky to the United States Senate. And yet I am certain that no skies would fall or any extinct volcanoes spit up lava if the old distinction between amateur and professional were abolished. Surely some change in the general conception is very necessary. When tennis was an infant industry it was simple enough to limit competition to the few players who appeared in the occasional tournaments just for the fun of it. That was before the days of a tennis season, long trips, and the Davis Cup. No man can be a player of the first rank unless he is prepared to give up three or four months of steady application to perfecting and tightening up his game.

Very possibly a man is a fool to do that unless he has an independent income. But the same authorities who look askance on technical breaches of amateurism are the identical cheer leaders who urge young men to do or die for the Davis Cup. This year America had a training camp in Georgia much after the manner of the big-league baseball teams. Here the expenses were paid for the players invited to participate in the trials. But once tennis is lifted up to such importance the essence of amateurism has departed no matter what the practices of the players may be.

I have no desire to see the game go back to the days when it was a social and a private affair. The community in general gets much more fun out of matches at Forest Hills than if it were forced to read about encounters held in the seclusion of Newport. If there are to be stands large enough to hold all comers, money must be collected and somebody must be paid if it's only the builder. But once tennis has become a public spectacle it seems to me silly to pretend that all this is done in fun. Surely Tilden would not choose of his own free will to play in a large bowl before a crowd which must be constantly reminded that ladies and gentlemen do not applaud errors.

Crack tennis is no longer the pastime of the idle rich. As far as I know not one of the first-class players of the present day is entirely freed from the thrall of making his own living. Now that the competition has grown keener since the last French victory every nation urges its young men to give their all to tennis. That is well enough. Possibly sport may serve a useful purpose as a moral equivalent for war. But if the player is to give all it seems to me no more than reasonable that the country should make some return. And I mean a financial return. Tilden, La Coste, Cochet, and the others are practically drafted for service. If any star in any land said, "I can't compete in big matches anymore because I am too poverty stricken to afford the time," he would be treated as an arch traitor.

I see no possible harm and a great gain in frankness if tennis were administered without regard to amateur or professional distinctions. It may be that in some corner of the land there lurks some low mercenary fellow proficient at the game but so lacking in manners that his presence would pain even the most democratic gallery. In that case let him be barred for just those reasons and not for professionalism. In golf, although the lines are drawn, amateurs and professionals may meet without let or hindrance in all open tournaments. I do not see why this system could not be applied to tennis. A championship should determine the best man and not merely the most proficient within certain financial and artificial limitations. I myself could never see any great distinction between professionalism and living off expense money. According to the present system an amateur tennis player may be best defined as a careful fellow who has not yet been caught.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Digging Graves in Mexico

By CARLETON BEALS

Mexico City, July 23

EVERY candidate for the Mexican presidency is dead. Francisco Serrano is dead, Arnulfo Gomez is dead, Alvaro Obregon is dead. The regime which came out of Sonora on the crest of the Mexican Revolution and beached on a lonely island of power has torn itself to pieces in a selfish struggle for survival. Only Plutarco Elias Calles remains—Calles and a disciplined army.

And every economic and social organization in Mexico is in a state of disintegration or at least of realignment. For the moment only Calles remains firm—Calles and a disciplined army. Yesterday Obregon was undoubtedly master of the country, and his reappearance at the threshold of power had set in motion many new forces. But today he is dust and ashes and his death has caused a new type of social disintegration. He had used his strength to splinter the labor movement in accordance with the old motto, Divide and rule. The peasant movement had been in a process of integration; this process has been aborted. Today the labor movement is in a state of chaos and the peasant movement is drifting on uncharted seas. Obregonism, the unruly heritage of its founder, has become a hydra-headed creature scarcely able to survive. Obregonism is made up of peasant leaders, regional caciquismo or bossism, soup-kitchen bureaucrats, bastard militarism. Its present unity is a unity of chagrin at losing the soup. Its adherents loathe each other and will soon fall apart if, instead of a leader, they have only a common enemy. This enemy is Luis N. Morones, king and symbol of the Mexican Regional Confederation of Labor (CROM) and the Mexican Labor Party. Obregon was easily sweeping Morones and his group aside. Agrarian leaders have launched harsh and wild charges implicating Morones in the assassination. And so Morones, along with his fellow-Laborites, has resigned from the Calles government. This is the immediate result of Obregon's assassination—a sharpening of the bitterness between the followers of Obregon and of Morones.

The CROM swept into its greatest victory with the election of Calles, but during the past two years it has been on the defensive. Above all its leaders have been on the defensive. The leaders have lost prestige with the nation and with the rank and file of the CROM unions, and have been obliged to defend themselves from attack on all quarters. The leaders have lost power because of a wanton abuse of their power—by their kowtowing to the American Federation of Labor, by their looting of public funds, by their luxurious living, by their violent tactics (consider the assassination of Senator Juan Field Jurado), by their strenuous efforts to crush independent unions (consider their breaking of the railway strike, the fight against the Jalisco miners, the sharp clashes in the textile industry), by their use of official boards of conciliation and arbitration to break non-CROM unions and deny justice to non-CROM workers. Disaffection in the CROM ranks grew. Time and again the leaders prevented strong nucleus organizations, such as the Orizaba brewery and the Textile Center, from seceding. But although last year CROM broke the railway strike by an independent confederation of workers sixty thousand strong and apparently partially destroyed the old organization, CROM was greatly discredited among all the workers in the country.

From another angle came the political drive against CROM. Strong local governors and regional caciques resented the political power and federalizing tendencies of CROM, which interfered with their own rule. Independent unions were promoted. Such governors and caciques are Guadalupe Zuno in Jalisco, who promoted the independent Jalisco Federation of Labor; Portes Gil in Tamaulipas, who promoted independent oil unions; Adalberto Tejeda in Vera Cruz, who supported Communists and peasants. Torre Diaz in Yucatan, who kept the Socialist Party of the south-east out of the CROM. Thus the CROM in Jalisco has not been able to maintain its footing and has even resorted to alliances with Catholic unions. But two weeks ago all the CROM unions there seceded, ousted their leaders, joined the State Federation, and turned Communist.

Still another enemy of the CROM has been the peasant movement. The National Agrarian Party, led by Diaz Soto y Gama, an ex-Zapatista, and by Urelío Manrique, the ex-Governor of San Luis Potosi, ever since its foundation in 1920 has been, with the exception of short intervals, bitterly hostile. Soto y Gama and Morones are enemies to the death. The National Peasants' League, launched early in the Calles period largely under the aegis of Secretary of the Interior Adalberto Tejeda, and organized by Uasulo Galvan, is a more radical outfit affiliated with Moscow. For the time being it took the up-grade in opposition to CROM, but, though bidding fair to becoming a national organization, it has not realized its expectations. It has, however, dug deep in the states of Vera Cruz, Tamaulipas, and Jalisco and, to a lesser degree, in Durango, Michoacan, and Morelos. Through the propaganda of these two organizations, little by little the peasant organizations affiliated with CROM have slid away. The Grupo Accion, the inner clique of CROM, does not contain a single peasant leader.

This peasant-labor schism was symbolized two years ago by Calles and Obregon, the laborites building up around Calles, the peasants around Obregon. For a time the policies of Calles and Obregon clashed, until the Obregon tendency gained the upper hand. Also Obregon outmaneuvered Calles at every turn, whereupon Calles hauled down the flag and ceded all of Obregon's demands. This was partly due to the arrival of Ambassador Morrow on the Mexican scene, which drove a slight wedge between Calles and Morones. Calles's prompt accedence to Morrow's wishes was a slap in the face of Morones, who had held a more recalcitrant position.

All these onslaughts against the CROM were skilfully utilized by Obregon. His first campaign announcement promised justice to the railway workers. He gathered round his person the agrarian leaders Soto y Gama, Galvan, and even Manrique, who was strongly anti-Calles. He promoted new CROM secessions. He gathered in Communists and at the same time bureaucrats, symbolized by Aaron Saenz. And by skilful promotion of the Sonora Yaqui campaign and the Jalisco religious campaign he prepared the military scene for any eventuality. But Obregon is dead and no essential unity exists between railway workers, peasants, bureaucrats, and army generals. They had been Obregonistas not by conviction but by force of circumstances. Similarly the CROM had been an enemy of Obregon not by conviction but by force of circumstances.

There remains an unhappy division between the peasants and the industrial city proletariat. Mexican cities, with the growth of the large-scale, raw-product industries, are modernizing themselves at phenomenal speed; wage scales since the revolution have quadrupled; but the rural areas lag behind. Despite land distribution, temporarily because of land distribution, the peasant sinks rather than rises in the national social scale. He has gained the right to freedom from feudal chains but this freedom is also a freedom to starve or drift to the city.

So in Mexico the natural schism is emphasized. The peasant leaders are out for the blood of their imperialistic city comrades, participating in the march of modernization at the expense of the peasants, and they are out for the blood of their parasitical leaders. But the result is at present the weakening of both movements. The present agrarian leaders, lacking Obregon's personal support, are lost; they have no standing with Calles. Manrique is close to being an enemy. Thus they destroy Morones but for the moment they gain no political advantage with the peasants they lead, whose power was artificially expanded by Obregon's support. To destroy Morones they have joined hands with those who wish the destruction of the whole labor movement. Tomorrow the peasants will pay the price. So both the labor movement and the peasant movement face a period of disorganization. Were new elections to be called the outcome at this moment would be civil war. So Calles remains—Calles and a disciplined army. Only he can pull the ship from the reefs, but, once off the reefs, where will it sail?

Alvaro Obregon

By ERNEST GRUENING

WHEN I first came to Mexico early in 1923 I wrote to President Obregon for an appointment. But before a reply had reached me I was invited to the last of the posadas, festivals of the Hispanic Christmas-tide, and at a ball, attended chiefly by Mexican officialdom, I met the President. Although he did not dance, it was well known that he enjoyed these functions, and every senora and senorita highly esteemed the privilege of taking Don Alvaro's left arm and listening to the flow of humor, anecdote, and wisdom drawn from experience for which he was justly renowned throughout Mexico. The President invited me to dine at Chapultepec two nights later, and as his English was slight and my Spanish still embryonic, Roberto Pesqueira, fellow-Sonoran, and one of the outstanding younger revolutionists, interpreted. Later I came to know the President well.

Now General Obregon has been assassinated, and it is my desire to give, in this brief compass allotted, my impression of him both as man and as public figure. It is not easy in the immediacy of his tragic end to write with the dispassionateness that history requires, and to dissociate the profound and favorable impressions wrought by repeated personal contacts from the multiplicity of acts which are the sum of Obregon's public service.

For the strength and charm of Obregon's personality had a bearing on his preeminence. They go far to explain not merely the extraordinary rise of the obscure ranchero—for many in Mexico have risen meteorically—but his continued ascendancy and supreme popularity for over a decade. So I will confess that he captivated me from the start, and that my feeling that he possessed many elements of greatness grew with each contact. First I was carried away by his gorgeous sense of humor. Most public men lack it; the abler ones are really serious nearly all the time, and the lesser ones are apt to compensate for their inadequacies by a striving for chronic earnestness. I remember that the first time I traveled on his private train and asked him facetiously where the bandits were that I had expected to find in the country, he replied with a solemnity which only his eyes betrayed: "You see, when I left the country and came into the city, the bandits all came in with me. Confidentially, I have some of them in my Cabinet now."

Next, there was his broad humanitarianism, the universality of his outlook, which would seem predicated on much travel or wide reading, neither of which had been Obregon's—although he had supplemented his own experience by not a little book-learning. At our second meeting he told me that Mexico was about to decline to attend the Fifth Pan-American Congress in Santiago, Chile, and in a few sentences exposed an entire philosophy of international relationship. Said he:

President Harding has not recognized the Mexican government. It is to be recognized for a consideration—that of agreeing in advance to a certain course of conduct. This we cannot and shall not do. It is inconsistent with the dignity and rights of a sovereign people, however much they may need and desire recognition. It would never be asked of a nation of equal strength. The Pan-American congresses are held under the auspices of the Pan-American Union, which has its seat in Washington, and is organized under the patronage of the American State Department. The delegates are diplomatic representatives of Latin-American countries to the United States. But as we have not been recognized, we have no ambassador to the United States. We should consider it highly improper to accept the invitation to attend, which permits us to overlook this fact and name another representative. Only a Pan-American Union based on absolute equality of nations regardless of size or power can adequately serve to bring the nations into a truer and closer friendship. At present it is a relationship dominated by one nation, which fact is in itself the negation of all the objectives claimed for Pan-Americanism.

But he made it plain that he was not, like so many of his countrymen, afflicted with "gringophobia." In his own mind the distinction between the American people and those who occasionally misrepresent them in Washington—or in Mexico City—was unmistakable. I recall the particular pleasure with which he stressed the opening, two years before, of the University of Mexico Summer School, designed especially for American students of Spanish.

Finally my appreciation of Obregon's personality was strengthened by the conviction that he was without pose, a characteristic—shared, incidentally, by Calles—which I consider rare in Mexico's public men, judged from the many I have met. But, turning aside from his admitted charm, what has been Obregon's contribution to the Mexico which is still reforming in the crucible of revolution?

That contribution will, I think, be increasingly valued as the years go on. Judged over the extremely long period of fifteen years in which Obregon was a power, his humanitarianism was conspicuous. One must measure his acts by Mexican standards and against the background of turmoil and bloodshed, and without losing sight of the pernicious forces at all times ready to plunge the country into chaos. In a country steeped in the tradition that only a ruthless tyrant can maintain himself, Obregon was anything but sanguinary. He repeatedly offered amnesty to his opponents in the field. Indeed the narrowest escapes of his public career—as in the De la Huerta rebellion—were due to the fact that he did not deal drastically and summarily enough with scoundrels and traitors.

Under Obregon the Mexican press was free, as it had been only for brief periods under Juarez and Madero. It is one of Obregon's imperishable monuments that even when the De la Huerta rebellion broke out and his government was in the most imminent peril, Obregon waved aside a perturbed and solemn delegation from the capital's press seeking instructions with: "Write whatever your conscience dictates." And there was no cryptic significance in those words. The newspapers repaid this rare generosity by remaining malevolently neutral (benevolent toward the rebellion) and only subsequently, when Calles, most regrettably in my opinion, departed from this fine example of press freedom, did the newspapers begin retrospectively to appreciate Obregon's attitude.

Obregon's career was cut short in the fulness of its potentialities; he can be judged only on what he did. This was to bring a very large measure of peace out a desperate chaos; to give the long-deferred and urgently needed revolutionary reforms in land, labor, and in cultural self-expression their first opportunity to materialize. Above all he launched the Mexican educational renaissance.

Obregon's mistakes were largely political. He often allowed personal friendship to dictate the use of his influence in state elections. He allowed the army a very free rein to pursue the iniquitous pillage which has characterized Mexican militarism since the birth of the Mexican nation. But even so he did not satisfy the uniformed looters, as the De la Huerta uprising revealed. "Effective suffrage and no reelection"—the first and outstanding revolutionary premise made little progress under Obregon.

For Mexico his death at this moment is an irreparable tragedy. Calles fortunately remains. But the burden of leading the Mexican nation out of bondage is too heavy for any one man. In a very definite way Calles and Obregon were complementary to each other. Calles in his four years showed far more material achievement than did Obregon. The Calles regime was the surgical, the operative period of Mexican reconstruction. Obregon's second term would have proved, much as his first term had been, the post-operative, the curative, the healing period. Both periods were and are essential if Mexico is to recover from the multiplicity and complexity of her social and political diseases.

Plays in Central Europe

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Paris, July 3

THOSE Americans who still dream of Vienna as the last refuge of the "Continental spirit" and who hope to find an asylum there when the last Frenchman has been lost among the crowd of Middle Western tourists swarming upon the Boulevard des Italiens, will be pained to learn that this year Vienna herself celebrated Mother's Day and that the co-citizens of Anatol have just passed successfully through a National Cheese Week.

They may, however, rest assured that, such signs notwithstanding, the wave of Americanization which has swept over Germany has not yet engulfed her sister republic and that the culture of Vienna was not essentially changed (however much it may have been enfeebled) by the war. Berlin recovered by transforming itself; Vienna seems to have preferred to remain what she was even if to do so means to sink into relative desuetude. The atmosphere is still, as always, more that of a formal garden than of a metropolis; the people still prefer light music to industry; and they still stroll (instead of rush) through the parks, which are still lined with orderly row upon row of flowering horse chestnuts. Moscow is less than forty-eight hours away, but I am as sure that Vienna cannot imagine the existence of a city so frowzily energetic, any more than Moscow can imagine the existence of one where life is so indolently agreeable.

Mr. Sil-Vara, one of whose plays is to be produced in New York next season by the Theater Guild, assures me that though plays are still occasionally written here there is nothing in the country which even the most determined optimism could call a dramatic movement. Indeed it looks as though Vienna, which has already, of course, ceased to be a world capital, would cease to be a theatrical capital as well. The Burg Theater still offers a standard repertory, the Raimond Theater still gives good solid plays for a more popular audience, and Jeritza still sings at the opera during such time as she can spare from more profitable engagements at the Metropolitan; but Reinhardt dominates the scene and Reinhardt—the establishment at Salzburg notwithstanding—now belongs essentially to Berlin, whose taste he follows in the Berlin productions which are later brought on to Vienna.

And if Vienna can no longer be classed among the great theatrical capitals, which are now New York, London, Moscow, and Paris, the same is still more conspicuously true of Budapest, where no one seems to be hopeful or happy except the chauvinist, who is able to exist upon the nourishment contained in two empty words, "Magyar Independence," and where Molnar is said recently to have refused the offer of the State Theater to put on one of his plays with the remark: "If I want fame I can get it in Berlin; if I want money I can get it in New York." As for Prague, I could discover not a single play by a native author. The last effort of the redoubtable brothers Capek (a failure called "Adam the Creator") had closed before I arrived, and when the director of one of the leading theaters told me, after long thought, that I could not do better there than to see a production of Wilde's "An Ideal Husband" I beat a hasty retreat. It is true that he assured me that the present had been an unusually disappointing season in Prague, but as this remark was the last I had heard before leaving New York and as it had been repeated to me in every city I had visited (except Moscow), I did not attach too much importance to it.

At the present moment, then, Central Europe does not seem to have any distinct theatrical character of its own; the best the visitor can hope for is to find a rare native play possessing some interest or to catch a French or other piece on tour. At the Raimond Theater in Vienna I saw a production of the somber folk-tragedy "Der Judas von Tirol," written many years ago by the locally famous Karl Schönherr, and I heard a new operetta by Lehar (of "The Merry Widow" fame) which has some very pleasant music strictly in the old Viennese tradition; but the two pieces most likely to reach America are "Hocus-Pocus" and the new Molnar comedy, "Olympia."

Though I happened to see "Hocus-Pocus" in Vienna, the play was written by a young German of no great literary pretensions named Kurt Goetz, and in spite of the fact that it is tenuous to the last possible degree it has by now been played with success over a considerable part of Europe. It begins with a prologue in the course of which a theatrical director, driven to desperation by the lack of promising plays, begins to read a manuscript to his company; and the play consists of a presentation of this manuscript which occurs, I presume, in the minds of his hearers. The chief scene takes place in the courtroom, where a beautiful murderess is on trial for her life, and the chief interest, at least from my point of view, lies in the fact that the play is essentially an attempt to imitate those American crime and mystery plays which have been so successful in Europe. The first act is full of the mysterious warnings and unexpected apparitions belonging to the genre; in the second the beautiful murderess flirts decorously with the whole courtroom while the most damning possible evidence is piled mountain-high against her; and in the third she (having been, of course, acquitted) gives a little dinner party, where the judge, the prosecuting attorney, and her own lawyer foregather to do homage to her charm.

The author has endeavored to combine melodrama and satirical extravaganza in a fashion very much like that in which the author of the typical American mystery play combines melodrama and farce, but though his play does succeed in being mildly entertaining I must confess my frank opinion that in general the European attempts to imitate these American plays which they regard with mingled wonder and contempt are not especially successful. They are far too self-conscious and far too lacking in the vulgar force which gives the American prototype such power as they have. Compared, for example, with "The Trial of Mary Dugan," "Hocus-Pocus" is essentially feeble in spite of its efforts to be satirical. Its author may very well be wittier, more sophisticated, and, in a word, more "civilized" than the authors of most American crime plays, but these are not the qualities necessary for this particular kind of writing and are, indeed, perhaps the very things which make it impossible for him to achieve the wholehearted, thoroughgoing absurdity which makes "Mary Dugan" effective.

Molnar's "Olympia" (not yet performed anywhere outside of Budapest) is, it goes without saying, at least thoroughly European. A minor German princess snubs the serious proposal of a humble young army officer with whom she has been flirting. Seeking revenge, he inspires a report that he is in reality an international swindler and when the frightened Princess Olympia and her still more frightened mother ask him how much he demands as the price of a disappearance, he replies that he desires only one thing—to pass the night with Olympia. Next morning—this price having been meanwhile and perhaps not too reluctantly paid—the legend of his criminal reputation is exploded and the Princess intimates that she no longer considers the difference in rank between them an unsurmountable barrier. But the officer, still smarting from the original snub, finds revenge sweeter than love. He assures her that he would not dream of asking such a sacrifice and he disappears.

The combined malice and suavity of the play serve to remind one that Molnar has at least a style, that his rather brutal wit is all of one piece, and that he is sometimes capable, as here, of following out the logic of that wit to its ultimate unromantic conclusion. "Olympia" is contemptuously "theatrical" and completely "unreal," but its expertness demands a certain respect, and one cannot but feel that its author at least knows what he wants to do and does it with complete success. Doubtless the piece will be given in America and doubtless it will have a considerable vogue.

In Budapest I saw also a reigning success called "The Chalk Circle," written by a young German who goes by the pseudonym Klabund, but the play is constructed around a Chinese theme, a bit of artificial naivete not unlike our own once-famous "Yellow Jacket" and hardly likely to reach New York. That is about all that, for the moment, Budapest has to offer except the Hungarian premiere of "Abris Rozsaja," which I considered it my patriotic duty to attend.

Miss Nichols's masterpiece has undergone certain necessary transformations. Since the Irish are as unknown in Hungary as Fiji Islanders they had to disappear and be replaced by ordinary Catholics. Though this would seem to deprive the play of whatever point it might be said to have it shows, nevertheless, every sign of becoming a success and as I watched the familiar action unroll amid shouts of alien laughter I felt constrained to give Miss Nichols her due. "Abie's Irish Rose" must deserve its success. There is a power in it greater than art and greater than that nature which was so rashly said to make all the world kin—the power, of course, of the commonplace.

Many quite ordinary people can achieve a banality sufficient to unite all America or all Germany or all England, but the banality of "Abie" is not merely national. Its author has discovered the lowest common denominator not only of one country but of all countries; she has unearthed jokes so old that they are as pleasantly familiar on the banks of the Danube as on the banks of the Rhine or the Hudson, and she has achieved a general insipidity so perfectly characterless that it makes all people one. Nothing less than genius could accomplish that.

[Mr. Krutch will follow this letter with two more—one on the Paris and one on the London theaters.]

In the Driftway

QUALIFICATIONS for public office have always puzzled the Drifter. What are they? He does his duty by the daily newspaper and the radio, he listens to what various candidates put forward as reasons why he should vote for them, but he remains puzzled and unconvinced. Why do these aspirants for office make themselves appear so dull and uninspired? As dog-days approach and our various Presidential candidates prepare to present their ideas, principles, and personal charms, if any, to a perspiring public, the Drifter turns with relief to the records of a long-gone campaign in another country.

* * * * *

IN France in 1848 most of the leading novelists—Victor Hugo, Dumas, Eugene Sue, Alphonse Karr, and Paul de Kock—presented themselves as parliamentary candidates. Dumas was practical and specific in setting forth his particular qualifications—for which the Drifter is indebted to a correspondent. Said Dumas:

Without counting six years of education, four years as a lawyer, seven years of office work, I have worked twenty years for ten hours a day. During these twenty years I have composed 400 books and thirty-five dramas.

The novelist calculated the total income which these volumes had brought to compositors, paper-makers, pamphleteers, literary societies, libraries, commission agents, etc., and the dramas to managers, actors, costumers, supernumeraries, firemen, timber merchants, oil merchants, billstickers, charwomen, agents, mechanics, hair-dressers, etc., and he concluded:

Counting in the year 300 working days, my books have kept 690 people in constant employment, and my dramas have given employment to 347 persons for the past ten years. Multiplying this figure by three for the whole province, there are 1,041 people who have been kept in constant employment. Add the work-women, leaders of the claue, and the cabmen: total 1,485 people. My dramas and books have therefore found work for 2,150 people.

It was a magnificent claim; but his rival put in a greater one. It was known to all France, said Paul de Kock, that he sat at his window on the Boulevard Saint Michel every afternoon. Every visitor to Paris wanted to have a look at him. They all went to the boulevard and returned from it by omnibus. This had been going on for twenty years and had put enormous sums into the pocket of the omnibus company. He continued:

A crowd of women whose names I do not wish to disclose, but whose addresses I will willingly give to anyone who wishes, have asked me for my portrait. I have had about 3,000 photographs taken. Other women, still more in love with my works, have begged for my autograph or a lock of my hair.

* * * * *

THE Drifter maintains that these are excellent examples of the politician's art. The only fly in the ointment is the fact that both candidates were rejected in favor of more prosaic and conventional nominees. Perhaps the tactics of Herbert Hoover and Al Smith are the ones that win, after all—in spite of

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Daughter Is a Daughter

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Great-Aunt Rachel Wilson was a woman of great stability, a daughter of a soldier of the Revolutionary War, who lived for many years in the small village of Quiet Dell. The very active chapter in a near-by town appointed a committee to wait upon her with a view to making her a charter member since she was an "original daughter." "Join?", she exclaimed. "Join? Why should I join? I am one."

Clarksburg, West Virginia, June 25

MARY OGDEN

Curtis's Indian Blood

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The nomination of Senator Curtis for Vice-President is a striking illustration of the state of racial discrimination in the United States today. In the campaign biography it is frankly told that the Senator is a descendant of a chieftain of a Middle Western tribe of Indians and that during his boyhood he lived for a period in the tribal manner. If anyone is inclined to interpret the acceptance of a candidate with such a background as evidence of racial tolerance, let him reflect upon the chances of being named to a similar post which a man of Negro blood would have. One needs only to recall that during the campaign of the late President Harding the whispers that he had "colored" blood in his veins grew to such a damaging extent that it was finally thought necessary to make a public denial.

Even as a member of the so-called Anglo-Saxon race, it seems to me that the Negroes have cause for much bitterness when they contemplate this situation. For both of these primitive races, the red and the black, contact with the white man has been disastrous. The Indian has been betrayed, conquered, pauperized, and is now facing extinction. Out of the wreck of his old culture but one thing has been saved; there is no social stigma on his race, a fact for which the romantic episode of Pocahontas and Captain John Smith may have more than a little to do. The star of the red man seems to have almost touched its azimuth. The black man, on the other hand, began life on this continent as a slave. A war and an awakening public consciousness gave him his freedom. In the South he still has very doubtful legal rights (witness the latest lynching at Houston, Texas) although in the North he may soon have a member of his race serving as his Representative in the august House of Representatives. Economically, socially, and artistically, his star is proceeding steadily toward its zenith. How galling, then, must be that Anglo-Saxon conceit that a white man's blood is enriched by the addition of one primitive strain (red) but that it is forever polluted by another primitive strain (black).

In the spirit of fairness, may the time be not far distant when the man whose ancestors may have lived in a village of Africa will be eligible to the same political posts as the one whose forebears lived in a teepee.

New York, June 21

ERIC KIEL

The Candy White List

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On page 657 of the June 13 issue of The Nation is an editorial about the "White List" being promulgated by the Consumers' League of New York, on which appear the names of fifty-seven candy manufacturers.

The editorial starts out by assuming that it would be a good thing to reduce the amount of candy eaten in the country. In its body it states that the Consumers' League, after making an investigation of factories in New York, did not seek a remedy for conditions "through impossible or probably futile legislation." It also reports the minimum wage of $14 required by the league with apparent favor, and yet refers to a wage of $13.75 as woefully low.

It might interest The Nation to know that the investigation referred to was started and carried through for exactly the purpose you have said was not intended—that is, to encourage the passage of a definite piece of legislation in New York State, i.e., the Brereton amendment to the Labor law.

Aside from the wage question (intended to be reached through the Brereton amendment, and which is not confined to the candy industry) the so-called standards of the league are neither more nor less than those specified in the laws and regulations of the city and State of New York. If the State did not succeed in enforcing them, how can it be supposed that the league, with a less numerous force of inspectors than the State, can succeed in doing so?

Philadelphia, June 15

EUGENE PHARO,
Editor, Confectioners Journal

The Carib Syndicate

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In my article in your issue of July 11 describing efforts of the Anglo-Persian, a British government company, to obtain through the so-called Yates Concession in Colombia a large tract of land in the neighborhood of the Panama Canal, I mentioned an alleged connection between the British Dutch-Shell oil interests and the (American) Carib Syndicate in the Barco Concession in another part of Colombia. My information was from official sources. I am now informed, however, by a representative of the Carib Syndicate that his organization operates a Venezuelan property jointly with Dutch-Shell but that there is no British interest either in Carib Syndicate or in the Barco Concession of Colombia.

Washington, D. C., July 11

LUDWELL DENNY

More Pay for Jurors

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to suggest that you start a movement to bring about an increase in the pay of federal jurors, which is now miserably low, only $3 per day.

When this rate was established $3 represented the wage of the average skilled union mechanic, but, as you know, this is now about $8 per day and a juror should not be paid less. No doubt such an increase would not appeal to big-business men, but there are many hundreds of thousands of bright, intelligent, small business men whose income averages more than $8 per day who would be willing to give up some time to jury service if paid this rate, but to whom it would be a hardship to serve for $3 per day.

Oak Park, Illinois, June 18

GEORGE SELENINE

How to Hold Outdoor Meetings

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of July 18 you compare the treatment accorded to the representatives of the All-America Anti-Imperialism League with that accorded to a fundamentalist preacher, to the discredit of the police.

Representatives of the Women's Peace Society have held meetings, not only in Wall Street, week after week, but in other parts of the city, and have denounced the Coolidge war in Nicaragua, the sending of battleships to China, and the unsavory part played by Wall Street in the raping of Haiti in no uncertain terms.

It is my custom to notify the Commissioner of Police each spring that the Women's Peace Society plans to resume its outdoor work, thank them for past cooperation, and express confidence in their willingness to cooperate in future. We do not ask for a permit, because "permits" or licenses are granted only to religious organizations.

As loyal coworkers of our late beloved founder and chairman, Fanny Garrison Villard, we practice, to the best of our ability, the non-resistant, uncompromising pacifism of William Lloyd Garrison. And it works. The police are most courteous and helpful. Any act to the contrary needs only to be reported to the commissioner to receive the amende honorable. I regret conflicts between radical groups and the police. They could be avoided. It is all a matter of tactics.

I have held suffrage meetings and Irish republican meetings at Columbus Circle against the protests of Englishmen and of the 104th Regiment recruiting corps, with the precinct captain on my side (he umpired the decision as to priority right to the corner), and the pacifist meetings as well, all of the most amiable description.

A knowledge of one's rights, friendly insistence that they be respected by audience and police alike, and a sense of humor are the only equipment needed to conduct outdoor demonstrations successfully.

New York, July 16

ANNIE E. GRAY,
Executive Secretary, W. P. S.

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

"PORGY" || REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

|| JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 5:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

|| GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

THE ACTOR MANAGERS present

GRAND STREET FOLLIES
OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Tues. (Pop.) & Thurs.

ST. GEORGE
Playhouse
CLARK ST. STATION, L. R. T.
COURT ST. STATION, B. M. T.
BROOKLYN
MAIN 1726

"BERLIN"
BROOKLYN'S PREMIERE SHOWING
The Symphony of a
Big City
SUNDAY—MONDAY
July 29-30

Books

For a Few Hours

By MARIE LUHRS

Swinging our hard chains of living we met—
Burdened like oxen with care;
We watched the suns of the days rise and set
Through drooping, sorrowful hair.

Through drooping hair our eyes kindled together—
That we might endure pain
And all the beatings of the changeful weather
And the solemn swinging chain,

We were given each other. Eyes and eyes
Fused in flame for a few hours.
Now weighted and wingless and bowed we rise
Trailing our loops of light flowers.

To a Friend

By BABETTE DEUTSCH

This is not love that in your absence finds
The world so rich in sun, flowers so cool
And perfect in their pattern, the several kinds
Of music means to put my heart to school.
If you could move me, nothing else but you
Could move me, yet each hour observes me touched
By an odor or a color or a clue
To wisdom that is only in torment clutched.
And there are those whom my obedient veins Confess their master—you have not shouldered those
From my thought's terraces to the blind lanes
Whose shrunken haws commemorate the rose.
This is not love that is so empty of need,
So pulseless, acquiescent, without pain,
And yet the weather of your mind will feed
My spirit's root when we can meet again.

Schoolroom Chaos

The Diary of a Communist Schoolboy. By N. Ogynov. Payson and Clarke. $2.50.

THESE is an old Russian saying which, roughly translated, runs: "Our cottages stand far apart, and I don't know what you are talking about." The educational cottages of Soviet Russia stand very far apart from those of the rest of the world, and to a majority outside its borders the authorized publication of this book must be an enigma. For "The Diary of a Communist Schoolboy" is frankly a picture of schoolroom chaos.

Kostya Riabtsov, aged sixteen, the nominal keeper of the "Diary," reports on September 15 that no one knows when school is to start. "Sechas," he was probably told when he asked—"Within the hour." On September 20 it does start and is "fearfully noisy and rowdy." On September 27 he learns that the Dalton plan has been introduced, "a system under which the skworkers (school-teachers) do nothing and the pupils have to find everything out for themselves." On November 28, in the school paper, Red Scholar, he writes: "Once a month tasks are given out on each subject, and we have to work independently.

The teacher only tells you what books to consult, but you can't get the books anywhere, and to buy them is, of course, out of the question. . . . There is no way of working in the labs. because of the noise. . . . Damn, damn, damn Dalton!"

The direct management of the school is divided between a pupils' council and a teachers' council, the former persistently vociferous on the subject of its rights. Should they be seriously violated, the bell is rung to summon a general meeting, with results as follows: "Everybody dropped his books there and then; those answering questions in the labs. dashed off in the middle of a sentence. The skworkers were flabbergasted."

This is all perfectly intelligible to the occupant of a non-Communist cottage, granted one theory—namely, that the Soviet in mood of commendable, if incomprehensible, frankness has at last decided to confess its own inefficiency. The present writer, however, can prove such a theory to be untenable. In 1923, the year this "Diary" begins, on a second visit to School No. 58, Moscow, she found the headmistress almost in tears. The inspector of the Sokolnichy District, in a report published in the Moscow Pravda, had said nasty things about her conduct. Her discipline, he complained, was too good! The present writer, who had been saved by a strong-armed janitor from a mob of youngsters interested among other things in her clothes, had got the impression that it was pretty rotten. So far apart were the cottages in which the inspector and herself had been reared!

The explanation of this officially approved "Diary," then, must be sought elsewhere. The truth, however distasteful, is that the Soviets are still unashamed. In fact, as a god with ideas of his own about shaping a world might welcome an inchoate mass of whirling matter, so do the Soviets welcome the chaos which permits them to shape the youth of Russia to their own ends. Opinions may differ about the desirability of those ends, but no unprejudiced reader can deny the value, the interest, even the tangible achievement of the Soviet educational experiment as shown by this "Diary." Apart from the failure to provide books, an economic matter still possibly beyond Soviet control, the rulers of Russia are doing what they set out to do and what many orthodox teachers claim they do. They are educing to the best of their ability the native capacities of each girl and boy.

It seems trite to say that Kostya Riabtsov and his companions are learning how rationally to face life and its complex personal and social problems, but it is none the less definitely true. Take the question of sex, the parents' supposed nightmare in this post-war world. The pupils themselves here propound the question. "Can boys and girls in our schools be friends?" asks the Reel, a wall-sheet published by the United Collectivity of Junior Groups. Answers are invited. Here is one: "I understand friendship in two ways. First, there must be a collective friendship between boys and girls which, I think, is possible. But there is also another kind of friendship—that between individuals. Such friendship can exist between a special boy and girl but not between any boy and girl." Educated in a non-Communist cottage, that pupil would undoubtedly have written an essay on Platonic Friendship. As it was, he simply worked out the idea from his own experience, and stated his conclusions baldly.

Russia, too, has its petting and hooch parties, "cabbage nights" as they are called, and Kostya Riabtsov, uninstructed in conventional morality, nevertheless feels uneasy about these affairs. He asks himself: "Are they worthy of a young Communist, one marching in the vanguard of a rising generation?" He decides they are not.

He is no better instructed on religion than on morality, and is in fact a worker, a volunteer, on behalf of the Soviet anti-religious propaganda. But not even the revered Soviet, it seems, can teach him always to be rational. Enthusiasm must have its place. He finds it in the "revolutionary passion" without which life, he declares, would be impossible. Naturally, being sixteen, he finds relief, too, in schoolboy humor, football, and other games.

The temptation to quote at length from this book is strong, so arresting is its attitude toward life and so extraordinary the life it shows. It reveals more than the Soviet experiments in education, for there are also quick flashes vivifying the everyday tests to which pet Soviet theories are being subjected. We see the attempt to forge the smeetchki (the word echoes in your sleep in Russia), the link so ardently desired between peasant and industrial worker. It makes amusing reading—for the Soviet's critics.

Of course the author of this book says his age is thirty-six and his real name Mikhail Grigoryevich Rozanov. He may by using his imagination and experience as a teacher have invented the whole "Diary." Or he may through good luck or a gift have acquired it. It has been described as a Soviet joke on the outside world. My personal opinion is that it is pure fact, and I base that on an experience of schools and school-children in Moscow, Samara, Kazan, and Leningrad. I could not talk to them in their language, but I could see their work, hear their voices, and feel their hands. They were only emerging then from the shadow of the famine and living often on less than an "eighth of bread." Yet they left on me such an impression of strength, endurance, high spirits, and searching intelligence as confirmed me for life in my preconceived optimism about their country. I have heard a couple of them "sass" a relief-worker even while they were eating a gift of food, explaining that the gift would not have been necessary if the outside world only treated Russia fairly. To the honor of the worker and his friends, I would like to add that his come-back was a valuable concession for the shaving of certain American chins and the shining of certain American shoes. Wherefore his flower vases were filled with lilacs and lily-of-the-valley, probably pinched from somebody's garden.

NORAH MEADE

Houdini

Houdini: His Life-Story from the Recollections and Documents of Beatrice Houdini. By Harold Kellock. Illustrated. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

TRUTH is stranger than fiction; at any rate, the fiction of Horatio Alger. For in the life of Harry Houdini the quintessence of all the lives of Alger's heroes was refined and distilled—the obscure origin of little Ehrich Weiss, the poverty-stricken, hard-laboring youth, the innumerable struggles against adversity followed by the sudden leap of Houdini the Magnificent into enduring wealth and fame—save that he had one trait which no Algerian hero even remotely possessed: a genius as incredible as it was inexplicable. In his own peculiar way Houdini was as much of a character, an "original," as was Barnum, John L. Sullivan, Jesse James, Abraham Lincoln, the Black Douglas, Richard the Lion-Hearted, or Saint Francis of Assisi. Indeed, in one important respect Houdini stands above all these rivals. Folk-lore made them largely what they are; but Houdini was, and is, his own folk-lore. He can be explained only in terms of himself—in other words, he cannot be explained. He "just grewed" and that is all.

And yet not quite all. Three fairly distinct elements helped make him the supreme, the incomparable artist that he was. He trained himself to be absolutely fearless; for had fear ever gripped him when he was locked in a three-by-three safe fitted with a combination lock whose numbers stretched to infinity, or when he was placed head downward in a can full of water which in turn was incased in an iron-bound chest whose lid was spiked down and fastened all around with padlocks, his end would have been very speedy. Furthermore, he was probably the most perfect physical specimen of his day; he was 160 pounds of solid, steely muscle capped by an abnormally quick and fertile brain. And finally, he worked prodigiously. For months at a stretch, several times a day, he inured himself to stay under water in his own bathtub until he was able to live without fresh air for four minutes and sixteen seconds; he also constantly practiced slow-breathing exercises so that he might last within the cramped confines of a safe or an under-water box long enough to free himself; he apprenticed himself to a locksmith, scoured the earth for new handcuffs and all manner of nasty contraptions, and ransacked libraries on the subject until there was no variety of lock with whose intricacies he was not familiar. If, as the saying goes, nature did much for him, he probably did even more for himself.

No prison ever made, and no device conceived by the cleverest of locksmiths or carpenters, ever held him long. After he had succeeded in escaping from almost all the notorious jails of Europe, Scotland Yard foolishly tried its hand on the modern Old Man of the Sea. The superintendent, highly amused at the idea that anyone should attempt to escape from the Yard's manacles, encircled Houdini's arms about a pillar, snapped a pair of handcuffs around his wrists, and, with the laughing remark, "I'm going to leave you here and come back for you in a couple of hours," started toward the exit. "Wait!" Houdini called. "I'll go with you," and he tossed the gyves on the floor and walked away from the pillar. The aghast superintendent extended his hand and paid the highest compliment of which British aplomb was capable. "Scotland Yard won't forget you, young man," he reverently observed. On another occasion a heavy chain was put around Houdini's neck and crossed over his breast, each end was fastened to an arm above the elbow, his hands were handcuffed behind him, and he was tossed overboard from a tug in Aberdeen harbor. A howling gale was blowing, and indeed one man had already been washed overboard and drowned that morning; the men on the tug therefore tried to persuade Houdini to desist, but he refused to listen. In precisely eighteen seconds, after he had been dumped into the raging surf he reappeared with his hands free. Once he was manacled in the triple-safe cell that had formerly held Charles Guiteau. In two minutes he had escaped, and then, seized with a grimly humorous idea, he quickly unlocked the doors of the cell in the corridor and transferred all the dangerous criminals to other cells. On reading of Houdini's various exploits, in fact, one can only repeat the profound ejaculation of an amazed Chinese magician who was watching the greatest of magicians at his work. "That's not a trick, gentlemen," he said in a preternaturally solemn tone. "That's a gift."

Perhaps some idea of Houdini's astounding agility and resourcefulness may be best conveyed by giving his schedule for one week in Boston during February, 1907. On Monday he escaped from an iron boiler that had been bolted and riveted by employees of the Riverside Boiler Works—escaped without leaving any discoverable egress in the boiler. At the Tuesday matinee he was laced inside a giant football and emerged in a brief space of time—the football, seemingly at least, was intact. In the evening he quickly got out of a hamper made of hoop-iron fastened together with padlocks. On Thursday he freed himself from a bed made to hold insane patients, and also popped out of a locked roll-top desk without disturbing the lock or the desk. Next day he was incased in a 24 x 30 x 36 box made of three-eighths-inch glass which was bolted together with strips of steel that in turn were padlocked—when he emerged the glass was unbroken. On Saturday he merely performed some tricks of magic and escaped from a straitjacket. His diary at the end of the week reads thus: "Had easy day, left on the midnight for New York."

His character was a curious compound of childlike oddities. A strenuous fighter against mediums and spiritualists, he yet vainly hoped that some means of communication with the dead might be discovered so that he might speak with his dead mother. After each visit to a new seance had ended in failure, he would visit his mother's grave, lie at full length upon it, and whisper: "Well, mamma, I have not heard." He always refused to undertake any hazardous stunt on Friday, but his assistants, knowing his weakness for dates, would often rearrange the calendar. Equally generous and stingy, he was always throwing out thousands of dollars to provide for the maintenance of the graves of some obscure magicians, prodigally buying expensive books and pictures, and fretting because he had to pay so much to get his pants pressed. In his personal habits he was as happy-go-lucky as a boy. He never changed his shirts or his socks until he was compelled to do so; at any time a tan sock might be seen adorning one of his ankles while a blue one blossomed on the other; and for thirty-three years Mrs. Houdini regularly scrubbed his ears.

Houdini's head was still buzzing with new schemes when an accidental blow caused the attack of acute appendicitis that killed him in his prime. He was planning to take courses in English to improve his rather too individual idiom; he was devising a trick in which, frozen inside a cake of artificial ice in full view of his audience, he was to escape, also in full view of the audience, leaving the ice intact; he was doing a world of good in exposing the trickery of mediums and the open-mouthed credulity of their followers. Had he lived a few years longer, perhaps he might even have disturbed the charming naivete of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle concerning dear little dancing fairies (animated rag-dolls), and ectoplasm (the lung tissue of animals)—Sir Arthur, whose own Sherlock Holmes Houdini had out-Sherlocked in so many ways. In any case his complete silence since his death, despite the many attempts made to communicate with him, furnishes perhaps the strongest argument against the spiritualists; for certainly if any ghost could escape from the confines of Elysium or Hades or Nirvana or Heaven and bob up somewhere on the earth, that ghost would be Harry Houdini.

R. F. DIBBLE

The Theory of Liberalism

The History of European Liberalism. By Guido de Ruggiero. Translated by R. G. Collingwood. Oxford University Press. $5.50.

THE democratic ferment inaugurated by the American and French revolutions ushered in a century of release. Indeed, once the ice was broken, there was no obvious conclusion. Thus by the end of the century we find the principles of the French Declaration of the Rights of Man of 1791 translated into the constitutional law of the states of Western Europe. We see the removal of racial and religious barriers from the enjoyment of the full panoply of citizenship. We note the universal recognition of national liberty as it was realized that self-government is incompatible with alien domination. It is true that for the vast masses this emancipation was largely illusory, for in the most significant aspect of their lives they were subject to an authority not answerable to them. Yet the extension of the franchise, the growth of trade unions and co-operative societies, and the emergence of socialist parties trained the masses for a greater penetration subsequently of the sources of power. Thus in significant spheres of human relationship the Liberal reverence for the dignity of personality found concrete expression.

Signor de Ruggiero's volume on "The History of European Liberalism" is hence in essence a history of the time-spirit of the last century. In a lengthy introduction the author presents a review of the political thought of the eighteenth century. It is strange, incidentally, that he does not make a single reference to Locke. During the nineteenth century the stream of Liberalism was divided into various national tributaries. Hence the author gives, in the first part of the book, separate sections to the development of Liberalism in England, France, Germany, and Italy respectively. He stresses frequently the different nature of English Liberalism, based on tradition, from that of French, derived from speculative doctrines. He surveys the thought of De Tocqueville, Mill, Green, Spencer, Mazzini, and a host of lesser prophets. Signor de Ruggiero is undoubtedly correct in saying that the mantle of Mill rests on Professor Hobhouse. However, his reference to Professor Hobhouse is based on "Liberalism" (1911); a later and more comprehensive statement by Professor Hobhouse may be found in his "Elements of Social Justice" (1921). The discussion of Italian Liberalism is highly informative, for it clearly demonstrates the frail structure of democracy there. As a historian of thought, the author shows wide knowledge and penetrating insight. His is a reflective mind of a high order.

More debatable is his exposition, in the second part of the book, of his own doctrine of Liberalism. To him, Liberalism is both an attitude and a method. Its underlying tenet is liberty, capacity for growth. It culminates in the Liberal state. The chief function of the Liberal state is to synthesize the varied elements in society. In its administration is widely decentralized, certain individual rights are withdrawn from state interference, and the legal responsibility of functionaries is enforced. To Signor de Ruggiero, Liberalism is not congenial to universal suffrage and to socialism, for democracy brings declining faith in individual spontaneity, while socialism has degraded the state into an arena of class selfishness. Liberalism, too, favors the separation of church and state. It encourages national freedom, but not imperialism. With the pulverization of the middle class, which was the mainstay of Liberalism, it now faces an attack both from capitalist imperialism and from proletarian socialism. Yet its spirit, the author concludes, is still vital, and it is now the special function of Liberals to suffuse the entire population with its lasting qualities.

The competence with which Signor de Ruggiero's view is presented does not conceal its inherent limitations. For, indeed, from Liberalism, as he expounds it, we may expect neither an intelligent dissection of the state and of property nor an attempt at solutions. His restatement emphatically reveals that the eclipse of the Liberal parties is inevitable. Indeed, he is still in the intellectual atmosphere of De Tocqueville and Green. He offers generally the attitude of such Liberal publicists and politicians as Nitti, Miliukov, Morley, Bryce, and Asquith, men whose political education was completed half a century ago. To Signor de Ruggiero, England between 1832 and 1867 or France under Louis-Philippe set the ideal. Liberalism, to him, has become a mystic symbol void of critical content. Whatever may be its past and its speculative background, his view is, in the ultimate, indistinguishable from avowedly conservative opinion. To be sure, critical political thought must regard the past of Liberalism not as an impassable limit but as a point for further advance. It must reinterpret the noble Liberal ideal of veneration for the personalities of ordinary men in the perspective of the issues of our day. For such an effort the path to be pursued is well indicated by Hobhouse, Laski, and the Webbs.

LEWIS ROCKOW

India: Beautiful and Terrifying

An Indian Journey. By Waldemar Bonsels. Albert and Charles Boni. $4.

TO Mr. Bonsels the way to understand India is not through study of her ancient monuments and literature, great and important as these are, nor by observation of her inhabitants in the most developed aspects of their modern culture. These studies come later; they are the finial on the spire. First one must learn to know India's soil and mountains and rivers, her animal life, and come to understand man there as set in his primitive environment. India is more than the human; and we cannot know the human part until we know the rest, from which it has sprung.

He penetrates for us the mystery of the Hindu's return to nature and the lonely places when he undertakes the religious quest—"let him wander alone" is the admonition of many an ancient text—for in undisturbed meditation in the silences of the jungle or in the cool shelter of the caves of Ellora with the spread of the plains before him he will reach the heart of the universe, comprehend the mystical, which "is not the dark or the obscure . . . not the fantastic portent of incomprehensible or mysterious processes. The mystical, in its profoundest sense, involves rather a certitude of eternal truths operating beyond our ken."

When I lived as a boy in India, played with animals or hunted them, walked through the fields and jungle, had much of my life with the peasants, I had a faint glimmer of the things Mr. Bonsels writes about here with so much power and beauty. Later studies slowly drew me, all unaware, away from this early feeling for India and the Indians as part of nature, turned my attention to human accomplishments, and brought me to look upon the country as one of great cities, splendid literature, brilliant art, noble religions, profound and difficult philosophy. Only the reading of folk-tales carried me back from time to time to the India of my boyhood. But now Mr. Bonsels's description of his wanderings, his philosophizing and prose poetry have recaptured for me these early scarce-realized impressions, brought them to life again, given them a sudden growth, and filled them with meaning.

No such book has ever before been written about India. It is not a travel book, because the journey is of importance only as it inspires thought. Nor is it an exposition of anything. It is the record of impressions made upon a mind of extreme sensitiveness to beauty and to life, of one who is a philosopher, yet not an academician, and a poet who continually passes from sensuousness to pure thought. His India is a land of beautiful and terrifying nature, where life and death easily flow into each other, inhabited by an unlimited and fearful animal kingdom, yet one strangely sympathetic to man. In this environment the Hindu grew up as inevitably as did the palm.

W. NORMAN BROWN

Books in Brief

Sex and Repression in Savage Society. By Bronislaw Malinowski. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

Dr. Malinowski has approached this problem with exceeding breadth of perspective and refreshing clarity. The work will no doubt be welcomed as a unique addition to the science of empirical culture. Sex repression in general, the author holds, is determined very largely by social and cultural factors which center around the family unit as a nucleus. He discovers an interesting difference between the types of repression in two culturally antithetical societies, namely the European and the Melanesian. The former adheres to a patrilineal descendency and the latter to a matrilineal one. Hence in the place of the Oedipus complex, which he grants is prevalent in the European civilization, the author finds a matriarchal family complex among the Melanesians. The latter complex is characterized by unconscious hate fantasies directed toward the eldest maternal uncle, who is invested with the authority to enforce the taboos, and by autistic expressions of brother-sister incest cravings. Every intelligent reader will find many new and stimulating ideas in this book.

The Capture of Old Vincennes. The Original Narrative of George Rogers Clark and of His Opponent, Governor Henry Hamilton. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Milo M. Quaife. The Bobbs-Merrill Company.

Opinions have differed as to how much credit is really due to the military genius of Clark, though in the reviewer's opinion the tendency has been rather to overrate than to underestimate the part he played in the conquest of the Northwest. It is always interesting to have the personal narrative of the participant in any enterprise, though there is too often a tendency for the hero in the drama to enhance his talents. In the present instance we have the narrative of Clark as written more than a decade after the occurrence of the events recorded, and it is a question how far such a record can be trusted. That this record has value there can be no doubt, but it would be interesting to compare it with the one Clark is said to have written to his friend George Mason in 1779, and which appears to have been lost. There is no question that Clark had military genius and that he possessed also daring. There is, however, very little to indicate that the actual retaking of the fort at Vincennes was difficult after he arrived there. Mr. Quaife has included in the volume the narrative of Governor Hamilton, written nearer the time of the happenings. Governor Hamilton is distinctly more modest than Clark, though he attributes his failure to the treachery of those he trusted rather than to any deficiency in himself. Mr. Quaife has carefully edited these two narratives and rightly left the reader to form his own opinion of their respective merits.

Contemporaries of Marco Polo. Edited by Manuel Komroff.

The Black and Gold Library. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

This is far from being a simple reprint, since research was required for so interesting a collection of little-known works of Eastern travel by the earliest visitors to China. Mr. Komroff, who recently edited Marco Polo for the same library, now presents William of Rubruck, John of Pian de Carpini, Friar Odoric, and Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela. He has done his work as editor carefully and has written an interesting and informing introduction.

The Art in Painting. By Albert C. Barnes. Second Edition, revised and enlarged. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $6.

Mr. Barnes's already established study of the plastic values in plastic art, and of the means whereby they may be taught and appreciated, is enlarged and revised in order to bring the accounts of contemporary painters more directly into line with the purpose of the book and in order to make room for discussion of the early German, Flemish, Dutch, and French painters.

The Gobbler of God. A Poem of the Southern Appalachians.

By Percy Mackaye. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Mackaye adds to his now very long list of works inspired by local and popular American materials a narrative poem which, though it is as difficult in its language as some of its predecessors, is richer and stronger in the elements of myth and motive which give it substance. Mr. Mackaye has told a story which would be true of other people than these local ones, and has been at pains to give this story a kind of general poetic power. The result is a distinct improvement over much of what went before.

Gentlemen, Be Seated! A Parade of the Old-time Minstrels. By Dailey Paskman and Sigmund Spaeth. With a Foreword by Daniel Frohman. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.

The current rage for old-fashioned American songs has brought forth this book, which in a rough-and-ready manner tells the story of the minstrels, their rise and (temporary) fall.

Anatole France Abroad. By His Secretary, Jean Jacques Brousson. Translated by John Pollock. Robert M. McBride and Company. $5.

The brilliant author of "Anatole France Abroad" is still brilliant on the subject of the Master's vagaries of mind and morals, but he is much more malicious now. In fact, he turns against the Master all the resources of his very able pen, making him in the end seem one of the most difficult, if one of the cleverest, of men. The account is of a lecture trip which Anatole France took to the Argentine.

Read RARE Books

You may now read without buying, at moderate cost, both the quaint old books and the extraordinary new ones.

Limited editions, privately printed items, unexpurgated translations and exceptional reprints may be had through this entirely unique service.

Members throughout the United States have access to a collection of rare, scarce, unusual, out-of-print and curious books chosen largely by themselves.

Please state occupation or profession when writing for information and lists.

Esoterika Biblion Society Inc., Dept. N-3
45 West 45th Street, New York City

EDUCATIONAL

OAK LANE Country Day School

New Residence Department for Boys

A large progressive country day school with limited boarding group under competent masters.

Address

WILLIAM B. CURRY, Oak Lane, Philadelphia Pa.

The MODERN SCHOOL, Stelton, N. J.
A co-educational school. Freedom of Self-expression in Creative Activities, with a Social Environment developing Responsibility and Comradeship.
Rates $12.00 weekly.

OPEN WINTER AND SUMMER.

Write—JAS. H. DICK, Prin.

OPEN SHELF

Visit or Write

THE FRENCH BOOKMAN
202 WEST 96TH ST. (NEAR BROADWAY)
French books and magazines exclusively, low prices.
Catalogue, 5c (stamps).

USE OUR SUMMER SERVICE

Any book sent anywhere in the United States post free. Send for our summer catalogue.

The Post Box Bookshop,
36 E. 48th St., Dept. A, New York

Encyclopaedia Britannica, 32 Vols. bound in 16 Vols. Latest Edition, new, big bargain, write for price. Encyclopaedia Dictionary of Music and Musicians, by De Bekker ($6.00), $2.50. Goethe's Life, by Georg Brandes, 2 Vols. ($10.00), $4.25. Israfel: Life and Times of Edgar Allan Poe, by Allen, 2 Vols. ($10.00), $4.50.

PEABODY BOOK SHOP

913 N. Charles St., Baltimore, Md.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:

Mail your classified ads so they reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.

Rates: $3.08 for one half inch (30 words) minimum. Additional lines of 6 words 62 cents each.

COOL—REFRIGERATED

KEITH-ALBEE

CAMEO

42nd St. and B'way

FILM ARTS GUILD Presents

BEGIN- SATURDAY JULY 28th
NING

Two Outstanding Achievements of the Cinema

"CZAR IVAN THE TERRIBLE"

Featuring the Amazing Characterization of the "Czar" by LEONIDOFF

and

The Russian Film Classic

"POTEMKIN"

Produced by Sovkino, Moscow

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS

Suit Lengths Cut to Order.

NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired.

Direct from the Makers
at Manufacturer's Price.
Postage Paid.

THE MYTH OF ADAM AND EVE

By Paul Lafargue

The Genesis story studied in the light of modern anthropology.
Brilliant, fascinating, suggestive. 25 cents, postpaid.

Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago

You may still have a copy of Prophets True and False by Oswald Garrison Villard

free in return for one new subscriber to The Nation secured outside your immediate household at the regular annual rate of $5.

Prophets True and False is beautifully printed and beautifully bound. It is just the book to have at your elbow this summer. Hoover, the "Supersalesman," is there, and Al Smith, "Governor Extraordinary," and all the other figures of the year's political drama—"portraits as daring and lively as they are pertinent to this Presidential year," says the publisher, and we agree.

Colonel House and Woodrow Wilson are there, too, and Anna Howard Shaw and Henry Ford and Abraham Jacobi, "Last of the Forty-eighters." Altogether twenty-seven men and women of significance in our day.

The original time limit has been extended, but this special offer will not be good after Mr. Hoover is informed of his nomination, on August 11.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York

Send The Nation for a year to Name .....

Address .....

Send Prophets True and False to

Name .....

Address .....

$5 a year. Additional Postage: Canada 50c, Foreign $1.

8-1-28

International Relations Section

Germany's Red Front

By AGNES SMEDLEY

Berlin, June 12

THE Red Front Fighters come to Berlin once a year to celebrate the future. They are an organization of over 200,000 men, 30,000 women, and some 50,000 youth. Although the leadership is Communist, only one-third of the members belong to the party. The president is Ernst Thälmann, transport worker and Communist Reichstag member from Hamburg, and one of the executives of the party. This is the organization that the Minister of the Interior, von Keudell, tried in vain to declare illegal about two months ago, while leaving the Fascist "Steel Helmets" untouched. These Red Front Fighters are known as the "storm-troops of the proletariat," organized in 1924 to counteract the growth of Fascism, to defend the working class, and, in case of another war, "to turn upon the capitalist class and change the war into a civil war for the destruction of capitalism and the establishment of a workers' and peasants' government." They are organized on a military basis and wear a gray uniform that looks much like the Russian Red Army uniform or the uniform of the Chinese Nationalist soldiers. The coat is half shirt, open at the throat and caught in at the waist and over the shoulder by leather straps. The cap, of the same material, has a solitary red star in front. Practically all men over twenty-five had military training in the last war, and even the Red Youth—young men from the ages of 16 to 21—look as if they had had it when they swing down the street.

Their fourth national gathering has just ended. They meet each year during the Whitsuntide holidays, and on Whitsunday is the great demonstration. This year 100,000 uniformed men and a few thousand women marched, followed by as many more non-uniformed Communist Party members. Seventy-five thousand came from outside Berlin—walking, riding bicycles, traveling in trucks or fourth-class railway carriages. Berlin contributed the other 25,000. For days in advance the working-class sections were busy preparing for their coming. Beds for 68,000 were arranged in the private homes of the workers, and it did not matter if some of these beds were bales of hay. The other men were housed in barracks or tents. The various divisions brought their bands with them, and when they began to arrive the railway stations were a mass of uniformed men waiting to start the music and escort their comrades through the streets. The workers' sections were a blaze of red; red flags and banners, red flowers, red streamers; red flowers or ribbons in the buttonholes or hats.

On Whitsunday the buglers awoke the Red Front Fighters at six. From eight to ten there were concerts and gatherings in the many halls and on the many squares. At ten the marching began, and in the "respectable" parts of the city the comfortable ladies and gentlemen turned uneasily in their beds when they heard the steady marching of thousands of feet and the blare of bands playing the "International" and "Out to the Sun and the Light." If you were in the workers' sections, it seemed that the whole city was marching. Eisenstein could have made a marvelous picture of whole streets marching, seemingly crossing and recrossing, their red flags caught in the wind and blazing in the brilliant morning sun. The streets were seething with workers in their Sunday best—not only Communists, but all workers turned out for this occasion. Thousands of working women and girls stood along the lines with baskets of sandwiches and fruit, distributing food free to the marching men. Glasses of water and beer appeared by the thousand along the routes—workers' restaurant keepers giving free—and girls ran along beside the marchers waiting to take back the glasses.

The Lustgarten was the goal of the marchers. On one side of the square is the former imperial palace; on another the cathedral; on the third the Museum of Ancient Arts, with a long flight of broad steps leading up to it; on the fourth the canal. Roads and bridges lead to it from six or seven different directions. Rows of police helmets gleamed on the top steps of the cathedral and the museum, and back of the museum hundreds of them were camped, with rifles ready, while across the canal were big police lorries, filled with men. Clear across the front of the cathedral, almost hiding the policemen, was a long, broad slash of red bunting, with the white words "Red Front Fighters, join the Communist Party." Across the face of the imperial palace was another: "Each factory a fortress of the Red Front!" Shades of imperial ancestors!

The Red Front is frightfully punctual. At 2:30, on the scheduled moment, the first columns began to pour into the Lustgarten. Their red banners fluttered beyond the green trees and the bands blared their approach. Within a few minutes the garden was a gray sea of rhythmically marching men, a medley of music, a mass of great red flags and banners, while above the noise came the repeated triple shouts of "Red Front" as each new division received and gave their greeting. Divisions arrived from feudal East Prussia, from the Catholic South, from the great industrial centers of the Rhineland, the Ruhr, and Saxony. Hamburg and Stettin contributed not only industrial sections, but contingents of the "Red Marine" in seamen's uniform, raising their clenched fists and shouting "Red Front." Divisions from the brother Red Front organizations in Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, Switzerland, and France marched also; there was a small Chinese group, and now and then the lines threw up the faces of Negroes, Indians, Javanese. There were individual delegates from the Scandinavian countries, England, Australia, Russia, and India. The "Young Pioneers"—boys and girls under sixteen—marched; and the "Young Spartacans"—little chaps under twelve—screamed "Red Front! Hoch!" from their big motor lorries. The Red sport organizations, with their many members training for the Workers' Olympiad in Moscow, marched, both men and women in white shorts with bare arms, heads, and legs. The white-clad Workers' First Aid, which numbers some 80,000 men and women throughout the country, moved through the crowd, carrying stretchers or first-aid kits on their backs, ready to take any person who fainted to one of the many stations where physicians were in charge. On the broad steps of the museum stood a chorus of 300 Communist workingmen who shouted "Red Front" in unison as the columns marched past. With each call of "Red Front" the right fist, clenched, is raised. This is the greeting of all Red Front men and women and their sympathizers and supporters.

Two hours passed, but still the columns kept marching in and long after the demonstration was at an end they continued coming. The Lustgarten was filled to overflowing. The crowds spilled over into the squares beyond the palace, down Unter den Linden before the opera and the university, and blocked all the streets leading toward the garden. The crowd that gathered to watch and take part in the demonstration was estimated at from five to seven hundred thousand.

At four the bugles sounded a warning from the statue in the center of the Lustgarten—then sounded it again. The audience became silent. From the steps of the museum the chorus of 300 men singers began "Out to the Sun and the Light." The museum served as a sounding-board, the men's voices were strong and well trained. There are some thousand such Communist singers under training in Berlin. You could hear them as they sang, far on the other side of the garden. I doubt if I have ever heard anything so gripping as those strong, deep voices singing the songs of the revolution to a great audience standing in silence, the bright sun streaming upon them and their gleaming banners, the wind catching their flags and moving the green background of trees.

After the second song the bugles called again, and simultaneously from every part of the vast concourse speakers arose—standing on steps, boxes, statues. They had all been given their points to emphasize, and fifteen minutes in which to deliver them. Then the bugles called again and the oath of the Red Front was given. The speakers read each line, with clenched fist raised, and the vast crowds repeated it. The oath was:

I swear:

Never to forget that world imperialism is preparing a war against Soviet Russia.

Never to forget that the destiny of the working class of the whole world is bound up with Soviet Russia.

Never to forget the experience and the suffering of the working class in the imperialist World War. Never to forget the 4th of August, 1914, and the betrayal of the reformists.

Always and forever to fulfil my revolutionary duty to the working class and socialism.

Always and forever to remain a soldier of the revolution.

Always and forever, in all proletarian mass organizations, in industries and factories, to be a pioneer of the irreconcilable class war.

On the front, and in the army of imperialism, to work only for the revolution.

To lead the revolutionary fight for the destruction of class rule and of the German bourgeoisie.

To defend the Chinese revolution and the Soviet Union by any and every means.

I swear:

Always and forever to fight for Soviet Russia and for the World Revolution.

The bugles sounded again when the last rumble of voices had died away. The chorus sang the "International" and the program was at an end.

On Monday there was a great farewell meet. Many of the Red Front men from outside the city remained for a few days to see the sights. Most of them had never seen Berlin before. Some had brought their girls or wives along, simply or very poorly dressed, and for the next few days you could meet them in groups of fifteen or twenty looking at public buildings or, in curious scorn or amazement, at the fashionably dressed men and women sitting in the cafes on Unter den Linden or Kurfürstendamm. Not one could afford such luxury. For weeks their members had been taxed ten pfennigs a day for this Berlin trip. They carried their sandwiches, wrapped in newspapers, and every extra pfennig spent meant a sacrifice.

The strength of the Red Front Fighters' Federation cannot be judged by its numbers alone. The duties and discipline imposed upon members are so exacting that only the most determined men and women can remain in it. Every spare minute is claimed. There are mass meetings, study groups, organizational work. There are the many proletarian celebrations where propaganda is carried on. There was the work for Sacco and Vanzetti, for the Chinese revolution, for strikes in various parts of the world, for the Vienna uprising. Just now the organization is working against the Fascist sentences in Italy. The man or woman who can meet the rigid discipline imposed by either the Red Front or the Communist Party—and often the workers belong to both—is exceptional. But this keeps the organization down to from two to three hundred thousand. Those who do remain are steeled by the conviction that theirs is an historic mission—that history is with them.

Berlin remains red. In some of the workers' sections the Communist Party stands first. The next four years will be filled with intense and bitter struggle. The Red Front has plans, in the eventuality of war, that will not stop with Parliamentary agitation. They do not hide the fact; they warn the German bourgeoisie, they proclaim their intentions before the entire working class and call for recruits. The Red Front Fighters may one day be suppressed. But to suppress three and a half million voters is not so easy, and if the federation is suppressed, all Communists may be called upon to join them.

Contributors to This Issue

CARLETON BEALS, author of "Brimstone and Chili" and "Mexico: An Interpretation," has been living in Mexico City for several years.

ERNEST GRUENING, editor of the Portland Evening News, is the author of "Mexico and Its Heritage," which will shortly be published.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is in Europe writing a series of articles for The Nation on the theater in Moscow, Berlin, Vienna, Budapest, Paris, and London.

BABETTE DEUTSCH is the author of two books of verse, "Banners" and "Honey Out of the Rock."

MARIE LUHRS has contributed verse to The Nation and other magazines.

NORAH MEADE visited Russia several years ago and has since then closely followed events there.

W. NORMAN BROWN of the department of Sanskrit at the University of Pennsylvania is now en route to India for a year's visit.

R. F. DIBBLE is the author of "Strenuous Americans," "John L. Sullivan, an Intimate Narrative," and "Mohammed."

AGNES SMEDLEY is an American writer living in Berlin.

RESTAURANT

The Old Russian Inn

wishes to see its old Friends
in its new home

COOL AND AIRY

23 W. 49th—N. Y. C.

Tel. Circle 10442

LANGUAGES

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN
75c. Short Course Surprising results
Per Lesson Native Teachers
PRIVATE SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK
Established 1906 Between 85th and 86th Sts.

RUSSIAN taught by experienced teacher, Imperial University graduate, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School of Languages. Michael M. Jerlitzyn, 2013 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C. Tel. Harlem 5560.

INSTRUCTION

TEACHER (former college and high school instructor) gives lessons in languages and science: English, French, Spanish, German, Latin, etc.; chemistry, biology, physics, mathematics, etc. Also preparation for examinations. Box 718, % The Nation.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

NEW YORK CITY architect, now building small homes and apartment houses, invites financial participation from individuals controlling $25,000 upwards, as investment or become partner in building enterprise, in N. Y. C. References exchanged. Box 817, % The Nation.

KINDERGARTEN GROUP

GOVERNESS - KINDERGARTNER
TAKES CHILDREN TO PARK MORNINGS, AFTERNOONS OR ALL DAY. ALSO TRIPS AND PICNICS TO BEACHES. CHILDREN CALLED FOR AND TAKEN HOME.
252 West 93rd St. Schuyler 6438

VOCATIONAL SERVICE

GERTRUDE STEIN, INC., 18 E. 41st St., N.Y.C. Lexington 2593
Unusual secretarial and social service positions. We are glad to hear from Nation readers who need workers or who are looking for positions.

POSITIONS WANTED

YOUNG WOMAN, excellent training and experience, purposeful and sane philosophy of education, rejected by traditional kindergartners, desires work with group of 3-6 year old children. Will undertake directorship of new group or become affiliated with existing one. Address 22 DeKoven St., Forest Hills, L. I.

EXPERIENCED woman, college graduate, would like a job that has a future. Box 822, % The Nation.

STATE editor, special feature writer. Experience editing copy, writing heads, layout, proof-reading, accept position editorial assistant, or other capacity newspaper, magazine. Box 826, % The Nation.

ROOMS AND BOARD

252 WEST 93D ST.
Room for business mother and board and care of child during day.
Unusual advantages. Phone: Schuyler 6438

FOR SALE

A MAHOGANY four-post bed and coil spring are for sale at a very reasonable price. The bed is three-quarter size, the posts about 5½ feet high. Can be seen by appointment. Phone Mr. Fisher, Whitehall 7730, or write Box 817, % The Nation.

S U M M E R

A new retreat
for a few campers
Robin Hood Lodge

on beautiful Echo Lake—in the Adirondacks—near Lake George.

Capacity—25

All camp activities

Rates: $27 per week.

Address

JEAN FOX
ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg, N. Y.
Tel. Warrensburg 106 F-2

PIONEER LODGE

A Summer Camp for Adults

Near Thousand Islands

Limited to Seventy-five—Has all conveniences in Lodge and Bungalows—All Sports—Boating on Large Lake—Golf Within Fifteen Minutes' Walk—Rate $30 per Week.

Accessible over night by N. Y. Central.

STAR LAKE, N. Y. CITY OFFICE
ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY 9 MAIDEN LANE
CORTLAND 1958

Uncas Lodge, Uncasville, Conn.

Small rustic camp, limited to 50, situated on 165-acre farm, bordering twin lakes. Tennis, handball, basket-ball, swimming, boating. Dancing to a fine orchestra. Golf within 10 minutes.
Delightful overnight sail over L. I. Sound, $2.88
Dietary laws observed. Food American style. Phone Minnesota 6741 evenings, or write Lifschutz, 73 W. 105th St., N. Y. C., or direct to camp. $22.50 July; $25.00 August.

PROPERTY FOR SALE

FOR Sale—In Adirondacks, 3 acres, 8 room camp. Garage. Price $1,200; part cash. Over 100 other camps and cabins to pick from. Write for booklet, Earl Woodward, Hadley, N. Y.

BORDERING Westchester Co., two dwellings, barn, 150 acres, suitable for camp, estate or summer home. Five springs. Lake bordering property. Very reasonable for locality. About 50 miles from city. Terms. Box 823, % The Nation.

HOUSE FOR RENT

BERMUDA—For Rent—Charming 12 room house, plainly furnished, beautiful grounds. Located on ocean and sound, 5 minutes from village and hotel. Will rent by month until January. $50 monthly. Box 824, % The Nation.

WORKERS' COLONY

JOIN the Golden's Bridge Cooperative. A Workers' Colony, situated in beautiful Westchester county, at the foot of Berkshire Mountains, within commuting distance from New York (1½ hrs. from Grand Central), 7 minutes' walk from station. Comradely atmosphere, social activities; sports, swimming, rowing, fishing. For information apply to H. S. Weinbatt, 16 W. 21st St., Phone Watkins 7950.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

BROOKLYN HEIGHTS, entire floor in artist's home. Front room 18 x 13, rear 14 x 13. Kitchen, modern bath, unique wood burning fireplace. $65. Phone Main 3670.

REPRESENTATION ABROAD

LADY traveling to Europe will execute any commissions. Box 827, c/o The Nation.

CAMP
TAMIMENT

FOR ADULTS FOREST PARK, PA.

Every modern facility for outdoor sports. Sixteen Tennis Courts. Dancing. Safe, delightful bathing. Entertainment. Dramatics. Excellent food. Occasional lectures. Reasonable rates.

Write Forest Park, Pa. Tel. Stroudsburg 71R2

BURDEN LAKE LODGE, Averill Park, N. Y. Near Albany. A new modern camp for adults. Small but complete—all sports and social activities free. July, $28 per week; August, $35 per week. Prop., Al. Goldstein, Phone Averill Park 40.

GREENWICH VILLAGE

FOR RENT OR SALE

GREENWICH VILLAGE
1—5 ROOM apartments, elevator, tile baths, real kitchens. Frigidaire. Also entire floors in remodeled Colonial houses. Reasonable rentals. Properties for sale, $1,000 cash and up.
FRANCES SPENCER
61 Christopher St. Tel. Spring 1970

MARITZA'S Peasant Shop*SPECIAL VACATION SALE

Embroidered voile blouses, $5.00; dresses, $8.95; Russian smocks from $8.50 up. Silk dresses and hats, from 25 to 50% reduction. Morocco bags, $3.50 and $4.50. Palestine embroidered pongee dresses for children $3.75 up.

MARITZA, 172 W. 4th St., nr. 6th Ave.

Any Change of Address

should be mailed to our Subscription Department at least two weeks before it is to become effective. This will insure uninterrupted delivery of The Nation to you, and will materially lessen the pressure of work in our office. When notifying us be sure to give both old and new addresses and stipulate the exact date upon which you desire the change made.

SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT

The Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 8, 1928

No. 3292

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	119
EDITORIALS:
Like as Two Peas.....	122
Our Treaty with China.....	123
Crystal Eastman .....	124
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	125
CAN AL SMITH CARRY NEW JERSEY? By Frederick L. Ferris.....	126
NORMAN THOMAS. By McAlister Coleman.....	128
THE TRUTH ABOUT TSINANFU. By H. J. Timperley.....	130
COVERING WASHINGTON. By The Unofficial Spokesman.....	132
ELLEN TERRY. By J. Ranken Towse.....	133
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	134
CORRESPONDENCE .....	134
BOOKS:
Some Grass. By Thomas Hornsby Ferril.....	136
Francis Joseph. By Emil Lengyel.....	136
Tom-toms and Rotarians. By Luis Muñoz Marín.....	136
A Jewish Banking Firm. By William Seagle.....	137
The Faith of a Liberal Historian. By George E. G. Catlin.....	140
The Body of This Paris. By Pierre Loving.....	140
Essays in Architecture. By Talbot Faulkner Hamlin.....	141
Critical Political Thought. By Lewis Rockow.....	142
Bravo! By Hartley Alexander.....	142
Books in Brief.....	142
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
C. P. Scott on Disarmament.....	144

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR

MARK VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

PPOTATOES ARE GOING DOWN; Presidents are going up. Potatoes touched the lowest mark in any July in sixty years when they sold in the New York wholesale market for less than one cent a pound. Presidents reached the zenith of cash value, at least in prospect, when the expenses of the coming Presidential campaign were estimated at ten million dollars. That is the highest figure for campaign expenditures in our history. After careful inspection the potatoes seem to be a better bargain than the Presidents. Potatoes are substantial things that a man can bite his teeth into; the two leading Presidential candidates offer nothing of that sort to the voters. Intelligent citizens will decide that the difference between the two old parties is not worth paying for—and will spend their money for potatoes. The very Wet, the very Dry, and the power interests will contribute heavily to the campaign. Of these the power interests are the ones to fear; the Drys and Wets will cancel each other. The power interests will work with an overflowing treasury under a half-dozen varying disguises. They will buy important men in both parties—and the extent of their success will not be apparent until the vote is taken next winter in Congress on the public development of Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam. The one important check upon their purchasing is the revised Federal Corrupt Practices Act. The Republicans and the Democrats are expected to report their gifts and givers every thirty days.

Perhaps the lengthened shadow of Vare, Smith, Fall, and Sinclair will frighten away some likely customers.

WHEN THERE WERE RUMORS that Owen D. Young, president of the General Electric Company, might be a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor of New York State Mr. Young issued a statement. Mr. Young, it read, "is not and will not be a candidate for Governor of the State of New York." If the author of "I do not choose to run" and other equally cloudy phrases ever wearies of fishing the Brule River we suggest that he retire to his study and ponder the simple clarity of Mr. Young's words. If a man is sure that he does not wish to run for office, the English language provides precise ways of saying so.

THE RELIGION OF BUSINESS, the deepest conviction which most Americans hold, seems to have been responsible for the retirement of John J. Raskob from active connection with the affairs of the General Motors Corporation as the price of his acceptance of the management of the Presidential campaign of Governor Smith. For despite the effort to keep all appearances of a row from the public, the newspaper accounts suggest that Mr. Raskob was forced out through the pressure of Hoover supporters among the company's directors and banking interests which feared injury to the corporation's business because of identification with the Democratic Party. In accepting the resignation the president of General Motors suggests that Mr. Raskob will be welcomed back after the campaign. But there is no good reason why he should have been forced to resign. If his political duties promised to interfere with his business, he might properly have asked for a furlough until after election; nothing further was necessary. But business has so become the religion of modern Americans that they cannot divorce a man from his job or recognize his right to any interests or loyalties outside of it. This is not equally true in other countries and ought not to be so here. It is a false public opinion which does not permit Mr. Raskob to be active both as a Democrat and in the affairs of General Motors without the assumption of any connection between the two. The public opinion which has actuated Mr. Raskob's action is the same which leads a university to dismiss a professor because he makes a few speeches for the Socialists in a political campaign.

THE BRITISH PLAN of governing Egypt is quite simple. Give the natives a show of self-government but keep all the police power in British hands. Create a parliament with permission to talk but with no power to drive out the British invaders, or tax them directly, or take away their extraterritorial rights. Then, if the Parliament becomes obstreperous, suspend it for three years through a king appointed from London who is a creature of the British High Commissioner. That is what the British Government did on July 19—ten years after Egyptian workers had been drafted into a labor corps and compelled to help Britain win a war for the self-determination of subject peoples. For Egypt self-determination has included complete suppression of freedom of the press, with British control of the Suez Canal, British armies on Egyptian soil, and a British general in command of Egyptian police. The Nationalists, who comprise about nine-tenths of the native population, have lost faith in a government which has promised them "freedom" some sixty-odd times, so they rejected the Sarwat-Chamberlain treaty last spring and their Ministry resigned in a body. Today their "government" consists of King Fuad, who talks like a ventriloquist's dummy and gets his picture in the London papers.

THE OFT-MADE CHARGE by Mexico's revolutionists that the Roman Catholic hierarchy of that country is medieval in character and far from spiritual would seem to derive some substantiation from the statement made public in Rome by Archbishop Ruiz y Flores of the archdiocese of Michoacan, Mexico. Said that prelate in commenting on the assassination of President-elect Obregon, as reported in the New York World:

Unhappily it is but natural that the newly elected President should perish by violence. He caused so many people's death that sooner or later the friends of those whose blood he shed would have killed him. . . . I don't think Obregon's assassination will jeopardize the chances of settlement. It may help them. Calles . . . probably desires peace more anxiously than before. He is tired of bloodshed. Besides, the federal finances are in a parlous state. Calles needs money, and it won't be forthcoming until a settlement between the Catholics and Liberals is reached.

These words come pretty close to condoning murder. It is just such an attitude that has caused the Mexican clergy to give its implicit support to the rebellion and the consequent bloodshed of the last two years, which Archbishop Ruiz y Flores declares he believes Calles is now "tired of." Contrast with the Mexican archbishop's statement that of an American Catholic prelate, Archbishop Edward J. Hanna of San Francisco, who quite properly declared:

The assassination of the President-elect of Mexico will be deplored by the whole civilized world. It is an outrage against every law of God and man. My utter condemnation of it and all connected with it cannot be made too emphatic.

IN THE MOUNTJOY and Maryboro jails the Irish Free State has put some of its political prisoners. And according to a report by the Women's Prisoners' Defense League on thirty-one men and women now held in Irish and English prisons for their Republican activities, the conditions in the Free State jails are "appalling." In addition to the fact that "none of the prison reforms adopted in civilized countries have been introduced" the report states that Everything is done to degrade the prisoner, nothing to improve him. Except for illiterates who cannot read or write, there are no classes. There are no lectures, no music, no recreations to vary the hideous monotony of exercise round and round asphalt rings inclosed by high walls.

While some have been imprisoned for distributing literature, carrying firearms, or for crimes of violence, others have been arbitrarily arrested and kept in prison without trial—often for a year or longer. Over long periods they are kept in solitary confinement, locked in their cells twenty-two hours out of twenty-four, with no distinction between the treatment of the Republican prisoners and the ordinary criminals. Appeals are now being forwarded to Timothy A. Smiddy, Minister of the Irish Free State in Washington, asking his personal investigation into these charges.

AFTER EIGHTEEN YEARS in prison Oscar Slater has been set free by the Scottish Court of Appeals on the ground that he is an innocent man. Slater, now fifty-six years of age and looking older because of his long imprisonment, was convicted of the murder and robbery of an aged woman of Glasgow. At the trial Slater was identified by twelve persons as the man seen leaving the premises of the murdered woman, and he was originally sentenced to death. But the testimony of the eye-witnesses—like those in the Sacco-Vanzetti trial—was so specious and unsatisfactory that 20,000 persons signed a petition for clemency for the prisoner and his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. Later several prominent Englishmen interested themselves in the case and Slater's innocence was eventually established to the satisfaction of the courts. It is expected that Parliament will make some money compensation to Slater, but what money can compensate a man for eighteen years of wasted life? It seems like an incredible lapse of justice, yet here in America we executed Sacco and Vanzetti, while Tom Mooney and the Centralia prisoners are still in jail.

MOST OF THE APPLAUSE for the contestants in the transatlantic yacht race from New York to Spain went to the Nina, the winner in the class for small craft. The diminutive Nina, in command of her owner, Paul Hammond, made the 3,055 knots from Sandy Hook to Santander in twenty-four days, truly remarkable time for so small a vessel, and according to accounts she behaved splendidly in all kinds of wind and weather. The Nina covered more than 200 miles on two days of the passage and at one time logged thirty-seven knots in four hours. Right on the heels of the Nina when she made port on the other side was the larger schooner Elena, owned by William B. Bell. The Elena, starting a week later than the Nina, won in the class for larger yachts after a driving race in which she outfooted the veteran schooner Atlantic, winner of the German Emperor's cup twenty-three years ago.

THE BUSINESS OF ARCHAEOLOGY has not reached the pinnacles which transatlantic flying and moving-picture acting have attained, but it is looking up. What with signed testimonials to wrist watches, cigarettes, bouillon tablets, socks, hair-ribbons, and automobile tires, theatrical and radio contracts, book royalties and fees for more or less exclusive newspaper articles, flying must—for those who get there—have become a profitable adventure, comparable to starring in the films. But the archaeologists have been slow. Consider, for instance, the farmers who run the Glozel show in France. This is the farm, our readers may recall, where marvelous prehistoric relics were discovered, proving the existence of a ten-thousand-year-old pre-Phoenician alphabet. It was all very thrilling. But the professors began to disagree; some suggested that the relics were not Neolithic but late Roman, and others shouted that they were neo-modern—post-World War, in fact. A committee of international paleontologists solemnly visited the field, dug with their little trowels, and announced their decision that the relics were mid-Victorian. The Glozelians, led by Salomon Reinach, however, still insisted upon their antiquity; while the anti-Glozelians continued to shout that the peasant Fradin manufactured them in his barn. Now those who take the baths at Vichy make regular trips to the Fradin farm. Germaine Fradin sells admission to a dark little museum at four francs each; Emile Fradin, the peasant who "found" the "relics," lectures on their scientific significance; grandfather Fradin sells autographed picture post cards when not working on the new Glozel cafe. It is a good beginning; but the Fradins might do better still with the aid of a Yankee publicity man.

PROBLEM: IF 200,000 WORKERS of the General Motors Corporation can get $2,000 life-insurance policies and $15-a-week sickness-and-accident insurance benefits for a payment of five cents per worker per day, how much would it cost all the workers of America to get the same insurance through a federal-government social insurance system? Answer: Sh! The big insurance companies do not like that kind of question. Recall their public agony during the campaign for health-insurance laws in the years immediately following the war! Nevertheless, we think that a number of people will ask that question when they read that the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has written the largest group insurance policy in history for the General Motors Corporation at an exceedingly low rate—the total payments for this insurance will be about seven cents per worker per day. In itself the plan seems admirable; it distributes the burden of social risk, it demonstrates the economy of large-scale insurance, and it tends to encourage the group practice of medicine. But it gives to a powerful anti-union corporation one more weapon for breaking strikes, the double-edged weapon of discharge and the loss of insurance protection. Probably the General Motors Corporation does not intend to use its social insurance as a class weapon, but the potentialities are there. A government plan of social insurance would be more democratic and more economical; it would not restrict the right of industrial protest and it could reach everybody.

WE ARE HEARTILY for the campaign now on in New York and other States to insist upon proper headlights for motor vehicles. At least 364 serious automobile accidents in New York State in 1927 were due directly to the blinding of drivers, and no one can estimate the number of less serious ones. In Schenectady, during the week of June 11, the police stopped 1,638 cars only to find that 427 carried dangerous headlights. Now the interesting thing is that a remarkable headlight has been developed which meets all the tests, but the daily press, either because of ignorance of this fact or fear of giving free advertising, has refrained from mentioning it. We refer to the Ryanlite, the invention of the chief engineer of the General Electric Company, who devoted himself to the problem after having himself twice been sent into ditches owing to the glare of the other fellow's lights. Mr. Ryan's invention floods the road with a soft, non-glaring illumination, which goes much further to the side of the road than any other, makes possible the reading of all road signs without leaving the car, and blinds nobody—not even an approaching pedestrian. It also enables the driver to see the road ahead of him, even when passing another car, thus eliminating that dreadful dark moment which has caused the death of so many pedestrians. We suppose that the several States cannot prescribe a patented article like this, but we commend it to all automobile clubs and to all the agencies interested in combating the evils of the ordinary headlights. The Automobile Club of Australia has already pronounced the Ryanlite to be the most satisfactory submitted to it for testing.

OPHTHALMIA NEONATORUM, commonly known as "babies' sore eyes," has been reduced as a cause of blindness among children admitted to schools for the blind 64 per cent in the last twenty years. This remarkable achievement, according to the National Society for the Prevention of Blindness, comes as the result of a nation-wide educational campaign conducted by the society since it was organized in 1908. It has encouraged the adoption of laws, in most States, requiring doctors, nurses, or others in attendance to put prophylactic drops in the eyes of babies at birth. Thus what was once the most prolific of all causes of blindness has been brought under very effective control with its complete eradication now scientifically possible. We have here a demonstration of the tremendous good that can come from the wide use and popularization of new scientific knowledge. Much the same message is conveyed by the announcement of the American Child Health Association that the infant mortality rate in cities of the United States during 1927 was lower than in any previous year. Last year the rate was 64.9 deaths for each 1,000 births, as compared with 100 in 1915. In the 683 cities studied it was found that the larger places—above 250,000 population—had the lower rates. It is, of course, not possible to attribute this reduced death-rate to any single cause, but improved medical knowledge and experience, together with more enlightened social and economic conditions, must be outstanding factors in the result.

W. C. BROWNELL was one of the best American critics, though not one of the best known. Wherever good writing and careful judgment were esteemed, "American Prose Masters" and "Victorian Prose Masters" were also valued; but there was nothing in either book to attract the casual or lazy reader. It took a kind of discipline to cope with Mr. Brownell's long, lean, and richly meditated sentences; and it took wisdom to realize how much he knew about literature, and how well fitted he was to judge it. The effort, however, was worth while, for he was an aristocrat of criticism—this in spite of his constant preoccupation with the theme of democratic culture. He was a critic of society, too, as those who know his "French Traits" will remember, or as those who read his last book, "Democratic Distinction in America," will admit even though they may not have agreed with his position there. In "The Genius of Style," published two years ago, Mr. Brownell, while maintaining the grave and witty excellence of his manner, revealed the fact that he had by no means mastered the literature of this generation. His objections to it, just though many of them were, smacked nevertheless of another century and made it clear that he was not to speak in his old age with a valuable voice. Time, indeed, had put him in a curiously paradoxical position: while he continued in polished accents to consider the future of culture in democracies, younger and rougher critics like Mr. Mencken arose to announce in the language of the market-place that democracy was dead, or at least absurd. Mr. Brownell had not written for this journal in recent years, but The Nation considers him one of the most distinguished contributors it ever had.

As Like as Two Peas

THAT is what the two older political parties have become—as like as two peas. They have been tending in this direction for years, as The Nation has long been pointing out. But in this campaign we are getting frank admissions of this fact from quarters in which the effort has hitherto been made to convince the voters that there really were radical differences between what the Republicans and Democrats stood for. Walter Lippmann of the New York World was quite open about it in his radio debate the other night with Ogden L. Mills, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The only difference between the two platforms on foreign affairs, Mr. Lippmann admitted, was that while both were voluble and vague the Republican took longer to read. Both mean about the same thing, for, he said, “both were written by men determined to use the largest words with the smallest meaning.” As for William Allen White, he is quite cynical, not to say ribald, about it. The Republicans, he declares, sighed over corruption and “the Democrats yelled about it at the top of their voices.” As for prohibition, the Republicans were for its enforcement “in a gentlemanly way”; the Democrats “evaded as far as they dared the promise to enforce the Volstead Act.” For the rest, according to the doctrine in Emporia:

On farm relief the Republicans heaved a sigh at the sad state of the farmer, and promised him exactly what the Democrats have promised, except that with their promise the Democrats gave the farmer three lusty cheers. On other matters—excepting the tariff, wherein each party was traditional, neither being really excited about it—both parties were explicit without enthusiasm. But speaking broadly, one may say that if the Republican platform is the sublimation of a silent tear, the Democratic platform is a passionate straddle in white pants.

If Mr. Lippmann and Mr. White are not quite fair in some respects—the Democrats abandoned at Houston their historic tariff position, while the Democratic planks on foreign policy are distinctly more liberal and anti-imperialistic than the Republican—a prominent official of the Wilson Administration has admitted privately that, with the surrender of the Democrats on the tariff and their indifference to the League of Nations, there is now no worth-while distinction between the two parties. “It has come down,” he declares, “to the simple decision whether you prefer the man Hoover to the man Smith.” This is more to the point because of the determined effort to make it appear that Smith is no more dangerous to business than is Hoover. Mr. Olvany, the head of Tammany Hall, did not wait to return to New York before issuing a statement from the train that business had nothing whatever to fear from Smith. More than that, for the first time in years a Democratic banner has been hung in Wall Street. It certifies to the support of Alfred E. Smith by the business men’s association of the lower part of that historic thoroughfare. But the thing does not stop there. Governor Smith has himself chosen the chairman of the board of General Motors as his campaign manager, while William H. Woodin, president of the American Car and Foundry Company, has also joined the Democratic forces.

What matters it beside this that a college president from the South, a former Senator from Oklahoma, and a Democratic committee-woman from Maine have joined the Hoover forces? What the Democrats are doing is muzzling the Republican orators who usually assure the country that the Democrats are certain to upset all business if their candidate is elected. Obviously they cannot do that when Judge Olvany, Colonel Herbert H. Lehman, Mr. Raskob, Mr. Woodin, and the Lower Wall Street Business Men’s Association are there to certify that Governor Smith’s election will not injure what is left of Coolidge prosperity. This is certainly a new role for the Democratic Party. It is thus no longer the defender of the small business man, the protagonist of the worker, the sworn protector of the plain people who suffer from the money power and the trusts. It has forgotten that only sixteen years ago that Democratic President who was so highly praised at the Houston convention chose for the keynote of his successful campaign for the White House the fact that “the masters of the government of the United States are the combined capitalists and manufacturers of the United States.” In addition he insisted that “the government of the United States at present is a foster-child of the special interests. It is not allowed to have a will of its own,” and he declared that through him and the Democratic Party the government would be taken away from “the big manufacturers, the bankers, and the heads of the great railroad combinations.”

The truth is that this apostasy of the Democratic Party is a sorry business for the voters. There still are vital issues before the American people. What is happening is that both candidates for the Presidency are kowtowing to the business powers that control. When Governor Smith’s backers portray him as safe and sane for all business they picture him as faithless to the soundest tenets of the Democracy. He ought not to be safe and sane for all business. He ought to be as dreaded by lawless business and that portion of the business world which is seeking to acquire certain birthrights of the American people as was Woodrow Wilson when he was putting through his “Seven Sisters” laws against the corporations in New Jersey. For the Democracy of Grover Cleveland to support the tariff and to pretend that the organization is like the Republican Party in all its aims and ambitions is indeed to reduce the whole business to a question of personality, to whether you like Al Smith’s brown derby or prefer Mr. Hoover’s conventional straw hat; whether you prefer to have Mrs. Hoover in the White House rather than Mrs. Smith; whether you think that Smith’s election would or would not turn over the United States government to the Pope. All the vast problems of capitalism and labor are shoved aside; no issues are defined on vital foreign problems.

It is still true, of course, that the candidates may make sharp issues if they will. But on what? Prohibition? Mr. Hoover has spent nearly seven and one-half years in two Administrations neither of which has made the slightest real effort to enforce prohibition. Neither will Mr. Hoover do so if he is elected. In the end the question still is: Do you like Smith better than Hoover? There is no difference whatever between their parties.

Our Treaty with China

THE United States took the lead in recognizing Nationalist China when John Van A. MacMurray, American Minister at Peking, signed a treaty on July 25 which acknowledged the right of China to tariff autonomy next January. Secretary Kellogg deserves high praise for the promptness with which the treaty was executed; it is a welcome gesture of friendship at a critical moment in the establishment of the new government. Admiral Bristol made a still more welcome gesture when he effected the recall of 1,500 American marines from Tientsin. The two gestures coming simultaneously will help materially to win Chinese friendship and to force a general recognition by other Powers of the Nationalist group as the actual government of China.

Once more, as in the handling of the Nanking incident of March, 1927, the Administration's diplomacy puts us in a strategic position to determine the policy of Great Britain, France, and other nations which share with us in the penetration of China. Will the Government use the advantage of that strategic position effectively to win justice for the Nationalists? The history of the last three years seems to indicate that while we are genuinely friendly to the aspirations of Chinese nationalism, our Government is slow to relinquish any of the conditions of special privilege which exist for Americans in China.

Events have moved so rapidly during recent months that it may be well to ask: Where are we in relation to Chinese sovereignty and treaty rights?

At the Washington Conference we and other Powers agreed to open negotiations for restoring to China the control of her tariff and her courts. After long delay special conferences were called on tariff and extraterritoriality. As to tariff, the Powers agreed to give China autonomy in January, 1929; as to extraterritoriality, they were not so liberal. They laid down an elaborate set of conditions which China must fulfil before her courts could have jurisdiction over foreigners. Before the negotiations were ended, the revolution swept northward and the Peking diplomats were forced to flee for their lives. Finally Chang Tso-lin fell, and a new Nationalist Government is knocking at our door and reminding us of the unequal treaties and our pledges.

We cannot refuse these Nationalists recognition; they are the government of China. We cannot stick by the unequal treaties; we have pledged ourselves again and again to eliminate those treaties. The sole question of importance is: How fast will we move in giving back China to the control of the Chinese?

Mr. Kellogg was swift enough in executing the new treaty with China concerning tariff autonomy to satisfy the most exacting, but there is one clause in that treaty which is so laden with possibilities of delay that it may fairly be described as a joker. The phrase runs:

subject, however, to the condition that each of the high contracting parties shall enjoy in the territories of the other, with respect to the above specified and any related matters, treatment in no way discriminatory as compared with the treatment accorded to any other country.

We do not actually agree to give China tariff autonomy until the other great Powers have granted it. If Britain, France, and Japan find technical causes of delay in giving tariff autonomy to China, our special privileges will continue with theirs. Moreover, the treaty raises doubts in another direction; it says nothing about extraterritoriality. Why was Mr. Kellogg silent on that subject both in his note and in the treaty?

Three practical measures suggest themselves as natural next steps in American policy, if this new treaty is more than political elocution. Let us recall more of our marines; we still have 2,600 in China even after Admiral Bristol has returned one delegation. Let us volunteer to modify our extraterritorial rights immediately in such a way that Chinese judges can participate in the trial of all American citizens in China. Let us protest against the Japanese usurpation of power in Manchuria.

This last will be most difficult to do for a nation whose hands are not clean, but for the Chinese it is the most important thing we can do. Japan is the greatest obstacle which stands between the Nationalists and Chinese political unification—and Japan is clearly violating in Manchuria the pledge which she gave us at the Washington Conference to respect the sovereignty of China.

Crystal Eastman

CRYSTAL EASTMAN is dead. And all over the world there are women and men who will feel touched with loss, who will look on a world that seems more sober, more subdued. In her short life Crystal Eastman brushed against many other lives, and wherever she moved she carried with her the breath of courage and a contagious belief in the coming triumph of freedom and decent human relations. These were her religion. She preached it in many places and in many forms. In the struggle for woman's suffrage and for equality between men and women; in her work for peace and the rule of reason among peoples; in the fight for social justice and human liberty—as feminist, pacifist, socialist—she fought for her faith. Her strength, her beauty, her vitality and enthusiasm, her rich and compelling personality—these she threw with reckless vigor into every cause that promised a finer life to the world. She spent herself wholly, and died—too young.

Crystal Eastman was a great leader. Those who knew her, know these words are not too strong. When she spoke to people—whether it was to a small committee or a swarming crowd—hearts beat faster and nerves tightened as she talked. She was simple, direct, dramatic. Force poured from her strong body and her rich voice, and people followed where she led. Her vitality overflowed into thousands of other feebler spirits and made them, for the moment at least, into the likeness of herself. In her personal as in her public life her enthusiasm and strength were spent without thought; she had no pride or sense of her own power. Her capacity for warm and generous friendships seemed unlimited.

Early in her life Crystal Eastman studied law and was admitted to the bar; but she gave up legal work to turn to social studies. She wished to come closer to human beings in their social and industrial lives and to bring a trained understanding to the devious causes of their troubles. She helped make the famous Pittsburgh survey for the Russell Sage Foundation; later she was appointed a member—the only woman member—of the New York State Employers' Liability Commission. She became its secretary and in 1911 published a masterly report on "Work Accidents and the Law." But Crystal Eastman came honestly by her zeal and her capacity for leadership, and social work could not hold her. Her father and mother, both Congregational ministers, were the center of intellectual vigor and freedom in their up-State town, and her mother particularly was an active advocate of "women's rights" in the days when such a stand took courage and humor and a readiness to endure ridicule and dislike. Crystal Eastman flung her ardent energies into the suffrage fight. She became State leader of the suffrage forces in Wisconsin in 1911 and 1912. From then on until the vote was won, she campaigned and spoke for suffrage. She was always associated with the more militant wing of the movement; and later she joined the Woman's Party and supported it in its fight for the "blanket amendment," although she was opposed to any narrow legal interpretation of women's rights.

As a feminist Crystal Eastman was more than an ardent, militant advocate of votes for her sex. She was to thousands of young women and young men a symbol of what the free woman might be. Unlike some of her contemporaries, embittered by the long and unreasoning struggle, she never lost her sense of balance or her friendly sympathy with men. She fought not for a sterile victory for her sex but for her religion—the triumph of freedom and decent human relations. Since they could be won only through the winning of equality and the vote—those must come first. But she was fair and steady and consistent. Equality worked both ways. It was not a gesture but a simple article of her belief that she should refuse alimony when she was divorced from her first husband. She is quoted as saying:

No self-respecting feminist would accept alimony. It would be her own confession that she could not take care of herself. Alimony has nothing to do with the support of children, which, of course, must always be the mother's and father's joint responsibility whether they live together or not.

This acceptance of the responsibilities of freedom along with its privileges was a solid principle. She believed in absolute equality. She would have abolished, along with the legal discriminations against women, all the laws which favored them. This included every form of protection whether in the form of property, or alimony, or support by a husband, or industrial safeguards. One may question the social wisdom of her position, but no one could doubt its courage or sincerity. She saw in the light of her faith a world in which men and women worked and played and loved as equals; nothing less than this would satisfy her.

Once in New York, before the war broke over the head of a hopeful world, a series of meetings was held to discuss the perennial subject of women's advancement—their right to self-support; their right to every sort of job; their right, even when married, to keep their own names. Crystal Eastman tackled a bold subject. She discussed women's right to physical equality with men. With humor and vivid imagination she pictured a cheerful Utopia of young athletes of both sexes, the girls unhampered by preconceived ideas of what was fit or proper or possible for their sex to achieve. She drew her examples from circus tents and battlefields and the fields of European peasants. She asserted that when women were expected to be agile, they became agile; when they were expected to be brave, they developed courage; when they had to endure, their endurance broke all records. As she stood there, herself an embodiment of tall, easy strength and valor, her words took on amazing life. Whether science would sustain her theories or reject them made little difference. The fact was that not one woman left that hall but felt a little taller, straighter, stronger, more self-confident; and not one man left without a stir of a new sort of respect for women somewhere beneath his ribs. Crystal Eastman created the thing she preached.

As a pacifist Crystal Eastman was also a militant. She was the vigorous leader of the Woman's Peace Party in New York State during the early years of the Great War, piloting that organization through stormy days when it was denounced as pro-German and when some of its members dropped off to support the war or to roll bandages. She turned the energies of this women's society into dramatic, vigorous protest and caught the attention of a country already sliding into the fatal whirlpool. With equal vigor she shared the labors of the editor of The Nation and other pacifists who founded the American Union Against Militarism, a body which stood firm even when the war itself trampled their protest under iron feet.

But pacifism had failed to save the world. In 1917 Crystal Eastman joined her brother Max on the staff of the Liberator, successor to the Masses. For two years they fought against war and in behalf of social change. They hailed the Soviet Revolution in Russia as the embodiment of their dreams. They watched with high hope the tide of revolutionary sentiment rise in Central Europe, as famine and the devastation of war and the truckling of the peace makers made the workers more and more desperate and conscious of their plight.

The tide of revolution subsided; and in the years which followed Crystal Eastman, living for the most part in England with her two children and her husband, Walter Fuller, devoted herself to a more quiet life of writing and speaking on subjects concerning women. But quiet was not her natural medium. She longed to get to work—and work meant America. It was almost exactly a year ago that she came to New York, determined to find herself again in the world of active affairs. The months which followed bruised her body and spirit; but only her death ended her hopes. She had been in this country less than a month when word came that her husband had died. His loss was an irreparable blow. She was herself ill, but she fought off despair and physical suffering. With a courage that now appears almost incredible she organized and carried through to a brilliant finish The Nation's Tenth Anniversary celebration.

Into that campaign she put all her old-time fire and imagination. She concealed even from herself the deadly force of the disease that had assailed her. Only when she had finished her work and gone home to rest did her illness finally overwhelm her. She faced this last fight with the same defiant courage that had carried many a battle in her earlier days. But the flesh was less strong than the spirit, and the deadly effect of nephritis could not be stood off by any courage.

Mingled with our sorrow and deep sense of loss, we shall always feel pride and gratitude that it was to The Nation that Crystal Eastman turned when she came back to America. Her spirit and her steady faith in peace and freedom and justice lent strength to our own purpose, and they will remain with us.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THE laborer is worthy of his hire and yet nobody likes him. Gene Tunney, deprived of love, purposes to seek consolation in philosophy. It is perhaps unfair to speak of this champion as one rejected by all men. As a matter of fact, he is a critics' pet. All professional commentators applaud his high talent, if not his genius, and W. O. McGeehan, most cynical of sporting writers, never mentions the Fighting Marine without paying him the tribute of tearful admiration. In other words, Tunney is an enormous hit with that wise public which comes to boxing matches on passes. As yet he has not touched the heart of America.

The reasons for this are not difficult to find. The heavyweight king possesses in a high degree that commodity which never yet drew sighs of delight from any save collectors. He has technique. It was an actress in a play by Jimmy Forbes who said, "Technique is what you work all your life to get and when you have it nobody likes it."

But Gene Tunney is entirely justified in his amazement at the lack of warmth which greets his greatest efforts. Can it be that such friends as Billy Phelps and Thornton Wilder have played him false? These teachers have impressed him with the worth of form. Indeed, the fighter would not set down "The Winter's Tale" until he had perused it ten times. Always he found new contours in the play, and he was not content to stop until he had plowed down beneath the surface. At night in bed the restless champion might well inquire of himself, And why was it that "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" sold better than my fight with Thomas Heeney?

This is a fair question because both achievements have been hailed by many as masterpieces. The "Bridge" and the fight both depended upon a certain unity of conception. Mr. Wilder undoubtedly knew before he set pen to paper the precise point at which his tale would end and the manner of its conclusion. But the same thing may be said for Mr. Tunney. He predicted in advance the way in which the contest would end, and the first left jab he laid upon the nose of the Hard Rock from down under was a piece of exposition. And even so, no Fight-of-the-Month Club or Pugilistic Guild has cared to send Tunney out to all its members.

Possibly Billy Phelps or Thornton Wilder might reveal to him in strictest confidence that the vast importance and popularity of sheer style are just a trifle exaggerated. Backed into a neutral corner Phelps might say that Shakespeare could have been only three-eighths as much the poet and still have swept the imagination of the world with tumultuous tales of duels, rapine, and murder. And Thornton Wilder, who tucks the lads of Lawrenceville into their cots at night, could give away the sham of Stevenson. When the smaller pupils ask for a bedtime story it is a custom among house masters to read them something like "Treasure Island" and to pretend that the book is being put forward as a masterpiece of English prose. Prose be damned! The teacher knows full well that the tale goes over because it deals with pirates.

Though the manners and the morals of the time might well have shocked him Tunney would have done better by very much had he lived in the days of the Restoration. His touch is that of Congreve and he functions in a world which likes the broad effects of Cohan. Nor would Gene have been wholly out of line with popular sentiment in the days of Queen Victoria. He remains unhonored and unsung because he is a belated classicist in a world gone modern and experimental. That is not the Tunney way. A right-hand swing by Dempsey is very like a poem of Carl Sandburg's. The author plays for all or nothing. He is content to miss and fall upon his face if only now and then he can drive home a poetic or a fistic knockout. If I were Tunney's pugilistic mentor I would take away his Pater and his Herrick. Indeed, Billy Gibson might have been wiser to have discouraged the friendship with Thornton Wilder. If a fighting man must have writing chaps about him Zane Grey should have been drafted and a hurry call sent out for Robert Service.

In a sense the civilized world should have applauded the downfall of Thomas Heeney. He was not a constructive force in the aesthetic movement. All that could ever be said for the New Zealander was that he could take it. And for this reason the sporting writers called him Hard Rock and, later on, the Anvil and the Landing Field. Spiritually he belongs among the martyrs. Professor Phelps might expand upon this theme to Tunney. Or better yet, let Gene seek out old Doctor Freud and learn why it is that one touch of masochism makes the whole world kin.

Freud being in Vienna I will venture the assertion that the whole thing is very puzzling. According to popular psychologists men go to fights because there resides in each of us a primitive lust for cruelty. Gentleman Gene in his performances is not incapable of satisfying this public need. Although he is not the lion of the ring nor the black panther he has earned the right to be known as the Fighting Woodpecker. A single blow from his fist carries with it less than annihilation, but these punches are punishing enough and each one stings and cuts and wounds the adversary. The Tunney way of felling a foe bit by bit should please the sadists more than the swift, sweeping doom imposed by a Dempsey or a Firpo.

The catch lies in the fact that every unconscious is built around a deep ravine. The man in the ringside seat begins by identifying himself with the winning fighter. The blow which lands becomes through the spectator's imagination something he himself has accomplished against a relative or rival. But this cannot continue for ten rounds or more. Suddenly this same savage in a forty-dollar seat begins to recognize the beaten one as a blood brother. These jabs in fantasy pound upon the jaws of those who watch. When Heeney fell our hearts and hopes went with him. The salvation of success for Tunney depends not on further and even more flashing triumphs. In order to be loved he must go down and stay there. He had his chance. Dempsey sent him to the floor before the thousands in Chicago. Gene was a fool to come up. Wilder should have told him that. What is the "Bridge" but a story close to the heart of man because it details a history of frustration?

HEYWOOD BROWN

Can Al Smith Carry New Jersey?

By FREDERICK L. FERRIS

NEW JERSEY likes Al Smith. Separated from the sidewalks of New York only by the breadth of the many-tunneled Hudson, Jerseymen, too, have come under the spell of the hero of Oliver Street. They are familiar with the Governor's administrative record. They know his personal appeal. Predominantly urban, they relish his "brown derby" philosophy. From Port Jervis to Cape May, from Camden to Jersey City, thousands of Republicans and most of the Democrats are friendly toward Al.

For one thing, New Jersey is Wet, even, one might say, militantly Wet. Here is a State that has always been a thorn in the side of the Anti-Saloon League. In its leading cities, speak-easies are ten times as numerous as the old-fashioned licensed saloons. Al Smith, Jerseymen believe, is a man who if elected President will give them not more liquor but better liquor, a Messiah capable of leading them out of the Volstead wilderness with its contaminated oases into the promised land of real Bourbon and Pilsner.

For another thing, New Jersey's affairs have been linked, in recent years, more and more closely with those of the Empire State. The Port of New York Authority, that inter-State agency for the development of metropolitan commerce, is largely responsible for this increasingly intimate relationship. And Governor Smith's intelligent interest in bridge and tunnel construction, as well as in other of the Port Authority's major schemes, has impressed Jerseymen with his capacity, his far-sightedness, and his square dealing. Then, too, New Jersey has a big commuter vote that follows Wall Street. And Wall Street likes Al.

Such considerations might lead one to believe that New Jersey will break its rule next November and go Democratic. In Presidential years, the State is overwhelmingly Republican. Witness the pluralities of more than 350,000 which were given to Harding in 1920 and to Coolidge in 1924. Yet, Smith might seem capable of doing the impossible, of actually overwhelming the G. O. P.

But on second thought, and after careful investigation, it is evident that this is an over-optimistic forecast. And the reason is not Al's Catholicism. Nor is it his Fourteenth Street associations. The reason is Boss Hague. Mayor of Jersey City, overlord of Hudson County, and vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Frank Hague has the New Jersey Democracy in the palm of his hand. In party affairs, his word is law. He has developed an organization which, in some respects, makes Tammany look amateurish by comparison. Three years ago, Clinton W. Gilbert, author of "The Mirrors of Washington," made a survey of Hague's methods. Gilbert concluded: "The Tammany side [of Hague] is twice as efficient as Tammany ever was."

Now, Boss Hague, much to the consternation of ardent Smith supporters, is under fire. He is under the fire, moreover, of powerful agencies—two legislative investigating committees, leading citizens of Hudson County, and the independent press of the State. A good many competent observers are of the opinion that, before this campaign is over, Smith will consider the Jersey boss more of a liability than an asset. Independent Democrats contrast the Smith-Hague alliance, emphasized by the appointment of Hague as one of Al's Eastern campaign managers, with the aggressive fight Woodrow Wilson waged on the old New Jersey bosses. Many Wilson supporters are frankly declaring that Al Smith is a disappointment. They say that if Wilson had surrendered to the Jim Smith forces the way Al is bowing before the Hague group, he never would have won the independent vote. And Al, they point out, must get the independent vote to carry the State.

The fight against Hague and his political methods is no new thing. It has been going on, intermittently, for a number of years. But now it has developed an organized vigor which promises to result in a wholesale exposure of Hagueism and may even lead to criminal proceedings. Former Judge Robert Carey of Jersey City is largely responsible for the force of this 1928 onslaught. In the primary election last May, Carey was a candidate for the Republican gubernatorial nomination. He based his campaign upon the elimination of "commercialized politics." His chief target was Mayor Hague.

Carey fired the opening volley on March 15 in an address before the Union County Republican Committee. Among other things, he said:

Let me tell you people of the rest of the State what this system [the Hague machine] really is. It has been built up by the liberal distribution of patronage and the granting of special privileges in almost every walk of life. The Hague machine is made up of office-holders, many of whom should have no place whatever on the public pay roll. Literally hundreds, yes, thousands of unnecessary jobs have been created and filled. Every principal official is given a deputy, a deputy gets a secretary, and so it runs down the line, and nobody walks. This organization is operated by its bosses solely to perpetuate political control so that the bosses may get their hands not only into the public treasury but also into the private business of the community. . . . Bosses grow fabulously rich, buy fine summer homes, own large apartment houses, live like princes without any visible means of substantial support.

Carey then sketched a picture of a community literally terrorized by political machinations. Police captains, he said, are sent out to collect from business houses, industrial organizations, and professional men. Office-holders must pay annual tribute, 3 per cent of their incomes, upon demand. Gambling thrives; industry is throttled; labor conditions are intolerable; taxes, unbearable. "Men lose their liberty," said Carey. "This is what is happening in Hudson County today." This explosion had repercussions in every independent newspaper in the State. With the legislature in session, the air buzzed with political gossip. Carey stumped the State, presenting his case against boss rule in every big city and many small communities. Without organized support—the G. O. P. bosses were backing State Senator Morgan F. Larson—Carey continued his crusade. People called him "Fighting Bob."

Meantime, the Davis committee's investigation into the State Department of Banking and Insurance was begun. This had been in progress but a short time when the Hague machine received another powerful blow.

Hague had passed the word along to give John Milton, then prosecutor of Hudson County, another term. As with other bosses, Hague feels he must control the court machinery in order to maintain full dominance. But it developed in the course of testimony before the Davis committee, that bank charters had been obtained by the payment of liberal fees, ranging from $5,000 to $10,000, to henchmen of Boss Hague. The name of John Milton came out in this connection, as did that of John Fallon, Jr., son of a vice-chancellor. To make matters worse, Milton admitted, on the witness stand, profiting from his law practice at the rate of approximately $300,000 annually. This sum, it was generally felt, represented the cash value, to Milton, of Hague's influence. These things looked so bad that, after the State Senate had refused confirmation, Milton's name was withdrawn and the Attorney General took charge of the Hudson County office, finally designating a deputy.

It was to be expected that Carey, playing a lone hand, would fail to land the Republican nomination for Governor. But he received, nevertheless, more than 140,000 votes. Had the progressive vote not been split among three candidates, Hague's foe doubtless would have defeated Larson, the G. O. P. organization favorite. But even the holding of the primary election did not silence Carey. He at once claimed that thousands of Hudson County Democrats had voted in the Republican ballot boxes, throwing their influence to Larson who, if not friendly to Hague, at least had neglected to fight him tooth and nail. Hague's county chairman, Leo Sullivan, had voted in the Republican primary box; so had other henchmen of the boss.

The State Legislature responded by creating another investigating committee with powers broad enough to permit a thorough investigation of alleged election frauds and other forms of political depravity in Hudson County. This body was headed by State Senator Clarence E. Case, who figured prominently among defense counsel in the Hall-Mills murder trial. Its sessions were recently adjourned until September. When it resumes work, the Presidential campaigns will be in full swing.

At the same time, Attorney General Katzenbach instituted a grand-jury probe of the Carey charges regarding primary frauds. But the Case committee unearthed the fact that two members of the panel themselves were Democrats who had voted as Republicans. Consequently, the grand-jury investigation was called off. It was then suggested that an outside jury be brought into Hudson County, but it is unlikely that this will be done until the legislative investigations have been completed.

In addition to uncovering numerous violations of the spirit, if not the letter, of the New Jersey election laws, the Case committee has written a sordid story of political sinecures into the annals of the State. The case of Sheriff John J. Coppinger, of Hague's county of Hudson, is illustrative. He is one of the Hague gang, having occupied the sheriff's office for almost two years. Questioned as to his duties and those of his subordinates, Coppinger showed amazing ignorance of the requirements of his $11,000-a-year job. He knew that James Hague, index clerk at a $3,500 salary and brother of the boss, "indexes different bills, whatever they give him." Beyond that, the Sheriff knew nothing at all.

Alfred H. Mansfield, who receives $4,000 yearly as a County Health and Sanitary Inspector, admitted to the Case committee that he has never made an arrest during his 25-year occupancy of the office. It turned out that Mansfield is a Democratic district committeeman and president of the Seminole Club, where the "boys" gather, after passing an outer guard who peers at them through a peep-hole, to play cards and eat sandwiches which, Mansfield said, are kept in the club ice-box.

The awarding by the Hoboken City Commission of a $470,000 municipal garbage-removal contract, $100,000 in excess of previous awards, also occupied the attention of the investigators. James J. McFeely and Mary McFeely are the supposed proprietors of the firm whose bid was accepted. They are brother and sister of "Barney" McFeely, Democratic sub-boss and Director of Public Safety in Hoboken. The McFeelys, Mary and James, were exceedingly vague about the company's operations, so vague, in fact, that charges of perjury are to be lodged against them by the Case committee. It did develop, however, that they are taxed on the basis of a $300 valuation, though they own nine Mack trucks, two Cadillac trucks, and one Ford truck. It has been charged by an unsuccessful bidder that the award of the huge contract to the McFeely outfit was prearranged.

Jersey City's purchase of Split Rock Pond, Morris County, in 1922 was another matter that interested the Case committee. These 2,500 acres were bought by a corporation, according to witnesses, for $124,000 and sold to the city, a few months later, for $323,000. "Who got the profit?" Hague was asked. But the Mayor, though in office at the time, said he knew nothing of the transaction.

The Davis commission, conducting the bank investigation, is about to turn its attention to surety bonding. During his primary campaign, Judge Carey also attacked alleged scandalous activities of a bi-partisan nature in this fruitful field. "Teddy" Brandle's Branleygran Company in Hudson County and the Liberty Surety Bond Insurance Company, of Trenton, are the leading organizations which, it is said, are profiting in the bonding business.

Behind all these various enterprises, the legislative investigators, Judge Carey, and the New Jersey newspapers think they see the hand of Frank Hague. In consequence, Democrats who believe in the old ideals of the party see in Governor Smith's selection of Hague as one of his Eastern campaign managers not a trace of idealism but simply a sharp political move. From the standpoint of vote-getting, there is no denying Hague's ability. He is a professional Catholic and has enormous power with the church authorities in New Jersey. He knows how to line up the church vote, especially in the industrial centers with a large foreign population. Already he is organizing the foreign colonies in behalf of the Smith cause.

Hague is playing for big stakes. In 1907 he was an assistant sergeant-at-arms in the State House at Trenton. Since then he has been court constable, janitor in the City Hall in Jersey City, and, finally, Mayor of that municipality. He is not particularly keen about going before the voters of his own city for reelection next year. But if Al Smith is elected, he need not worry. His cohorts already see Hague as Postmaster General or Secretary of Labor in the Smith Cabinet.

Fortune has smiled upon Hague quite miraculously. Never having held a big-salaried job he is, nevertheless, part owner of a million-dollar apartment house in Jersey City and of a half-million-dollar estate on the shore at Deal. He has several Rolls-Royce cars and makes frequent pilgrimages to Europe and Palm Beach. National eminence, on the Smith bandwagon, would be a splendid way of topping off so successful a career. And that, say the "boys," is Frank Hague's game.

These are a few of the chief reasons why independent Democrats and "Smith Republicans" in New Jersey are so keenly disappointed in Governor Smith. It would have been bad enough to retain Hague as vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee. But for Al to place a fond arm around his shoulders and murmur, "Hello, Francesco," and, quite needlessly, to make him an Eastern campaign manager—such things are bitter pills for thinking men and women.

Can Al Smith carry New Jersey? Well, in order to do so, it will be necessary for him to overcome a normal Republican plurality of more than 300,000. Perhaps Boss Hague will be able to secure a sufficiently large foreign vote; perhaps he will find it possible to swing an unheard-of number of Smith ballots in Hudson County, where it is said they don't count the votes but weigh them. Even then, it is hard to see how Smith can win without making great inroads upon the Republican strength and without keeping in line the independent Democrats, many of whom are thoroughly disgusted with the Hague regime.

To sum it up, Hague will get many Jersey votes for the "happy warrior." But he will be responsible for the loss of many others. And the ones he loses will be those of progressives who love Smith but hate his company.

Norman Thomas

By McALISTER COLEMAN

ALANKY six-feet-two of Ohio-born bone and muscle unlimbers itself above the speaker's platform at the corner of Avenue B and Houston Street, on New York's East Side. Flare-lights throw the long shadow of Norman Thomas across the heads of his audience, squat little tailors, for the most part, with here and there smudged mechanics, truck-drivers, and a sprinkling of women and children.

The speaker holds up a huge enlargement of a photograph of a working-class apartment erected by the Socialists of Vienna and then proceeds to wonder loudly and vehemently how it comes that in a comparatively poverty-stricken city like Vienna folks pay around two dollars a room a month for such splendid quarters, whereas in "prosperous" New York a worker is hard put to it to find decent housing at fifteen dollars. His audience begins to wonder with him. And then Thomas goes on to talk of things as they are and things as they might be; simple things like gas bills and rents and pay envelopes and the youngsters' schooling and the prices the women pay in the stores round about Avenue B.

One night last year toward the end of a hot campaign in the Eighth Aldermanic District a truck loaded with a Tammany band and a collection of children armed with rattlers and other noise-making horrors drove through the crowd in front of the platform where Thomas was speaking. The chieftain in charge of the invasion raised a pudgy hand as a signal to his youthful braves to cut loose and drown out Thomas. To his consternation, the kids, after one look at the speaker, piped with shrill gusto, "Yeaa! Norman Thomas!" That's a familiar enough war-cry on the East Side whenever he goes campaigning. The children, as yet unterrified by Tammany's elaborate and subtle machinery of fear, suspicion, and greed, have no hesitancy in voicing their love for Norman Thomas. Battalions trudge trustingly after him as he goes from one meeting-place to another, hang on the running-board of his campaign car, and besiege his headquarters the minute school is out. And at least three or four times when Thomas was running for alderman, mothers appeared with amazingly vocal infants whose last names ended in "ski" or "baum" but whose first two names were Norman Thomas.

Sometimes a former classmate of Thomas's at Princeton or a "respectable" hangover from the old Brick Church days, passing by a street meeting at which Thomas is wondering aloud, stops to do some wondering of his own. How does it happen that a man of such obvious ability, magnetism, and fiery force can stoop to conquer the imaginations and hearts of the city's most submerged—the workers on the East Side, in the Bronx, and in Brownsville?

If Thomas is interested in the labor movement, all well and good. Ever so many intellectuals are "taking up the movement," writing pieces about it for magazines and newspapers, evincing an intelligently alert awareness of its existence. But here is Thomas running his good head off at the beck and call of every little union organizer, every Socialist who is getting up a meeting in some remote hall, every rank-and-filer who has a crowd to reach and a cause to preach. In last autumn's campaign Thomas made more than sixty speeches in two months, most of them out-of-doors, and he wrote enough words to fill a double-decker novel—all because he had been nominated for alderman by a small local of the Socialist Party in a strong Tammany district. When the votes were counted, an ignorant Tammany optometrist, whose boast was "I never go outdoors during a campaign," was sent back to the aldermanic chamber with a big majority. And now Thomas is running for President of the United States, as the leader of a party whose death has been officially announced time and again these past few years by conservatives and liberals and extreme radicals alike.

No one need feel sorry for Norman Thomas. There is little glory in what he is doing. Long nights in stuffy sleepers, long days filled with speech-making in labor halls, at farmers' picnics, at Socialist rallies; party conferences; newspaper interviews; pamphlet-writing; handshaking (at which, by the way, in spite of long practice Thomas is still singularly inept)—this is not most people's idea of a good time. But Thomas is having a magnificent time. He is doing what he wants to do and doing it well.

It is in the Thomas blood from the days when the Welsh preacher-men Thomases expounded their vigorous doctrines in the old country—this business of articulating ideas and ideals. The first of the Thomases to arrive in this country came from Wales in 1824. He was Thomas Thomas, a parson with a hill hunger on him which took him to the mountains of Pennsylvania, where he preached the forbidding doctrines of Calvin with a certain mellow touch that made him the most beloved man of all the country round. He had found time to work his way through Lafayette College. His son, Welling Evan Thomas, followed in his footsteps and found himself, of all places, in charge of the Presbyterian Church in the late Mr. Harding's home town of Marion, Ohio, where Norman was born on November 20, 1884.

The two-story brick parsonage was on Prospect Street, a home sheltered by huge old maples, with a grape arbor in the rear, and woods and pasture-land right outside the door. Even when they moved further into town, and added a cow and a bathtub to the establishment, life at the Thomases' was still largely rural. Norman, the eldest of six children, soon learned what hard work meant. A ministerial income of $1,200 a year for the clothing and feeding of four boys and two girls, especially such upshooting children as the Thomases, was in sad need of supplement. Everybody worked in that family, and mingled a keen respect for the father with a deep love for the mother, who before her marriage was Emma Matoon, a descendant of the French Huguenots who came to this country in 1650. Her father was a missionary to Siam and later became American consul. On his return to this country, immediately after the Civil War, he started one of the first schools for Negroes, near Charlotte, North Carolina. Starting schools for Negroes in the South in the turbulent days of reconstruction was no light undertaking.

Norman was obviously predestined for the ministry. He took the Marion High School in his long stride, being one of the youngest ever to be graduated from that institution. And then, when the family moved to Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, he entered Bucknell. He was a long, gangling freshman, sticking out of his clothes, and out of his class as well, for he had read greedily all sorts and varieties of books back in the Marion parsonage and easily led his fellows in classroom work. Bucknell in those days was about as rigidly orthodox a place as one could find, but already the youngster was beginning to doubt and question the validity of creeds and dogmas. An unexpectedly beneficent relative gave him the chance to enter Princeton.

He left the small Pennsylvania college in a mood approaching exaltation. Princeton, to him, had been a place to dream about. "I was so afraid I would flunk out," he says, "that I worked like a trooper, tutoring at nights, working in a chair factory in summer, and selling aluminum-ware." So he stuck in the first group of his class for the next three years, and he was valedictorian of that class of 1905, and one of the most popular men in college. He was on the debating team, took all the courses in economics and politics which Princeton offered, and was moved, as were so many of the young men of those days, by the Princetonian Walter Wyckoff's pioneer labor book, "The Workers," and by the great strike of the anthracite miners led by John Mitchell. He was caught in the Thomas tradition, and he made the best compromise with it that he could by taking a job in the Spring Street Settlement, in New York's slums.

A trip around the world with the director of the settlement laid the foundations for his international outlook, but it was the World War which finally took him clear out of church circles into the heart of the labor and Socialist movement. He was in a church in East Harlem, working among the foreign-born of a tenement district, when the war brought its challenge to him as it did to every Christian minister. He answered that challenge by flatly refusing to have anything to do with the bloody mess. Instantly "patriotic" pressures were brought to bear on him from all sides. Contributions to his social work stopped. There were attempts, mainly futile, at social ostracism. Then Morris Hillquit started his crusading campaign for mayor of New York City, and Thomas, to the utter consternation of all his respectable flag-waving associates, stood up with Hillquit in that historic struggle. At the close of the campaign Thomas found himself a full-fledged card-carrying, dues-paying member of the Socialist Party, with no church and only the slender editorial salary from his paper, the World Tomorrow, for the support of a large and husky family. His brother Evan was lugged off to jail as a conscientious objector. Snoopers and spies, official and self-appointed, dogged Norman night and day. Postmaster General Burleson paid him the compliment of saying that Thomas was a more dangerous man than Debs. He was dangerous—for those who were attempting to make a clean sweep of civil liberties; who used the war to exploit labor; dangerous for the peace of mind of every militarist minister.

With Roger Baldwin and Hollingsworth Wood he helped form the American Civil Liberties Bureau. What a hated institution that was! After the headquarters of the bureau had been raided, and the magnificently defiant Baldwin had been sent to jail, much of the pioneering work fell on Thomas's shoulders. And when he was not busy with editorial and civil-liberties affairs, he was going among the colleges, speaking for the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, the predecessor of the League for Industrial Democracy.

To these two organizations, the one with its program of freedom of speech, press, and assemblage, and the other with its goal of production for use rather than profit, and to the political expression of these ideals through the medium of the Socialist Party, Thomas has devoted his surprisingly varied and rich talents.

I have said that Thomas's empirical philosophy has unity and consistency, and this despite the fact that his usual activities in the course of a day cover what seem to be a bewildering range of subjects. When the Chinese Nationalists cable for funds, Thomas is on the Committee for Justice to China. When the Pullman porters organize a pioneer Negro industrial union, Thomas is called on for counsel. When the textile strikers in Passaic are prohibited from meeting, Thomas is the man who goes over to New Jersey and speaks under the menace of high-powered rifles in the hands of the operators' gunmen, and goes to jail with his head up, so that from then on the strikers may meet unmolested. When some adequate reply to the propaganda of the power lobby becomes a public necessity, Thomas is the driving spirit of the Committee on Coal and Giant Power which makes that ringing answer.

Always in the back of Thomas's mind is the fundamental necessity for the organization in this country of a political party representing the hopes and aspirations of those who produce the country's wealth by work of hand or brain. He was one of those who were instrumental in swinging his party's forces into the La Follette campaign, despite the opposition of many party Socialists. I have heard Thomas speak under all sorts of circumstances, and to all sorts of people, but I cannot remember his ever having used the credal Marxian dialectic "proletariat," "bourgeoisie," "the economic interpretation of history"—these are not in his vocabulary when he goes out to talk to workers and farmers, college students, and professional men and women.

Still he remains an internationalist, passionately following the poignant dream of bread, peace, and freedom for all people. Whether his speech or pamphlet or statement to the press begins with a discussion of the intricacies of municipal government, to which he brings expert knowledge, or a headlong attack upon the corruption of both old parties, or the deep damnation of imperialism, he generally concludes with a compelling plea for a peaceful world.

When Thomas told the convention which nominated him in New York that he did not expect to be elected President this year, many veteran hands were raised in horror. That was not the sort of thing that a candidate says to his constituents. A sense of proportion, a richly mellowed understanding of reality, is not found in the arsenals of most campaigners. It is to the credit of the old-timers in the movement that, knowing very well Norman Thomas's frequent departures from the faith of the fathers, they chose him for their leader, and are giving liberally to make his campaign a success. And a success it will be, if there is found in this country by next November a collective intelligence powerful enough to present to the united front of the two old parties an opposition worthy of the name.

The Truth About Tsinanfu

By H. J. TIMPERLEY

Peking, June 16

JAPAN'S statement to the League of Nations concerning the Tsinanfu affair, we are told in Geneva dispatches published here, has created a favorable impression. This may well be so, for the Chinese side of the argument was badly bungled. It is improbable, however, that this impression would be long sustained if the League took a notion to investigate thoroughly the whole circumstances surrounding the case.

One aspect which such an inquiry could hardly fail to reveal would be the provocative attitude of the Japanese military all through the affair. Neutral eye-witnesses, in which category I take the liberty of including myself, agree that the Nationalist occupation of Tsinanfu was as peaceful as could be wished for. The leading Nationalist columns which entered the city on the morning of May 1 halted quietly a block away from the Japanese barriers and displayed very little excitement about it. Senseless truculence, on the other hand, was shown from the beginning by the Japanese soldiery. Not content merely to remain quietly watchful behind their sandbags, as American or British troops would have done, they often were to be seen standing on top of the barricades with their bayonets thrust almost under the noses of the Nationalist troops that went marching by. "Here we are, come along and hit us," they almost said. Except for a perceptible lift of the eyebrow, the Southerners made no response to these demonstrations.

It became increasingly evident during the first two days of the Nationalist occupation, however, that a highly explosive situation gradually was working up. Foreign as well as Chinese civilians were handled on occasion with unnecessary roughness by the Japanese sentries on post. One such episode in which I was personally involved occurred within an hour or so of the Southerners' entry. I had gone across to the Tientsin-Pukow station just in time to see the last of the White Russian armored cars guarding the Northern retreat pull out slowly as the Nationalist troops appeared along the railway embankment. Chatting with a group of the newcomers, I found them peaceably disposed and friendly. Stein's Hotel, where I was staying, had a Japanese barricade around it. The sentries stationed there had let me go across to the station and return through the barricade without question, but when I returned from a second sortie, to the telegraph office, a Japanese soldier clubbed me viciously in the small of the back with the butt-end of his rifle. It was a most uncalled-for exhibition of ill-tempered violence, and within a very short space of time I was telling the Japanese Consul so. Subsequent negotiations, during which it was explained that my name inadvertently had been omitted from the list of foreigners to whom permits to pass through the barriers had been supplied, ended in a verbal apology being offered by a Japanese staff officer to the British Consul, as well as to myself. In fairness it ought to be mentioned that the Japanese Consul was visibly distressed by the incident and spared no effort to see that proper amends were made.

I was around the city a good deal on the morning of May 2 and took special interest in the activities of the Nationalist propagandists. Little squads of them were going quietly about the business of plastering the town with posters setting forth the aims of the Nationalist campaign and denouncing the Northern "militarists." One poster showed Chang Tso-lin whispering sweet nothings into the ear of a coyly smiling Japanese geisha, while another depicted him and Japan tugging at opposite ends of a chain and strangling China between them. How the walls of Peking would totter when the Nationalists got there was demonstrated by another sheet. Pictures of Sun Yat-sen and Chiang Kai-shek were displayed side by side and propaganda leaflets were broadcast in the streets. Interested groups of Chinese coolies gazed at the posters or listened open-mouthed to the street lecturers. Some of the latter were arrested by the Japanese during the morning. Nobody seemed to know why. I saw them being marched along the street in custody. They went along quite good-humoredly with their unsmiling guards and even saluted a Japanese officer who cantered up on a horse. Some were released afterward, but the majority were detained and no information could be obtained about them. This aroused a good deal of resentment among the Nationalists, though, so Chiang Kai-shek's staff officers told me, news of it was suppressed in order not to excite the troops. Chiang's staff also told me that on this day a Nationalist officer, described by them as being the Chief of Transportation, was shot by Japanese troops in front of the Tsinan Pao newspaper office. They were not able to tell me anything of the circumstances and I could get no confirmation of it from any other source.

By the night of May 2 the Japanese apparently felt the situation tranquil enough to justify the withdrawal of the barricades, and these were removed toward midnight. My understanding as a result of inquiries made at the time was that this step was taken purely on the initiative of the Japanese themselves. The next day opened as calmly as the May morning of tradition. Everybody was congratulating everybody else that things had gone off so smoothly. Then came the clash. What started it and who fired the first shot are questions that may never be decided with any certainty, but there seems no doubt that it was the veriest spark that set off the tremendous explosion which followed.

I did not myself witness the initial outbreak, though I was in the neighborhood at the time, but I gathered every possible version directly afterward and each story agreed that the hostilities began with a single isolated incident and then spread with amazing rapidity. That rapidity ceases to be amazing if one takes into account the circumstance that within a few minutes of the initial clash the Japanese began to clear the streets in the protected areas with bursts of machine-gun fire preparatory to replacing the barricades, and also sent around armored cars which dropped small patrols here and there beyond the area limits. They then started systematically to mop up the territory thus inclosed and a general free-for-all developed. Groups of Nationalists took refuge in houses here and there and replied with rifle fire, throwing a grenade or two when the chance offered. Large numbers of them who had entered the foreign settlement on one innocent errand or another found themselves entrapped behind the Japanese barricades and endeavored to fight their way out.

Nobody on the Chinese side could tell what was happening, except that a clash had occurred somehow and that the Japanese were in action. Wild rumors flew from mouth to mouth and newly arrived Nationalist detachments joined in the fray without having any clear notion what it was all about. The battle royal raged till evening, when Chiang Kai-shek, who quite early had ordered a complete withdrawal from the Japanese protected areas, succeeded in getting the bulk of his troops on the move. This still left pockets of snipers within and on the fringes of the protected areas and the Japanese were engaged in street warfare with these remnants for the next couple of days. No organized attack on the part of the Nationalists was discernible at any time. Blood was up on both sides, but to suggest that it was a case of a handful of Japanese defending themselves against a Chinese army is to distort what actually did occur. It was a one-sided affair in which a well-knit, well-equipped, and fearless fighting unit demonstrated its relentless efficiency to an out-of-hand rabble.

The Nationalist army as such never was involved. The whole effort of Chiang Kai-shek's staff was concentrated upon preventing the conflict from spreading. Very little assistance to this end seems to have been forthcoming from the Japanese. There is no evidence whatever that they made the slightest attempt to isolate the incident which led to the first clash. On the contrary, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that when they withdrew their barricades on the night of May 2 they did so with the idea at the back of their minds that if anything untoward happened afterward they would be in a fine position to wade in and justify their presence in Shantung. Accepting as accurate the Japanese story that the trouble began with the looting of a Japanese house, it is certain that if the Japanese had reported the matter to Chiang Kai-shek and had requested him to quell the disturbance the Nationalist Generalissimo would have taken immediate action. Instead they sent a platoon of men charging down a crowded street with fixed bayonets and within a few minutes afterward put the whole city in a panic by raking the main thoroughfares with machine-gun fire. It seems scarcely reasonable to expect that the Nationalist soldiers, perceiving that Chinese civilians as well as their own comrades were being shot down for no apparent reason, should not have felt an overwhelming desire to retaliate.

This they did and there is no doubt that fairly soon after the trouble started a considerable section of the Nationalist forces got completely out of hand. It also is well established that some time between May 3 and May 5 certain Japanese civilians, including women, were terribly mutilated. By whom and under what circumstances is not yet clear. The American, British, and German consuls were taken along in a Japanese armored car to view these bodies on the night of May 5. There also is a good deal of evidence to convict the Japanese troops of extreme ruthlessness during the days that followed the initial clash. Witness this statement, made to me on May 20 by a spokesman of the Japanese Consulate General at Tsingtao in response to my request for specific information regarding the alleged Japanese massacre of patients at the Shantung Hospital:

On May 10, during the Japanese attack on the inner city wall, Japanese troops approaching from the west had first of all to pass through the outer wall. As they came through the outer gate leading into the west suburb and were advancing along the main street they were heavily engaged from the upper story of a large building known as the Shantung Hospital. After five or six of their number had been killed the Japanese tried to force their way in at the front door. This resisted their efforts and they then entered by a side door. The building was split up into a series of courtyards and when they got inside they were fired at from all directions. They returned the fire into each window and, when the firing from inside had been silenced, they went in and as they were still being shot at killed everyone they saw.

The spokesman estimated that there were about sixty-eight patients at the hospital, mostly soldiers. There were also a number of civilian refugees. Only the Chinese doctor in charge of the hospital is believed to have escaped.

I had left for Tsingtao before the Japanese bombardment of the native city at Tsinanfu on May 8, but foreigners who witnessed it appeared to be unanimous in agreeing that no sign of any organized provocation on the part of the Nationalist forces remaining within the walled area could be detected. Any doubts that this was intended to be a punitive expedition are disposed of by General Fukuda's belligerent announcement beforehand that in order to maintain the prestige of the Japanese Empire he intended to take drastic measures against the Southerners and to punish the troops who committed outrages against the Japanese.

Once the trouble started at Tsinanfu on May 3 the Japanese military authorities took the thing completely out of the hands of the consular authorities, giving the latter only such information as they thought it might be good for them to know and to pass on to their foreign colleagues. It presented to the military group in Tokio an opportunity to get back into the saddle, which they appear to have grabbed with both hands. To what extent this is the case may be gathered from the answer given me by the spokesman of the Japanese Legation here today when questioned as to the status of the negotiations, if any, for the settlement of the Tsinanfu incident. "It is a military matter," he declared, "and we have been forbidden to interfere."

Covering Washington

The Nation's Biweekly Washington Letter

By THE UNOFFICIAL SPOKESMAN

Washington, D. C.,
July 21

ONE of these days the Honorable Bill Vare is going to discover that there ain't no gratitude in this Hoover outfit. If the discovery comes just before election day, look out for an exhibition of plain and fancy double-crossing unsurpassed in the annals of practical politics. It may shove rock-ribbed Republican Pennsylvania into the Democratic column and throw the election to Smith. Philadelphia is ripe for it. There the omnipotent Vare machine is dripping wet and Catholic. A mere nod from the boss would be enough. In fact, just a slight air of indifference on the part of Mr. Vare probably would turn the trick.

* * * * *

ANYONE who supposes practical-minded Bill Vare threw his support to Herbert Hoover at the critical juncture of the Kansas City convention and thus annihilated the stop-Hoover movement, somewhat to the discomfiture of the Greatest Secretary of the Treasury Since Alexander Hamilton—anyone who supposes Bill did all this out of lofty altruism is capable of believing Grimms' fairy tales. Bill had a very definite purpose in mind, as he always has. He never goes floundering about pursuing will-o'-the-wisps. What he wanted and what he expects to get is the support of the Hoover forces in his fight to crash the gate of the Senate. Nothing else counts seriously with Bill just now. Nothing else is so near and dear to Bill's heart. Nothing in all the ups and downs of his turbulent political career has been so bitter a disappointment to Bill as his failure to get himself seated in the Senate. He is willing to make almost any kind of compromise or deal to reach the goal of his life's greatest ambition, namely, his now padlocked desk in the Senate chamber.

Having unhorsed Uncle Andy as President-maker at Kansas City, Bill hurried back to Washington as fast as wheels could carry him to be among the first of the party chiefs to confer with the newly chosen standard-bearer. A photograph of impeccable Herbert greeting the heavy-jowled Philadelphia boss to whom he owes so much would be worth publishing, but unfortunately it is not available. Every once in a while Bill drops in at Hoover headquarters. What for is not revealed. Possibly to give Mr. Hoover and Dr. Work the benefit of his extensive, practical political experience. It is known, however, that these visits of Bill cause shudders among all the nice, clean, efficient boys at the G. O. P. G. H. Q. After he goes out they feel it necessary thoroughly to disinfect themselves. The last time Bill called no one at headquarters recognized him and he was forced to twiddle his thumbs for fifteen minutes before Dr. Work could see him. Just let this sort of thing happen another time or two and the tally sheets from some of the Philadelphia zero districts will be a shock to all loyal Republicans. There is a limit to Mr. Vare's complacency, especially if he gets the idea that preelection slights are a forerunner of post-election ingratitude.

* * * * *

HOW the ward heelers and the precinct henchmen must be licking their chops over the bullish news from both campaign headquarters concerning finances this year! Nothing but the blue sky is to be the limit on contributions. Word went out from Republican headquarters soon after the Kansas City convention intimating a desire to hold the fund down to about $3,000,000. Wily Mr. Raskob, head of the world's largest corporation, was not to be caught in any such trap, not when the Democrats for the first time in their lives are assured of almost unlimited money. He and Colonel Lehman, the Democratic finance director, let it be known they would accept all the money they could get. This was something entirely new and it caused no little apprehension among the Republicans, long accustomed to having the fattest boodle bags. So they, too, announced there would be "no fixed limit" on contributions. Colonel Nutt, the Republican collector-in-chief, explained that it was unfair to judge a contribution by its size. The character of the donor and his ability to pay will be the measure, hereafter, according to Colonel Nutt. There are glorious days ahead on both sides for the "watchers at the polls" and the patriotic boys who "get out the vote." It is quite possible that we shall see Mark Hanna's famous war chest of the free-silver campaign of ninety-six outdone at last.

* * * * *

FOR sheer ineptitude in political management we used to be committed to William M. Butler. But Dr. Work already has given abundant evidence that he will outrank his predecessor in this respect. Nothing Mr. Hoover has ever done has so chilled the ardor of Republican chieftains as the selection of Dr. Work as the national campaign manager. Hoover has enjoyed an enormous reputation for being able to surround himself with able subordinates, but his choice of Dr. Work does not speak so well of his ability to judge brains. The most authentic explanation available is that Dr. Work ardently desired the chairmanship and in view of the fact that he was the original Hoover man in the Coolidge Cabinet Mr. Hoover felt that it would be an act of ingratitude for him to turn the doctor down. Work's extraordinary lack of tact, his dictatorial manner upon assuming the chairmanship, and his blundering loquacity held Republican statesmen aghast. Small wonder that one of them, emerging from the doctor's office after a conference, exclaimed ruefully: "At last we have found someone who can stop Hoover."

Ellen Terry

By J. RANKEN TOWSE

ELLEN TERRY, though not the greatest actress—she had her very definite limitations—was the most illustrious female figure upon the English-speaking stage for the greater part of the Victorian era. She achieved this preeminence partly by a personal fascination which may be called, without exaggeration, extraordinary, partly by her consummate artistry. This artistry she acquired in the course of a long and arduous training in good stock companies, and in all kinds of drama, an experience from which modern players, under the system prevailing in our commercial theater, are hopelessly barred. That is why we have so few really competent actors, perhaps none of her class. Herein lies the chief and deplorable significance of her death. She was probably the last survivor of a great histrionic school and has left no recognizable successor. The theater is not the poorer for her death, for she was lost to it years ago, but the long line of queens of high comedy is broken and there appears to be small prospect of its renewal.

It might almost be said of her that she was born upon the stage. The child of professional actors—respected but not particularly distinguished—she was put upon it as soon as she could toddle. She first faced the footlights as a little mite in various grotesque shapes of extravaganza. Thus she gained confidence and precocious rudimentary knowledge. Space will not permit report of her career in detail—nor is anything of the kind now necessary. But by the time she was eight years old she was sufficiently advanced to be engaged for childish parts by Charles Kean, one of the ablest and most scholarly stage managers of his day. With him she played the boy Mamillius in "The Winter's Tale"; Puck in "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Arthur in "King John," and Fleance in "Macbeth," attracting critical attention by her natural grace, vivacity, and intelligence. Then followed a brief period of acting in juvenile characters in farce and comedy, and of dancing in the ballets of fairy pantomime. In 1863, when barely sixteen, she was playing Desdemona, with Kean at the Princess' Theater, with rare tenderness, sweetness, and charm, if with no profound depths of emotion. Three years later she made a popular hit as Mrs. Mildmay in Tom Taylor's "Still Waters Run Deep," a character in which she could display some of her most attractive qualities. Then she first acted with Henry Irving.

It was at this time that the great painter, G. F. Watts—elderly, dignified, and famous—met her, was bewitched, and induced her to marry him. It was a strange match between this grand seigneur and the wisp of a girl already noted for her animal spirits, her wilfulness, and her volatility. What wonder that it was speedily dissolved, no matter how or why! Soon she was acting again. But before she was 21 she was married once more, now to Charles Kelly, an actor, and passed six years in retirement in the country, nurturing two children, hereafter to be known as Gordon and Ailsa Craig. It was Charles Reade, an old and ardent admirer, who lured her back to the stage and for a season or two she appeared successfully under his direction, in several of his own plays. In him, too, she found an able guide and instructor. Her education was almost finished when she joined the Bancrofts, to play Portia in "The Merchant of Venice" and to win a triumph which placed her on almost the top rung of the ladder. Next, under the management of John Hare, one of the most finished artists the theater has ever produced, she made her first appearance as Olivia in Wills's version of "The Vicar of Wakefield" and, at a bound, established herself as the most popular comedian of the day.

As yet, however, she was but in the early dawn of her true career, which began with her memorable alliance with Henry Irving at the Lyceum, which was to be maintained for nearly a quarter of a century and to confirm her permanently in the position she had won. She was then in her full prime, physically and artistically. Tall, lithe, lissome, graceful, she seemed to realize, in every gesture, the poetry of motion. Her carriage was perfect, her face mobile, expressive, alight with keen intelligence and radiant with indefinable charm, if of no special type of classical beauty. Her voice was rich, sweet, and mellow, her diction admirable. A kind nature had invested her with the most winning attributes and her training had made her mistress of all stage cunning. And now, with all her faculties matured, she was to profit by constant association with as clever, ambitious, and masterful a manager as ever lived. No marvel that the pair proceeded from victory to victory; never was a happier theatrical combination of brains and charm.

To rehearse the story of the brilliant dramatic campaigns waged by these allies, in Great Britain and the United States, is not the object of this article. The chief purpose is to summarize the actual dramatic achievement of Ellen Terry, and to determine, as nearly as may be, her final position in the ranks of the theatrical hierarchy. The probable truth is that her popular renown was due rather to her irresistible personal charm than to any actual histrionic genius. A great artist she undoubtedly was, but a great actress, measuring her by the demonstrated scope of her creative or interpretative powers, she was not. She was no Modjeska, Duse, Charlotte Cushman, or Clara Morris, not to mention others. The heights and depths of the profounder human emotions were beyond her reach, perhaps beyond her conception. Grace, innocence, humor, gaiety, pathos (of the gentler kind), tenderness, a provocative archness, mischievous raillery, fine manners, and every variety of feminine artifice constituted her artistic armament. Her power of tragic utterance was insignificant and her command of versatility was small. In all her impersonations her technical execution was beautifully finished, but in none of them was there any suppression, or indeed much disguise of her own individual personality. As her nature was joyous, sparkling, whimsical, and irresponsible, she found herself most at home in the brighter regions of comedy and overburdened in the gloomier atmosphere of tragedy.

Irving, indeed, led her through the whole dramatic gamut, and the glamor of her irresistible personal charm often blinded observers both to her deficiencies and his own. This was the case, for instance, in such tragedies as "Macbeth" and "Romeo and Juliet." Her Lady Macbeth, to be sure, suggested the power of a lovely temptress, but had none of the force of the dominant partner or of the tortured spirit of the remorseful murderess. In the Balcony Scene her Juliet was an entrancing vision of youthful ardor and virginal modesty, but in the potion and other tragic scenes there was no throb of tragic passion. Her Queen Katharine, in "Henry VIII," had queen-like dignity and was touchingly pathetic, but in the critical speech "Lord Cardinal, to you I speak," the authentic note of outraged majesty was lacking. Some old playgoers will yet remember the fire with which Cushman delivered the lines. Even as Beatrice, one of her most brilliant and fascinating embodiments, Terry's "Kill Claudio" failed of its true dramatic effect. And in her Madame Sans-Gêne, despite its charm, humorous as it was and hoydenish, the needed coarseness and dash of masculinity were altogether wanting. But her Portia, perhaps her masterpiece, was almost ideal, at least the equal of Modjeska's. Her Viola, in its sweetness, charm, and humor, was almost on a par with it, while her Olivia, in which her personality had fullest play, was nearly flawless. She furnished another delightful impersonation in "The Amber Heart" in a part written specially to fit her. Many other instances of similar purport might easily be cited did space allow. It was in comedy, in characters with which her own was sympathetic, that she was supreme. In tragedy she was appealing, but not highly effective. Always she was a glorious creature. The stage will not soon look upon her like again.

In the Driftway

"THERE was a time when cream was cream," says a writer in the New York World tantalizingly. "You put it in your coffee and it produced a mixture that was rich yellow-brown in color, with thick, rich streaks in it that eddied and curled and remained visible after a full minute of stirring, and with, here and there, floating on the top, a friendly, buttery lump."

YES, there was indeed a time when cream was cream. It was about the same era as that when men were men and has as irretrievably disappeared. Cream now, at least in our great cities, is, as the writer in the World regretfully concludes, only "another name for milk."

You put in into your coffee, and it produces a mixture that is not yellow-brown at all but a dull gray-brown. The streaks are thin, and they disappear as soon as you jiggle the spoon, if not sooner. As for lumps let us not be facetious with a serious subject. It has been so long since the average citizen saw a lump that if one did accidentally get into his cup he would fish it out under the impression that it was an impurity, probably a piece of soap.

A sad picture. But one from which we cannot truthfully dissent. So let us read further:

It is still possible, of course, to obtain cream. It is possible, that is, if you are privy to the fact that the cream language has undergone the same kind of changes that the egg language has undergone. Even a schoolboy knows nowadays that you do not get a fresh egg by asking for a "fresh egg." You do not get it even by asking for a "strictly fresh egg." You do not get it even by asking for a "guaranteed fresh egg." You do not get it even by asking for a "select egg." What you do is ask for a "strickly fresh guaranteed extra fancy jumbo select egg." Then you get a plain fresh egg.

In the case of cream, what you ask for is double cream. That means cream. But it is obvious that double cream is a luxury reserved for the man who eats his meals at home. He can request his wife to have the milkman leave it, and then drink his coffee with complete enjoyment. But the man who eats in restaurants is not so fortunately situated. He is, in fact, quite helpless.

* * * * *

YES, and so is the man who eats at home, despite the writer in the World. For the trouble with modern cream extracted with a separator and thus of uniform thinness—is not just its texture. The trouble is deeper, more poignantly sad, than that. The aching truth is that pasteurization—practiced on the supply of most of our cities—takes the flavor out of cream. It doesn't improve the taste of milk, but with cream—which at its best is the gods' surpassing gift to this poor, gray world—its havoc is harrowing. Pasteurization takes the joy out of cream just as most things that are healthful—like prohibition and spinach—take the fun out of living.

* * * * *

NO, with all apologies to the writer in the World, the Drifter contends that it is necessary to do more than speak to the milkman in order to get cream that is cream. It is necessary to go back to the farm of one's childhood where the milk was put in a spring-house in shallow pans and the cream was skimmed off—not too closely—by hand. Such cream was almost pumpkin-yellow in hue, gurgling and splashing from the pitcher in what a modern advertising man might call "lumps of lusciousness." Such cream was cream.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence We Apologize

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your editorial on the restoration of Williamsburg you mention the "House of Burgesses in which Patrick Henry in 1765 made his great speech demanding liberty or death." In Richmond such a remark would be likely to result in death or at least the loss of liberty, for there they point out the exact spot in "Old St. John's" Church where the orator stood when he uttered those memorable words in 1775.

Chicago, Illinois, July 17

E. W. SHAW

Governor Sweet and Mr. Broun

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Heywood Broun says in The Nation for July 11 that when replying to his article on Protestantism and prohibition in The Nation for June 20, I could not have read his article, or if I did I missed his point completely. It was obviously impossible in the short space at my command to reply to all the points made by Mr. Broun. He denies that he said the church was "meddling." I stand corrected. He said that the church was "terrorizing both parties."

In referring to the church's activity in regard to prohibition Mr. Broun said:

The question is broader than prohibition. We are told that the whole structure of American government is tottering because of lax enforcement. This may be so, but it is even more easy to undermine our institutions by the practice which the Protestant churches have brought into popularity. The members of these bodies constitute a minority, but through bipartisan activities and pressure politics it has been possible for them to terrorize both parties. Their concern has been largely confined to the liquor issue, but the same system may be used in regard to the tariff, the League of Nations, or any other public problem.

I submit that in this statement it is fair to say that Mr. Broun accuses the church of meddling and he regards its activities as undermining our institutions. To this accusation I answered:

Clarence True Wilson's call to the churches to mobilize for an effective Dry campaign would be just about as effective in bringing about a union of church and state in this country as the Senate chaplain's prayers are in evangelizing the members of the United States Senate. The church has always been a bitter and unrelenting foe of the liquor traffic. The saloon has been abolished by the effective work of the organized church. Not all Protestant church members are Dry, but the vast majority are. These are the backbone of the Dry forces, the shock troops of the whole campaign. It was perfectly natural, logical, and proper for Mr. Wilson to call upon the church to get ready for the impending conflict.

In this instance, at least, I did not miss Mr. Broun's point. Whether I made an effective answer is for the reader to decide.

But Mr. Broun's most serious objection as set forth in his article of July 11 is to my question, "How many Dry victories will give permanent possession?" He says what is perfectly true: "A public question can never be settled beyond the chance of reconsideration." But Mr. Broun has taken my question entirely out of its context. Mr. Broun had said that "a flaw in the Constitution may be attended to by the practice of nullification." My question had no reference whatever as to whether or not prohibition is still debatable. Again I ask Mr. Broun, Is there any limit to the number of times which a constitutional amendment must be affirmed before he will obey the law? This is a fair question to ask any patriotic American.

I have always granted the anti-prohibitionists the right of debate and do so now, and I do not agree with Mr. McBride of the Anti-Saloon League that prohibition cannot now be argued because it has become a part of the Constitution. I do insist, however, that pending the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment the law should be obeyed by every right-minded patriotic citizen, and in this sense "possession," as used by Mr. Broun, is now with prohibition.

Since the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment cannot be accomplished soon, Mr. Broun and his following fall back upon nullification. "Until such time as the Constitution can be overhauled," he says, "nullification is a necessary and time-honored expedient. . . . Nullification is among the inalienable rights of man." To Mr. Broun's unpatriotic and un-American assertion I would simply say that if nullification were ever universally practiced by a powerful minority who did not like any given law, it would bring an end to this government quicker than any other method that could be devised. The policy of nullification is a closed issue in America and cannot be reopened to bolster up the liquor business.

Again Mr. Broun cites the "scrapping in spirit" of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments in the South as a precedent for scrapping the Eighteenth Amendment nation-wide. Technically he may be right, but the consequences of the scrapping of these two amendments in the Southern States would be much less dangerous than would be the nullification of the Eighteenth Amendment in all of the States of the Union. To argue that this is not so is absurd.

A fair interpretation of Mr. Broun's position on prohibition from his articles which have appeared in The Nation and elsewhere seems to be this:

Prohibition is a mistake. It is immoral, wrong. All sumptuary laws effecting prohibition should be repealed; if they are not repealed they should be disobeyed.

If the law is enforced and obedience practiced by our citizens, prohibition might in time prove to be a good thing, and possibly its immoral aspects might not be so apparent. Therefore, if you are opposed to prohibition you should excuse lawbreaking, discourage obedience to law, and practice and preach nullification, for if the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act are enforced prohibition will never be repealed. Besides, in this way the country can be delivered from the hands of a "terrorizing church."

If this is not Mr. Broun's doctrine, I should be glad to have him set me right. If it is his theory, he should not be afraid to affirm it.

Denver, Colorado, July 14

WILLIAM E. SWEET

G. B. S. on America

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On June 5 I wrote G. B. Shaw, telling him that I proposed to organize The Shavian Society, An Asylum for the Sane. I asked him to be its honorary president, saying:

I have observed it to be the custom of the world to devote a good deal of its spare time, money, and energy to the welfare of the lame, the blind, the ill, the poor, and the insane. While these are meritorious occupations, it seems to me that too much time is being devoted to the making of crutches and too little to the making of torches to light and arrows to point the way for the able. By all means build a shelter for the insane, but why not do something for the sane? It is on them the race depends for improvement.

And here is the reply, sent by Shaw's secretary, Miss Blanche Patch:

In reply to your letter of the 5th June, Mr. Bernard Shaw desires me to say that an Asylum for the Sane would be empty in America.

New York, July 1

DANIEL ARCHER

He Is Through

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I see that the Republicans are not to make religion an issue in this campaign, according to a statement of one of the managers.

It hasn't been officially announced, but some say they will not mention oil either. By leaving out oil and religion there isn't much left for them to stand on in their drive for the Presidency. It has been proved that the oil deal was a patriotic move involving men who were likened to Jesus the Christ at the trial. So there's patriotism and religion, both being ignored by the Republican Party.

I'm a Republican whose ancestors came to this country in 1600, and fought to establish a free country in the Western World for those who believe in religious liberty and real patriotism.

But I cannot afford to stand by my party this year when it discards all reference to the principal ideals of life—that is, when they discard patriotism and do not even mention religious liberty, I'm through.

Los Angeles, California, July 15

E. C. BARNEY

The "Peace Bridge"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I visited Niagara Falls and they would not let me cross the bridge to see from the Canadian side.

Buffalo, N. Y., July 12

KARL SPITZER, Yugoslav

Some Grass

By THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL

I will not name this grass,
I did not know its name when I was younger,
Then there was more than summer for a boy
Who walked in it with fingers and with hunger.

It is not meadow grass,
But prairie city where the flagstone courses
Along a place where no one built his house
And I remember seeing tethered horses.

It is not grass alone:
Between the flagstone and the curb there grows
Thistle and lambsquarter and some wild thing
That was and is like mint against my nose.

I will not pull this grass,
I have too many dollars in my pocket,
Or not enough, there is no way of telling;
I dare not pull a green beard from its socket.

It is not grass alone,
Or I would cross the street less often than
I do to see it, yet it may have been Much more like grass before I was a man.

Francis Joseph

Francis Joseph, Emperor of Austria—King of Hungary. By Eugene Bagger. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

IT would be hard to find a more fascinating topic in recent European history than the life of Francis Joseph. Mr. Bagger, realizing the possibility of his subject, gives his readers a narrative which is as interesting as fiction and yet contains a large amount of useful information.

The Francis Joseph whom Mr. Bagger portrays is the emperor known to history lacking imagination, an enemy of innovation, conscious of his own type of duty, and punctilious to the most trivial details. Francis Joseph was not devoid of a high ethical standard, not even when he indulged in cruelty. He was convinced that it was his duty to shed blood in order to uphold authority. Although Austria was incomparably more constitutional than Russia, yet he was more autocratic than were the Czars. Mr. Bagger calls him the last of the Caesars. While most of his predecessors were tools of hidden Powers, he was their leader, a fact which establishes his undivided responsibility for the downfall of the monarchy. During his reign he had, as Mr. Bagger suggests, numerous opportunities to place the government on a basis satisfactory to all the races composing Austria-Hungary. Francis Joseph died ignorant of the true meaning of nationalism. He was a feudal lord and he demanded fealty, not affection.

Conscious that tradition meant much more in the monarchy than the forces of progress, Mr. Bagger begins his story with the epoch of Joseph II, the only crowned exponent of radicalism in the House of Hapsburg. The reign of Francis I was a reaction against the jacobinism of the bourgeois emperor. When Francis Joseph ascended the throne, not yet twenty, he was heir to the crown of an autocrat, a condition which exactly harmonized with his own proclivities.

The problems which the young emperor encountered were solved—if this word may be applied—in an autocratic manner. Francis Joseph treated every political innovation as an incipient rebellion. His was the policy of the iron hand which prevented the antiquated institutions of his realm from adjusting themselves to the new conditions.

Francis Joseph rose at four in the morning, Mr. Bagger says, and sat at his desk till eight in the evening. Sophisticated propagandists and naive subjects spoke of his self-sacrificing devotion to duty. "In the depths of psychic reality he spent those sixteen or eighteen hours in performing a rite at the altar of Divus Caesar—omniscient, omnipotent—Himself. Performing that rite, year in, year out, lest the world, his world, collapse. Governing wearily, yet ceaselessly, governing, governing, weary monarch governing a weary empire, looking toward his sleep in the night, a sleep made restful by consciousness of duty done."

The life of Francis Joseph is full of dramatic episodes which have been properly exploited by Mr. Bagger. Our only cause for complaint is that he places, perhaps, too much emphasis on incidents which are more dramatic than important for the historian. He tells at considerable length the story of the Mexican expedition of Emperor Maximilian, the brother of Francis Joseph, of the Meyerling tragedy, and of the eccentric vagaries of Empress Elizabeth. The redeeming quality of these diversions is that often they underline the essential traits of the character of Francis Joseph.

EMIL LENGYEL

Tom-toms and Rotarians

La Agonía Antillana: El Imperialismo Yanqui en el Mar Caribe.

Por Luis Araquistain. Espassa-Calpe, S. A., Madrid, 1928.

HERE, moving to a tragic tempo, the agony of the West Indies is depicted, analyzed, and pigeonholed by a man who may safely be considered Spain's foremost journalist. The erstwhile Spanish territories of Cuba, Santo Domingo, and Porto Rico are parading toward their undoing in a fanfare of millions, aqueducts, good roads, and schoolhouses; capital, and particularly the ownership of land, is passing to the control of American interests at a rate that must be gratifying to Wall Street, whatever that may be, and this spells death to the culture and essential well-being of the nationalities involved—that is Señor Araquistain's view of what is happening under the rays of the hot sun south of Florida and north of God knows where. In this book, he limits himself to the former island possessions of Spain in the Caribbean. The other West Indies are no longer in agony, but dead; and further south, the situation lacks the African element to which Araquistain, a liberal and egalitarian, points with embarrassed alarm.

Economic exploitation is not, according to Araquistain, the consummation of the tragedy. The ultimate result, as he sees it, is the Africanization of the last remaining bulwarks of white culture in the West Indies. Porto Rico, on account of the density of its population, stands the best chance of escaping this end.

Certainly the history of Jamaica, Barbados, and dozens of minor West Indies buttresses Araquistain's argument and lends it an ominous plausibility. It is a fact that in no island of the American Mediterranean colonized by non-Spaniards has the white race been able to maintain a numerical predominance or, except in economics, a cultural supremacy. The much-maligned Spaniards, it seems, knew how to colonize, even if their government did not know how to administer colonies. White predominance in the West Indies has been maintained only where

A Sensation for the Coming Book Season

A DEAD PRESIDENT MAKES ANSWER TO ~ ~ ~ THE PRESIDENT'S DAUGHTER

BY ANTON SHREWSBURY JENKS

REGULAR EDITION
$1.50

Special Edition
Numbered to 999
$3.00

THE GOLDEN HIND PRESS
500-5th Avenue
New York City
STUYVESANT 2738

If your bookseller cannot supply you send us the full price of the book and it will go out to you postpaid immediately.

the land is divided into small holdings; Africanization has regularly followed upon the concentration of the land into large sugar estates. The white immigrant holds his own only under conditions of economic independence, however meager its basis. When the vast hordes of wage labor are set loose upon the land, the Negro's capacity as a tropical machine asserts itself, and soon the tom-toms beat and the red bandanas flash in the sun.

The Spaniards, Araquistain reminds us, "copiously" distributed the lands reconquered from the Moors, and the king transplanted to America the same system. This talent for keeping agrarian property well divided was seconded even by such reactionary policies as the monopoly market and the expulsion of the Jews, which kept away foreigners and the most capitalistically minded of the king's own subjects. The United States, the latest arrival on the Caribbean, lacks this talent, at least where justice, the survival of a Jeffersonian yeomanry, and the integrity of a culture do not matter to them so much as profits and markets—and property becomes conveniently concentrated in a few hands. As Araquistain sees it, the engineer who follows the financier into the West Indies has a witch-doctor camping on his trail.

Araquistain defends the Spaniard as a biological imperialist. And in biology imperialism and democracy are curiously alike. Accepting the West Indies as a valid experiment, Araquistain notes where the so-called Nordic's greater reluctance to interbreeding leads to, and where the Spaniard's way with a maid of a less successful race. The other fellows Africanize their colonies; on the other hand, they claim that the Spaniards Africanized themselves. This is not quite true. They invented the mulatto, but in doing so they merely created a Spaniard of a different color. For Spain contributes to the world a sense that culture is nationality, and it makes an unscientific but politically sound association between the ideas of culture and race. Araquistain heard a coal-black Negro in Porto Rico give three cheers for the Latin race when Uzcudún beat Harry Wills.

The burden of Araquistain's counsel is a closer, though never uncritical, relationship between the Spanish lion and its American whelps. He advocates a freer immigration from the old country to offset the tendency to import Negro labor from neighboring islands and also to revive the traditional urge toward a wide distribution of the land. However doubtful the economic possibilities of this remedy, its cultural properties are evident. Havana, with its enormous Spanish proletariat and middle class, holds its own culturally not only against Jamaica, W. I., but also against Jamaica, L. I., and Toledo, O.

And here is a point that Araquistain has failed to consider properly. Americanization is far more imminent than Africanization; and, despite all our political shortcomings and all your aggressive virtues, Americanization is a pretty bad thing for us Latin Americans because we have something, in the way of intelligent, skeptical living and easy social democracy from which you would bribe us away. Of course there is always a possibility that we shall be Africanized first and Americanized afterward. That would be hell.

LUIS MUÑOZ MARÍN

A Jewish Banking Firm

The Rise of the House of Rothschilds. By Count Egon Caesar Corti. Translated from the German by Brian and Beatrix Lunn. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $5.

IN 1770 an obscure Jew by the name of Meyer Amschel Rothschild lived in the Frankfort Ghetto carrying on the business of a small trader and dealing on the side in rare coins and curiosities. His father before him had been a pious Jewish peddler who had intended his son for the rabbinate. But the son had a more practical bent of mind, and when he died in 1812 he left a modest fortune to his five sons. By 1830 these were at the head of the greatest international banking concern in Europe, directing branches respectively in Frankfort, Vienna, London, Paris, and Naples. The Rothschilds no longer had need to regard money as a means to secure economic goods. Their success was attested by the fact that they regarded money in terms of power.

The phenomenal rise of the house of Rothschild was an enigma to the Europeans of the early decades of the nineteenth century. There were, of course, other powerful banking firms, but there was none that attracted the same attention or inspired a comparable hatred and envy. Two periods must be taken into account in the attitude toward the Rothschilds. The contemporaries of the early house lived in innocent, pre-Marxian days when the sinister aspects of international banking and finance were generally little realized. If the Rothschilds had not been Jewish bankers they would have been able to carry on their operations without arousing the attacks they did. But while racial prejudice thus singled them out, the main fascination their story had for the minds of early nineteenth-century Europeans was implicit in the myth of Midas. They wanted to know the secret of the success of this family which made all they touched turn to gold. The explanations invented were characteristically no less mythological than Midas. A successful move in a game of chess which old Meyer Amschel was able to suggest to the wealthy Landgrave of Hesse during the simultaneous progress of his first audience is said to have so impressed the prince that he appointed the clever Jew crown agent at once. A Rothschild is supposed to have been present personally at the battle of Waterloo, and to have used the advance information of the victory for profitable speculation on the London stock exchange, thus netting the family its first millions. This myth-making as to the origin of great fortunes continues in our own period if the "success" magazines may be taken as an indication; the modern reader still wants to know the methods the Rothschilds used to get rich so quickly. But speaking generally he is far less mystified as to the ultimate forces which produce wealth. He is accustomed to think along the lines of economic determinism, and lives in the age of Mellons, Morgans, and Rockefellers. Indeed, the intelligent American reader will be far more interested in the story of the Rothschilds than the German, and he can be relied upon to make pretty shrewd guesses as to the main outlines of their story.

Quite a number of works in French, German, and English have been devoted to the Rothschilds, but they represent for the most part the first and unsophisticated period. Count Corti's book is the first which is entirely accurate, documented, and impartial. The present volume relates the history of the house from 1770 to 1830; a second volume is promised to cover the remainder of the nineteenth century. Count Corti's leading purpose is modernistic: he wishes to gauge the influence in the Rothschilds upon the general course of European history in the nineteenth century. In doing so he naturally tells the true story of that success which led them from the Frankfort Ghetto to the chancelleries of Europe.

The strict truth turns out to be often less fascinating than the fictions. The only general maxims which can be educed from the rise of the Rothschilds are such eminently pious ones as Pay Strict Attention to Business, Keep Trust, Take Advantage of Every Opportunity, and Know Not Everything but Everybody. Their Jewishness, far from being a hindrance, was an advantage. Belonging to a suppressed race, having no social position to lose, they were able to accomplish a great deal simply by their abject servility. Jewish family solidarity also helped a lot. For the rest, their fortune was due to their taking advantage of the wars and disasters of the Napoleonic period. We who know how millions were made in the late war need not be surprised. The strangeness which the story has for us is contributed largely by its period.

Count Corti is an historian's historian, and he confines his

ONLY 750 COPIES ARE LEFT of the wonderful "Centenary Number" of the English "Athenæum"

AND THEY ARE NOT FOR SALE!

LOVERS of literature, browsers in bookland, will delight in this Historical Survey of 100 years of British Affairs and affrays. The Centenary Number contains, inter alia:-

- Reprint of the first Leading Article in "THE ATHENÆUM" in 1828, dealing with the low reading tastes of "the younger generation."
- Anecdotes and reminiscences of outstanding events and famous men — SIR CHARLES DILKE; CARLYLE; BULWER LYTTON; KEATS; WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR, Etc.

Great books of the last 100 years.

An extraordinary action for libel in 1874, on the ground of adverse literary criticism—damages awarded, £1,275!

The very first announcement of the "Pickwick

Papers," April, 1836—destined to be the "best seller of its day." (See Illustration above.)

And many other quaint historical extracts.

THE JOURNAL OF TO-DAY

"THE NATION & ATHENÆUM" presents to you weekly the essence of the heart and spirit of England.

It is not only literary; it is also—intensely human.

Those whose writings are accepted for "THE NATION & ATHENÆUM" speak from first-hand knowledge of the main currents of thought, and are themselves men and women of distinction and leadership.

ONE COPY OF THE CENTENARY NUMBER WILL BE GIVEN FREE with an Annual Subscription to "The Nation and Athenæum," price $7.30, post free, if this form be cut out and used.

To:—"The Nation and Athenæum," 38, Great James Street, London, W.C.1, England.

Please send me "The Nation & Athenæum," post free, for one year, beginning with your next issue—and also a Free copy of the Centenary Number of "The Athenæum." I enclose remittance for $7.30.

American Checks can be used in payment of Annual Subscription

Name .....

Street .....

City..... State.....

book almost entirely to a marshaling of documents. From the point of view of historical research it is without doubt a monument and of incalculable importance. But as it is offered to the general reader one must regret that a greater effort was not made to give it color and emphasis. As the account of one international loan follows upon another, a wearisome sense of repetition is produced. There are some sidelights upon general European history which give the reader fascinating moments, but they are on the whole few. No doubt it was Count Corti's desire to be absolutely impartial which led him to adopt so objective and impersonal a manner. To avoid the dangers of anti-Semitism, he has preferred to remain entirely unopinionated. This is one of those cases where the facts have been allowed to speak too much for themselves. One is not even quite sure that Count Corti is free of the popular superstition that Jews have a special and innate talent for making money. The documentary method has also kept him from such a tell-tale course as attempting real personality portraits of any of the Rothschilds. Perhaps, however, engrossment in success is not conducive to the development of personality, and all financiers are alike. It surely required no great courage to assume that the Rothschilds profited by riding the waves of conservatism and reaction. They were honest—as financiers go; and if not worse were certainly no better than other international bankers before and since. Count Corti has erred as much from philo-Semitism as preceding commentators from anti-Semitism. In this he has followed a modern liberal convention.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

The Faith of a Liberal Historian

National Character. By Ernest Barker. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

THE two great pests of our age are an exaggerated nationalism and that soporific talk about character which dulls our sense of the urgent need for the application of intelligence to the problems of our day. A study of national character, and especially one which in effect limits itself to a study, not psychological and critical but historical, literary, and descriptive, of one people, the English, might well be expected to justify our worst fears. Since the days of Edmund Burke and of Savigny the laudation of this ghostly somewhat has been the worst enemy of the international spirit of éclaircissement. Dr. Barker, professor of political science in the University of Cambridge, says that nations "may now have moved to a stage at which they make themselves freshly of their own free choice of ideals (ideals consciously framed and consciously pursued) in the fields both of social organization and of national education. If it be so, it is a great and solemn thing." With Abelard and Diderot we cannot help feeling that the beginning of philosophy, and still more of the scientific spirit, is in doubt. References to the area of "the working of man's unconscious mind" or to the embryonic condition of social intelligence moves us not to awe but to more Voltairean emotions. The trouble with statements about the unconscious mind is that only the unconscious mind knows whether they are true, and it will not say. It will not yield to analysis its secret of whether there even is such a thing as a "national character."

A further perusal of "National Character" will show that such a judgment as that above, provoked by a title instinct with doctrines of group personality, race Pecksniffianism, and what is often miscalled by the good name of mysticism, would be quite premature. The book is no jingo broadside in praise of the English. "The idea of a nation or group of kinsfolk, united by an intimate consanguinity within their gates, but divided from the stranger without by an impassable barrier of difference. That is false nationalism." Through careful and scholarly chapters, written with the pen of an historian and a love of good English, on the genetic, the geographic, the economic factors, the political, the religious, the literary, the educational factors in the making of a people, that intuitionism which is the mother of conservatism and a puritan-born Liberalism strive for the soul of Dr. Barker. At the end, rather disconnectedly, abruptly, briefly, he declares his faith, the faith of Mazzini, and leaves the reader looking for the unwritten pages. The conservative in Dr. Barker has prevented him from being more explicit. The precious things of the spirit are not to be set forth like jewels in an auction show. Through pages here and there on English history, on its music, its education, even its agriculture ("a balanced national character requires a ballast of agriculture"), this elusive quality called English national character is hinted at, its rays of ruby and topaz glint and wink at us behind a curtain. Sometimes (so emphatically does Dr. Barker insist, with obvious personal puritan pleasure, on the individuality and idiosyncracies of the English) that national character seems lost in a nation of "characters." But, we are reassured, "there is a rock on which we stand and from which we are hewn; but we keep it shyly secret in mists of reserve, and it is only in some destined hour of national crisis, such as came to us in the midsummer of 1914, that we can see ourselves, and show to others, the stuff of which we are made."

This book embodies a course of lectures in citizenship. Whether "civics is best handled not as an abstract subject but as something involved and immersed in the stream of historical processes" is a statement which, in these days of national social reorganization, will arouse discussion. To those who prefer to political science, to which your reviewer confesses a bigoted and impenitent attachment, the more leisured stream of the literary, historical, and descriptive method few more pleasing expositions of the method could be commended. The book is important because it is itself so thoroughly English and by its tone, its moral stress, its quality of common sense, its half-humorous preference of cumulative narrative to logical generalization, is even more an example of English national character than a disquisition about it. Dr. Barker prefers the imponderables to the ponderables, but all who appreciate the difficulty of conveying in prose the subtle nature of the bond of tradition and of like-mindedness which unites communities will perceive in his work that of a great educationalist.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

The Body of This Paris

In and About Paris. By Sisley Huddleston. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

ON a discarded proof-sheet, suppressing a fulsome dedication, a great French poet of the nineteenth century scrawled: "... a dedication should not be a profession of faith." The danger is twofold: a writer may express too much or he may express too little, and no book endowed with living qualities really needs an apologetic prolegomena. This requisitoire practice was but lately reintroduced, we believe, by Mr. Ford Madox Ford, to whom the present book is dedicated. In his prefatory dedication Mr. Huddleston errs a bit on the side of amplitude; he has packed too much of himself into it and too little into the corpus of the book itself, which possesses the merit—to say the least—of being one of the best-documented vade-mecums in print.

With Mr. Huddleston we are moved to ask: What does Paris mean to the sensitive man or woman coming from another country? What did it mean, for example, to that phantom host that rises before us when we merely conjure the name: Heine, Turgenev, Chopin, Henry Adams, Matthew Arnold, Rainer Maria Rilke, Ady, Whistler, and Wilde? And what has it meant, coming down to our own day, to Curtius, Santayana, Joyce, Unamuno, Eliot, and Panait Istrati? The roll is legion. You recall—do you not?—what intellectual magic it held out to Thomas Mann in 1925 when he revisited the city for the first time since the war.

Should not a man's encounter with such a node produce something of an inward happening? If we turn, for example, to the pages of Stendhal and Balzac we note to what extent (and the fiction writer is here closer to the root of the matter than the impressively documented cicerone) it contrived to shift the focal center of such characters as Rastignac, Rubempré, and Leuwen. Yet Mr. Huddleston does give us with his unflinching precision the clue to the immense fascination of Paris for imaginative men and women. He says: "The vices and virtues, the labors and amusements of Paris are open and unashamed. It is because men and things are sincere and individual, highly conscious of themselves but not, as we say, self-conscious, that Paris—and France—are so vital. . . ."

If Mr. Huddleston deplores that he has been forced to cover well-trodden ground, his apology strikes us as unnecessary. He covers the ground remarkably well, revealing in the wealth of detail and wise running comment his wide and thorough knowledge of the city. Perhaps the normal exigencies of the task made the author choose the humbler role of guide, through the fetching mazes of the "town of light," waving his stick, as it were, at its coquetties, its history, its monuments, its fetes—at the whole lovely body of his favorite Paris.

"White Paris has been generally pictured, in our tongue, from the outside," continues Mr. Huddleston, "my ambition has been to picture it from the inside." The ambition is, to be sure, laudable, but it hasn't been quite achieved. Has a city a soul save that which is felt and seen and transmuted by the creative writer or artist? The soul of Paris (the well-made body, we repeat, is most persuasively given) somehow escapes us in this attractive book because, at a hazard, Mr. Huddleston himself is but timidly committed in its pages.

PIERRE LOVING

Essays in Architecture

The A B C of Architecture. By Matlock Price. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

The Essence of Architecture. By W. R. Greely. D. Van Nostrand Company. $2.50.

Mudejar. By Georgiana Goddard King. Bryn Mawr Notes and Monographs. Longmans Green and Company. $2.50.

Ruined Abbeys of Great Britain. By R. A. Cram. Marshall Jones Company. $5.

THE first two of these books are excellent examples of how two different lines of attack on the same problem, the popularization of architecture, can give two contrasting results. "The A B C of Architecture" attempts in the space of 230 pages to include not only a sketch of the history of architecture, with a brief analysis of American development, but also a section on the study of architecture and architecture as a profession. This is a manifest impossibility, and the book, full of random technicalities, and carelessly but profusely illustrated by heterogeneous drawings and photographs, taken from all sorts of sources without credit, is superficial and valueless either to layman or student. It is the reductio ad absurdum of the modern trend to furnish painless knowledge by outlines of everything.

By contrast "The Essence of Architecture," though even briefer, seems profound. It is a carefully organized and well-presented analysis of the art of architecture—its aims, its methods, its achievements. It is clearly written, and despite an occasional labored epigram and some sentimentality it should prove a valuable book for any one who seeks knowledge of what architecture is all about.

The other two books are scholarly and authoritative historical analyses, one of a style, the other of a great cultural

Just Off Press

TOLSTOY

A PLAY IN SEVEN SCENES

By

Henry Bailey Stevens

Advance Indorsements

Jane Addams: "I am sending the play back with an assurance of my genuine admiration. The conflict, the situation, the burning words grip me as they have always done, and I am very grateful to you for making them such a clean and well sustained drama."

Aylmer Maude, the English biographer of Tolstoy: "I am surprised and pleased that you have been able to give so good an impression of Tolstoy's general attitude towards his family and the outside world."

Nathan Haskell Dole, the American biographer of Tolstoy: "I think you have made a convincing drama out of the Tolstoy ménage."

Rev. John Haynes Holmes: "I want to say that I am immensely impressed by what you have done. I was a bit sceptical when I started, as Tolstoy is so gigantic a subject that I did not see how you could grapple with it successfully. But you have done so, and I give you my grateful salutation. The play ought to reach the public."

Alice Stone Blackwell: "'Tolstoy' is a wonderful play. Nobody could help loving the man as you have depicted him. The play is both beautiful and courageous. It would translate well into a variety of languages."

M. R. L. Freshel: "I have been very greatly moved by the play, and do not remember ever having had so clear an impression of a personality given me in any book."

Vida Scudder: "I have enjoyed the play very much. It is a chronicle play, and to me, at least, quite as moving as Drinkwater's 'Lincoln.'"

Count Ilya Tolstoy: "I will be glad if your play will be produced on the stage. It will make people think and will remind them once more of the great message of my father."

154 pages, 12mo. . . . . $1.75

Other New Books

ENGLAND: A History of British Progress.

By CYRIL E. ROBINSON, Winchester College, England.

900 pages, 63 maps and 24 plates, 8vo. $5.00

EXTRA-CLASSROOM ACTIVITIES

In Elementary and Secondary Schools.

By R. H. JORDAN, Cornell University.

300 pages, 8vo. $2.50

NOTEBOOK OF

EUROPEAN HISTORY, 1400-1920.

By S. H. McGRADY.

256 pages, 12mo. $1.50

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO
393 Fourth Avenue New York.

movement. The new edition of "The Ruined Abbeys of Great Britain," first published in 1905, has little new material. Mr. Cram's rather querulous and strident medievalism appears most powerfully in his love for monasticism; the new edition is welcome for again making available this well-known and trenchant expression of that love. Mr. Cram is a skilful propagandist, and though the beauty and the clarity of his writing well express the intensity of his passion, they can not blind one to his one-sided and prejudiced view of life.

Miss King's "Mudejar" is a welcome addition to our knowledge of Spanish art. Its differentiation between the Moorish, the Mudejar, and the Gothic clarifies the whole history of medieval architecture in Spain, and its tracing of Mudejar influences into Renaissance and baroque art helps to account for the peculiarly vivid character of Spanish baroque. The book is well illustrated and thoroughly documented, with a complete bibliography, yet the whole is presented simply, concisely, and with personal charm—something quite different from the usual archaeological contribution. It sets a standard for the Bryn Mawr monographs which will be hard to uphold.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN

Critical Political Thought

Political Pluralism. By Kung Chuan Hsiao. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE doctrine of political monism assumes that in every state there is a single center of ultimate authority. On the other hand, political pluralism predicates that discoverable authority in society is manifold and that the monistic assumption is both unreal and dangerous. Professor Hsiao's volume is an analysis of that theory from the standpoint of an attenuated monism. The author devotes separate chapters to the legal, administrative, political, philosophical, and ethical aspects of pluralism and thus surveys the views of Duguit, Krabbe, the Webbs, Laski, and Cole. He offers lengthy criticism of the views discussed and penetrating comparisons with the relevant theories of the major prophets of the past. To Professor Hsiao the essence of pluralism is the advocacy of a division of the state and sovereignty into political and economic functions. He rightly concludes that its chief contribution is the broadening of the base of the state by stressing social and economic factors. The book presents the most critical and comprehensive study of the subject and is, in fact, a competent contribution.

However, Professor Hsiao's admirable aim at reconciling conflicting doctrines entices him to exaggerate slightly the extent of agreement reached. Thus, for example, Hobbes was less concerned in limiting sovereignty by "laws of nature" and "laws of God," and Cole's theory of a functionally coordinated society is more remote from the Hegelian God-State than the author supposes. Nor does Cole's view that the individual is to judge any function from the standpoint of social welfare approach the doctrine of the "general will." The omission, too, of any reference to Fascism is perhaps because Fascist theory is yet incomplete. Again, more than a little doubtful is the author's view that the gist of pluralism is an emphasis on a duality of politics and economics. The crux of pluralism is rather a defense of the individual against the "Great State." Cole does not offer the most typical pluralistic theory, as the author suggests, but the most extreme. It is true that present-day writers stress economic functions, but this concentration does not necessarily involve pluralism as the traditional Fabians and Marx have shown. Figgis—whom the author curiously dismisses with bare footnotes—has offered the pluralistic thesis on behalf of religious bodies and not economic. The varied administrative proposals offered by Cole, Laski, and the Webbs are merely different administrative structures of the pluralistic state.

LEWIS ROCKOW

Bravo!

To the Foot of the Rainbow. By Clyde Kluckhohn. The Century Company. $3.50.

WITH one comrade, another college youth sent on a mission like his own, Clyde Kluckhohn packed through the region of northern New Mexico and Arizona, southern Colorado and Utah, just to set eyes on the country and its people, and for the sake of high emprise determined to find and view the Rainbow Bridge of southern Utah, one of the many natural wonders of an unexampled land. The story—from the hand of an undergraduate, mind you—is told with modesty, vigor, humor, and the keen enlightenment of a mind that was as vividly on the job as limbs and wits had to be if the voyage were to be rounded into a return.

There is a start from Gallup, New Mexico, where the fable of the Rainbow is broached—for it is, here, half fabulous. There is a journey of try-out and inspection up to Santa Fe and Taos, with stops for Pueblo dances and a loafing in the Jemez Mountains; there is the wandering on into the country of the Navaho and out into the region of the Black Mesa, where the Indian children were to see in the wanderers their first glimpse of the white race. Finally there is the adventure into the sheer wilderness, beyond even Indian habit, and the attainment of the Rainbow itself! Perils by the way—thirst, hunger, storm, accident, and, too, pleasant stops at remote trading stations, in native hogans, around chance campfires, with a Navaho dance here, a Paiute sun-ceremony there, a by-excursion into cliff-dwellers ruins, or down into the Painted Desert—for there is time for all things.

The whole adventure is in the true spirit of your errant sir knight, and if the tilts are with cameras rather than lances and the jousts are horse-tradings, none the less the spirit is there, and it is eternal! Surely it is one of the most precious of the possessions of these United States that in the very core of our continent great regions defy the hand of the human spoiler. The desert—mesa and canyon, sand-plain and rock-cliff—this is the matrix of the jewels of nature, most glorious where most they are difficult of access and jealous of their solitude.

HARTLEY ALEXANDER

Books in Brief

The Song of Solomon. King James Version. Illustrated with Woodcuts on every page by Wharton Esherick. Published by the Centaur Press, Philadelphia, and distributed by Random House. $15.

Midsummer Eve. By Æ. Published by Crosby Gaige and distributed by Random House. $7.50.

Random House in New York is a clearing-house in America for finely printed books issued, as these two are, in limited editions. "The Song of Solomon" is given here a most beautiful and interesting dress, Mr. Esherick's woodcuts adding distinction to a volume already distinguished for its paper, press-work, and incidental decoration. Æ does not at all alter his stature in "Midsummer Eve," a very slender collection of new poems; as always he shows himself to be a pure, rather severely limited poet. The edition is decidedly worthy of praise, achieving appropriately simple ends through the most fastidious means.

Elements of Rural Sociology. By Newell Leroy Sims. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.75.

This is by far the most scholarly and comprehensive of the numerous recent textbooks on rural sociology—and the only one of marked value for reference purposes. The author has brought together from innumerable sources a mass of pertinent ata, which he interprets with accuracy. He sketches also a significant background of rural history and contemporary European practice. The work is largely free from the sentimental junk and the uncritical assumptions characteristic of most contemporary writings on rural life. Unfortunately, the book is badly written, but not worse than other books in its field.

The Book in Italy During the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries, Shown in Facsimile Reproductions from the Most Famous Printed Volumes Collected under the Auspices of the Royal Italian Minister of Instruction, together with an Introduction by Guido Baggi. Explanatory Text and Comment by William Dana Orcutt. Harper and Brothers. $15.

This is much the most ambitious and beautiful of the three books on fine printing which Mr. Orcutt has published to date. It contains reproductions of 132 out of the 199 pages displayed in the album of the Italian Government at the Paris Exhibition in 1900, and amounts to a survey of the whole art of printing during perhaps its finest period and at its most significant place—Italy, the mother of the Renaissance. Guido Baggi, late librarian of the Laurentian Library in Florence, who secured for Mr. Orcutt the permission to reproduce these specimen pages from magnificent Italian books, closes his introduction with some interesting remarks on the distinction between printing as an art and printing as an industry. The distinction seems to be coming clear to more and more people today; if it is not clear to any one he is advised to turn over these handsome pages—pages in which there is no monotony and on which there is always something to engage the exacting eye. The specimens are grouped according to the cities which produced them; and at the beginning there are reproductions of three miniatures—a Petrarch, a Laura, and an Annunciation—such as used to appear in printed books in order to recommend them among those readers who had known and loved decorated manuscripts. The miniatures are given here in exquisite colors, and alone make the book worth while.

Selected Poems of Amy Lowell. Edited by John Livingston Lowes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

Mr. Lowes faced a difficult task here—the task not only of pleasing Miss Lowell's widely scattered audience but of selecting from her eleven volumes the really and permanently best poems, the number of which is admitted by many even of her admirers to be somewhat less than great. He seems to have come through the ordeal quite satisfactorily. This will undoubtedly be the source henceforth for most persons' knowledge of Amy Lowell.

The Adventures of Thomas Jefferson Snodgrass. By Mark Twain. Edited by Charles Honce, with a Foreword by Vincent Starrett, and a Note on "A Celebrated Village Idiot" by James O'Donnell Bennett. Pascal Covici. $5.

Interesting as being virtually the first professional efforts of Samuel Clemens, these three "letters" reprinted from the Keokuk (Iowa) Saturday Post of 1856-1857 are still very lame stuff—merely museum pieces, as Mr. Starrett warns the reader beforehand. They were worth putting on record, and that is about all there is to say.

Gongorism and the Golden Age. A Study of Exuberance and Unrestraint in the Arts. By Elisha K. Kane. University North Carolina Press. $3.50.

Mr. Kane makes the most thorough study to date of the literary phenomenon known as Gongorism which made itself felt in Europe during the seventeenth century. He relieves Gongora, the reputed father of this highly affected movement, of the full charge for its blame by showing how it antedated him and how it was in a sense inevitable in such a day—branching off to show the same forces at work at various times, including today, and to discover analogous tendencies in the other arts of Gongora's century. The book is marred by occasional professorial smartness and by a complete lack of sympathy on the author's part with exuberance and grotesqueness in art; but it is a valuable study, and indeed a contribution to current literary and aesthetic criticism.

Spain from the South. By J. B. Trend. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

An expert in the subject writes a glorified guide-book to historical Spain, commencing at Algeciras, Ronda, and Cadiz and going on through Seville, Cordoba, and Granada to Toledo. Mr. Trend knows his Old Spain richly and well, and furnishes among other things a group of valuable translations from the Moorish poets.

Mystic Italy. By Michael I. Rostovtzeff. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

The three lectures comprising this slender volume, Mystic Italy, Mystic Pompeii, Mystic Rome, are as expert as authority can make them at the same time that they are fascinating in detail and extraordinarily rich in suggestion. Professor Rostovtzeff studies the evidences that survive in the excavations at Pompeii and Rome of the vogue of certain mystic cults, notably the Dionysian, which took hold of the Italian peninsula as soon as its people, to use the phrase of Gilbert Murray, lost its intellectual nerve. The evidences are sculptures and mural paintings, and the author, true to his characteristic method, confines himself almost entirely to a running commentary on these remains, many of which he reproduces as illustrations of the text.

The King of Spain and Other Poems. By Maxwell Bodenheim. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Mr. Bodenheim's new volume has all of his old merits and a proportionate share of his only defect—monotony. For a poet who makes so much, in footnotes and elsewhere, of his sardonic and even savage character, he is singularly lacking in the capacity for emphasis, and hence the capacity for giving the reader relief.

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

"PORGY" ■ REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

■ JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 5:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

■ GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

THE ACTOR MANAGERS present

GRAND STREET FOLLIES

OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Tues. (Pop.) & Thurs.

International Relations Section

C. P. Scott on Disarmament

AT the conference which opened in London on July 6 composed of delegates representing an international entente of Liberal, Democratic, and Radical parties in twelve European countries, Mr. C. P. Scott, editor of the Manchester Guardian, made the following address:

I suppose every man in this room is an ardent advocate of international peace. We all desire it with our whole hearts; it is partly in order to testify to that desire and to do something toward its fulfilment that we are here. And in this we do but represent the common feeling. The whole world today seeks peace, and yet, perhaps, there never was a time when it was so haunted by the specter of war; and it is not to its aspirations that it responds, but to its fears. It is armed to the teeth. How shall we account for this grotesque contradiction? No doubt it is the very existence of these armaments which is the chief cause of these fears, and the obvious remedy for the one would therefore seem to be to remove or vastly to reduce the other. That is recognized, and there exists actually a commission of the League of Nations established for this very purpose. It would be interesting therefore to know of the progress this committee is making. I regret to say that no news of such progress is forthcoming. At least it has not reached me. If other members of this assembly have been more fortunate they will no doubt let us know. The committee, it is true, sits, but unfortunately it does not progress. There have even been signs that such movement as can be detected in this great matter has of late been in an opposite direction.

Disarmament for this country means naval disarmament. Some years ago there was a conference on this subject at Washington between the five principal naval Powers. It did an extraordinary thing; it not only stopped the competition in armament of these Powers as regards the largest and most expensive kind of warships, but it actually caused certain of these tremendous structures either built or building to be destroyed. Think of that! The latest and most perfect of the engines of destruction thrown half-built on to the scrap-heap. It might almost seem as though the millennium of peace, if not arrived, were close in the offing. But the vision did not last, and when last year the United States tried to go a step farther on the same road and to come to an agreement with this country in regard to the next size of great ships, the cruisers, the proposal was coldly received. War between the two countries was indeed declared to be unthinkable, but at the same time it appeared that our Admiralty thought enough about it to be entirely unwilling to make any change which would place the next strongest naval Power in a position of advantage. And, if truth must be told, the United States Admiralty acted in exactly the same spirit.

I have referred first to this matter not because it is in itself of the first importance, but partly because it touches our impeccable selves and partly because it is so typical. Professions abound; it is performance which, unfortunately, is lacking. There are fine words in plenty, but then fine words butter no parsnips. And so it happens that in the larger European field there is found the same contradiction, unlimited professions of peace and equally unlimited preparations for war. So that it now comes to this, that instead of having, as in the old unregenerate days, armaments for war, we now have armaments for peace. But the mischief of it is that peace armaments are still armaments, that where there are guns loaded they are apt to go off, and that the absurdity of making enormous preparations and spending enormous sums for an event which it is agreed on all hands is never to take place is so glaring and the anomaly so great that in the end, if only for reason's sake, it is likely to be quite simply resolved; the agreement will vanish and the guns will go off.

And the strange thing is that alongside of this great organization for war there is an equally imposing organization for peace, and in the League of Nations we have the expression of man's hopes as in the fleets and armies we have the expression of his fears. It is a struggle to the death between the two, between a power resting on reason and humanity and one which draws its strength from some of the deepest and most primitive instincts of mankind. We know where we here stand, every man of us in this room: how shall we help to tip the balance, how bring such aid as we may to the right side in this perennial and fateful contest?

We are friends of peace; what do we mean by peace? It is possible to think of peace as a passive state, as a state in which people do not go to war because there is, for the time being, no particular reason for doing so. Obviously peace under such conditions is insecure and war lurks in the background waiting only for its occasion and its opportunity. Yet that is the only kind of peace which hitherto the world has known and the only kind which it is likely to know so long as our thoughts and our dispositions remain exactly what they are. The League of Nations, it is true, represents another principle. It prepares actively and systematically for peace among the nations of the whole world, and has created an elaborate machinery by which nations may be prevented from rushing hastily into war. But this, after all, is machinery only and, like every other kind of machinery, it demands, if it is to operate, a motive power. And it is such motive power, active, alert, persistent, which alone can save us, which alone in the end can save civilization. What does that mean? It means that our whole idea of peace must be changed. It must become active instead of passive, dynamic instead of static.

Those, it may be, are just words. We must try to clothe them and make them alive. Why do nations arm? They arm because they are afraid. Why are they afraid? They are afraid because they take a narrow and impoverished view of their neighbors, regarding them almost wholly in the light of possible adversaries, of possible assailants. So rooted is this view, so deeply does it dominate men's spirits, that the greatest military Power in the world, faced by a neighbor totally and permanently disarmed, continually speaks, dreams, and prepares for what it calls an "unprovoked attack" from that prostrate neighbor. And not only so, but when that neighbor, by an act of great wisdom and generosity, voluntarily and spontaneously renounced for all time its claim on certain disputed territory which for generations had been the prime cause of quarrel between the two peoples, this act, which should once for all have released the tension between them, had no such effect and was regarded by the other side only as an occasion for the demand of fresh guaranties of quite another sort.

I call attention specifically to this incident not with any intention of throwing special blame upon our great neighbor, who is also our great friend, but because it helps to drive home my point. If there is ever to be a real peace in Europe, in the world, our neighbors must be something more to us than possible adversaries. We must understand them, enter into their life. Why not even care for them? That would indeed be the dictate of religion, but who in these days cares for religion, even the religion of humanity, when it is a question of the relations of states? Yet none the less the affairs of our neighbors, the home affairs of every distinctive European state, are, one might suppose, not without interest, not without instruction, not without help and comfort for ourselves if we will approach them with understanding and intelligence and in the spirit of friendship. And that is what I mean by the active conception of peace—that is, a peace resting on comprehension, intelligence, and a natural and lively good feeling—such a feeling as may naturally exist between neighbors in private life. . . .

Contributors to This Issue

FREDERICK L. FERRIS is on the editorial staff of the Trenton Evening Times.

MCALISTER COLEMAN, columnist and writer on labor conditions, is a contributing editor of the New Leader.

H. J. TIMPERLEY is Peking correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

J. RANKEN TOWSE was for many years the dramatic critic of the New York Evening Post.

THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL was the winner of The Nation's poetry contest in 1927.

EMIL LENGYEL is a Hungarian journalist now living in the United States.

LUIS MUÑOZ MARÍN, Latin-American writer, born in Porto Rico, was technical assessor for the Cuban government during the Havana Conference.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is coauthor with Morris L. Ernst of "To the Pure," a forthcoming book on the obscenity laws.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN is a member of the department of government at Cornell University.

PIERRE LOVING is an American critic now living in France.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN is a New York architect, and the author of "The American Spirit in Architecture."

LEWIS ROCKOW is the author of "Contemporary Political Thought in England."

HARTLEY ALEXANDER is the author of "Manito Masks, Dramatizations with Music of American Spirit Legends."

A Report to Stockholders

AT the dinner to Mr. Villard on March 13, the Tenth Anniversary Committee of Nation Readers made him a birthday present of 2,300 new subscriptions to the paper that he edits—1,304 Nation readers had joined in the gift. So many others wanted to join that the period was extended to July 1, the Tenth Anniversary of Oswald Garrison Villard's editorship. And on that date the birthday present had grown to 4,000 new subscriptions—from 2,017 readers.

Those subscriptions are not only a gift to Mr. Villard but a gift to the cause of liberal thinking in America. We congratulate you and ourselves—and America—on the result. The Nation has never been stronger or more needed than today. The anniversary is past; but some of us intend to continue making The Nation and its liberal gospel known to our friends.

The Tenth Anniversary Committee of Nation Readers.

NEW MASSES DEBATE

"Do Radicals Pussyfoot on Sex?"

"YES" says

"NO" says

V. F. CALVERTON VS MICHAEL GOLD
Editor of Modern Quarterly Editor of New Masses

CHAIRMAN TO BE ANNOUNCED

to be held at the LABOR TEMPLE, 14th St. and 2nd Ave.

Friday evening, August 10, 1928

At 8 P. M.

ADMISSION 75 CENTS

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS

Direct from the Makers
at Manufacturer's Price.
Postage Paid.

Suit Lengths Cut to Order.

NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired.

THE MYTH OF ADAM AND EVE

By Paul Lafargue

The Genesis story studied in the light of modern anthropology.
Brilliant, fascinating, suggestive. 25 cents, postpaid.

Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WILL BE THE SPEAKER

Wednesday, August 8, at Eight o'clock

The Nation's Hour—W M C A—New York (370m.)

RESTAURANT

The Russian Inn

wishes to see its old Friends
in its new home

COOL AND AIRY

23 W. 49th—N. Y. C.

MARITZA'S Peasant Shop

SPECIAL VACATION SALE

Embroidered voile blouses, $5.00; dresses, $8.95; Russian smocks from $8.50 up. Silk dresses and hats, from 25 to 50% reduction. Morocco bags, $3.50 and $4.50. Palestine embroidered pongee dresses for children $3.75 up.

MARITZA, 172 W. 4th St., nr. 6th Ave.

OPEN SHELF

Visit or Write

THE FRENCH BOOKMAN

202 WEST 96TH ST. (NEAR BROADWAY)

French books and magazines exclusively, low prices.
Catalogue, 5c (stamps).

LANGUAGES

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN
75c. Short Course Surprising results
Per Lesson Native Teachers
PRIVATE SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK
Established 1906 Between 85th and 86th Sts.

RUSSIAN taught by experienced teacher, Imperial University graduate, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School of Languages. Michael M.
Jerlitzyn, 2013 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C. Tel. Harlem 5560.

The INTELLECT QUARTERLY

has published two more pages: "Silence and Little of That." 5c. Address: B. JONAS, Box 734, FORT MYERS, Fla.

MULTIGRAPHING

Tel. CORTland 3339

The MULTIGRAM

MULTIGRAPHING MAILING
MIMEOGRAPHING ADDRESSING FACSIMILE LETTERS

39 CORTLANDT ST., N. Y.
Ask The Nation about us!

APARTMENTS FOR SALE

Co-operative Apartment
for Sale

Solve your apartment hunting problem once and for all by the purchase of a modern Co-operative Apartment in a restricted community.

4 Rooms. Cash Required $1,000
(Terms can be arranged)

Monthly maintenance $48.48 plus monthly stock payment of $12.50.

Also available, five and six rooms.

Take Corona-Flushing Subway
(I. R. T., B. M. T., or Second Avenue
"L") to Bliss Street.

CITY HOUSING CORPORATION

4625 Queens Boulevard

Long Island City, New York

Phone Stillwell 8475

Open daily, including Sundays.

PROPERTY FOR SALE

FOR Sale—In Adirondacks, 3 acres, 8 room camp. Garage. Price $1,200; part cash. Over 100 other camps and cabins to pick from. Write for booklet, Earl Woodward, Hadley, N. Y.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

NEW YORK CITY architect, now building small homes and apartment houses, invites financial participation from individuals controlling $25,000 upwards, as investment or become partner in building enterprise, in N. Y. C. References exchanged. Box 817, % The Nation.

VOCATIONAL SERVICE

GERTRUDE STEIN, INC., 18 E. 41st St., N.Y.C.
Lexington 2593

Unusual secretarial and social service positions. We are glad to hear from Nation readers who need workers or who are looking for positions.

POSITIONS WANTED

YOUNG WOMAN, excellent training and experience, purposeful and sane philosophy of education, rejected by traditional kindergartners, desires work with group of 3-6 year old children. Will undertake directorship of new group or become affiliated with existing one. Address 22 DeKoven St., Forest Hills, L. I.

LIBERAL with 5 years' teaching experience, 6 years as office manager of large corporation, desires connection with liberal, educational, or labor organization about September. Highest references. Write Box 829, % The Nation.

COLLEGE graduate desires position with reputable progressive weekly newspaper. Box 828, % The Nation.

REFINED couple, one child, man evening student, desire care physician's office or music studio, in exchange for use of apartment—West Bronx or Washington Heights. Highest references. Foundation 4577.

FOR SALE

A MAHOGANY four-post bed and coil spring are for sale at a very reasonable price. The bed is three-quarter size, the posts about 5½ feet high. Can be seen by appointment. Phone Mr. Fisher, Whitehall 7730, or write Box 817, % The Nation.

S U M M E R

CAMP
TAMIMENT

FOR ADULTS FOREST PARK, PA.

Every modern facility for outdoor sports. Sixteen Tennis Courts. Dancing. Safe, delightful bathing. Entertainment. Dramatics. Excellent food. Occasional lectures. Reasonable rates.

Write Forest Park, Pa. Tel. Stroudsburg 71a2

Summer Restfulness Forty Miles
From New York!

In the least frequented part of Westchester County, where chance has preserved some of the wildness of the Adirondacks, a roomy old manor house, with its orchards, woodland and vegetable garden, receives guests for week ends or longer periods. R. UNDERHILL, Amawalk, N. Y. Telephone Yorktown 140.

THE SPRING MOUNTAIN HOUSE

Fremont Center, N. Y. In the beautiful mountains of Sullivan County; modern improvements, airy rooms, good food. Rate $20.00. W. Ellman.

WORKERS' COLONY

JOIN the Golden's Bridge Cooperative. A Workers' Colony, situated in beautiful Westchester county, at the foot of Berkshire Mountains, within commuting distance from New York (1½ hrs. from Grand Central). 7 minutes' walk from station. Comradely atmosphere, social activities; sports, swimming, rowing, fishing. For information apply to H. S. Weinblatt, 16 W. 21st St., Phone Watkins 7950.

HELP WANTED

INTELLIGENT young man as councillor for small group of boys for month of August. Preferably one who drives car. E. Miller, R. F. D. 2, Somerville, N. J.

WANTED—Alert men and women to represent The Nation in every community. Our circulation is on the up-curve and our commissions are as liberal as our editorial policy. If you would like to earn extra money by making friends for The Nation, write to Department 11, % The Nation.

SERVICE!
AT
ECHO LAKE TAVERN

In the Adirondacks
Not only in Tennis
BUT IN

FOOD! Incomparable! from our newly built, most modernly equipped kitchen.

ACCOMMODATIONS

Newly built "bunks" for four or more (no tents). Modern sanitation. Capacity limited, conforming to small camp ideal!

PLAY Unquestionably the best social program in the vicinity. Every conceivable facility for land and water sports. Tennis under expert guidance.

RATES $32.50

per week
Reservations will be closing soon. Make YOURS now!

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

WARRENSBURG, N. Y.

Tel.: Warrensburg, 104

N. Y. OFFICE: 1440 Broadway
Tel.: LONGacre 5432

PIONEER LODGE

A Summer Camp for Adults

Near Thousand Islands

Limited to Seventy-five—Has all conveniences in Lodge and Bungalows—All Sports—Boating on Large Lake—Golf Within Fifteen Minutes' Walk—Rate $30 per Week.

Accessible over night by N. Y. Central.

STAR LAKE, N. Y.

ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY

CITY OFFICE

9 MAIDEN LANE

CORTLAND 1958

"NATURE PATH" Health Resort

in the Watchung Mountains

ISRAEL SHMID, N.D., Director

A resort for the intelligent vacationist and health seeker. Sun baths, tennis, bathing. Vegetarian-dairy cuisine. Physio-therapy treatment if desired. Wonderful wood lot. Rest and relaxation. Booklet. Mount Bethel Road, Plainfield, N. J.

Phone Martinsville 201 F 23.

SUMMER HOMES TO LET

SOLITUDE, tranquillity, ethereal loveliness in Adirondacks on Hudson River, vicinity Lake George. Marvelous for artists or writers. Artistic, comfortable house. Bathing, boating, famous fishing. $50 monthly. Write Brande, Warrensburg, N. Y.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:

Mail your classified ads so they reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.

Rates: $3.08 for one half inch (50 words) minimum. Additional lines of 6 words 62 cents each.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 15, 1928

No. 3293

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	147
EDITORIALS:
The Southern Bishops.....	149
Power Mergers and the Public.....	150
Navies and Peace.....	151
The "Friendly" Olympics.....	151
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	152
THE POINCARÉ LEGEND. By Robert Dell.....	153
BROKERS AND "SUCKERS." By Robert Ryan.....	154
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	156
IN REPLY TO SENATOR NORRIS.....	157
CORRESPONDENCE .....	158
BOOKS:
Hamlet in Modern Dress. By James Rorty.....	159
Mighty Is Man. By William Rose Benét.....	159
How to Change Things. By Henry Raymond Mussey.....	159
Summer Reading. By Alice Beal Parsons.....	160
More About "Mother India." By W. Norman Brown.....	160
A Westminster Exhibitionist. By Keith Hutchison.....	161
Fiction Shorts. By C. P. F.....	161
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Alsatian Problem. By Emil Lengyel.....	163

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 18, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

PEACE, FREEDOM, AND PLENTY are the three major issues of the national political campaign as set forth by Norman Thomas in opening his contest for the Presidency on the Socialist Party's ticket. They are good issues, a hundred times more meaningful than the mumbo-jumbo of trite or equivocal phrases in the Republican and Democratic platforms. Mr. Thomas spoke of them as follows:

1. The issue of peace. Every party sings its praise. Only the Socialists understand that to be for peace is to be against imperialism, of which Coolidge's infamous war in Nicaragua like Wilson's infamous wars in Haiti and Santo Domingo are illustrations.

2. The issue of freedom. Both parties talk pious nonsense about injunctions. Neither party discusses civil liberty or what is the matter with our courts or the tragic failure of our country to give justice to the poor, especially if the poor are also workers, strikers, radicals, aliens, or Negroes.

3. The issue of plenty. It is part of our shame that we do not even know how many men and women in this country of stock-market prosperity know that most bitter and heart-breaking sort of toil: the hunt for a job. Probably there are at least 4,000,000, or one in every five or six of the workers. In what we call normal times one in every nine or ten is in the sorrowful army of the unemployed. Beyond advocating public works in dull times the old parties say nothing. We propose specific remedies, immediate remedies, among them: A proper record of the unemployed, a nation-wide system of public non-profit-making employment exchanges, a proper and carefully planned program of public works in dull times, unemployment insurance, and the five-day week.

We wish Mr. Thomas every success in his effort to persuade people that the man who most surely throws away his vote is the one who sacrifices principles in order to win some doubtful and temporary advantage by a ballot for one of two parties both of which live through exploiting him.

THIS IS THE SEASON of straw—straw hats, straws in lemonade, straws which show which way the wind blows, straw men, and straw votes. Straw votes do not amount to much. They are chaff. But so is politics, and straw votes are no more unsubstantial than the most of it. Already a straw vote on the Presidential election has been taken at the summer session of the University of California, in which Hoover beat Smith by eight votes, 386 to 378. We note, though, that the son of California was beaten by the students from his own State, receiving 248 votes to Smith's 265. To offset this the New York students repudiated their Governor, giving him 3 ballots and Hoover 5. New Jersey voted for Hoover 4 to 1; Massachusetts, 4 to 3; Ohio, 6 to 4; Indiana, 8 to 2; and the Solid South was disrupted to the extent that the entire Mississippi delegation, consisting of one student, and the total Florida block, numbering two persons, were unanimous for Hoover. On the other hand, Smith carried Illinois 7 to 4; Michigan, 5 to 2; Colorado, 4 to 2; Wyoming, 5 to 1. Five-sevenths of the entire student vote was from California. Exclusive of that, the ballots from the other States favored Hoover by 138 to 113. All voters were asked to set down also their preferences as between Coolidge and Davis in 1924. Coolidge had 508 supporters to 126 for Davis. Compared with this year's vote, this discloses a formidable shrinkage in Republicanism.

HERBERT HOOVER'S tortuous policy in regard to Mississippi flood relief has been publicly shown up by Colonel Robert Ewing, the publisher of the New Orleans States. There is no denying the truth of Colonel Ewing's charge, because too many men in Mississippi and Louisiana are familiar with the facts. Mr. Hoover repeatedly declared, both in public and in private, while he was in the flooded district, as Colonel Ewing states, that the Federal Government should assume the entire financial responsibility for relieving the wrecked States. When it was suggested that there be immediate action looking to the organization of public opinion to this end, Mr. Hoover privately asked all who came to him to do nothing, to leave it to him, and he would attend to it and put it through. Then he returned to Washington. Did he thereupon state to the press how he felt about the matter? He did not. Did he rush to the hearings before the Senate committee which was taking testimony as to the flood situation and ask to be heard? He did not. On the contrary, he dodged the committee, and left Washington for ten days. Finally, when Senator Willis insisted that he should come before it and publicly demanded him, Mr. Hoover appeared, a most taciturn and reluctant witness. He thought that the policy to be followed in preventing future floods should be determined by the Army engineers and ventured no opinion of his own. Then it was discovered that he had completely forgotten his promises and thought the financial responsibility should be shared by the States in the flood district. It is a most unhappy chapter in Mr. Hoover's political record, but unfortunately it is not a unique one.

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE stubbed his toe badly during his recent visit to New York City, in the course of which he made a violent attack upon Governor Smith. We are sorry to have to criticize so old and valued a friend, but Mr. White's utterances can only have shocked all who read them. He was, of course, well within his rights in digging up the Governor's early record in the New York Legislature. It is vulnerable. Al did take orders, like every other Tammany Assemblyman, and he voted against bills to improve moral conditions in New York City and to tighten control of the liquor traffic. That has been known of all men these many years, and Mr. White was quite justified in calling this record to public attention. But Mr. White's comments on this were nothing less than amazing. In one breath he disclosed that Smith was "compelled" by Tammany to do this and also that he acted "out of conviction." Next he said that it was unfair to judge the Smith of today by the Smith of twenty years ago, but that this record showed what he would do if elected President! He was quite different today; nevertheless, if elected, Tammany would compel him to repeat his early record! Then, when Walter Lippmann called upon him and explained that his attack had hurt Governor Smith, Mr. White withdrew his charges in so far as they related to prostitution and gambling, but stood pat on saloons. Saying that he would fight Smith on this line until the election, Mr. White announced that he had a "pocketful of money" and would stay in Europe until he spent it, which would probably keep him there until after the election!

IN THE FACE OF THIS, what Mr. White plainly needs is a rest cure in some Swiss resort, until he recovers his ordinary political judgment, not to say sanity. His position in regard to Charles Curtis, the Vice-Presidential candidate, is even more extraordinary. Some years ago he called Curtis a "nit-wit"; declared he "served the great interests" in the Senate; demanded his defeat for reelection by Kansas in order to punish him for his iniquity in voting in Congress with Aldrich, Lorimer, Cannon, Guggenheim, and Smoot. This was in 1912 when Curtis went with Taft instead of supporting Roosevelt. This year Mr. White appeared at the Kansas City convention demanding Curtis's nomination for President and lauding him to the skies. Charley, the ex-archtraitor, had suddenly become the ideal man to head this country, and Mr. White backed his fellow Kansan's candidacy by editorials praising him highly. Yet just before his sailing, when a reporter asked him if he still believed that Curtis was a "nit-wit," Mr. White said Yes, that he stood by this description of him! Mr. White being a sincere teetotaler, this mystery is beyond us. We pass it on to the psychoanalysts.

THE SENATE STANDS BETWEEN Roy O. West, counsel for the Insull power companies, and the place to which President Coolidge has named him, the head of the Department of the Interior. The Senate which twice flung back the name of Charles Beecher Warren of the sugar trust, when Coolidge appointed him Attorney General, will doubtless fling back the name of West with equal gusto. Roy O. West as Secretary of the Interior would be head of the Reclamation Service and the Geological Survey, ex-officio member of the Federal Power Commission, and director of the commission to investigate Boulder Dam. Such a guardian of our natural resources should come to the task from an experience of disinterested public service. West comes from thirty years of manipulation as attorney and adviser to Samuel Insull, whose tainted money kept Frank L. Smith out of the United States Senate and whose propaganda against Boulder Dam and public ownership have become a national scandal. Does President Coolidge remember what happened to certain of our natural resources during the Harding Administration when this same post of Secretary of the Interior was given to a gentleman from New Mexico? Friends of Coolidge absolved him from blame for the oil scandals because Harding was responsible for his own Cabinet appointees. When the record is finally completed, and the minor selections are included with the Cabinet leaders, we doubt if the appointees of President Coolidge will come nearer to distinction and probity in public service than the appointees of President Harding.

WHAT IS A RIOT? Evidently there are riots and riots. The jolliest riot that has come to our attention is that of the New Bedford strikers when 240 pickets were arrested on July 30. They were peacefully picketing in large numbers before the cotton mills where they used to work. Then—but let the New Bedford Evening Standard describe the riot:

Toward mid-afternoon a big police truck drove around to the Kilburn [cotton mill], loaded in half a hundred willing pickets, and carried them to the central station.

At 5 p. m. two more trucks rattled around to the Whiteman, loaded up with men and women, fought off an eager crowd that begged the disgusted patrolmen to take them too, and jogged off to headquarters. A fourth truck, requisitioned for the occasion, took care of an after-line that formed by backing up to the mill gate so all the patrolmen had to do was to keep back the rush that ensued as the picketers clambered aboard.

When the "rioters" got to court, the atmosphere was not so jolly; they were sentenced to prison for rioting for terms ranging from two to six months. Fortunately the sentences do not mean much for the immediate future. In practically all cases a jury trial has been demanded, the strikers have been freed on bail, and the strike goes on. Some 28,000 strikers have fought for sixteen weeks against a 10 per cent wage cut, and still there are almost no strike-breakers in the mills.

JUDGE FRANK MILLIKEN of the Third District Court does not reflect credit upon Massachusetts justice by his handling the New Bedford strike cases. One of the simplest rights of a citizen under the law is the right to know what is a crime and what is not. No striker in New Bedford can tell whether he is committing a crime or not when he walks on the picket line. "Picketing in New Bedford must stop," shouted Judge Milliken on one occasion. "It is a nuisance." But the Massachusetts law allows picketing, although the statute is very vague and leaves the methods of peaceful persuasion entirely to the interpretation of local police officers. In some of the cases Judge Milliken has ruled that picketing in large numbers is "parading without a permit," in other cases he has called such picketing common-law rioting. His rulings are all the more remarkable because the strikers were not molested in forming large picket lines in the first three months of the strike. Perhaps the police were too lenient at the beginning of the strike in the face of the reckless defiance of left-wing leaders, but that cannot justify Judge Milliken in depriving the workers of recognized legal rights.

FOR HEROISM in the face of an overwhelming catastrophe commend to us Paul Wittgenstein. Drawn into the maelstrom of the World War, this rising young pianist lost an arm on the field of battle. A wave of sympathy swept over European musical circles—so gifted a youth and so suddenly deprived of the results of years of artistic labor! For him it was plainly a living death, this extinction of all his professional ambitions. But Paul Wittgenstein was not one to accept defeat even where his loss seemed irretrievable. He determined to go on with his music despite his deprivation of five fingers. In the first place, he found a number of compositions written for the left hand only. In the second, many composers, including Richard Strauss, on hearing of his plan wrote for him and dedicated their compositions to him. Friends and admirers rallied to him and leaders of orchestras engaged him to play with them, not because he was a freak, not because he posed as a war-hero, but because of his solid artistic achievements. So it is that nearly ten years after his catastrophe, Paul Wittgenstein will make his American debut with the new Beethoven Symphony Orchestra in New York next winter, playing a new Strauss concerto—"Panathenaenzug"—which will, we trust, sound better than its name. We believe that the American public will be proud to give to Mr. Wittgenstein the warm reception his fortitude and ability entitle him to receive.

The Southern Bishops

THE war of Southern bishops over the wetness of Governor Smith is more than a side-show or a fight between Dry and ultra-Dry Democrats. It is a serious challenge to that trinity of social attitudes which rules the South, loyalty to the Protestant church, allegiance to the Democratic Party, and "keeping the nigger in his place." These three things have gone together so consistently in Southern life that a "nigger lover," a Catholic, or a Republican has, in many sections, had no chance whatever of success.

Now come a number of ultra-respectable leaders of Southern Protestantism who say frankly that they are going to bolt the Democratic ticket and vote for Hoover. They take this unprecedented step in the name of their hatred for the liquor traffic. Whatever may be the justice of their cause, we rejoice that they are smashing the political prejudices which made the Solid South solid. One of those prejudices was given a painful blow when the Democrats nominated a Catholic. Now another is threatened when a large number of native Southerners announce their intention of voting for a Republican. There is hope that a new wind of reality will blow through Southern political life.

The main question concerning the challenge of the ultra-Dry bishops is still to be answered. Will they dare to permit the Negroes to vote with them for the Republican ticket? Clearly they need the Negro vote to win, and many of the Negroes would like to give that vote. If a fair and free election were taken in the South, the Negro vote might be the deciding factor. Our guess is that the ultra-Dry bishops will never open their mouths about the Negro vote. To doubt the justice of white supremacy as it is now practiced in the South is a greater sin in the eyes of most Southern people than anything mentioned in the Decalogue. If the Hoover Democrats should venture to suggest the possibility of Negro support for their cause, the resulting tidal wave of racial fear would undoubtedly swamp them.

Bishop Warren Candler of the Methodist Church South and the Coca Cola family does not mention the Negro vote in discussing this subject. He chides his brethren for using the church openly to fight against Governor Smith. "Do not preach politics," he says, in quoting an old episcopal letter. "You have no commission to preach politics. The divinity of the church is never more strikingly displayed than when it holds on its ever straightforward way in the midst of worldly commotions."

With the bishop's attitude toward Governor Smith we are not concerned here, but since when has the Methodist Church South held to a straightforward way in the midst of worldly commotions? In the Civil War the Southern Methodists stood for the South and slavery; in the World War they stood for Wilson and the Allies; in the present controversy in the South over the eleven-hour day and twelve-hour night in cotton mills at least one church conference has espoused the cause of the mill-owners.

Bishop Candler, who leads the regular Democratic section of the Methodist Church South against Bishop James Cannon and his pro-Hoover associates, is quite willing to mix in economic and political controversies when he is on the dominant, conservative side. He favored compulsory military training at Emory University when he was chancellor, and he kept Debs from speaking on the campus of that institution in 1920 by charging that students who petitioned for the right to hear Debs "had tried to take the escutcheon of honor of this institution into their hands and stain it in dishonor by having a jailbird enter our midst." When the leaders of the American (Southern) Cotton Manufacturers' Association met recently in Richmond they were treated to a splendid eulogy from Bishop Candler, who praised them for giving their workers every educational, social, and spiritual advantage. The fact was not mentioned that these manufacturers pay their workers the lowest wages and work them the longest hours of any large manufacturing industry in the United States.

As between Bishop Candler, who appears to be wholly consumed with Pentecostal yearning, and Bishop Cannon, who says he is out to demolish Al Smith, we prefer Bishop Cannon, though he ought not to be so shocked at the thought of Roman Catholics likewise seeking their ends through politics. Why shouldn't a bishop go into politics if a moral issue is involved? And where can a political situation be found in which there is not a moral issue of some sort? Almost every aspect of moral life is conditioned by political habits and institutions, and the preacher who is interested in the moral life of the community cannot stay out of politics. He may take the plunge into politics as a non-partisan, or he may indorse one party as against another. In either case he is to be judged, as any other citizen is judged, by his knowledge of facts and the reasoned truth of his utterance.

Power Mergers and the Public

AN issue of far-reaching importance has been raised in New York City by the Public Committee on Power, a group of citizens who came together to support Governor Smith's policies on water-power and others of like import. The committee has sought through its attorney, Morris L. Ernst, to intervene in the proposed consolidation of the Brooklyn Edison Company and the Consolidated Gas Company of New York to the extent of asking the Public Service Commission, in whom is vested the authority to approve such a merger, to insist that some of the great savings to be made by the combination shall be passed on to the consumer, so that all the profit from the transaction shall not go to the stockholders. The chief officials of the two companies have said that the combination would lead to savings in management and operation, one declaring these economies to run between two and three millions of dollars and the other stating that they could not even be estimated; for this reason they have asked the commission to approve the amalgamation. But the commission has refused to let Mr. Ernst make an oral argument and has declined to the same extent to hear ex-Mayor Hylan representing the People's Civic League of Brooklyn, on the ground that neither of these organizations can show what is necessary, "a property interest or some duty or right devolving upon or belonging to the party to be brought in." It has, moreover, indicated that it may approve the merger at an early meeting without asking in return for the privilege of amalgamation one single concession to the consuming public, although the representative of the City of New York at the hearing asked for a five-cent rate in place of the existing one and objected to the terms of the combination. The commission persistently declares that it is not a merger which is being sought. For its attitude in denying additional hearings the chairman, William A. Prendergast, assumes full responsibility. "In drawing distinctions," he says, "between those who appear and claim the right to take part in a case, the commission has exercised what it believes to be its best judgment, and continued consideration of the question between the time of the first hearing and the second confirms the commission in its judgment."

Naturally this situation presented a political opportunity and Governor Smith was not slow to seize upon it. The Public Committee on Power includes within its membership at least one of his most trusted advisers, and as has been said, it was formed partly with a view to supporting him. He therefore telegraphed to the Public Service Commission asking that Mr. Ernst and other critics be given a prompt hearing. By a vote of two to two, dividing on strict party lines, the effort to throw open the hearings was lost. A fifth member of the commission, a Democrat, was ill at his home and unable to vote. There, at this writing, the situation stands.

The commission has stated to the antagonists of the merger that they are to be restricted merely to filing briefs in support of their contention. That this is satisfactory no one will suggest. Much as we regret having to differ with Mr. Prendergast, his position that such a body of public-spirited citizens shall not be heard at length in so momentous a case as this indicates to us that the commission has an entirely wrong idea of its functions and duties. The commission should not only be willing to listen to every argument presented by reputable citizens; it should certainly deem itself the public defender and should therefore inquire into the contention of the Committee on Power that if this merger proposal is accepted it will set the stamp of official approval upon a capitalization of both companies which the committee claims is at least 120 millions too high.

But the question that has been raised by Mr. Ernst's brilliant appeals to the commission and to the Governor is one that cannot be downed by any hasty action on the part of one public regulating body. Already Norman Thomas, speaking for the Socialist Party, has taken his stand, and has demanded that the merger, to which per se he is not opposed, shall lead, if granted, to a five-cent rate per kilowatt hour instead of the nine cents now charged in the Borough of the Bronx, the eight cents demanded in Queens, and the seven cents exacted in Brooklyn and Manhattan.

All over the country mergers of electric and power companies are going on. New holding companies arise overnight. Many of them are showing enormous profits, yet their officers do nothing but cut the coupons and receive the dividend checks of the lesser companies which constitute the aggregation over which they preside. It is plain that if this tendency is not checked it will only be a few years before the whole of the public utilities of this country will be controlled by two or three enormous corporations with a capitalization running into the billions, whose operations will not be restricted to the United States alone, but, as in the case of one of the growing combinations, be concerned also with power companies situated outside of the United States. Now these combinations may be inevitable and may perhaps, as Norman Thomas thinks, often be demanded by technical and economic progress. Yet the fact remains that in all of these cases the public, and not merely the stockholders, should also profit by the new combinations. If the regulatory commissions are merely to approve every merger suggested by the managers of the merging companies, their function becomes that of the rubber stamp. If the managers of the public service corporations are to be allowed to believe that those whom they represent are to get all the advantages that arise from combinations, we shall see the latter taking place with even greater frequency.

The truth is that this constitutes another serious test of the regulatory principle. The corporation managers who at first were so bitterly opposed to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the several State commissions are now the foremost defenders of them. How can any one suggest public ownership, they ask, when the consumers have such perfect control of the companies through commissions? But this Brooklyn-New York case proves that the interests of the people are not being protected. If Governor Smith had not jumped in, the Democrats would have voted with the Republicans and the whole thing would have slipped through. If the public is to receive the benefit of amalgamations in large units, some different system will have to be devised. The fact that the City of New York is now moving to take over its street and subway transportation companies points the way.

Navies and Peace

PERHAPS the most hopeful aspect of the agreement into which France and Great Britain have entered for the limitation of naval vessels lies in the character of the men who have reached the accord. Such arrangements usually involve technicalities which technicians alone can thresh out—conditions which may be twisted to suit almost any propaganda. But in an accord between two premiers as generally disposed toward international peace as Aristide Briand and Sir Austen Chamberlain there is fair assurance of a mutual effort to reduce the hazards of war, even though the details of the agreement are obscure and their reception by the rest of the world is still in doubt.

It is significant that although the agreement was first announced in London, most of the details have come from Paris. This apparent interest in the plan in France is a good sign, for recent efforts toward the limitation of armaments have been resisted by the French. The effect of the agreement will not be clear until it comes up as a basis for discussion at the next session at Geneva of the Preparatory Commission on Disarmament of the League of Nations. If it proves then to be merely a prearrangement whereby France and England can dominate the meeting in their own interests, nothing will be gained. If, on the other hand, it turns out to be a practical basis for further international limitation of navies, it will be a genuine contribution toward peace.

As first announced in London the agreement was not set forth as a limitation upon naval armament but as an agreement to make all building programs public some time in advance. This would prevent secret preparations and thus militate against some naval construction, but it would not limit specifically the competitive armament race. As set forth in Paris the arrangement goes further and is said to limit war vessels according to classification in four categories: (1) All fighting ships of more than 10,000 tons; (2) airplane carriers of more than 10,000 tons; (3) surface ships of less than 10,000 tons carrying guns of six to eight inches; (4) submarines of more than 600 tons. Limitation of the last two categories is of the most importance because such vessels were not touched in the restrictions imposed by the Washington Conference.

If preliminary reports are correct, France and Great Britain have compromised on an essential point in naval strategy. Heretofore, France has stood out for a limitation based upon the total tonnage of a nation's navy, whereas England has wanted to divide its fleet into numerous classifications, treating each individually in the matter of restriction. The present agreement seems to be a mean between the two points of view.

Peace, of course, means more than disarmament. To achieve it we must get rid of the causes of war as well as the means. For the means of war can be purchased or produced upon comparatively short notice. But experience has proved that the means of war are among its causes and that unpreparedness is usually an aid toward peaceful and reasonable diplomacy. We may add that nothing leads the mind of a nation so successfully toward a policy of peace as a progressive limitation and reduction of its war-making machinery.

The "Friendly" Olympics

MANY Americans picture the Olympic Games as a great festival of innocent play for happy, young athletes, a training-ground for clean sportsmanship, and a promoter of international good-will. In the background of this conventional picture there is usually a vision of the Star Spangled Banner waving serenely over the admiring (and defeated) nations of the earth.

How fatuous that picture is can be seen by reading the current news dispatches from Amsterdam. The Olympic athletes upon examination look more like quarreling semi-professionals than happy amateurs. They are disciplined like trained seals and guarded like murderers in a death-house. They enter the games with the sport-loving abandon of a Georgia road gang on an August afternoon. The whole proceeding is characterized by a hair-trigger sensitivity to any possible foreign insult.

On the opening day of the present Olympic Games the French declined to march in the parade because a Dutch gatekeeper had refused to allow them practice-time in the stadium. Our American contingent had been heartily booed by the French in 1924, and this time the Amsterdam audience was decidedly cool. In the wrestling contest shouts of delight greeted any athlete who could score a point against an American, and, according to the American coach, our wrestlers were defeated by illegal methods. Perhaps the crowd remembered the confession of Charles Paddock that four Americans had agreed to "jump the gun" on an English sprinter in the last Olympics—although the plan was never carried out. Perhaps—but let a paragraph of Wythe Williams in the New York Times tell part of the story. The scene is the passage of the athletes' parade before the Prince Consort of Holland on the opening day of the Olympic games.

All flags except one were dipped when the various delegations passed the royal stand. The Stars and Stripes carried by Clarence Houser, true to the tradition that the national emblem shall never be lowered to man or nation, was borne aloft. As has been the case at past Olympics, this caused some criticism, on the ground that at a purely sporting event the Americans might follow the same procedure as the other nations. Also, instead of saluting when passing the reviewing stand, the Americans, headed by Major General MacArthur, merely gave right dress.

Although the crowd was loyal in applause to all visiting teams, there was considerable comment after the ceremony to the effect that, apart from the vociferous applause from compatriots in the stands, the general reception of the American team was somewhat lukewarm.

What a love feast! We laughed at the French when they pouted so conspicuously over the bad manners of a Dutch gatekeeper, but our own provincial etiquette of flag-waving will be remembered long after the gatekeeper's row has been forgotten. Is there not some military Emily Post at Washington who can quietly change the rules about flag-dipping—without mentioning the fact to the American Legion?

Amateurism at the Olympic Games has become a farce and international friendship a stiff formality. No lover of true sportsmanship could grieve very deeply if the games were suspended a while until we human beings learn to play together in a civilized manner.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

IF I had a fortune I should build a house. It would not stand upon a hill or by a river's brim. This house of which I dream is situated very near the center of the city. Indeed some betterment association of the town might well endow me, since the plan calls for the purchase of a brownstone front and its immediate demolition. Once the walls were down there could be speculation about a substitute. It would be my own desire to have something in light green or purple. There will be no other house in all the world like my house. It should be so.

Uniformity of architecture is among the most destructive forces in city and suburban life. Somebody should keep statistics upon the careers of a group of persons living in one of those regimented blocks of little houses. Brick for brick the family resemblance holds them fast. They might be, these houses, so many still-born kittens in the litter of an unimaginative cat.

It is my assumption that no one very useful will ever grow up from out of these surroundings. The emergence of the great from shack and hovel probably has truth as well as tradition behind it, but there the controlling factor is something quite different. Abject poverty can give a boy a house more mean and ramshackle than any round about and then, at least, he does escape the blight of sameness. Lincoln had more chance in a log cabin than he would have possessed if his formative years had been passed in one unit of a row of villas. It would be better by far to be cradled in a sampan than to grow up with a Long Island home development. Even the tenements of New York are less depressing than many apartment houses, for they run less to strict conformity in architecture.

Yes, I think I shall build. Most of us are too casual about second-hand houses. The floor plan and the condition of the furnace would not be enough for me. I should like to know something about the history of any building where I was prepared to light. I'd like to know who lived there and for how long and whether they were happy. People adopt a baby and make careful inquiry about heredity influences. In this I take small interest. Babies can be remodeled from the ground up. But it surprises me to find these same people who haggle over a baby's past walking boldly into a residence without knowing a single item of its inheritance. A purchaser might fight shy of a house if more than a few murders had been committed on the premises and there is still some prejudice against haunted dwellings. Of course no person with any pretense to rationality actually believes that any house is haunted. It simply happens that he doesn't like the approach or maybe it is just the plumbing.

I have never seen any ghostly figure or heard the clanking of the chains and yet I am more or less addicted to the belief that emanations do subtly persist in houses. I would rather live in a humble cottage where there had been a nice clean murder, an agreeably rapid and impulsive murder, than take up my abode within walls where one or two had haggled over a span of years. One summer for a brief time I rented a cottage in the country and made no inquiries as to its antecedents. The view was fine and out of the well came excellent water, but every one who stayed in that house for even a day was more than characteristically surly.

And if any guest accepted an invitation for a week-end he went away no more than coldly cordial, while I knew in my heart that I hated him.

During a hot spell of ten days I lost a dozen friends in this fashion. Of course there always seemed a good and apparent reason. There would be quarrels about dice or cards or the principle of prohibition. As I remember, another man and I came almost to blows about the right of secession and whether the South had a constitutional leg upon which to stand in the Civil War. It seemed to me curious that so great a passion could be engendered from an academic matter. Again there was great bitterness between two of the guests because one undertook to tell the other that there was no such word as "arbitrator" and that the proper term was "arbiter." That was the time when I was compelled to step between the disputants saying, "Ladies, ladies, do you want to get your pictures in the Graphic?"

Throughout that summer the premises rang with expressions such as "Shut your yap," "Is that so?," and "When you say that, smile." So curious was the constant bickering that I sought an explanation. I am myself a person of infinite good nature and exquisite manners.

It seemed to me extraordinary that I should ever have been led, even under provocation, to call a girl a blockhead simply because she failed to bid the slam which she so obviously held. It was only a matter of a few thousand points and amounted to very little in money. Under ordinary circumstances I should have expected to find myself passing the whole matter off with a cheery "It really doesn't matter. I honestly don't think you're the worst bridge partner I've ever had. I know several who play much more stupidly."

But in this haunted house no flash of tact ever came to the lips of anyone. Hatred, bitterness, and sarcastic comments seemed almost to cling under the rafters. I found that a farmer and his wife had quarreled in that house for almost thirty years. She finally moved out to a barn across the road. During the last year of the marriage (they both died of a January) neither one spoke to the other. But often she came to the door of the barn and glared across the road at him. It was a narrow road. I am not prepared to defend in any logical or scientific way my belief that this long-protracted venom had impaired that house just as much as if a beam had sagged. All I know is that I had not a civil word for man or woman during an entire summer. And that is enough to convince me that there must have been something malignly miraculous about the cottage.

For fear of being laughed at I will not mention the fact that it was only in the rear of the house that flowers grew. The soil in front seemed much the same and there was even more sun. Big husky rose bushes were all about the front door, but never so much as a bud. Incidentally, I might remark that this was the doorway in which the farmer stood to send back glare for glare to his wife across the road. Still, the apple tree a few yards away bore prodigiously. They were not regular apples but those small, bright red sour ones. I do not know the name they go by, but I believe that they are used for making jelly.

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Poincaré Legend

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, July 8

RAYMOND POINCARÉ should be a proud and happy man. For sixteen years he has been the master of France; his authority underwent a brief eclipse only to issue from it more potent than ever, and for the last two years it has been undisputed. He has been supported by the French people at a general election in which he was the only issue, he has been given a vote of confidence by all parties in the Chamber except the Socialists and Communists, and he has crowned the financial reconstruction of the last two years by giving France a new currency firmly established on a gold basis.

Yet he seems depressed and almost humiliated. The speech in which he announced the legal stabilization of the franc left on its hearers an impression of melancholy. Since stabilization was decided on he has shown more than once a nervousness not at all habitual and, according to some of his colleagues in the Cabinet, he seriously contemplated resignation, at any rate for a moment, immediately after the passing of the stabilization law. And in his last important speech in the Chamber he was no longer the cold, almost inhuman Poincaré with the blunt authoritative manner, to whom we are accustomed, but a softened and persuasive Poincaré who seemed to feel the need of apologizing for himself.

He had reason to be melancholy, for his apparent triumph was in fact a defeat. He has mastered his fellow-countrymen, but economic realities have mastered him. The world imagines that the restoration of a stable currency—the de facto stabilization eighteen months ago and its recent legal consecration—has been the work of Poincaré. Poincaré himself knows better. When he reluctantly and after a strenuous but vain resistance asked the French Parliament to pass the law that made final the repudiation of four-fifths of the French national debt and the imposition on rentiers of a capital levy of 80 per cent, he registered the failure of his ambition to be the “savior of the franc.” His view was that of the French rentier class, of which he is so typical a representative, that the stabilization of the franc at any rate below the pre-war value would be an act of national bankruptcy by which France would be eternally dishonored. That he, the highly respectable bourgeois, should have been obliged to act as liquidator was a bitter humiliation, and the bitterness was no doubt intensified by his consciousness of the fact that his own financial policy before 1924 was one of the causes that had made national bankruptcy inevitable.

When Poincaré took office again two years ago, his currency policy was complete revalorization. His intention was gradually to bring back the franc to its par value, either by a continuous rise or by stages. It was only with great difficulty that he was persuaded at the beginning of last year to allow the Bank of France to peg the franc at about twenty-five to the dollar, and perhaps he would not have yielded had there not been the beginnings of an industrial crisis. Even then he did not abandon the idea of revalorization by stages—a disastrous method, for it would have meant periodic crises each time that the value of the franc was increased. Even after the last general election he said that France was like a patient requiring a prolonged treatment whose cure would not be hastened by “surgical operations.” It is extremely probable that Poincaré himself inspired the campaign against legal stabilization in the Temps and other papers after the election, for the purpose of organizing public opinion to support him against the Bank of France and the industrial interests.

Only the threat of Moreau, the governor of the Bank of France, to resign if legal stabilization were longer delayed at last obliged Poincaré to yield, and it is not surprising that he should have resented his forced surrender. When he had consented to legal stabilization there was another fight on the question of the convertibility of banknotes into gold. Poincaré wished gold at once to be obtainable by anybody asking for it and to circulate as freely as before the war. He was with difficulty persuaded to abandon this policy.

Thus the stabilization of the franc, far from being the work of Poincaré, has been forced upon him, not so much by men as by facts. He was obliged at last to recognize the impossibility of a policy that would have trebled the French budget, have made the service of the national debt alone cost about $5,000,000,000 a year, and ruined French industry into the bargain; but it took a great deal of trouble to make him recognize it. This is to say that the conception of Poincaré as a great finance minister is absurd. He has in fact done nothing, and the policy of which he has been the executor has not been his policy. All that has been done has been done by the Bank of France and the staff of the Finance Department, often in the teeth of Poincaré's opposition. The only reason why Poincaré has succeeded where his predecessors failed is that he has had a majority in Parliament, whereas his predecessors were turned out one after the other as soon as they tried to do anything.

The extraordinary hold of Poincaré on his fellow-countrymen is a remarkable phenomenon, not easy to explain. For he is not and never has been popular in the true sense of the term. Popular heroes in France have usually been southerners, often of foreign origin like Napoleon and Gambetta, nearly always flamboyant orators. Napoleon was not an orator, it is true, but he was decidedly flamboyant, not to say cabotin, in spite of his undoubted, although limited, genius. Clemenceau is cynical rather than flamboyant, but he is a chauvinist of the romantic type and he owed his once great popularity to that fact and to his wit. Poincaré, too, is a chauvinist, but not of the romantic type; he is the opposite of flamboyant and is not a great orator. In some respects he is not typically French—no Lorrainer is typically French. He is as methodical as a German and there is something of the English politician in his clear and businesslike statements. Poincaré is one of the very few French politicians able to set out facts and figures methodically and make his case clear. It may be that he inspires confidence on this account—just because he is unlike the rest. But in some respects Poincaré is typical of the French bourgeoisie, or of the French peasant—which comes to much the same thing, for the French bourgeoisie betrays its peasant origin.

He has the narrowly juridical mentality, the meticulous regard for formulas, the respect for the letter of written documents, the limited shrewdness of outlook. He is in fact very much like a notary, and the French are always ready to intrust their interests to a notary. And he inspires confidence because he knows his own mind, has definite aims, and pursues them with dogged persistence.

Yet this is by no means the first time that Poincaré has been vanquished by circumstances and failed in his policy. One reason no doubt is that he lacks perception and cannot see far enough ahead. When Clemenceau said of him that he knew everything and understood nothing, it was of course a boutade in which there was deliberate exaggeration, but there was a great deal of truth in it. When one looks back on the last sixteen years, during which Poincaré has been a dominant influence in French politics, it is hard to say where his policy has succeeded. No doubt his policy in 1912-1914 was one of the most important factors in bringing about the war. When he was elected President of the Republic in January, 1913, Anatole France said at once that it meant war, so did Michel Corday, so did some others of us in Paris. But, although I have no doubt at all as to Poincaré's responsibility for the war, I am not sure that he deliberately willed it. I am rather inclined to think the contrary. Certainly he wished to recover Alsace-Lorraine—he himself has said that its recovery was the only thing that his generation of Frenchmen had to live for; certainly he intended to pursue a spirited foreign policy, “une politique fière,” to show that France, as again he himself said in 1912, was not afraid of war; but I doubt whether he had enough perception to realize that his policy was leading to war inevitably. When the war came, it became his persistent aim, not merely to recover Alsace-Lorraine, but to annex the whole of the Rhineland, or at any rate to separate it from Germany. He had not abandoned that aim in 1923, as the Dariac report showed, but he has not attained it and never will. He, with Millerand, destroyed the agreement made by Briand with Lloyd George at Cannes and forced Briand to resign, but a few years later he was obliged to accept Locarno, which was the outcome of the Cannes failure and much to be preferred from every point of view, except that of the French chauvinist. He invaded the Ruhr, refusing Bonar Law's offer to cancel the French debt to England if he would refrain, in order to force Germany to pay grotesque sums in reparations, and the only result was that he was obliged to accept the Dawes Plan, which was an admission that she could not pay them. For, although Herriot had become Prime Minister when the Dawes Plan actually went through, Poincaré had accepted it in principle before he went out of office in 1924. Since Poincaré became Prime Minister again in 1926, it is true that he has wrecked the Thoiry agreement, as he previously wrecked that of Cannes, but, although he has postponed a Franco-German understanding and may postpone it further, I do not think that he will be able permanently to prevent it. It is even possible that Poincaré may be the Prime Minister to evacuate the Rhineland, if he remains in office longer than Austen Chamberlain.

In short, Poincaré's career has been a failure. He has done those things that he would not have done and left undone those things that he would have done. But, as J. M. Keynes said the other day in the London Nation, politicians “are the interpreters, not the masters, of our fate. It is their job, in short, to register the fait accompli.” So we may say that, in the matter of stabilization, as in the other matters mentioned, Poincaré has done his job.

Brokers and “Suckers”

By ROBERT RYAN

DURING the spring months of this year the customers' rooms of Wall Street's brokerage houses were overflowing with a new type of speculator. In these broad rooms you could see feverish young men and heated elders, eyes intent upon the ticker tape. The ranks of the inexperienced—the “suckers”—were swelled by numbers of men who had been attracted by newspaper stories of the big, easy profits to be made in a tremendous bull market, of millions captured overnight by the Fisher Brothers, Arthur Cutten, and Durant. At first these newcomers risked a few hundred dollars with some broker they knew, discovered that it was easy to make money this way, and finally made their headquarters in the broker's large customers' room, bringing with them their entire checking and savings accounts.

These amateurs were not schooled in markets that had seen stringent, panicky drops in prices. They came in on a rising tide. They speculated on tips, on hunches, on “follow-the-leader” principles. When a stock rose sharply they all jumped for it—and frequently were left holding the bag of higher prices. They would sell or buy on the slightest notice, usually obeying implicitly the advice of their broker.

Out of this combustible desire to trade in and out of the market, abuses have arisen. Some brokers, none too scrupulous, have taken advantage of the helplessness of the small customer. The broker can make more commissions by rapid trading than by holding stocks for real appreciation in value, and he knows that this particular type of customer is here today and gone tomorrow. He must make commissions while the money shines.

Sometime ago I spent about two months in a busy broker's office. I had been offered a position as customer's man (to get new accounts and keep them posted on the market's doings). As I wanted to see whether I would like this work, I asked for a two months' period in which to learn the business. The broker with whom I became associated is considered reliable and honest, and the offer was supposedly an attractive one. I sat in the private office of the president and was thus able to follow quite minutely the methods by which he conducted his business. Years of experience with ordinary business had given me no hint of the practices I saw occur as everyday procedure—in the main practices highly prejudicial to the average customer's interest. So astonished was I that I questioned several other Wall Street brokers, only to find that the practices I saw were common enough on the Street, indulged in more or less generally by large and small firms.

There are two ways in which stock may be bought through a broker. One is to limit the price by stipulating exactly what the broker may pay. For instance, if you wished to buy General Motors stock, you would see on the ticker tape that the last quoted sale was at $194 a share. If you were willing to pay that price or less you would order your broker to buy 50 shares at $194. In this way, if the price had jumped a point or so after the quotation you saw, you would not buy the stock, but your order would stand at $194 until you got the stock at that price or canceled the order. It might also happen that if the stock had a temporary recession, you would get it at less than $194 a share.

The other method of buying is to give a "market order." Thus, in the same circumstances as those above, if General Motors had a sudden rise in price you would pay the current rate being quoted on the Stock Exchange floor. It might be $194.50, $196, or more, as the stock responded to buying. Or if the stock were selling for less, you would also pay the current quotation. When placing a market order you cannot tell what price you will pay for your stock.

I shall list here a few of the incidents I witnessed while in the office. On Thursday the partner of Mr. X, whose name I shall conceal, had bought some shares of Arabian bank stock at $440 a share. This stock was not listed on the Stock Exchange but was dealt in by over-the-counter houses (houses which deal in unlisted securities). These firms make their own prices, determined solely by the demand for the stock. There is usually a marked difference in quotations by these houses, and the practice is to call several of them before buying in order to get the best price. On Friday morning a customer of Mr. X telephoned an order to sell 50 shares of Arabian bank stock. Mr. X obtained his permission to sell "at the best price." He called to his partner, "Want any more of that Arabian bank stock?"

"At what price?" answered Mr. Y. "I paid $440 a share yesterday."

"You can have this for less," said Mr. X. "I've got a market order. The market is 415 bid, 445 offered. Want it at 415?"

"Sure," said Mr. Y. And the customer was informed that it was too bad he got such a low price—but after all, "we sold it at the market."

The dishonesty of this transaction lies in the fact that if several firms had been called and the stock offered for sale, a better price could have been obtained, for this was an active stock in good demand with a wide difference between the bid-and-ask prices.

Incident No. 2: This firm was "bullish" on a certain stock—they believed its price would go higher. Suddenly a panic developed in the stock and it began to decline at a rapid rate. The large and small customers who owned the stock all began selling at once. When the selling confirmations came in, Mr. X announced that no selling prices could be given out until all the orders were checked. In the next half hour Mr. X and his partners selected those sales which had brought the best prices, allotted these best prices to their larger customers, and allowed the small fry to get what was left. This is obviously unfair discrimination. A record is kept by the order clerk of the sequence in which the selling orders are placed. Consequently, the prices of the sales should have been allotted in that order.

"Of course," Mr. X remarked, "we make most money from our large customers, and we must keep them satisfied."

Incident No. 3: The broker charges a standard—and substantial—commission on the orders he executes, yet it is common practice among all firms to borrow money at, let us say, 5 per cent and charge 6 per cent to their customers who buy on margin. The Stock Exchange has ruled that brokers may charge their customers the exact amount of interest, or more than the exact amount, that they themselves have to pay when they borrow the money in the open market or from banks; but in no case may brokers charge the customers less than the brokers pay in borrowing the money. This rule has been promulgated in order that brokers may not offer the extra inducement of a reduced interest rate to large speculators in order to acquire them as customers. This rule does away with a great deal of cut-throat competition; but in practice the large customer is actually charged the same amount of interest as the broker pays or very little more, while the small customer pays an average of  $\frac{3}{4}$  of one per cent additional on all money which he uses when buying on margin. This  $\frac{3}{4}$  of one per cent, various brokers have told me, is intended to cover the entire overhead cost of their business. This means that the commissions which are paid for buying or selling the stock are net income to the brokerage house. It is easy to understand why brokerage houses insist that they are justified in charging this so-called "service fee" for negotiating a loan for a client.

Incident No. 4: Mr. X stepped into the customers' room and announced with a great show of sagacity that "Pomegranate A" was a purchase at current prices, and that he advised immediate purchase. His advice was quickly followed; there was general buying by the customers who thought they saw an opportunity to make some quick money. A few minutes later Mr. X notified one of his large customers that he had sold 1,500 shares of "Pomegranate A" at excellent prices, and received the client's congratulations for a good "execution." Those customers in the big room who bought on Mr. X's advice paid 6 per cent or more on their money, and watched the stock drop in value. The story behind this transaction was enlightening. Mr. X's large customer had heard from a director of "Pomegranate A" that the quarterly dividend would not be paid and that this fact would be announced in a few days. Knowing that the stock would drop in price after such an announcement, Mr. X's customer gave immediate orders to sell at the current prices. Mr. X knew that "Pomegranate A" was a volatile stock and that if he dumped 1,500 shares on the market it would break the price of the stock. So, by getting his small customers to buy these shares, he placed a cushion under the stock to absorb the 1,500 shares he was selling. He sold at no sacrifice and induced his smaller customers to buy stock which he knew would decline in value.

Incident No. 5: A "pool" is made to maintain current prices in a certain stock or push those prices higher. Mr. X was in a pool to raise the price on "New York Rug." This pool had made a substantial profit by the time its price had been shoved up to $212 a share. Thereupon the members of the pool decided to liquidate their holdings and take their profits. Mr. X knew that this stock was not worth $212 a share and that when the pool had distributed its holdings the stock would drop in value. Mr. X had put a large number of his customers into this stock at high prices. When any of them called to inquire about it he answered cheerfully, "It's good for $250 a share. Yes, I'm holding mine." So his customers held on.

When Mr. X and his friends had finished taking their profits by selling the stock and the news had come out on the floor that the pool had disbanded there was a great deal of "short selling." (If you believe a stock is selling at a price above its real value, you sell it and buy it back at a lower price—if you are lucky.) These "short sales" forced the stock down, and it was only then that Mr. X telephoned his customers that he understood the stock was a sale at once, and watched his customers receive much lower prices.

Incident No. 6: Mr. X advised all his customers to buy "Rotten Apples Common." Since Mr. X's firm helped to finance the stock issue their interest in selling this stock could hardly be wholly disinterested.

It would be simple to multiply these incidents and cite other practices, but what I suggested in the first part of this article has, I believe, been amply shown: in every case under my observation the broker felt that he must give the advantage, even though it were a dishonest advantage, to his large customer, for the large customer is his bread and butter and his profits. The small investor or speculator remains completely unaware of these practices. In a rising market such methods may be employed without losing the customer's business, for a speculator will overlook small irregularities as long as he continues to make money; while in a declining market the broker gets away with an equal amount of dishonesty, the customer blames the results on market drops. If a customer loses all his money, or so dislikes the actions of Mr. X's firm that he withdraws his business, Mr. X is completely unconcerned. As he remarked to me: "Suckers are born every minute; the glamor of easy money gets them all. One goes, two come in. Win or lose, we get our commissions." It is an easy-going philosophy which has been so completely proved true by many Wall Street brokers that they have no reason to revise it.

How such practices can be stopped I do not know; nor do I imagine that it is within the power of the Stock Exchange authorities to prevent them. I do believe that one step ahead would be to forbid all brokerage houses or their employees to transact business for themselves, to compel them to act solely as customers' agents. Surely this would make them a trifle more disinterested in the advice they give their clients.

In the meantime Mr. X's firm is making money hand over fist. In another month they will move to quarters three times their present space.

In the Driftway

"COLOR movies" are the latest invention of those persistent persons who are unflagging in their attempts to make art just like life, and the Drifter is in a dreadful state of depression at the prospect. And not only are amateur photographers to be able to take pictures in color, but the synchronization of sound with movement is to be perfected, so that a red-headed man shouting to his black-haired wife will come out unmercifully red and black and noisy, and the cooing of a pale, adolescent suitor to his rouged and lip-sticked lady will not be softened one whit from the painful truth!

* * * * *

THE Drifter denies heatedly that this is a pessimistic viewpoint. For what is the purpose of the motion picture or the drama or fiction or poetry or any work of the imagination? It is to be just that—a work of the imagination. Often enough critics of the "realistic" school of fiction have complained that these sour novels are not really like life; and conversely, audiences at depressingly sordid plays have moaned that "there is enough trouble in life. People go to the theater to be amused." The truth of the matter is somewhere in between. For life itself is so unbearably intricate, so unutterably beautiful or so hideously cruel that a faithful representation of it by way of art would be more than any reader or listener could endure. It would blast the ears, it would blind the eyes. Art simplifies life, narrows it, softens it to the point where it can be observed without acute pain. Thus the song of the wood thrush, the color of the evening sky, the din of steam riveters, and a movie director's idea of a tastefully furnished house had better remain as unobtrusive as possible.

* * * * *

ALL this is assuming that the motion picture is art or that it will be. The Drifter has his own opinion about the matter, but he has been called a crabbed pessimist so often that he refuses to be quoted on the subject. Plenty of persons promise that some day the movies will be in the same class with Michelangelo and Milton, and stranger things undoubtedly have happened. But they will never achieve this eminence by the photographic synchronization of form and color and sound. Milton's characters are angels and devils, Michelangelo's are gods. Life is certainly not like that. Nor does anybody want it to be, least of all the Drifter. He himself asks little of life and only a little more of art. He does not go to the movies and he abjures the talkies like a pestilence. For him the graceful young men at the Paramount—or is it Roxy's?—are phantoms ushering shadowy patrons to imaginary plush chairs. They might be characters in fiction, just as Becky Sharpe or Tom Jones might be his neighbors. What he sees with his eyes he cannot quite believe, be it never so faithfully colored or so exactly sounded. What enters into his mind becomes part of his mind, no matter how "unreal," how "unlifelike." When the movies stop trying to imitate and begin to originate the Drifter will cheerfully—every once in a while—pay his money at the gate and sit through the evening's program.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has received the following note from S. M. Reynolds, managing editor of the Baltimore Sun, in regard to the story about President Coolidge quoted from that journal:

In view of the very complimentary references in your column in The Nation of June 20, I thought that you would be interested in knowing that the author of the story referred to is Mr. Max Ways, one of the younger members of the Sun staff. Incidentally, Mr. Ways is the son of the late Max Ways, Sr., who was for many years one of the outstanding newspapermen of Baltimore.

THE DRIFTER

In Reply to Senator Norris

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of July 18 Senator G. W. Norris states that the same interests which controlled the Republican convention at Kansas City controlled the Democratic convention at Houston. The Senator asks: What are the people going to do about it? And then answers as follows: "It seems to me about the only thing we can do is to call the attention of the people to the fundamental difficulty—our Electoral College."

Senator Norris is right—the Electoral College should be abolished and the people given the power to nominate and elect the President directly; but how best "to call the attention of the people" to the direct nomination and election of the President is the practical question.

Many Progressives believe that if the actual operation of the Electoral College could be brought home to this generation the old system would easily give way to the new. In other words, if in a close national election a strong independent like Senator Norris were in the field, he would carry several States and elect a sufficient number of independent Presidential electors to hold the balance of power in the Electoral College, and thereby demonstrate to the people that they do not elect the President in November, but that the President is elected the following year when the electoral vote is cast, and failing there of a majority, the election passes to the House of Representatives.

If Senator Norris should reconsider the Farmer-Labor nomination and accept the same (or he failing to do so, some other Progressive accept it) and carry Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, and Nebraska, the independent Presidential electors might hold, are likely to hold, the balance of power in the Electoral College, cause the election to go into the House of Representatives, and thereby demonstrate to the people that they do not elect their own President under the antiquated Electoral College method now in vogue.

Whittier, California, July 22

ARTHUR G. WRAY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Senator Norris evidently believes that election of the President of the United States by direct vote of the people would weaken our two-party system and improve the chances of a new party. The two-party system, however, has prevailed in our State elections of governors as well as in the elections for Parliament in Great Britain, although such elections are by the direct vote of the people. The election of our President by direct vote, i. e., election of the candidate that receives the largest number of votes all over the country, would eliminate the pivotal States and rid us of the corrupt efforts to win such States, but the two-party system is sure to remain on account of the eagerness of party leaders to insure success at the November election by harmonizing the most discordant elements at the nominating convention.

In Germany there are forty-one political parties, and France and other continental countries of Europe find no trouble to escape the two-party system. The second election in these countries, when no candidate receives a majority of all votes cast at the first election, encourages the organization of sincere groups interested in certain issues into political parties.

No efforts are made to attract members of differing views by meaningless or ambiguous platforms or to resort to the desperate methods to bring about harmony within the party which prevail under the two-party system. When a majority of the votes cast does not elect any one, there is a second election ahead to decide between the leading candidates. Before this second election occur the conversations and negotiations between the political parties that result in cartels of parties supporting the same candidate in the final election.

A split of the Republican Party was fatal in 1912 and gave the Presidency to the Democrat Woodrow Wilson. The split might have proved harmless if a second election had been necessary because Wilson did not receive a majority of all votes cast, and the Roosevelt party and Taft party might have formed a cartel for the final election.

Los Angeles, July 19

C. M. ENNS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The recent letter of Senator Norris to The Nation deserves attention. He sketches the apparent indifference of the public to corruption and to the growth of the power trust, and comes to the conclusion that we can make no progress until we have changed the Constitution, abolished the Electoral College, and established the system of voting directly for President.

This amazing position not only gives up the ship, because it is obvious that it would take a generation at least to secure such a constitutional amendment, but it is opposed to reason and to experience. Convenient election machinery is not necessary in order to put over great ideas. All that is necessary is to educate the people, and they will make use of whatever machinery there is at hand to register their will.

The truth is that it is entirely feasible to get the names of candidates, other than of the major parties, upon our ballot, as experience abundantly proves. The Socialists and Prohibitionists have done it for a generation. Roosevelt and Johnson did it in 1912. The ridiculous Farmer-Labor Party did it in 1920; La Follette and Wheeler did it in 1924. It would be entirely feasible to put Senator Norris's name on the ballot in every State this year, if he cared to run.

The real trouble is that the progressive and radical leaders cannot agree upon any political program which will stand the discussion of a campaign. The Socialist program makes no appeal to thoughtful people. The Roosevelt platform in 1912 was a jumble of aspirations and palliatives. The La Follette platform of 1924 had eleven planks, all of which except one were superficial, unrelated each to the other, or to the abolition of monopoly. The plank for government ownership of railroads was the only fundamental declaration, and both La Follette and Wheeler got scared and never mentioned it during the campaign. Their speeches were a wearisome repetition of stale attacks upon big business, without any constructive plan for abolishing or lessening monopoly.

Jersey City, July 23

GEORGE L. RECORD

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Senator Norris's suggestion in regard to abolishing the Electoral College system of electing a President is the typical expression of a sincere but misguided idealist. His plan might make it harder for the mosquitoes to get in, but the scientific method nowadays is to try to destroy the eggs and larvae at the source.

If "the great trusts, particularly the water-power trust, control the destiny of our republic," is it logical to think that they would be fooled by any change in the system of election? Is it not as clear as the Senator's nose that as long as these trusts have tremendous power and as long as it is to their interest as private and therefore power-desiring organizations to control our destiny, the only conceivable remedy is to abolish this prime incentive by nationalizing them? Is it not a fact that cries to heaven that while we are tinkering with our political machinery, down in the economic boiler-room the pressure is increasing to a dangerous degree? Come down into the boiler-room, Senator, and have a look around. And then take off your Senatorial frock and pitch into it. Never mind about the machinery on the upper floors.

Brooklyn, New York, July 18

PHILIP POLLACK

Correspondence

"Zu Ehren von Al Smith"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR:

Ich sitze hier beim Pilsner Bier
Und denke an Al Smith.
Ich trank bis jetzt der Krügel vier
Zum Wohle von Al Smith.
Und bin ich voll mit Gerstensaft,
Dann rufe ich aus voller Kraft:
Three cheers for wet Al Smith!
Auch cocktails trink ich dann und wann
Zu Ehren von Al Smith.
Die highballs kommen später dran,
Es lebe dear old Smith!
Und wird er endlich Präsident
Dann sing ich frank und frei,
Vorerst da shake ich his hand,
For he never will be dry.

Osijek, Czecho-Slovakia, July 15

JULIUS PFEIFFER

Ocean Liners' Limits

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A coincidence in a recent evening's reading included the item in The Nation of July 18 giving comparative lengths and tonnages of the huge transatlantic liners already in operation and the new Oceanic now under construction, and a paragraph from "The Education of Henry Adams."

Henry Adams was in the heat of his advanced-middle-age revival of his pursuit of education, and at the time was engrossed in trying to figure out the economic relation between the panic of 1893 and the wonders of the Exposition at Chicago, which he visited the same year. He says:

Historical exhibits were common, but they never went far enough; none were thoroughly worked out. One of the best was that of the Cunard steamers, but still a student hungry for results found himself obliged to waste a pencil and several sheets of paper trying to calculate exactly when, according to the given increase of power, tonnage, and speed, the growth of the ocean steamer would reach its limits. His figures brought him, he thought, to the year 1927; another generation to spare before force, space, and time should meet. The ocean steamer ran the surest line of triangulation into the future, because it was the nearest of man's products to a unity; railroads taught less because they seemed already finished except for mere increase in number; explosives taught most, but needed a tribe of chemists, physicists, and mathematicians to explain.

Spokane, Washington, July 18

EDITH D. ABBOTT

As Seen in Arkansas

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation of July 11 you speak of Smith, Catholic, Wet, and Tammany, linked in trial marriage to Robinson, Protestant, Dry, and anti-Negro. I can see no incongruity in the fact that a Catholic and a Protestant are the standard-bearers of the Democratic Party. In fact, though a Protestant, I am very glad indeed that a Catholic is heading the ticket. It will give us another opportunity to make an open fight on intolerance and bigotry. The Ku Klux Klan, Anti-Saloon League preachers, and others here in Arkansas say that Robinson is not a Dry and never has been.

Robinson may be anti-Negro, as you charge, but there are thousands of Negroes in Arkansas who are going to vote for Smith and Robinson. One Negro leader said that his people had been voting the Republican ticket for sixty years, which was, he believed, long enough to show their gratitude to the Republican Party for having freed them, and it was their desire now to express their admiration for Senator Robinson. If you still believe fundamental American rights, guaranteed by the Constitution, are denied to Americans whose skins happen to be dark, I suggest that you send a representative to Little Rock next November and watch them vote.

There will be a fight on the Democratic ticket in the South this year. The Dry organizations, Ku Kluxers, Mystic Knights, political preachers are calling mass meetings and circulating petitions which pledge the signers to vote only for a Dry for President. They are asking the people not to waste their vote on a third party nor to stay at home but to come to the polls and cast their ballots for Hoover. Whether this movement will continue and gain force or die out, I do not know. I hope it continues, not that I am in sympathy with it, but I would like to see a spirited fight here in the South. It will be a great aid to liberalism. The prohibition question has got to be fought out and settled before we can move on to economic issues which are more important.

You say, "The fact remains that it is the same old Democratic Party with which we have to deal," but I am inclined to believe with the New York World and the Chicago Tribune that we are dealing with a new party, very different, at least, from the party of Bryan.

Senator Nye says the heritage of hate keeps the South solid. What heritage keeps the West Republican? Why are the Hoover-baiters clamoring to get on his bandwagon? Even Brookhart, I understand, is a great Hoover supporter.

But there is one man out West who is a consistent progressive and one of America's ablest men, who is not guilty of crow-eating and turning political somersaults, that is, Norris.

Little Rock, Arkansas, July 15

FORREST F. REED

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

"PORGY" || REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

|| JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 5:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

|| GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

THE ACTOR MANAGERS present

GRAND STREET FOLLIES

OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Tues. (Pop.) & Thurs.

Books

Hamlet in Modern Dress

By JAMES RORTY

Nymph, in thy orisons, do not forget
A certain poet who had laughed
Himself half way to wisdom, having set
Guards at the gate of his eternal city
Fiercely to slay the beggars of self-pity . . .
Half way, I said; hence, maiden, waft
A prayer into that infinite
Air that laves the world, wherein we sow
Fear, grief, desire, deeds, the bright
Keen lust of satyrs and the dream of saints.
This air we breathe, and whoso faints
Has need of laughter; so
Go to, my girl . . . get thee to a nunnery, the poet's mad;
Who's he to blow the bubble of your world?
The time is out of joint; his lips are curled.

Mighty Is Man

By WILLIAM ROSE BENÉT

To the body of woman man turns and seeks deliverance
From his world grown strange since deliverance from her thighs;
To the womb he turns, to his infancy's paradise,
Blind with a dream, an outcast weary of severance.

From the body of woman man rises with exultation Shaking his veins. Singing, he whets a sword.
He is freed of his weakness now, he has loosed the cord
That binds him to alien mysteries of creation.

Again he is mighty, he stamps for joy of his strength;
His words, his deeds will be clamorous round the earth.
Woman, who bore him, merely gives him rebirth
Who returns to spurn, and return again, at length,

To the grieved eternal breast that lulled him since life began,
To the eyes that smile in the dark on that baffled Antaeus, Man.

How to Change Things

Marx and Lenin: The Science of Revolution. By Max Eastman. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

SOME people want a social revolution. Others of us prefer other methods of getting forward. Still others don't want to move at all; they are too comfortable where they are. Max Eastman's is a good book for all three classes. It contains a vast amount of shrewd good sense about revolutions, mixed, in my judgment, with some nonsense. Written by one who wants to show how to make a communist revolution, it is essentially a devastating attack on orthodox Marxism, from the standpoint of instrumental thinking as opposed to Hegelian metaphysics. Mr. Eastman wants the Socialists to rescue Marx the practical revolutionist from Marx the Hegelian dialectician. He wants the Communists to follow the real Lenin, the hard-headed, tireless engineer of revolution, rather than the metaphysical Lenin, the fierce Marxian dogmatist. Marx was wrong, Lenin right—thus Mr. Eastman.

Communicants in the Marxian church and worshipers in the Moscow synagogue alike are bound to curse this book and stone its author, despite his friendly purpose. For orthodox Marxism, the official religion of the Socialists, which is likewise professed in Russia, has abandoned God only to set up a new god, named the Forces of Production, who is inevitably producing socialism out of capitalism by the machinery of class struggle and consequent proletarian dictatorship. Bosh! says Mr. Eastman, truly enough; history is producing nothing. Revolutions are brought about by men who actually will them and under certain circumstances succeed in pulling them off. That is what Lenin did.

Marxism as science, and not as metaphysics, declares Mr. Eastman, asserts simply, on the basis of historical observation, that the major forces controlling society are economic class interests, that wealth production is becoming more cooperative and its control more centralized, and that, therefore, the only possible revolutionary plan is to transfer that control to the producers themselves through the revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat, which can expropriate the present owners. This done, "human society could begin to move in the direction of freedom, and political sincerity, and international peace, and an opportunity of life for every member of it."

Despite his orthodox, contemptuous rejection of "utopian-evangelical" methods of reform, Mr. Eastman certainly lets loose a very large serpent among the fig-trees of the revolutionary garden. If revolutionary will and purpose count, so do counter-revolutionary and even despised bourgeois-reform purpose. The very acts of hard-fisted capitalists and soft-headed reformers are in sober fact changing the total of circumstances that condition the action of the clear-eyed revolutionist who knows what's what. Behold Mr. Eastman's own doubt: Outside Russia "just at the present moment it is apparently not possible to break down capitalism." Is it possible that it was something else that broke down in Russia? Some of us who love capitalism none too well suspect as much. Says Lenin: "Only when the masses do not want the old regime, and when the rulers are unable to govern as of old, only then can a revolution succeed."

True enough, and scant comfort to American revolutionaries, if such there be. For in manifest fact, the exploited American workingman and farmer still ride in their Fords from the movie palace to the polls to vote for Coolidges and Hardings, and apparently they will keep on voting for them so long as they can continue to get three square meals a day, and so long as too many half-wit juries do not acquit the Dohenys and Falls and Sinclairs and Stewarts. (Incidentally, the meals keep on getting squarer.) Doubtless the interests of the "exploited masses" are irreconcilably opposed to those of Messrs. Coolidge and Co. Yet neither W. Z. Foster nor the already forgotten Farmer Townley, nor even The Nation itself has yet succeeded in convincing them of that fact; and here is Mr. Hoover all ready to lead a united people triumphantly forward into a newly opened and yet more luxuriously upholstered wing of our capitalist heaven—unless they stop for a drink by the way. Such facts did not greatly trouble the old-fashioned Socialist, for he was sure that the god of productive forces would in due time grind out a revolution; they are calculated to give long pause to "scientific" rather than metaphysical revolutionists. The lessons of history may not be so clear after all.

Possibly we shall yet see a progressive lessening, not a sudden destruction, of the power of property owners, though the utilities investigation is calculated to shake any but the most robust faith in anything short of extreme communism. Still, some of us are hopeful—fatuously so, Mr. Eastman would observe.

A concluding observation concerning this admirable and stimulating book. Some people's skepticism extends even to post-dated Russian checks drawn on the Bank of the Future, much as we should like to honor them. Some of us soft-headed ones still believe that the road to liberty for advanced peoples lies through regions of gradually increasing freedom, and not over a magic carpet of all-wise, all-benevolent dictatorship. We are accordingly bound to ponder certain of Mr. Eastman's observations by the way: that "wholesale curtailments of liberty and violations of their own ultimate ideal of social relations, are a necessary and intrinsic part of the plan of action of all scientific revolutionists"; that the essence of the Russian political situation is the unshakable dominance of the Communist Party, which holds "a position in the new state not unlike that occupied by the personal sovereign in the old"; that the most unsatisfactory feature of the Russian experiment is the failure to establish a great system of education, in place of which has been set up "this great solemn fetish of dialectic materialism, which is nothing but the old shoes of Almighty God"; and that the second most unsatisfactory feature is the absence of a direct and simple purpose "to see to it that the proletarian dictatorship and the collective ownership of the means of production shall create to the full extent possible at any stage of its development, a free and true human society." Alas! After ten years here is another full-sized serpent in the garden.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Summer Reading

The Battle of the Horizons. By Sylvia Thompson. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

her knight comes riding. By John V. A. Weaver. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IN her rather mediocre, rather likable and well-intentioned variation on the old theme of the American venturing to amalgamate his crudities with European subtleties, Miss Thompson has made the rather usual mistake of comparing unlike quantities on the assumption that they are like, except for the racial differences. The rather preposterous little simpleton she calls Athene comes from a wealthy, socially prominent and non-literate American family. She leaps at the romantic possibilities of marriage with the son of an English baronet. There are newly rich even in England, and any newly rich English girl would equally well have served such contrasts as Miss Thompson has achieved, and would have saved her revealing her ignorance of Americans. Athene may have aroused some smiles in England; she would have been razed to death in America. The author had a real idea of her as a person, a more real idea than was embodied in Carol Kennicott; but she failed to shape the various good hunches into a recognizable whole, and in any case, they are scattered about too widely in the general morass induced by thinking rightly about life in terms of neat little invented characters.

Mr. Weaver gives a beautiful exhibition of a boxer dancing skilfully all around a great hulking opponent without ever getting inside his defenses. The opponent is his theme. No one could ask a better theme than the conflict in the individual of those adventurous impulses which send an occasional hardy soul rolling around the world gathering no moss—if moss is to be construed as home, family, income, and position—but gathering a various and possibly non-negotiable lore, with the impulse to clothe one's nakedness in a fine mesh of habit and to spend the years achieving security for further years. But Mr. Weaver has wedded the desire for adventure and romance to a certain scurviness of soul, in order to point a moral in favor of more homespun virtues. Moreover, he has seen such a nice little tight little Freudian fable in the possible influence of a romantic rapscallion father on an adoring girl that he has thrown overboard most of the possibilities of his theme.

His command of current argot, those lively phrases that seem to be precipitated out of the New York air, and that sometimes afford unexpected glimpses into the lives of those who use them, is as entertaining in this book as in his poems. And he paints all his characters with that superficial honesty that is one of the first steps to virtue in a novelist, and that the reader is increasingly surprised and delighted to find behind the new jackets. It takes a certain paroxysm of the soul to discover more than superficial truths in any thing or person, and of anything so pathological as such a paroxysm, Mr. Weaver is blithely guiltless. He adheres to the general belief that a novel can be a Sahara desert, provided it goes somewhere and is on to a racket or two. But this is not to be held against him. He would be an exception if he clung to the fantastic view that each paragraph and each page should justify its existence.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

More About "Mother India"

Father India. A Reply to Mother India. By C. S. Ranga Iyer, member of the Indian Legislative Assembly. Louis Carrier and Company. $2.

Miss Mayo's Mother India. A Rejoinder. By K. Natarajan, Editor the Indian Social Reformer. Madras: G. A. Natesan and Company. 12 annas.

ONLY a person with an untrained and unreflective mind would ever have attempted what Miss Mayo did in her "Mother India." Without a single evident misgiving she endeavored, on the basis of a few months of travel and a small amount of reading, to appraise the public health, morals, economic state, politics, and religion of over three hundred million people. That she failed has been shown abundantly in numerous reviews, articles, and books. Errors of fact and interpretation have been pointed out by many writers in such great number that there is now hardly a point in her arraignment left unimpaired.

The two books here noticed make havoc of much of her argument. Mr. Natarajan's method is chiefly direct refutation—to point out errors, to show the antiquity and unreliability of many of her authorities, to give her the lie direct in regard to many of her specific quotations from Indians. Mr. Iyer uses somewhat the same method, but adds to it an entertaining running commentary of the "tu quoque" sort, to indicate that bad as Miss Mayo says (erroneously) things are in India, they are even worse in America; and he bases this part of his work chiefly on the writings of Judge Ben Lindsey.

In connection with all the controversy aroused by "Mother India" there is one point of some importance that still needs to be cleared up, namely, how Miss Mayo came to undertake an "investigation" of India. She herself in her book gives us to understand that the moving force was solely her own inner consciousness. Yet in an address last January before the Contemporary Club in Philadelphia she told a different story. She stated, according to my recollection, that two prominent officers of the Rockefeller Foundation called her to the foundation's offices in New York, where they laid before her a mass of statistics concerning the appalling state of public health in India, and spoke in despair of ever getting the world to realize what a menace the country is. Here was where she could help. She was to take this material of theirs, go to India herself to see the land and the people and accumulate what she calls "test facts," and then with the application of her literary skill present a shocking and forceful picture of this menace that would move the world to protest. This, of course, makes the Rockefeller Foundation appear to be the father of the volume to which she has given birth.

It would be well if both she and the Rockefeller Foundation would make statements in detail about the complicity, if any, between the two. Certainly the foundation should do so, and, if possible, remove from itself the odium of having begot her offspring. It will not help the public health work which is supported in India by the foundation's funds to have this claim of hers stand unrefuted.

W. NORMAN BROWN

A Westminster Exhibitionist

Winston Churchill. By "Ephesian." Robert M. McBride and Company. $5.

THE anonymous author of this life of Winston Churchill has not approached his task in any critical mood. His tremendous admiration for his subject is evident in every page—an admiration obviously inspired by the quick brain, the abundant vitality, and the unquenchable self-confidence which, all agree, characterize the present Chancellor of the British Exchequer. These are the qualities which make him so picturesque and interesting a figure. But Ephesian makes it very clear, though no doubt unintentionally, that Churchill's use of his talents has been mainly that of the ambitious politician, not that of the statesman. In the inconsistencies of his career only one consistency is apparent—his determination to keep in the forefront of the political stage with the limelight centered truly upon him.

Churchill entered Parliament as one of the great Tory majority of 1900. The silent obedience, expected of new members of the government party, irked him, however, and he soon became a stalwart critic of the Cabinet. Before the next election he passed over to the Liberals, ostensibly on the tariff issue, but actually, as Ephesian admits, because his merits had not been recognized. The Liberals proved more discerning. He became an Under Secretary and in 1908 was promoted to the presidency of the Board of Trade with a seat in the Cabinet.

The next two years were perhaps the most socially useful of his career. His office was closely connected with the various reforms that were then being enacted. In the promotion of such, and in assisting Lloyd George in attacks on the House of Lords, he found a constructive outlet for his energies and plenty of opportunities to bask in the sunshine of popular applause. His speeches during this era make strange reading now that he has returned to the fold of true-blue reaction.

Unhappily, cabinet reconstruction changed his position to that of Home Secretary, whose duties include control of the London police. He was thus responsible for the ridiculous episode of the battle of Sidney Street, where horse, foot, and artillery were brought into action against a gang of criminals. But worse was to follow when in 1911 he was placed in charge of the Admiralty. Two years before he had opposed increased estimates for the navy and had attacked the theory that war with Germany was inevitable. Now he was, to use the words of his biographer, "bursting with ideas for future wars," calling for more ships, making ready to do battle with the Central European Powers. Ephesian, of course, believes that 1914 merely proved how right his hero was and how great his foresight. It does not occur to him that the war became inevitable just because Churchill and many other men in authority of many nationalities were preparing secretly, strenuously, and hopefully for "Der Tag."

In the election immediately after the war Churchill made a speech advocating nationalization of the railways. Ephesian mentions this as an unaccountable indiscretion, but it seems probable that Churchill, who as Minister of Munitions had successfully organized a variety of collectivist activities, had a temporary vision of himself as Minister of Transport inaugurating and controlling a national railway system. It is a tragedy

Important Additions to the # MODERN LIBRARY

at 95¢ a copy

Twelve Men

By THEODORE DREISER
Introduction by Robert Ballou

The Heretic of Soana

By GERHART HAUPTMANN
Introduction by Harry Salpeter

Tristram Shandy

By LAURENCE STERNE
Complete and unabridged in one volume

A Portrait of the Artist As A Young Man

By JAMES JOYCE
Introduction by Herbert Gorman

The Emperor Jones and The Straw

By EUGENE O'NEILL
Introduction by Dudley Nichols

Fourteen Great Detective Stories

A satisfying and unorthodox anthology compiled by
VINCENT STARRETT

95 cents a copy at all bookstores
One Dollar Postpaid

Modern Library texts are absolutely complete and unabridged, and though the volumes are pocket size and full limp, the type is invariably large and clear.

Here is ideal reading for pullman cars, subways, steamer chairs, bathtubs, canoes, rotten concerts, or what have you?

Let us send you a lively catalogue outlining the 150 titles in the series; many of them will be books you've always wanted to read, and never dreamed were available at so low a cost.

MODERN LIBRARY, Inc.
20 East 57th Street, New York

that his energies and his love of power were not harnessed to such a task. Instead he was made Minister of War with a huge army on his hands and nothing to do but demobilize it. It was a pitiful position for a man of action who believed himself a great strategist. Soldiers had been the favorite toys of his childhood. The interest had never died and now with millions to his command he was ordered to put them back in their boxes. For two years he did his best to find a new war. But his attempt to start a crusade against bolshevism was defeated, largely through the efforts of the Labor Party.

Thus started a bitter feud that seems likely to govern the rest of Churchill's political life. It was intensified when the Labor Party kept him out of Parliament at two successive elections. That, and the dwindling opportunities offered by membership of the Liberal Party, made him rejoin the Tory fold, where he dabbles in protectionist measures he once denounced, and earns applause from the Diehards by fierce attacks on positions he once defended—the legal rights of trade unions, for instance. Ephesian suggests that he will be the next Tory Prime Minister. That is the highest of ambition's hurdles and perhaps he will take it, but, it is worth while to remember, many of his colleagues do not trust his mercurial temperament. It was Viscount Cecil, as genuine a Tory as ever breathed, who once described Churchill in the following emendation of Dryden's lines, overlooked by Ephesian:

Stiff in opinion, always in the wrong;
Was everything by starts and nothing long;
But, in the course of one revolving moon,
Was scribbler, painter, statesman, and buffoon.

No member of the opposition will attempt to improve on that verdict.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Fiction Shorts

Rejections of 1927. Edited by Charles H. Baker. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50.

This well-meaning compilation of short stories that have been sternly returned from editorial sancta is admirably calculated to give at least a pin-prick to the illusion that every successful fiction writer retains, deep down in his deck, one manuscript of really high quality which no editor will touch. The contents of this anthology are without exception excellent machine products; and the big-fiction magnates who rejected them must have done so out of sheer whimsicality. Mr. Baker deserves some appreciation for having dug out an incredibly tawdry tale by Arthur Schnitzler, interesting if only for the proof it affords that the manufacture of adroit hokum is not an American monopoly.

The Bitter End. By John Brophy. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

A slow-moving war novel about an adolescent who massed love and lust and perversion in a single amorphous lump. Mr. Brophy is most interesting when describing the sordidness of trench life, which he seems to know at first hand; but his analysis of the sex-scared young hero hampered by Victorian prudery is labored and long-winded, nullifying the obvious earnestness with which he writes. The blue pencil would have quickened the story's tempo and repaired its jerky sequences at the same time.

The Death of Society. By Romer Wilson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A welcome reprint of a novel which seven years ago won for its author the Hawthornden Prize. Its mystic conviction and its theme may elicit a tuppenny sneer from professional realists who cannot believe that two people can carry on a profound and impassioned love affair without understanding each other's language. But "The Death of Society" should outlive the realists and perhaps most realism. It is an almost classic example of the lyric presentation of passion, done with so ecstatic a purity as to lead one to the enthusiastic judgment that, excepting Lawrence, Miss Wilson is the only poetic English novelist writing major prose today. The gifts evinced in her recent "Private History of Emily Brontë"—intuitive power and an easy instinct for alienating herself from the more unimportant contemporary literary fashions—are more vividly exercised in "The Death of Society," her finest book to date.

Jerome: or, The Latitude of Love. By Maurice Bedel. Translated from the French by Lawrence S. Morris. The Viking Press. $2.

This year's Goncourt Prize novel is a delightful satire on the traditional provincialism of the French boulevardier, so disguised that in Paris it is being enthusiastically received as a delightful satire on the athleticism and serious social-mindedness of Norwegians. The book, admirably translated, is recommended to all the Van Vechtens of our own land who would learn to write witty light fiction with just the right savor of delicate indecency. Run down the French as one will, it must be admitted that only a great people can have the catholicity necessary to award to M. Bedel's nimble farce a literary prize which a few years ago was won by Marcel Proust.

The Redemption of Tycho Brahe. By Max Brod. Translated from the German by Felix Warren Crosse. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A historical novel, founded on the curious relationship between Tycho Brahe and Johannes Kepler, and introducing to the American public a noteworthy German writer, comparable in some respects to Lion Feuchtwanger, though the latter's mind is measurably less subtle. In the persons of his two great astronomers Herr Brod depicts two diametrically opposed scientific tempers. Brahe, the emotional berserk, capable of almost infinite psychic expansion, is contrasted with the single-minded Kepler pursuing his intent way among the stars, incapable of even a glance at that riotous earth whose fortunes the mystical Brahe would link with God, the cosmos, and the planetary movements. Beside the powerful central presentation of the two personalities, the rather creaky intrigue of the tale appears dull and almost irrelevant. Like all of Herr Brod's work, the book is occasionally impeded by rhetorical over-indulgence and a heavy circumlocutory prose with which the translator fights a spirited but losing battle. Nevertheless, so much original power is manifest here that one looks forward to the planned translation of Reübeni, generally considered Herr Brod's most solid piece of fiction.

The Tree of Knowledge. By Pio Baroja. Translated from the Spanish by Aubrey F. G. Bell. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Perhaps "The Tree of Knowledge" will at last bring to Baroja the recognition he has been consistently denied in this country. In most respects it is a masterly performance, this sharp, acid portrayal of the futile career of Andrés Hurtados, symbol of that intellectualist generation which grew to disillusioned manhood at about the time of the Spanish-American War. This is not the first time this book has been written by Baroja; indeed its secondary theme—the fatty degeneration of contemporary Spain—is explicitly that of his great trilogy, "The Struggle for Life." The repetitiousness, however, does not seem to matter; for his inventive genius, akin to Balzac's, provides him with eternally new situations; and his scornful, honest prose excites admiration despite the familiarity of his subject matter. There is one tiny fly in the ointment: Baroja is ordinarily so unpromising a thinker that one hesitates to forgive him for a deal of fanciful nonsense anent the evil effects of the "Semitic soul" on the Iberian character. A few unfortunate paragraphs remind one comically of Houston Chamberlain, except that the hidalgo is substituted for the close-cropped, bespectacled blond beast.

C. P. F.

International Relations Section

The Alsatian Problem

By EMIL LENGYEL

Strasbourg, July 23

AFTER ten years of self-deception the French have discovered that the Alsatians are not French. The honeymoon is over and the French and Alsatians are looking at each other with sober eyes.

It was not the recent trial of the autonomists in Colmar that brought about this change. The thousands who booed the verdict were good Alsatians and not German agents.

For nearly ten years official Alsace reechoed ferocious execrations against the "Boche" and the newspapers hurled defiance at the Reich. One could have no doubt that the majority of the Alsatians were happy in their new allegiance. Then suddenly discordant voices were heard. Newspapers were founded to express the opinions of dissenting Alsatians. The anti-Boche campaign became ever more feeble and Alsace turned against the "Parisians." Not that the recovered provinces have grown tired of the new union. They do not want to secede from France. They merely want to be allowed to be Alsatians.

When one passes the French-Alsatian frontier at Avricourt it is not only the landscape that changes into the undulations of the Vosges. In Bretagne, Normandy, Gasconne, Limoges, and in many other parts of France people look, dress, and speak differently. A Frenchman from Nîmes hardly understands his compatriot from St. Malo. Yet, in spite of all these variations, the different regions of France and their populations are one and the same. After Avricourt, however, the uniformity ceases and one meets a different race with a different civilization. The people look like Southern Germans, they speak a language which is Allemannic, and their homes are typically Teutonic.

For fifteen centuries the Alsatians have clung to their "patois." For the greater part of the same period their history has been different from that of all the other nations of Europe. The Bourbons, for almost two hundred years, left no means untried to assimilate the Alsatians and to make them French. Their efforts remained barren, as may be judged from an utterance of a minister of Louis XV to the effect that "Alsace is essentially a foreign country."

The Jacobins went about the Gallicanization of the province with their accustomed zeal. The Convention adopted a resolution saying that the Alsatians who did not speak French were to be interned in France. This resolution was never executed because it turned out that nearly 90 per cent of the population was ignorant of the language of the "mère patrie."

During the half century of German rule after Sedan, the Alsatians were allowed to benefit from the general prosperity of the Reich. The federal constitution of the Reich permitted them to retain a certain independence. Yet, although they were well off economically, although they had their provincial parliament and could speak their own German language without hindrance the Alsatians remained French. The spontaneous and undoctored outburst of enthusiasm which greeted the French army at the end of the war furnished the most eloquent evidence of the sympathies of the Alsatians.

What is, then, the cause of the mutual disappointment? The most obvious cause is that the French do not yet see that what is good for, say, the Department of Seine may not be good for the Department of the Bas Rhin. During the fifty years of German rule the Alsatians had grown accustomed to a decentralized administration, whereas the French have a highly centralized government.

The other cause of the mutual disappointment is best explained by a paradoxical statement: "The Alsatian laborer is a Communist who attends the mass every Sunday." For the last quarter of a century France has been living under the laws separating the church from the state. These so-called lay laws prohibit religious instruction in schools, forbid the church to possess real estate and to maintain congregations. The situation in Alsace is entirely different. Nearly 80 per cent of the Alsatians are Catholics and for the most part they are extremely religious. The schools are maintained by the different denominations.

When about four years ago the Herriot government made an attempt to introduce the lay laws into Alsace a storm of indignation was the answer and the government had to revoke its orders. The Alsatians are so apprehensive on this score that M. Poincaré had to reassure them again the other day that no one would tamper with their religious organization, including the lay school and the Concordat, as long as they wished to continue under the present regime.

The problem of the language is another cause for disaffection. Under the present arrangement, French is the language of instruction and German is being taught as a foreign language during seven hours a week from the second class of the elementary school. The situation after ten years is that many children hardly understand their parents who speak their native patois. It is even more often the case that the children do not speak correctly either of the two languages. In justification of their methods the French say that the Germans had with ruthless arbitrariness extirpated the French language in the provinces. But the French forget that the ruthless methods of the Germans affected only the language of a small fraction of the population, whereas the outlawing of the native dialect is directed against the language of the majority.

"The French administration in Alsace," says Edouard Schuré, an Alsatian writer of great ability and of unquestioned French sympathies, "has been guilty of lack of tact, delicacy, and comprehension. It has relied too much on the uppermost stratum of Alsatian society." There are two classes in Alsace: the haute-bourgeoisie and the farmers and laborers. The haute-bourgeoisie has retained an antiquated notion of patriotism. They still like to dwell on the atrocities of the Boche and on their martyrdom under German rule. The gentlemen of Paris who are sitting in the prefectures of the three departments, Haut Rhin, Bas Rhin and Moselle, are the friends of these Alsatians who speak French and think French. In their circle it is a criminal offense to have a German friend or even to be in correspondence with Germans, except on strictly business matters. This mentality, which is almost extinct in the rest of France, is extremely virulent in Alsace. Alsace is governed in the spirit of these French-Alsatians by the "gentlemen from Paris," and the society elite calls those who are not satisfied with the present regime the "Boches Alsatiens."

It is mainly this mentality which is responsible for the less edifying outgrowths of the autonomist movement. It is this mentality which brought about the crisis in Franco-Alsatian relations at the recent trial of the autonomists at Colmar.

On Christmas eve of last year twenty-four Alsations, leaders of the Heimatsbund (Home Confederation), were arrested, charged with conspiracy to overthrow the existing regime. Their trial took place on May 24 and four of them were found guilty and sentenced to short prison terms. They were MM. Rossé, Schall, Faschauer, and Ricklin. The indignation in Alsace was general. Was the agitation in favor of a better arrangement with France to be proscribed? The trial revealed the narrow-mindedness of the upper bourgeoisie. The prosecuting attorney accused several of the defendants of correspondence with Germans. People thought that this crime had become extinct ten years ago. Was it such a frightful offense to have friends on the other side of the Rhine? The indignation reached such proportions that the four accused had to be pardoned. The Alsatian policy of the French government received a severe setback.

So far as their relations with France are concerned there are now in Alsace the autonomists, regionalists, separatists, and the bons Français. The first three want a readjustment of Franco-Alsatian relations, varying from complete autonomy in the framework of the French state to a greater influence of the native population in the administration of the provinces. The autonomists have a militant press. The Zukunft and the Volksstimme keep up a spirited and animated campaign against the "Parisians." They often contain vitriolic articles about the French-speaking upper bourgeoisie. The Elsässer Kurier represents the extremists. Its chief contributor is the Abbé Haegy, the most dynamic personality in Alsatian politics.

The result of the recent general election is instructive as a means of gauging the trend of public opinion toward autonomy. In Alsace there is a curious combination of Communists and Catholics working for the same end. The Communists want an autonomous Alsace because, as one of their critics pointed out, they always want something else than the existing order. The Catholics want a different status for Alsace because they are afraid of the lay laws and have not much confidence in the "infidel" Paris. The Socialists, however, are opposed to the extension of autonomy. This is curious because one would expect the Socialists to favor the extension of the rights of minorities. But they are upholding the present centralized regime because they hope that sooner or later the lay laws and the separation of the church from the state will be introduced into Alsace. Fourteen electoral districts were carried at the last election by the parties favoring a separate status for Alsace and only two were captured by their opponents, the Socialists. The strongest separatist party is the "Upérna," the Union Populaire Républicaine, a designation adopted by the Catholics.

As a first step, the separatists want the appointment of a governor general for the three departments who understands their problem and speaks their language. It would be incumbent on this official to elaborate a plan by which Alsace could free itself of the centralizing efforts of Paris.

It is ridiculous to assert that the Alsations want to join the Reich. They will be perfectly happy in their new surroundings if their particular position is taken into consideration. Lying between two great countries with essentially different civilizations they are anxious to preserve not only their devoted attachment to France but also their German culture. As another great Alsatian author, René Schickelé, said the other day:

Alsace might be developed into a great entrepôt of the spiritual values of France and Germany. Strasbourg might soon become a literary Geneva where a civilization, inherently international, might serve as the prototype of European-mindedness.

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT DELL has for many years been a contributor to The Nation, the Manchester Guardian, and other periodicals on conditions in France.

ROBERT RYAN is the pseudonym of a New York business man.

JAMES RORTY is the author of "Children of the Sun."

WILLIAM ROSE BENÉT, associate editor of the Saturday Review of Literature, is the author of "The Falconer of God" and other books of verse.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, professor of economics at Wellesley College, was formerly managing editor of The Nation.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS contributes frequently to The Nation and other current periodicals.

W. NORMAN BROWN of the department of Sanskrit at the University of Pennsylvania is in India for a year's visit.

KEITH HUTCHISON is an English journalist.

INTERNATIONAL

Leninism

by JOSEPH STALIN

The Secretary of the Soviet Communist Party answers the Trotsky Opposition and presents Lenin's teachings in detail.

$2.50

Illustrated HISTORY of the RUSSIAN REVOLUTION

Ten years of progress reported by the outstanding Russian leaders. Profusely illustrated. Two vols. Each $2.75

WHITHER RUSSIA?

Toward Capitalism or Socialism

by LEON TROTSKY

Trotsky attacks those who maintain that Russia is going toward capitalism and proves the advances in Socialist construction.—$1.50

AMERICAN POLICY TOWARD RUSSIA SINCE 1917

by Dr. Fred L. Schuman

A detailed study of Russian-American relations since the revolution.—$3.75.

Guide to the Soviet Union

A 1000-page guide to Soviet Russia containing valuable information and maps to meet the everyday needs of the traveler.—$5.00

Labor Protection in Soviet Russia

by GEORGE M. PRICE

A first hand account of the protection accorded the Russian worker today.—$1.25

The Life and Death of Sacco and Vanzetti

by EUGENE LYONS

A complete and vivid account of the great social drama told against the background of immigrant life in America. Illustrated.—$1.50.

Whither China? by SCOTT NEARING

An eye witness account of the Chinese Revolution and a study of the social forces back of it.—$1.75

AT ALL BOOKSTORES; CATALOG ON REQUEST

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS CO.

INCORPORATED

381 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 22, 1928

No. 3294

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	165
EDITORIALS:
Sacco-Vanzetti—A Call for Action.....	168
Mr. Hoover Accepts .....	169
Popular Long Poems.....	169
The Dying Daily.....	170
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	171
SACCO AND VANZETTI. By Gardner Jackson.....	172
FOR ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY. By Malcolm Cowley.....	175
RAILROAD BUILDING AND LOCAL PRIDE. By C. K. Brown.....	176
A POLITICAL UTOPIA. By Frederic C. Howe.....	178
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	179
CORRESPONDENCE .....	180
BOOKS:
Man Does Not Ask for Much. By Stanley J. Kunitz.....	182
Deserted Barn. By Hal Saunders White.....	182
Elephant and Donkey. By William MacDonald.....	182
Lenin, Philosopher. By V. F. Calverton.....	182
Science and Music. By B. H. Haggin.....	183
A History of the League. By Karl F. Geiser.....	184
Matured Grace. By Helen Pearce.....	185
Books in Brief .....	187
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Soviet Health. By Mary Reed.....	188

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR

MARK VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

WHO WON FIRST HONORS in the ninth Olympic Games which recently ended in Amsterdam? It was the German team. But our wager is that very, very few Americans would ever have guessed that result before the final summaries were printed—least of all those who followed the newspaper accounts cabled by the Associated Press. According to the final score the German team led with a total of 45½ points, the United States was second with 39, and Holland third with 34½. We confess that it was a complete surprise to us to learn that the athletes of a downtrodden and war-weakened nation had been so successful. We remember something like seventy news columns devoted to the Olympic Games, yet in all that space there was only a casual word here and there to indicate the progress of the Teutons. It must be admitted that the news of American athletes was far more interesting to an American public and should thus have been allotted the greater share of space; but surely that fact cannot justify a wholly distorted and inaccurate picture of the situation. Among those who should be particularly incensed with this record is Dr. Ernest Cherrington of the Anti-Saloon League, who issued a statement declaring:

Stamina, reserve strength, sound hearts, steady nerves, all products of prohibition, played their parts in enabling the athletes from the United States to roll up a higher score in victories in the Olympic Games than was registered by representatives of nations handicapped by the liquor traffic.

The doctor, probably relying upon newspaper headlines, had overlooked Germany in first place, Holland in third, and Italy in fourth!

FROM ENGLAND comes by every mail news of the interest in the Kellogg treaties. They are hailed as ushering in a new era. Mass meetings of approval are the order of the day, and so emphatic is the popular indorsement of the proposal that it is plain that no party could stand out against it. The demonstrations are in marked contrast to the apathy in this country—an apathy which will, we trust, be ended when the campaign is over and Congress meets again. Still it is most encouraging that in both countries public opinion has driven the politicians ahead. It is an open secret that Mr. Kellogg stumbled into this proposal for outlawry of war without realizing how far-reaching it might be, and was then compelled to see it through. In Germany sentiment was from the beginning unanimous for it; in France, too, the politicians heard from the people and gradually became more and more aware of the merits of the proposal. In England there is considerable anger at what the London Nation calls the “revelation of the low standard of international conduct which still prevails in the Cabinets and Foreign Offices of France and Britain” as evidenced by their claiming “for each nation the right to be sole judge of its own course.” Our London contemporary admits that the moral effect of the pact has been weakened by the various interpretations, explanations, and reservations, but it declares that “it remains a clear and simple pledge of good behavior.”

THAT IS PRECISELY what it is, no more, no less. Like every other treaty it can be made a scrap of paper whenever the country that has signed its name to it desires to violate it. But behind it will be a remarkably strong world opinion, as is evidenced by the popular excitement in Europe and by the belief of many of the most ardent champions of peace that it means the dawning of a new era in human relations. We are not so optimistic as this, as our readers are aware, because of Mr. Kellogg's acceptance of the doctrine that his pact does not forbid a defensive war, and, as history shows, no nation on earth will admit that it has ever waged anything else than defensive war. We profoundly regret, too, Mr. Coolidge's statement to the press that these treaties will have no bearing whatsoever on the question of armaments and will in no wise carry with them a release from the dreadful burden that all the nations are carrying. This, to his shame, is echoed directly and specifically by Mr. Hoover in his speech of acceptance. He states that armaments remain the only safeguard of our liberty, though he boasts that the United States welcomes heartily all agreements for peace. Well, what is this Kellogg pact but the nations giving their word to one another that they will never again resort to war? If they are not to be trusted, if this is not, as the London Nation says, “a clear and simple pledge of good behavior,” what is the use of making it? Once having made it why should the United States not take the noble and inspiring stand of showing its faith by beginning to disarm of its own accord? P. W. Wilson has just shown in the New York Times that the cost of armies and navies is now $3,500,000,000 a year, that there are 5,500,000 soldiers under arms, costing every human being $2 a year, and that there are still 5,047,300 tons of warships afloat.

BY HIS DEATH at the hands of an assassin, Stefan Radich, the Croatian Peasant leader, may be able to win more benefits for his followers than his years of agitation have yet achieved. The tragic event in which two other Peasant deputies were killed and several more were wounded has served to sober rather than inflame the Yugoslav nation. From the beginning the attitude of the Government has been conciliatory—doubtless from fear of dangerous national and international consequences—and King Alexander has done more than show his sympathy and concern. While Radich lay in the hospital the King visited him twice a day, and at the same time carried on long personal conferences with Pribichevich, one of Radich's most important associates. It is obvious that both the Government and the King want peace. How much they will be willing to yield in order to maintain it is yet to be seen. Parliament has just placed the seal of its approval upon the Nettuno treaty with Italy—which Radich bitterly opposed—giving Mussolini wide colonization rights on the Dalmatian coast. On the other hand, the King will certainly urge a greater measure of autonomy for Croatia and concessions to the Peasant Party, and it is probable that the Government will not dare refuse them in spite of strong Nationalist opposition. The Peasant Party, meanwhile, has followed the advice of its leaders, including Radich himself, and has refrained from further riots. The funeral of their adored leader was attended by more than 200,000 peasants from all parts of the kingdom. There was mourning and many tears but no hint of violence or disorder. The Peasant Party properly refused to allow the Government to arrange their leader's funeral or send representatives. But the King's delegate and his offering of flowers were accepted, and nothing occurred which could hamper the efforts of the Peasant leaders to wring concessions from a fearful Government.

THE INSTITUTE OF POLITICS at Williamstown, Massachusetts, and the Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia can neither of them be charged with an aloof or academic spirit in their discussions this year. Current events have occupied the sessions at both places to a high degree, although, of course, the tendency of the newspapers to report such discussions most fully probably gives a somewhat distorted notion of the program as a whole. The American policy in Nicaragua, about which Mr. Hoover was sedulously silent in his speech of acceptance, has been under attack in both places. At Williamstown, Royal Meeker, formerly head of the federal Bureau of Labor Statistics and later attached to the International Labor Office of the League of Nations, made no bones of putting at least some of the responsibility for our present intervention in Nicaragua directly upon American banking interests. The meetings both at Williamstown and Charlottesville have showed a commendable interest in the plight of the farmer, but the suggestions put forward have not been much more helpful than the planks on the subject in the Republican and Democratic platforms.

AT THIS WRITING it is not clear whether Governor Smith will persist in his proposal to subject his entire conduct in office to a catechizing by the Rev. John Roach Straton in Calvary Baptist Church in New York City. His offer to do so was a brave and generous act quite unprecedented in an American Presidential campaign. From the first we regretted, however, that he thereby dignified a man whom we consider a pulpit mountebank, one of the clergymen who degrade the church and sink it to a level where it is but one degree above voodooism and idol worship. We cannot believe that Mr. Straton has the respect of the clergy or of the intelligent public. He is a sensationalist who lives and has his being in press notoriety. Already he has begun to weaken. First he demanded that the debate be held in Madison Square Garden, and then, when the Governor refused, that there should be two debates, one in Calvary and a second in St. Patrick's Cathedral. It is a pity that Mr. Straton cannot be made to feel that his declaration that Governor Smith is the greatest enemy to moral progress in America merits the contempt of all decent-minded men and women whatever their politics.

THERE WAS A DROP in immigration to the United States for the year ended with last June by comparison with the inflow for 1927. Last year's arrivals numbered 500,631 aliens, of whom 307,255 were immigrants and 193,376 non-immigrants. For 1927 the figures were 335,175 immigrants and 202,826 non-immigrants. Thus the chief decline among arrivals last year was in the immigrant class, the only group that bears a relation to the permanent population of the country. The two countries sending us the largest number of immigrants were Canada, with 73,154, and Mexico, with 59,016. Neither of these countries falls within the quota restrictions. Germany, which does, sent us 45,778 immigrants, while there were 38,193 of Irish stock, 33,597 of English, 23,177 of Scotch, 18,740 of Italian, 18,644 of Scandinavian, and 17,963 of French. Thus the aim of the framers of our present immigration policy—a stock primarily from the North European races—is in process of realization, although there are political and economic causes to account for it as well as our statutes. Mussolini, for instance, is discouraging Italian emigration and we have the spectacle—curious when one recalls past figures—of nearly as many immigrants from France as from Italy.

WHILE GREAT BRITAIN sends 10,000 unemployed workers to the Canadian harvest fields at public expense, our Government continues its indifference to the problem of surplus labor. We have no national system of employment exchanges and no adequate statistics concerning the hundreds of thousands of surplus miners and other workers who have been forced out of factories by planless industrial development or by labor-saving machinery. Britain was forced to try subsidized emigration on a national scale as a solution of the problem. Our men's clothing industry, which has been for many years an inspiring social pioneer, is now experimenting with a new method of subsidized emigration to other industries. Several large clothing plants have cooperated with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers in paying surplus workers to leave the industry. In the factories of Hart Schaffner and Marx 150 cutters were paid $500 each to leave their place in the trade. Of the total payment $25,000 came from the firm and the balance from the union and the cutters' share of the unemployment insurance fund in Chicago. Recently the firm of Arthur Nash and Company in Cincinnati found that there were too many cutters in its factories. Ten cutters volunteered to leave the trade and $300 was given to each by the firm. If these cutters had remained at work, all of the cutters of the firm would have been unemployed a part of each week because the rule of the company and of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers is that work in slack seasons must be equally distributed among the workers in a section. Now all of the cutters who remain in the Nash plants have a chance at a full day's work. The new practice is especially significant because it recognizes property rights of the worker in his job.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS is under attack again in the injunction forbidding further publication of the Saturday Press of Minneapolis. The injunction was obtained by the Hennepin County Attorney, who had been condemned by the newspaper, the official acting under authority of a law passed in Minnesota in 1925. This statute—the first of its kind in the United States—provides that the courts may enjoin the future publication of any newspaper deemed to be “malicious, scandalous, and defamatory.” As the Los Angeles Record puts it:

When a judge can enjoin the further publication of a paper whose views he does not like, the freedom of the press will have gone the way of a Pennsylvania miner's freedom to unionize and to strike. . . .

Should such a law stand it is evident that the courts would at once become censors of all papers. What is “malicious, scandalous, and defamatory” is a matter of opinion. If a judge is a friend of a powerful politician or official who is attacked by a paper for corruption or incompetence, the judge could at once conclude that the material in the paper is “malicious, scandalous, and defamatory” and order the paper closed overnight.

Heretofore it has been possible to proceed against an editor civilly or criminally for libelous or other illegal matter in his newspaper's columns, and the Post Office Department has excluded single issues from the mails, but it has not been lawful to suppress any periodical continuously. In spite of a decision by the Supreme Court of Minnesota upholding the law, we believe it to be clearly in violation of the federal Constitution and we thank the American Civil Liberties Union for taking an appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

SUMMER SCHOOLS may suffer all the defects outlined by Lorine Pruette in her article in The Nation for July 25. They may, as she suggests, encourage slack methods of teaching and marking and the laborious accumulation of academic credits by ill-qualified students who attend summer sessions under compulsion. But an instance of summer-school stupidity has recently come to our attention which indicates a more serious defect: an unwillingness to accept as a student a person preeminently qualified who had not met certain technical requirements. Last spring Ada L. Liveright applied for admission to this year's summer session at Columbia University, selecting certain specific courses in library work. She gave her record as follows:

I am a graduate of the Drexel Institute Library School and attended the summer sessions of the Columbia University Library School in 1914. I conducted the first course in book-selling and library methods in the Philadelphia evening high schools in 1914-1915. I am librarian of the Pedagogical Library, chairman of the school-library group composed of librarians of junior and senior high schools of the Philadelphia public-school system, and am also in charge of visual instruction for the Philadelphia public schools.

After long delay she received a letter stating that she was ineligible for the course she had selected because she was not a candidate for the master's degree and had not completed the general first-year course in an “accredited library school.” The Drexel Institute Library School from which she graduated in 1897 was not at that time “accredited,” because no library schools were. She was offered, instead of the work she wanted, a selection of elementary courses such as she herself had taught. She declined this opportunity and, finally, her application was denied.

AS THE NEW LITERARY SEASON gets under way, an announcement is made of three changes in the list of American publishers. One entirely new firm comes into existence under the name of Coward-McCann. The firm of Macy-Masius has merged with the Vanguard Press. And Pascal Covici, who formerly published in Chicago and represented there the left wing of literature, has come to New York where he will throw in his lot with Donald Friede, once an associate with Horace Liveright in the firm of Boni and Liveright (now, incidentally, just Horace Liveright). The situation is by no means an odd one; every year for the past ten years there have been changes of this sort in a publishing world distinguished throughout by its vigor and its enterprise. But we may be glad that such signs of vitality continue to show themselves, and all who are interested in American books will wish these three new establishments well.

TELEVISION BY RADIO, gas bullets that can be fired around corners, practical color cameras, three kinds of talking motion pictures, automatic repairing machines for silk stockings—we are dizzy with the multitude and variety of inventions that have been announced in the last few weeks. The summer of 1928 should be remembered in history as a continuous spasm of progress. The surprising thing about most of these inventions is the anonymity of the inventors. We remember Stephenson and Morse and Bell; our children will see their pictures in the school-books for many generations. But what name emerges from the brilliant summer of 1928 as immortal? The average American could not mention a single name as associated with any of the recent great inventions. Yes, perhaps he could mention one name, that of George Eastman in connection with the color camera. But who invented the color camera? Not Mr. Eastman or even the able head of his research laboratories, Dr. C. E. Kenneth Mees. The inventor was a man who spent ten years in the Eastman laboratories studying color photography. His name is John G. Capstaff. Three cheers for Capstaff! We would like to see Capstaff cigarettes, and pictures of Capstaff blindfolded selecting Old Gold, and babies named Capstaff Jones, and yachts christened Lady Capstaff by pretty girls. This laboratory method of invention may be efficient, and we presume that Mr. Eastman gave Mr. Capstaff a handsome check for his genius, but the human throat was made to cheer heroes. And we suspect that even Mr. Capstaff would appreciate an ounce of immortality more than a ton of pay-checks.

Sacco-Vanzetti—A Call for Action

NICOLA SACCO and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were put to death by the State of Massachusetts in the early minutes of August 23 a year ago. In the time that has intervened there has been no chance for a realignment of public opinion. Few persons had studied the case personally up to the time that the "good shoemaker" and the "poor peddler" were executed last summer, and it is safe to guess almost none have done so since. In this country the case was closed and execution became certain when Governor Fuller's unofficial committee of three decided against the men. Thereafter "respectable" journals and individuals, with a few brave exceptions, insisted that discussion was over. It became irregular and therefore un-American—if not practically treasonable—to question any longer the justice of the Massachusetts courts. The issue of human life was lost in a panic of fear and bitterness lest the political and property system of the country be jarred. As the American correspondent of the London Daily News cabled at the eleventh hour to his newspaper, public opinion in the United States had taken the position that it was better that Sacco and Vanzetti should die than that "anarchists and immigrants should get encouragement to attack the political basis on which prosperity rests."

It would be useless at this time to reopen the argument on the guilt or innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti. The Nation said last summer that the best work which those who, like it, believed that a great injustice had been done was to collect and preserve the record in the most adequate and complete way possible so that the verdict of history—which all must await—might be an informed one. We are glad to say at this time that such efforts are already under way and promise soon to reach a successful conclusion. A lawyer's committee has undertaken to print complete a transcript of the evidence at the trial and the court record of the various appeals. The first of six volumes containing this material has already been published by Henry Holt and Company and was the subject of editorial comment in our issue of July 25.

In Boston the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee, which almost from the first led the fight to obtain a second trial for the two Italians, has centered its attention for the past year chiefly on the highly worth-while task of collecting and editing the more important letters and statements of Sacco and Vanzetti. This material, which will provide the best permanent key to the character and ideas of the men, will be ready for publication some time in the coming winter. Equally important is the task undertaken by the Sacco-Vanzetti National League whose headquarters is in New York City. Realizing the decisive nature of the report of the Lowell Committee in closing the debate and sending Sacco and Vanzetti finally to their death, the league is trying to surround that report with as much light as possible for the guidance of future students. A book is under way, probably to be published next winter, detailing all the circumstances known in connection with the work of the committee and containing authoritative studies of the report from legal, psychological, and other points of view.

In fact only one important activity begun after the tragedy last summer has failed—presumably because it fell among politicians. Probably the aspect of the case which to most people seemed especially unjust was that in the entire six years that intervened between their trial and their execution, and in spite of the appeals to various courts, Sacco and Vanzetti were never able to obtain a reexamination of the evidence upon which the jury convicted them of murder. All appeals had to be based on errors of law. A reexamination of the evidence was possible only through a new trial to be obtained by order of the judge who had presided at the first one. The obstinacy and prejudice of Judge Webster Thayer in refusing a new trial sent the prisoners to the electric chair without ever a chance for a reinvestigation of a chain of testimony, some of which was outrageous nonsense and all of which was passed upon in the hysterical year of 1921 by a jury hot with passion against foreigners and cold with fear of radicals. After the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti Governor Fuller himself recommended amendment of the Massachusetts law so that in capital cases the right of appeal should carry with it the power to re-examine the evidence as well as the legal procedure. A bill was drawn which in this respect would have placed Massachusetts beside New York, but it was allowed to die.

And now what of the future? We have every reason to be pleased with the work begun during the past year, and promising a speedy and successful conclusion in the near future. But to what task shall those who gather in spirit or in person at the various Sacco-Vanzetti meetings on August 23 (see page 180 of this issue) address themselves? We suggest that there could be no finer or more practical tribute to the memories of Sacco and Vanzetti than for their friends and sympathizers to organize and begin a powerful campaign for the release of two groups of political prisoners both of which were put behind the bars before the arrest of the Massachusetts Italians and remain there today, although upon evidence equally flimsy and shattered. We refer to Mooney and Billings, in prison now for twelve years, and the Centralia victims, in jail for nine. We rehearsed the history of both of these cases in the editorial pages of our issue of April 11 and would like to see the Sacco-Vanzetti meetings of this month face the facts as free men should. The conviction of Mooney and Billings has been entirely discredited, as based upon perjured evidence, and was later repudiated by the judge who presided at the trial, the jurors, the detective sergeant who procured the State's witnesses, the Attorney General, and the successor to Charles M. Fickert as District Attorney. At least five of the jurors in the Centralia case have since signed affidavits indicating that they do not believe the men to have been guilty of murder.

The reason why all these prisoners are still wasting away their lives in jail is that no national organization is any longer fighting for their release. Mooney and Billings are dependent upon the efforts of the old-line labor organizations of California, which are at most only lukewarm in their behalf. The Centralia prisoners have only a local committee, practically without funds, to press for their release. Why should not Sacco-Vanzetti sympathizers take hold of the fight for these last two groups of political prisoners, and win it before another year?

Mr. Hoover Accepts

AS a bit of self-revelation Mr. Hoover's speech of acceptance is highly successful. It paints him just as he is—his ambitions, his desires, his limitations, his absence of true vision except as to material things. Though it is by no means a masterly presentation, the sentences and arguments move and there are passages that have power, as when Mr. Hoover portrays the joyous America he thinks this country is and the ideal of prosperity—of a country with poverty abolished—that he has for it. But for the rest it is the same old Republican stuff. The Hoover who came back from Europe in 1919 on fire with the Wilsonian doctrines; who in 1918 begged his fellow-countrymen to vote in a Democratic House; who wanted a new world through the League of Nations and a new brotherhood to rescue humanity from the abyss at the edge of which it stood is now finally dead and buried. So far as the sentiments go, a Willis, a Curtis, or even a Smoot, might have voiced them, or any other Republican hack. No one can doubt now Hoover's regularity, or his party subservience. Republican smugness, self-complacency, self-satisfaction, self-righteousness appear in every line.

He is not merely content with praising the Harding and Coolidge administrations to the skies and claiming far more than can in honesty be asked for them. He credits the Republican Party with all the progress that science and invention and modern business have made for the country in the last ten years. He is lost in admiration of our radios and our automobiles and what electricity has done for the housewife. The average reader must believe, as he is carried along by Mr. Hoover's enthusiasm for the material blessings that have descended upon us, that his party and his party alone is responsible for every electric washing machine and vacuum cleaner that have been placed in American homes since the election of Warren Harding. There you have the real heart and the real passion of Herbert Hoover. He is on fire to improve the material condition of every American. He wants increased opportunity for every American; he dwells upon lately won opportunities and upon the American equality of opportunity—for which in one amusing passage he bestows the credit equally upon Calvin Coolidge, Abraham Lincoln, and the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. He wants to help the farmer and is willing to spend hundreds of millions of dollars in the forlorn hope of rebuilding our interior canal and river systems so as to make them competitors of the railroads. As for prohibition, he is as mealy-mouthed as the average politician. He repeats that it is a great social experiment and declares that the Constitution cannot be nullified, and yet gives no positive assurance that he will end the rule of politics and favoritism and corruption in the enforcement of prohibition, of which he has been a close-range eyewitness ever since he entered the Cabinet. In other words, this is the plea of a mining engineer turned politician. It is not the product of a statesman of first rank.

Speaking of corruption, Mr. Hoover denounces it in the usual glittering generalities and scolds the people for their indifference to it. But as he highly lauds the Harding and Coolidge administrations, and never once refers to the dastardly record of the former, we cannot believe that this is anything more than the usual braying of the politician in search of votes. As for protection, he has gone the whole hog. He indorses the utter selfishness of this policy, while exalting the unselfishness of the United States. He applauds the reactionary conservatism of our own labor leaders and shows once more all the bitterness against Socialists and other would-be reformers that have marked his attitude since he returned from Europe. He lays the responsibility for all the ills of Europe not upon the capitalist governments which put Europe into the war, but upon the Socialist governments which kept it from collapsing after hostilities were over. Finally he declares: "With impressive proof on all sides of magnificent progress no one can rightly deny the fundamental correctness of our economic system." Let us be among the first to reply that in our judgment our magnificent industrial progress proves nothing of the kind.

We see not one word in this speech to make us change our attitude of complete opposition to the election of Herbert Hoover to the Presidency. No amount of rejoicing in our material welfare or of further economic favors could make us support a man who enthusiastically indorses the Administration of Calvin Coolidge, declares that "he has left an imprint of rectitude and statesmanship upon the history of our country," and says that he will chart his course upon that of his chief. Nor will The Nation ever by as much as one word aid the candidacy of this renegade Quaker who, while saying that he is possessed of a deep passion for peace, also declares for great armaments and asserts "that in an armed world there is only one certain guaranty of freedom—and that is preparedness of defense." Those were precisely the words of the Kaiser before the war, voiced with equal earnestness and equal sincerity.

Popular Long Poems

THE issue of Edwin Arlington Robinson's "Tristram," by the Literary Guild last year, is followed now by the appearance, under the auspices of the Book-of-the-Month Club, of Stephen Vincent Benét's still longer poem, "John Brown's Body."* The result should be a feeling of satisfaction among all those who have the future of poetry at heart. For it has been true at all times that the position of poetry in the world of literature depended upon the possibility of long poems being written and finding audiences. Now here are two extended narrative poems, one of quite extraordinary length; and large audiences have been found for them. "Tristram" had an enormous sale for poetry, and all signs indicate that "John Brown's Body" will go even farther. Such a situation must encourage those who were on the point of giving poetry up as something which would never give more than subtle and fugitive variations on the old lyric or elegiac or reflective themes.

The question remains, of course, how good these poems are—or rather, since "Tristram" was generally accepted with enthusiasm by the critics, how good "John Brown's Body" is. The answer is not a simple one to make. Open Mr. Benét's book and you are likely to come upon such a passage as this:

Brown did not know at first that the man dead
By the sword he thought of so often as Gideon's sword

* Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Was one of the race he had drawn that sword to free.
It had been dark on the bridge. A man had come
And had not halted when ordered.

Or this:

Neat, handsome McClellan,
Ex-railroad president, too, but a better railroad;
The fortunate youth, the highly-modern boy-wonder,
The snapping-eyed, brisk banner-salesman of war
With all the salesman's gifts and the salesman's ego;
Great organizer, with that magnetic spark
That pulls the heart from the crowd—and all of it spoiled
By the Napoleon-complex that haunts such men.
There never has been a young banner-salesman yet
That did not dream of a certain little cocked-hat
And feel it fit. McClellan felt that it fitted.

Having read so much, you will not be likely to think that you have opened a volume of poetry distinguished by excellence of any kind. There is a great deal of this stuff, stuff which is not even good prose. There is also a shameless disregard at times of the rule that in a work of literary art the documents should be disguised. Mr. Benét, working with books in France as a Guggenheim Fellow, dug up facts which seemed to him pertinent or picturesque and threw them headlong into the stream of his verse. They usually stick out and bother the reader. Then there are many evidences of haste and slovenliness in the workmanship; merely as narrative the book is loose-jointed, with much thrown in that one cannot remember after the page is turned.

Yet it would be unfair to judge such a work as "John Brown's Body" by random passages or by isolated faults. Read straight through, the poem yields a secret which might not be guessed otherwise. The secret is that Mr. Benét was not writing a pretty poem. The prose of the piece is quite intentional, the roughness planned. His idea was, probably, to produce a whole that would be impressive as history, as panorama, as picture; and he knew very well that toward this end it would not do to polish every line too carefully as he went along. That would have made a book more beautiful in each of its parts but one less strong and interesting, certainly, in its ensemble. He designed—and executed—a swift, nervous, rather sprawling epic which should contain within itself the smell of civil war, the confusion of a people in despair, the miscellaneity of a continent upheaved. Judged as such, "John Brown's Body" must be considered in general a success; and in particular there are many fine passages—the death of Stonewall Jackson, the preparation for Gettysburg—along with several appealing characters: Melora, Joe Vilas, Sally Dupre, and Lucy Weatherby. The rhythms, which vary according to the poet's purpose from indolent blank verse to highly syncopated jingle, are the work of a practiced hand; while the language, ranging as it does from sober English to the most pungent American, is such as might have been expected from Mr. Benét's exciting pen.

There could scarcely be a greater difference between two contemporary poems than appears now between "Tristram"—so measured, so melodious—and "John Brown's Body"—so unkempt, so harsh in its dissonances. But that is of course all the more reason for rejoicing. Variety and vitality go hand in hand, and it is pleasant to speculate that when the next long poem comes along it may deal neither with an old-world love story nor with the events of American history but with—whatever the author has been urged to treat.

The Dying Daily

EDITOR AND PUBLISHER, reporting for the first six months of 1928, shows only 401 morning dailies and 1,531 evening journals in the United States. Ten morning papers have disappeared since January and 24 during the past year and a half, during which latter period 45 evening newspapers have ceased publication. The deaths in the evening field since the beginning of 1928 number seven. Editor and Publisher continues its survey in these words:

Sunday papers, now numbering 516, are 10 less than at the beginning of 1928 and 29 less than at the beginning of 1927. If the rate of decrease for the first six months is maintained during the next six, the total decrease for 1928 will not be much less than for 1927, and may indeed exceed it. No similar period since the armistice has seen the death of so many newspapers. While there has been an apparent decline during the past six months in the number of papers purchased for operation as going concerns, there is no slackening of the movement to reduce the number of papers in cities and towns held by current trade beliefs to be "overnewspapered."

Editor and Publisher now admits that there is a distinct and powerful movement toward the creation of a journalistic monopoly in each town or city. Its statistics show that there are already 937 cities in which there is only one newspaper as against 414 that have more than one daily. Out of 89 cities in California only 26 have more than one journal; out of 77 in Illinois only 13 have more than one daily. In New York there are 48 one-newspaper cities to 24 of the other group. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that there are now only 6 cities having dailies in Nevada, 5 in New Mexico, 6 in Rhode Island, 4 in Utah, 8 in Vermont, 5 in Wyoming, 8 in New Hampshire, 7 in Maryland, 7 in Maine, 10 in Arizona, 9 in Idaho, and 10 in South Carolina. There are numerous other States in which it would be a simple thing for a rich man to buy up every daily. Lest anyone believe that the one-newspaper cities are very small towns, it is a fact that 152 of them have more than 20,000 population. Even in Ohio there are 56 cities that have only one newspaper each and only 30 that have more than one newspaper. The only large cities now served by more than two morning newspapers are New York, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, and Boston. Chicago, San Francisco, New Orleans, Denver, Omaha, Kansas City, Washington, Cincinnati, and Springfield, Massachusetts, get on with two morning journals apiece. What becomes in the other cities of the old theory that our two-party system of government requires the exposition of the rival Democratic and Republican doctrines in every community?

It must be remembered that our 1,932 daily newspapers are supposed to bring all the news to a population now estimated to approximate 118,000,000 of people. In this connection Editor and Publisher reports that despite the decrease in the total number of dailies the remaining newspapers had a total circulation of 38,623,709 net paid copies, the highest on record. Sunday circulations total nearly 26,000,000. Curiously enough, morning circulations gained while evening circulations practically stood still, gaining only one-half of 1 per cent. As a result of the upward tendency advertising rates have generally tended toward an increase.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

AT the end of a year it is well to remember again the case of Sacco and Vanzetti. We should remember, for it was the chief wish of Massachusetts that they should be forgotten. Indeed the people of Boston rejoiced after the execution because they felt that this was the last phase of the issue. And just what was the issue? The event is not yet sufficiently removed to make fair-minded judgment easy. Nor am I peculiarly qualified to act as commentator, since the trial moved me to more bitterness than I had ever felt before. Of that I'm not ashamed. The good men in the community were very fond of saying, "Let's withhold judgment. Let us ponder." And while they pondered the good shoemaker and the poor fish peddler went to the death chamber.

There was no way to save them, but it is not useless even now to review the circumstances of the case again to the end that no others shall be killed in this same mood. My own bitterness is not less after a year but somewhat more diffused. It no longer seems to me that the injustice done may fairly be blamed upon the State of Massachusetts singled out from all the rest. The old Bay State has become a backward American community which stifles thought and digs its toes into dead dust. Opinion is not free in Massachusetts, and no one looks in that direction expecting to find new things. And there the older verities have come to be perverted. Still Massachusetts is not alone in this decadence. There are scores of American communities in which Sacco and Vanzetti might have been killed with just as much good-will.

My respect does not go out to Lowell, Grant, and Stratton. And yet after a year I do not think of them as singular, arch-villains. It is never difficult to get men of distinguished name to lend respectability to violence done within the letter of the law. No rebel would care to pin his hope of justice upon the fairness of the average college president. Even the so-called liberals in the field of education are not safe men to lean against. It was Hopkins of Dartmouth, for instance, who joined in an obscene tribute of applause to Thayer at a college banquet after the death of Sacco and Vanzetti.

It is a familiar device in argumentation to announce that you do not question the other man's motives. William Allen White prefaced one of his most violent attacks upon Al Smith with this remark. Such concessions are silly. If you disagree with your opponent's findings you must inevitably distrust his motives. The motives of Lowell and Stratton and Grant were not admirable at all. It was the keen desire of each one in the trio to uphold the judgment of the courts of Massachusetts. Each one had some stake in government as administered in that commonwealth. To clear the prisoners would have been difficult for the advisory committee. To sustain the conviction was much more easy. Every individual likes to believe the thing which is easy to believe.

To some extent Lowell and Stratton and Grant may have succeeded in deluding themselves into accepting the judgment which they rendered as fair and honest. That is a problem for the Freudians. It seems to me that now and then uneasy dreams must come to all these men.

Whenever there was a discrepancy in testimony the committee invariably chose to believe the story told by a prosecuting witness. Many of their conclusions seemed at variance with the most simple sort of logic. But if Lowell and Stratton and Grant had not assumed the burden of saving face for Massachusetts many others just as respectable would have performed the task in just the same way.

And even so I cannot see the issue as a straight fight between the proletariat and the forces of entrenched capitalism. All the problems of the world become simple when viewed according to the communistic philosophy or even from the viewpoint of an orthodox Socialist. It seems to me that the state of mind in Massachusetts which made the convictions possible was complicated by many factors. There was, of course, the war. The bitterness against pacifism had much to do in prejudicing the jury against Sacco and Vanzetti. To be sure some will tell me that war is a phenomenon depending for survival on the capitalistic system. That I doubt. The emergence of Russia under the soviets has by no means brought world peace nearer to accomplishment. Of course I know that the Russian proletariat will only fight in self-defense or wage some conflict to end all wars, but somehow those explanations ring upon my ears familiarly.

My own opinion is that the heaviest charge brought against Sacco and Vanzetti was the fact that they were foreigners. This has become a high crime and misdemeanor in America within the last ten or twenty years. Even a man of passable intelligence like William Allen White can fly into flame against Al Smith because he threatens, in White's eyes, the Puritan civilization which is America. Sacco and Vanzetti also threatened that particular culture in this country. I am not contending, of course, that a man of White's caliber would have rushed about the town of Boston shouting for an execution. My point is that it is easy to understand how men of lesser wisdom could become frantic on the issue of the foreigner since even White is not immune to it.

Remember, please, that the commotion against the Italian agitators was not confined to any single class in Massachusetts. Motormen on street cars spoke as bitterly about the prisoners as did the bankers of State Street. The trial and the condemnation were not carried on by any minority in Massachusetts. A majority supported the verdict. It is true that the greater part of this group had read little or nothing of the testimony. It was enough for them that two Italians had dared to preach the overthrow of the American system of government. Usually that is not considered a very grave crime. Except in time of war the citizen of American birth may speak his mind out freely about the system under which we live. But even the slightest criticism from a foreigner will cause a frenzy.

Why does America hate the foreigner so profoundly? I think it is because we have wronged him so much. He has become through tariffs and war debts an economic slave bound to this country. And when a slave begins to speak his mouth must be shut at once for fear of what he is about to say. He knows too much.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Sacco and Vanzetti

By GARDNER JACKSON

TWO "anarchistic bastards." That gutter phrase, coined and freely distributed by Judge Webster Thayer of Massachusetts as the complete description of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, epitomizes the conception of the two men held by all but an insignificant minority of the American people. Its succinct expression of fear and hatred is not lost in its obscenity. Even liberals and other apparently fair-minded persons have been willing to apply scornful phrases to the two men who were killed for the cause of justice in America. Thus, from the comfortable remoteness of his Editor's Easy Chair in Harpers Magazine, E. S. Martin disposed of them in the following words:

Sacco and Vanzetti seem to have come to represent the fight of the big forwards party all over the world against the established order. It is extraordinary that they should, for they are not edifying characters, but quite the contrary. They look to be a couple of scamps.

Mr. Martin, reputed to be a benign and astute liberal, admitted that he did not know whether or not the two men were guilty. Where, then, did he derive the data on which to base his patronizing dismissal of them as individuals?

I went into the Sacco-Vanzetti case knowing nothing about the two men personally and practically nothing about anarchism. I went into it because I had heard more than enough while a reporter on the Boston Globe to convince me that a gross miscarriage of justice was threatening Sacco and Vanzetti with death. I came out of the case knowing somewhat more about anarchism and deeply thankful for the brief period of friendship allowed me with Sacco and Vanzetti.

I am not an Anarchist. I am not a Socialist or a Communist. When I write of Sacco and Vanzetti it is simply as a human being interested in other human beings and their ideas. An Anarchist ought to write a study of the men's philosophy. All I can hope to set down is a personal appreciation of two "shining spirits"—as Heywood Broun called them—based upon numerous visits with them and a reading of many of their letters.

I believe not only that they were innocent of the crime for which they were killed, but that they meticulously lived up to the rigid code of their anarchist philosophy. Their letters and courtroom utterances—which are being prepared for publication—and Vanzetti's last interview with Mr. William G. Thompson shortly before death, together with their words and bearing when they took their places in the electric chair, reveal the fine and strong texture of their spirits.

Nicola Sacco

Nicola Sacco had faith in human perfectibility, which is why H. L. Mencken called him a "mush-head." He also had the will to practice his faith in all its strict absolutism.

"Stop talking, Nick, till this time of anti-radical excitement is past!" urged George Kelly, superintendent of the Three K. Shoe Factory at Stoughton, Massachusetts, where Sacco was then working (early in 1920). Sacco replied, "Oh, George, it's my heart that talks." Earning $22.50 a day soon after this country entered the war, Sacco was ordered by his employer to invest in a Liberty bond. "I don't believe in war and I don't let anyone tell me how I spend my wages," he remarked as he walked out of the job.

Sacco was a passionate lover of life, particularly of nature. He arrived at his beliefs not by way of print and formalized logic, but by the instinctive reaction of his sensitive being to its environment.

He was never bitter or vindictive. After the sentence was pronounced on April 10, 1927, his certainty that "all efforts on his behalf . . . would be useless because no capitalistic society could afford to accord him justice" crystallized into a flat refusal to have further dealings with the authorities on his own case. This was an issue of vehement dispute between him and his high-minded, conservative counsel, W. G. Thompson. A final exchange over his refusal to discuss his case with Governor Fuller did cause Sacco to write his wife advising her not to follow Mr. Thompson's example of arguing for him before the authorities. It was far from a vindictive note. It simply stated a difference of opinion and went no further than classifying Mr. Thompson as "an old Mayflower." At his final interview with Mr. Thompson a few hours before the execution he was his usual cordial and positive self, without any trace of ill-feeling. "At this last meeting," writes Mr. Thompson in the February Atlantic Monthly, "he did not suggest that the result seemed to justify his view and not mine."

These conflicts of opinion between Sacco and those who called him names in their fierce desire to save his life are the keys to Sacco's character. His hunger strikes—one of 31 days in 1923 and one of 17 days shortly before the execution—were carried out on his own initiative over the protests of his friends. They were Sacco's only way of expressing his "despisement" of the system that held him in its torturing grasp. He was deeply appreciative of all his friends and counsel did for him, but he wished to make his protest in the manner he himself deemed most effective, even if it meant giving his life before the executioner took it.

Sacco came to this country in 1908 from tending his father's vineyards and vegetable- and flower-gardens near the town of Torremaggiore in the south of Italy. He was eighteen years old and was an ardent Italian republican. Within a year after he got his first job carrying water for a construction gang in Milford, Massachusetts, he had left republicanism for socialism. The American republic, he discovered, did not treat him and his fellow-workers with the open-heartedness he had been led to expect. The process of disillusion continued. He went through several strikes, worked on picket lines, and raised money for strike support by giving plays with his beautiful, Titian-haired wife, to whom he was married in 1912. Disappointed by the exploitation of their fellows which he found among union officials and strike leaders, he finally adopted anarchism as the only philosophy which would satisfy his rigorous belief in the rights of the individual.

The intense joy he derived from his love of nature, from his garden, from his growing family, and from his memories of the family and vineyards and flowers in Italy kept him buoyed up through this period and through the ensuing seven and a half years of prison. There is scarcely a letter among the many he sent from Dedham jail during that long agony which does not rejoice in some aspect of nature, be it no more than the tops of a few trees and a small patch of blue sky he could see from his cell. His letters are also full of the happiness he had with his wife and children, the visits to jail of baby Inez, born after his arrest, and his memories of the days with his son, Dante, who was his "true comradeship."

Not all of Sacco's letters were thus wistfully cheerful. Denied the privilege of physical labor enjoyed by other prisoners, he tried to satisfy the crying demands of his spirit and body by doing regular exercises in his tiny cell. But he had lived by vigorous, outdoor work and this make-shift failed to keep him in good health. He suffered from indigestion. Then he would write: "Believe me, Mrs. Jack, I am very pessimist and frankly I am tired of these miserable life and I like to see one where or the other."

Generally, however, "this sad recluse," as he often spoke of himself in his letters, agreed with his aged mother that it was his nature to have the "smiling shine always on face" especially if he "work hard." Sacco referred continually in touching terms to his "dear mother" and found infinite comfort in the visits of Mrs. Elizabeth Glendower Evans because she reminded him of her.

Vanzetti, of course, came to know Sacco more intimately than anyone else. After he and Sacco had addressed Judge Webster Thayer on the day the sentence was pronounced, Vanzetti suddenly interrupted the dry, dooming voice of the court to ask Mr. Thompson if he could say something more. The court denied further utterance. Vanzetti wanted to speak of Sacco. The next day he gave us the notes of what he had wished to say. The following is an excerpt from those notes:

Sacco, too, is a worker from his boyhood, a skilled worker and a lover of work, with a good job and pay; a bank account, a good and lovely wife, two beautiful children, and a neat little home at the verge of a wood near a brook. Sacco has a heart, a faith, a character; he is a man, a lover of nature and mankind. A man who gave all, who sacrificed all to the cause of liberty and to his love of mankind; money, rest, mundane ambitions, his own wife, his children, himself, and even his own life.

Sacco has never dreamt of stealing, nor of assassination if he and I never brought a morsel of bread to our mouths, from our childhood to this very day. Never! His people also are in good position and of good reputation.

Oh, yes, I may be more witty, as some have put it, I am a better babbler than he is, but many, many times in hearing his heartfelt voice ringing a faith sublime, in considering his supreme sacrifice, remembering his heroism, I felt small, small at the presence of his greatness and found myself compelled to fight back from my eyes the tears, and quench my heart troubling my throat to not weep before him—this man called thief and assassinator, and doomed.

But Sacco's name will live in the hearts of the people and in their gratitude when Katzmänn's and your bones, Judge Thayer, will be dispersed in time, when your name, his name, your laws, institutions, and your false gods are but a dim remembering of a cursed past in which man was wolf to man.

Is that estimate by Vanzetti solely the product of abnormal, emotional circumstances? If it is, then so are the estimates of Sacco given by his employers and fellow-workers—those with whom he came in close contact during the twelve years before his arrest with Vanzetti on May 5, 1920.

"A man who is in his garden at 4 o'clock in the morning, and at the factory at 7 o'clock, and in his garden again after supper and until nine and ten at night, carrying water and raising vegetables beyond his own needs to give to the poor, that man is not a 'holdup man!'" declared his employer, Mr. Kelly. And he added that Sacco used to bring him and his son vegetables and good Italian dishes cooked by Rosina. But this testimony was excluded by the Prosecutor Katzmänn's clever maneuvering, together with the words of Mr. Kelly's son George: "There never was a better fellow than Nick Sacco, nor one with a kinder heart. He couldn't kill a chicken."

With Mary Donovan I checked up on Sacco's work record and presented the evidence before the Lowell committee. Everywhere we went—at the Hopedale machine shops and at the several shoe factories where he had worked—we met the same expressions of affectionate admiration from his former benchmates and foremen, cautiously given under pledge of anonymity lest those talking with us get into trouble in those last, insane days.

Mr. Kelly made Sacco night watchman in addition to his day duties: "I trusted him with all I had." In the security of his office far from the State House he told us of Sacco's learning the trade of edger at his factory school years before with money saved from off-hour jobs, of his becoming the most skilled edger Kelly had ever employed, and of his regular savings-account deposits which were the envy of the other workers in the factory.

"The day after the murder he's supposed to have done, Sacco was in his garden early as usual and was at his bench when the 7 o'clock whistle blew," said Mr. Kelly to us a few days before the execution. "His hand was as steady as it always had been and, you know, edging needs steady hands. The slightest slip ruins the shoe."

Sacco was not of studious bent. He was a man of action. His short, muscular body was vibrant with energy. He worked hard to master the English language, and made progress. His ideas were all-embracing and simple in their expression. Advising his fourteen-year-old son, Dante, not to cry, "because many tears have been wasted, as your mother's have been wasted for seven years, and never did any good," and telling him to be "strong instead" and to comfort his mother, Sacco wrote from the deathhouse four days before the execution:

Take her for a long walk in the quiet country, gathering wild flowers here and there, resting under the shade of trees, between the harmony of the vivid stream and the gentle tranquillity of mother nature, and I am sure that she will enjoy this very much, as you surely would be happy for it.

But remember always, Dante, in the play of happiness don't use all for yourself only, but down yourself just one step at your side and help the weak ones that cry for help—help the persecuted and the victim because they are your better friend, they are the comrades that fight and fall as your father and Bartolo fought and fell yesterday for the conquest of the joy and freedom for all the poor workers. In this struggle of life you will find more love and you will be loved.

And to Governor Fuller, who tried to induce Sacco in the last days to discuss his case by saying that he himself had once worked in a rubber-sole factory and hence knew the workers' viewpoint, Sacco said: "Yes, but since then you get money, and money make you think different."

"Good evening, gentlemen," he said as he sat in the electric chair watching the prison guards adjust the electrodes. "Long live anarchy! Farewell, my wife and child and all my friends. Farewell, mother."

Bartolomeo Vanzetti

Bartolomeo Vanzetti lived life with passionate attention of mind. It was not with him "plenty of eat, little of work—belly of mine become a hub," as he described the prospective condition in Italy of "the gray masses, unconscious and idea-less—too domesticated by their leaders." Neither was it "safety first, gradual conquest, historical fatalism, and fascista blackjack over all," as he further described the Italian people in a letter from his cell in the Massachusetts State Prison.

The electric chair, reaching its arms for him for seven years and a half, had just the reverse influence on Vanzetti of that exercised by the "fascista blackjack" on the gray masses in Italy. His spirit grew stouter and fatalism was ground deeper under the heel of his scorn while the years in State Prison went by, unfolding "worse things and stuff than those and that seen by Dante at the shore of hell. . . ."

At the close of the Dedham trial in the summer of 1921 one of the defense counsel saw a chance of Vanzetti's acquittal—"there was so little evidence against him, almost none in fact." "But I felt sure," he remarked after the trial, "that in that case Sacco would be found guilty. I thought there was a fighting chance the jury would disagree as to the two; but if they acquitted one, I knew enough of juries to feel sure they would soak the other. So I put the case to Vanzetti. 'What shall I do?' And he answered, 'Save Nick. He has the woman and child.'"

Vanzetti had none of the egotist's ruthless pride of mind. Neither did he have the self-righteous air of one who glories in personal martyrdom. "I am a living hurricane of thoughts, feelings, and sentiments," he wrote in September, 1925. Good and bad in his mind were not divided by a sharp, straight line. "It is a quarter of a century that I am struggling to dislearn and re-learn; to deny and re-confirm. By little of school and very much experiences . . . I became a cosmopolit, perambulating philosopher of the main road—crushing, burning a world within me and creating a new, better one. Meanwhile I am having the worst of the worst one." Through his letters sounds the clash between his faith in human perfectibility and his own experience. Anatole France's "Penguin Island" tormented him, after four years in prison, because it ends with the destruction of society by society's own greed and inventions. "But I perceive the possibility of liberation," he protests in a letter to Mary Donovan, "not in a single strike and in a single hour, but by thousands of strikes gradually one more powerful than the other, and through the centuries."

A perplexing "Anarchist bastard" this, who will not accept Anatole France's gloomy prediction, who says that all reformers are contented if Mussolini, J. P. Morgan, or any other holder of control is "so gentlemanly to cut with them the power-pie," and who writes from his cell at about the same time, "Human nature is good. I would assert it even if I burned a hundred times or was chained for a hundred lives." Three years later in a letter from State Prison he said: "I despair. It seems to me the world is going to hell by radio. . . . The blindness of the more, the rascality of the few, the dreadful unconsciousness of all, and the tragic destiny and impotence of the exceptional one. . . ." Such was the conflict of thought and feeling, of hope and despair in this eager personality.

Vanzetti was an emotional, intellectual belligerent. He laughed genially at the importance given in the last year of his fight to the fact that certain respectable opinion had swung to his side. "I call that to cling to a razor blade," he wrote Miss Donovan.

The child of well-to-do, middle-class, Catholic parents dwelling among their gardens and vineyards in Villafalletto, the Piedmont section in north Italy, Vanzetti inherited an intense gratification in nature. "Some notes of bird song reach our cages," he wrote from his Bridgewater cell in the spring of 1925. "I hear the barking of dogs in the distance. Nature blesses me with her music, her fires, and her colors." At the age of thirteen he left school, where he had "loved study." His father put him to work in a pastry shop, toiling from seven in the morning till ten at night, with a fortnightly vacation of three to five hours. He was a fervent Catholic, surrounded by young store clerks and laborers who labeled themselves Socialists and him "hypocrite and bigot" because of his "religious streak." After five years of such labor Vanzetti fell ill and returned to his home. That was "one of the happiest periods of my life. . . . My mother put me in bed. . . . I had almost forgotten hands could caress so tenderly." Then his mother died, and he came to America, a clouded youth of twenty, unable ever after to write of his mother because "I would never be satisfied of what I may write of her, even if I could write it in the third rhyme with the ability of Dante." His emotions at Ellis Island were singularly prophetic: "I saw the steerage passengers handled like so many animals. . . . Hope, which lured these immigrants to the new land, withers under the touch of harsh officials. . . ."

There followed long years of labor as dishwasher in New York—"the drain was clogged, the greasy water rose higher and higher, and we trudged in slime." A period at a brickyard in Hartford, then back to New York as pastry cook, then unemployment, then pick-and-shovel work in Worcester, and thence to Plymouth as construction worker, ditch-digger, Plymouth Cordage Plant worker, and, finally, fish peddler.

Vanzetti, a friendly personality, chatted with his fellow-workers, thought, and studied—studied particularly his two best loved books, the "Divine Comedy" and Ernest Renan's "The Life of Jesus." He became a follower of the Anarchist, Galleani, prominent at the time in the small radical circles of New England and now held al confino in Italy by Mussolini. He was one of the leaders in the Plymouth cordage strike early in 1916, till his anarchist absolutism ran afoul of other elements involved in the struggle. A persuasive orator in Italian, he was shoved off many a platform in that strike. He became a marked man. Plymouth Cordage would not reemploy him after the strike settlement. When the war reached America he went to Mexico to avoid the draft. On his return he again joined his friends in Plymouth; he worked as day-laborer until, his health impaired, he became a fish peddler.

Vanzetti, like Sacco, had never before been washed up into the sieve of the law when he was arrested on the night of May 5, 1920. He had just seen what happened to his friend Salsedo, smashed to death on the pavement fourteen stories below the Department of Justice offices in New York City where he had been held incomunicado for weeks. And now he felt the system for himself.

Behind the smoke-dulled walls in Charlestown he studied English by correspondence with Mrs. Virginia MacMeehan so that he might answer in English the letters that came to him. He wrote hundreds of letters in English and Italian—averaging nearly four a week during the seven years, three months, and eighteen days until his death.

Not only letters; Vanzetti wrote from prison the story of his own "Proletarian Life," a piece of honestly romantic self-analysis; the "Background of the Plymouth Trial," an intelligent immigrant's first contact with American criminal procedure; "Events and Victims," a first-hand account of work in a munitions factory; a series of essays analyzing the Boston newspapers, "the harlot press," which he despised and understood better than most newspapermen; a series of letters attacking "Syndicalists and Syndicalism"; articles for the defense-committee bulletins; romantic nature poems in Italian. He translated Proudhon's "War and Peace" into English, and the defense counsels' Supreme Court briefs into Italian for distribution in Europe. One of his last undertakings was to write a review of Charles and Mary Beard's "The Rise of American Civilization."

Physically he labored in prison as he worked outside—in the prison paintshop which was hell for him. "I cannot study without work hard, physical work, sunshine and winds; free, blessing wind," he wrote Mrs. Evans. Yet study he did, with an avidity seldom found in Harvard Yard. He kept on with the self-discussions he had started long before he came to America in 1908. Consider the books commented upon by him in his "Proletarian Life" or in conversations with friends: the works of Peter Kropotkin, Leo Tolstoy, Zola, Hugo, Cantu, Réclus, Gorki, Merlino, Malatesta, Marx, Leone di Labriola, Darwin, Spencer, and Laplace; Mazzini's "Duties of Man," the political "Testament" of Carlo Pisacane, the Bible, "The Life of Jesus" (Renan), "Jesus Christ Has Never Existed," by Milesbo; "here [in America] I read Greek and Roman history, the story of the United States, of the French Revolution and of the Italian Revolution"; "I returned to the 'Divine Comedy' and to 'Jerusalem Liberated.' I re-read Leopardi and wept with him"; the poetry of Giusti, Guerrini, Rapisardi, and Carducci. He read, in fact, everything he could lay hands on, from Sinclair Lewis's "Elmer Gantry" to Emerson's essays. "I will again delight myself at the lecture of Emerson's 'Politics,' 'Nature,' and 'New England Reformers,' so exquisitely anarchist," he wrote Mrs. Evans upon receipt from her of a set of Emerson for his last Christmas in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In due time came his day before Judge Webster Thayer—April 9, 1927. The court kept averted face in the white-columned courthouse in historic Dedham that morning. In the quiet room of justice not one newspaperman was unmoved by Vanzetti's words. Then the petition to Governor Fuller and the struggle over that document. William G. Thompson, conservative, high-minded lawyer, pitted his best New England principles against Vanzetti's anarchism. After the document was presented to the Governor, Vanzetti wrote to Gertrude L. Winslow:

It is not great and it was emasculated and dis-souled of its best, its truer truths. After all, Mr. Thompson wished it to save and free us; an address of libertarians to an authority man. Gag the truth, gag the right, gag the highest songs of your soul, the strongest note of your impulse, all your spontaneities, lest you offend others and harm yourself. So many things were left unsaid and others fogged or maimed or veiled. . . . I was in earnest at it and I was sick, feeling heavily the earth gravitation, and my

For St. Bartholomew's Day

By MALCOLM COWLEY

Die, then.

Outside the prison gawk
the crowds that you will see no more.
A door slams shut behind you. Walk with turnkeys down a corridor smelling of lysol, through the gates to where the uneager sheriff waits.

St. Nicholas who blessed your birth, whose hands are rich with gifts, will bear no further gifts to you on earth,
Sacco, whose voice is heard in prayer neither to Pilate nor a saint whose earthly sons die innocent.

And you that would not bow your knee to God, swarthy Bartholomew, no God shall seek your liberty nor Virgin intercede for you nor bones of yours make sweet the plot where governors and judges rot.

A doctor sneezes, a chaplain maps
the streets of heaven, you mount the chair, two jailers buckle tight the straps like those which aviators wear, the surgeon makes a signal.

Die!

lost symbols of our liberty.

Beyond the chair, beyond the bars of day and night your path lies free.
Yours is an avenue of stars.
March on, O dago Christs, while we march on to spread your name abroad like ashes in the winds of God.

spirit bended upon itself. That work devoured my flesh.

I did it for conscience's sake. For I know that for us there is no sympathy or consideration. . . . We will never accept life imprisonment any more than we accept death, except as impositions from a stronger physical force, and we consider both as pure and simple murders committed by reaction against revolution; this is the ultimate essence of our case, and being so, we cannot depart recommending pardon.

Vanzetti's attitude toward violence is precisely set forth in his petition to the Governor where he quotes Jefferson, Paine, Lincoln, and Emerson in his support. He wrote in 1924:

I abhor useless violence. I would my blood to prevent the shedding of blood, but neither the abyss nor the earth, nor the heavens, have a law which condemns the self-defense. . . . The more I live, the more I suffer, the more I learn, the more I am inclined to forgive, to be generous, and to see that violence as such does not resolve the problem of life. . . . The slave has the right and duty to arise against his master.

In a letter to Mrs. Evans he said:

The Anarchist go ahead and says, "all what is help to me without hurt the others is good; all what help the others without hurting me is good also, all the rest is evil." He look for his liberty in the liberty of all, for his happiness in the happiness of all, for his welfare in the universal welfare. I am with him.

Vanzetti, who had no taste for wine or other spirituous drinks, was not solemn in his abstinence. The ferment of his own spirit kept him always gay, angry, or intellectually absorbed. Mostly, of course, it was the latter. "I almost forgot to be in prison, very near to the electric chair," he wrote at the end of a long letter discussing the Russian Revolution. The subject of war he recurred to again and again in his letters:

We have war because we are not sufficiently heroic for a life which does not need war. . . . Many cry upon the slaughtered soldier's grave, his old mother, his sister, or his sweetheart, but all the others did only marketing upon it; and the tavern, the priests, the brothel make great profits and business during twenty-four hours of Decoration Day.

Vanzetti's reason never expected liberty. Yet he never ceased to meet life with keen interest. "Fuller has presidential aspirations," he wrote on January 10, 1927, months before Governor Fuller's name was even mentioned in that connection and months before the Governor's investigation was officially contemplated. "To be chosen for such candidacy, one must prove himself a hanger for the appointing and over-ruling American plutocracy. . . ."

As the day of the execution approached, he disposed of his books in letters to various friends. Only the arrival of his sister, Luigia, from Italy made his heart "a little unsteady" in that last period. His penmanship showed a remarkable change. It grew noticeably firmer. His last letter from the deathhouse a few hours before the execution, to Henry W. L. Dana, in which he asked him to labor to "insert in history the true significance of our case" was extraordinary in its precision of line and content.

And in an interview with a New York journalist Vanzetti spoke these last words to Judge Thayer:

If it had not been for these things, I might have live out my life, talking at street corners to scorning men. I might have die, unmarked, unknown, a failure. Now we are not a failure. This is our career and triumph. Never in our full life can we hope to do such work for tolerance, for justice, for man's understanding of man as now we do by an accident. Our words, our lives, our pains—nothing! The taking of our lives—lives of a good shoemaker and a poor fish peddler—all! That last moment belong to us—that agony is our triumph!

"A man of powerful mind, of unselfish disposition, and of devotion to high ideals," wrote Mr. Thompson of Vanzetti immediately after his final interview with him. In the death chamber Vanzetti shook hands with the wardens and guards, and smiled cordially as he looked into their eyes. He thanked them for their "kindness" to him. He calmly repeated his innocence of all crimes, but not of "some sins," and seated himself in the chair. "I forgive some of them for what they are doing to me," he said.

Railroad Building and Local Pride

By C. K. BROWN

THE Piedmont and Northern Railway Company owns and operates an electric railway from Greenwood to Spartanburg, South Carolina, a distance of ninety miles, and from Gastonia to Charlotte, North Carolina, a distance of twenty-three miles. On April 3, 1928, the Interstate Commerce Commission denied the company's application for permission to connect the two segments by building fifty-three miles of track from Spartanburg to Gastonia and to extend the line seventy-five miles from Charlotte to Winston-Salem. The line, if completed as proposed, would run in a northeasterly direction from Greenwood to Winston-Salem, paralleling the double-tracked main line of the Southern Railway almost within sight practically the entire distance. The commission denied the application on the ground that the proposed construction would be an unnecessary duplication of existing facilities. The Piedmont and Northern has filed suit in the federal courts to test the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Transportation Act of 1920.

Tremendous concern over the decision of the commission has been manifested in the press of the Carolinas. Although the proposed railroad is a local undertaking, the principles involved in the controversy are not of such limited scope. The Piedmont and Northern maintains that the commission is without authority in the matter, first, because the proposed construction was contemplated before the effective date of the Transportation Act and was prosecuted with due diligence thereafter; and second, because the Piedmont and Northern is an electric interurban railway not operated as a part of a general system of steam transportation and hence is excepted from the provision of the Transportation Act which requires the issuance of certificates of public convenience and necessity before new railroads can be built. The courts must pass on these two points. The commission has already decided them adversely to the interests of the Piedmont and Northern. The first point need not detain us except to note that during six of the eight years which have elapsed since the Transportation Act was enacted the Piedmont and Northern has had no charter right to build any railroad within the State of South Carolina. That the company did contemplate, prior to 1920, building from Charlotte to Durham, eighty miles east of Winston-Salem, seems to be admitted, but it was only comparatively recently that Winston-Salem was mentioned. Whether the Piedmont and Northern is an electric interurban railroad within the meaning of the terms of the Transportation Act depends altogether upon what the framers of that act meant. It is electric, of course. And it is interurban in the most literal sense of the word, just as any railroad connecting two municipalities is interurban. Did Congress mean to distinguish on the basis of motive power? The best authorities seem to agree that an interurban is a short road whose business is primarily passenger traffic. In 1926 5.5 per cent of the Piedmont and Northern's revenue came from passengers, while 91 per cent came from freight.

Practically every newspaper in the Piedmont South has been loud in its advocacy of the new lines. The Governor of North Carolina and the railroad commissions of both the Carolinas intervened in the proceedings before the commission, strongly urging the granting of the desired permission. Chambers of commerce in towns along the proposed route have been enthusiastic in their assertions of the need for the new railroad. Perhaps nowhere within recent years has there been afforded a better opportunity to study the prevailing economic philosophy of American business men. Borrowing the name of the doctrine which flourished in Europe several centuries ago, we may characterize this economic philosophy as local mercantilism. However discredited mercantilism may be among economists, it survives today in hundreds of small newspapers, chambers of commerce, and luncheon clubs. Local mercantilism favors any sort of social device which will encourage new enterprises to grow, perhaps artificially and uneconomically, but nevertheless to grow. It is not infrequently responsible for skyscrapers five stories higher than necessary, hotels half of whose beds will not be slept in for years, and race-tracks whose grandstands rot down before they earn 2 per cent on their cost.

One of the principles of local mercantilism is that the expenditure of money in a community is a boon to business. No distinction is made between useful and wasteful expenditure. The construction of the proposed lines of the Piedmont and Northern would, we are informed, give employment to many men in the Piedmont Carolinas and enable merchants to make many sales. To be sure, here is the double-tracked main line of the Southern Railway, with an estimated capacity of 144 trains a day and now carrying an average of thirty trains a day between Greenville, South Carolina, and Salisbury, North Carolina. The Piedmont and Northern proposes to parallel it between Spartanburg and Gastonia at an average distance of 1.1 miles. Between Charlotte and Winston-Salem the Southern has two lines. Only 6.5 miles of the Piedmont and Northern's proposed lines north of Charlotte would be more than four miles from some railroad. The conclusion seems obvious. Yet the railroads now serving the Carolinas are the only parties who appeared before the commission to oppose the new construction, and they have, of course, a private interest in opposing it. Is there no social interest involved?

The Piedmont and Northern Railway is controlled by the Duke interests, perhaps the most powerful financial interests in the Carolinas. Practically every kilowatt of power and every street-car ticket purchased in the Piedmont Carolinas is bought from the Duke companies. Substantial control of the entire system is in the hands of the self-perpetuating board of fifteen trustees of the Duke Endowment and the Doris Duke Trust. The recent industrial development of the Piedmont Carolinas has rested so largely upon the electrical energy which the Duke interests have supplied that the Dukes have rightly been given large credit for the progress which these States have enjoyed. Any venture which the Duke interests undertake is accepted in the Carolinas as being for the public good. Confidence in the future industrial development of the section is well-nigh unbounded. The new lines of the Piedmont and Northern are needed, it is urged, to keep pace with this rapid industrialization. Without detracting from the part which the Dukes have played in this development, it may be fair to point out that the Southern Railway, the Piedmont and Northern's chief competitor, has itself had something to do with it. And it is, with all due respect to local pride, remarkable how large a part agriculture still plays in the economic life of the section. There seems to be no imminent danger that industrial development will get beyond bounds.

That the Duke interests would profit from the new lines of the Piedmont and Northern need not be questioned. But there is no apparent reason for believing that private interest and public interest will always coincide. The new lines could obtain traffic, it is admitted, but it is extremely doubtful that they could get it in any way except by taking it away from existing roads. The Southern is a prosperous road, now making large earnings. Commissioner McManamy informs us that the Southern can well afford to share its traffic with the new Piedmont and Northern lines.

The question is whether the shippers of the South can afford to have it shared. One point which has been consistently overlooked in the discussions is the effect of the proposed new lines upon the freight-rate structure. For many years the South has been fretting under the burden of heavy freight rates. The general level of freight rates in the South is about a third higher than in the territory north of the Potomac. A thin population, bulky seasonal products, and a multiplicity of railroads have had this result. The earnings of Southern roads should not be divided with newly constructed lines. Instead, they must in time be divided with Southern shippers in the form of lower freight rates. Can this be called throttling the industrial development of the South? On the contrary, it is more likely to contribute to the future industrial development of the section than any other change.

A partial explanation of the intervention of the State utilities commissions in behalf of the Piedmont and Northern is to be found in a widespread support of the principle of local autonomy and a resentment against the exercise of regulatory power by federal bodies. New railroads have, of course, never been built without public authority. Formerly the only authority needed was a State charter. Since 1920 the additional requirement of permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission has been imposed. So hot has the resentment against this authority of the commission become in the Carolinas that some persons have advocated the repeal of the provision and have been successful in carrying their contention as far as the floor of Congress. Other more irate individuals wish to abolish the entire Interstate Commerce Commission. The jealousy of the commission's power is shared by the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners, which raised the issue to one of national importance by intervening in the proceedings in behalf of the Piedmont and Northern. State utilities commissioners outside the South can obviously have no vital interest in the construction of the new lines of the Piedmont and Northern. They simply want to forestall curtailment of their own powers. The attitude of the State commissioners opens the whole question of the economic philosophy lying back of the Transportation Act. That railroads should be regulated by public authority has been almost unquestioned in this country for the past four or five decades. By whom and to what extent they should be regulated are questions which have never been satisfactorily settled in this land of forty-nine jurisdictions.

By the grant of power to the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1920 to say what new lines should be built, the railroads for the first time were given the complete status of monopolies. The commission was charged with the task of fixing rates so that the roads as a whole or by groups might earn a fair return on investment and the interests of shippers be protected. The overlapping and conflicting powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the various State commissions have been a source of vexation for many years. The trend during the past two decades has unquestionably been in the direction of increased power of the Interstate Commerce Commission at the expense of the State commissions. It may be traced through the Minnesota and Shreveport rate cases of 1913-1914, the provisions of the Transportation Act of 1920, and the decision in the Wisconsin Passenger Fares Case in 1922. This trend is regrettable from the standpoint of State rights and local control, but it is inevitable if adequate regulation of railroads as monopolies is to be attained in this country of great distances and many State boundaries, where transportation problems persistently refuse to remain local.

A Political Utopia

By FREDERIC C. HOWE

MY Utopia has to do with the political state, possibly because my chief interests for many years have been with the state, and the things it could do for its members if it chose. Yet as I think of it, my political state is somewhat negative—a state that keeps out of the way of people so that people themselves will be important in themselves and by themselves. I dislike a state in which some mediocre man by virtue of a show of hands becomes the most important personage in the community. I should prefer a state in which we thought about and talked about and revered as important men who had made contributions to science, to art, to literature, to the better living of the world. A mere president does not seem important to me in comparison with a Bernard Shaw or a governor in comparison with a Bertrand Russell.

My state would prize distinction. I would place that high above the sanctity that attaches to the thoughts, ideas, and spoken word of the politician or the statesman. In my Utopia, liberty, freedom, individuality, variety would be the goal; it would be a Utopia in which the mind played as freely on all subject matter as it now plays freely on airplanes, radios, and things mechanical. For the mechanical world is an exhibit of what this world might be in all its relations—cultural, artistic, human—if it were really free.

Such a state does involve some positive political action; but the political action would be with the aim of ending every economic privilege or law-made advantage that one man enjoys over another except such privileges as came to him by birth or natural endowment. It would welcome a Ford or an Edison but not a Rockefeller or a Gary.

And the first essential in a free state is to get rid of fear—the fear that begets economic greed; the fear that causes rich and poor alike to subordinate everything else to the problem of food, clothes, and shelter. And such fear can be exorcised. Of that I am sure. It is being exorcised in some states in Europe; and among all the political suggestions that I have read, whether it be socialism, communism, or any other utopian proposal, the philosophy of Henry George seems to me to rank highest. And the Utopia is so simple, so easily achieved, and so marvelous in its potentialities that it should be the first step in any change. All that Henry George taught was that God gave the earth to all his people. He dedicated its resources to use rather than to monopoly, to withholding them from use. He gave us all the elements—air, water, land—and said to man, "These are not for idle possession. They are to be used, and to be used by those most capable of using them to their highest and best efficiency."

And Henry George suggested a simple means for freeing the resources of the earth for use. His proposal was that there should be but one tax; that that tax should be imposed on the capital value of the land, and that the tax should be high enough to appropriate all of the ground rent which the land would potentially produce. In other words, he would have the state become the universal collector of ground rent. He would have the city of New York step into the shoes of the Astors, the Rhinelanders, the Trinity Corporation, and other speculators who have grown enormously rich through the growth of population, the advances of the arts, and the needs of humanity. He would have the state step into the shoes of the owner of coal, iron ore, copper, oil, gas, water-power. A tax appropriating the annual rental of all such land would bring into the public treasury a colossal revenue. It would bring in the ground rents of all of our cities; it would bring in the ground values of suburban land; it would appropriate the value of the oil and gas deposits, the bituminous and anthracite coal, iron ore, copper, and zinc. The revenues which now flow to private monopolies would be directed into the public purse and would be available for social uses. Far more important, the resources of the continent would be opened up to free use. There would be opportunities for unborn generations, and for a population many times our present one. Fear would vanish with opportunities calling to labor on every hand, while wages would rise with the demand for labor which such a taxation policy would involve.

My utopian state would know no other tax than this. There would be no protective tariffs. Custom houses would be turned to other uses. America would trade as freely with the outside world as California now trades with Pennsylvania, as Minnesota trades with Louisiana. That which we have found of such transcendent value in our own commonwealth would be expanded to include the products and the resources of other lands. Then exotic industries and monopolies would have to fight for their existence. Some would undoubtedly die, but others would take their place. International competition would not only reduce prices; it would improve quality, while the wealth of Europe would find its way into American markets, stimulating our own productive energies and enriching our means of enjoyment.

A free state does involve a certain amount of socialism, but a socialism for the purpose of making the state free. It involves the public ownership of all highways—railroads as well as automobile roads. It means the ownership of water-power, telephones and telegraphs, street railways, gas and electricity in order that these services may be rendered at the minimum of cost. Service, in these industries that are above competition, should take the place of private profit. But these are almost my only concessions to socialism. The gains from collective effort I would achieve in another way. I would get them through cooperation—such cooperation as has converted Denmark into one of the most contented, happy, and on the whole satisfactory commonwealths in the civilized world. Denmark achieved its approach to Utopia through the cooperative movement; through the collective organizations of farmers, workers, distributors around almost every important industry, so that private exploitation, the amassing of great wealth in few hands, has almost disappeared in this little Scandinavian state.

Cooperation means the maximum of liberty. It means the merging of politics with everyday life. It integrates all the economic and cultural activities of men about a natural center and that in this every-day life.

If this Utopia sounds materialistic, it is because I am convinced that we cannot approach our cultural or spiritual potentialities without first exorcising the economic fear which poisons all other departments of life. But with fear gone, men and women would be free to turn their latent energies and talents to other things as they have always done among well-to-do classes in every age of the world. Man is interested in his stomach first of all, only because he has to be interested in his stomach. We know very little of his potentialities in other fields, for not until very recent times has any class been free from economic fear, and only within a generation have any substantial numbers been released so that they might think in terms other than the possession of their daily bread.

Man must first be free in the economic field before he can be free in any other. And to those who feel that the economic problem is insoluble, that the forces of reaction are too powerful to be dislodged, one may point out that all the gains in this field we have made in a short century. It was not until the French Revolution that there was any thought in the world of social justice, and not until the middle of the last century that such thought began to find expression in legislation. In our own country the advances of the past twenty years are proof that economic ideas do make headway and that the advance suggestions of today do have a way of becoming realities tomorrow.

In the Driftway

THE DRIFTER'S favorite realtor lives in a little town on Long Island which, although not Hicksville, the Drifter will call, in the manner of Mr. Cummings, Hicksville. As a vaudeville joke Hicksville is somewhat past its prime, but as a philosophic problem it has never been solved, any more than the mystery of the chicken and the egg. Which came first, the hicks or Hicksville? The Drifter will probably never know.

* * * * *

THE TOWN realtor had engaged to show the Drifter's companion some cottages on Hicksville's Highland Beach. It is important not to confuse this with any of the other Highland Beaches lining the sandy spits and marshy coves of the island which Walt Whitman called Paumanok and the local chambers of commerce call "America's Sunrise Homeland." They all climbed into the realtor's car and started. They turned out of the highway, past an imposing garage and a modest church, and drove across the railroad track—one of those gateless, signalless crossings where, as the railroads reproachfully announce, hundreds of people are careless enough to be killed. A friendly old bucolic sitting on a pile of ties waved a notebook at the realtor and the realtor waved back. They came to a cove full of Long Island ducklings, not yet roasted but quacking happily. "Is the beach far from here?" inquired the Drifter's friend politely. "Oh, no," answered the realtor. "It's half a mile on the other side of the track." He turned back and crossed it again, waving once more at the friendly bucolic. "He's keeping a tally," the realtor explained. "If we can prove that enough cars cross the track the railroad will give us a signal bell, so we're all trying to roll up the score."

* * * * *

HIGHLAND BEACH turned out to be a densely wooded patch of oak scrub filled with cottages and mosquitoes. The realtor stopped the car before a tiny structure and bade his prospect and the Drifter descend. "Where," inquired the prospect, "is the beach?" "Right down here," was the cheerful reply. Peering through the trees, they descried a rowboat and a comfortable little lake only partly covered with ducklings. "And where," he pursued diffidently, "are the Highlands?" "Why, this," said the realtor with an air of reproach, "is the highest ground for twenty-five miles around." He was on the point of unlocking the cottage to display its internal charms when a loud alarum broke upon the air, frightening the ducks and mosquitoes as well as the Drifter. The realtor sprang toward the car and motioned the others to follow. "It's a fire," he said, "and I'm one of the chiefs. Come along. We'll look at the houses later."

THEY STOPPED at the garage to give a lift to one of the other chiefs. The old bucolic by the tracks noted their third crossing, and the Drifter wondered on which side the fire might be. It turned out to be near the station on the farther side. The crowd of townsfolk already gathered looked curiously at the prospect and the Drifter sitting in the realtor's car. They had been left in a grassy lane bordered by oak scrub and mosquitoes, and quite devoid of buildings, flames, or smoke. "Let's go and find the fire," the Drifter suggested. "Perhaps we can help." Before they could get out of the car the realtor returned with disappointment written on his face. It had been only a grass fire and he had been too late. They recrossed the track and returned to Highland Beach, with its welcoming committee of eager mosquitoes.

* * * * *

THE DRIFTER'S friend was not pleased with the cottages, and the realtor bade them a sad farewell. He had made no sale; he had missed a fire; and even if he had added four to the railway-crossing tally, he was late for supper. When the Drifter eventually stops drifting, he is going back to hicksville to console the realtor by buying one of his houses.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Sacco-Vanzetti Meetings

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: August 22 will mark the passing of the first year since the State of Massachusetts, under the subterfuge of legality, electrocuted two men upon the altar of sham respectability.

Meetings throughout the world will be held on August 22, where the blameless lives and heroic deaths of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti will be recited in many tongues.

In New York City the Sacco-Vanzetti Memorial Committee has arranged for a mass meeting in Union Square at 5 p. m. on Wednesday, August 22.

Prominent speakers will address the gathering in various languages, and the committee making the arrangements has assurances from large bodies of workers that this will be one of the greatest gatherings ever held in that memorable meeting-place. The outdoor meeting is also commemorative of the last few months prior to the tragedy, when it was impossible to secure a suitable hall, because of intimidation from many sources, and the workers were forced to make their protests out on the public highways, where they strenuously but vainly demanded the unconditional release of the idealists whose memories they now revere.

SACCO-VANZETTI MEMORIAL COMMITTEE,

New York, August 7 149 East Twenty-third Street

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A Sacco-Vanzetti memorial meeting will be held at Scenic Auditorium, 12 Berkeley Street, Boston, on August 23, at 8:30 p. m. A committee, including Professor Samuel Eliot Morison of Harvard, Dr. Alice Hamilton of the Harvard Medical School, Mrs. Gertrude L. Winslow, Miss Catherine Huntington, Creighton Hill, and myself, is sponsoring the meeting.

The list of speakers includes Edna St. Vincent Millay, Arthur Davison Ficke, Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn, Robert Morss Lovett, and the Rev. Harold L. Stratton of the Pilgrim Congregational Church of Worcester, Massachusetts.

We invite everyone to come to Boston for this meeting who considers the search for justice as an important activity of man.

Boston, August 8

GARDNER JACKSON

Governor Fuller's Way

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This past week another execution took place at Charlestown which is a further disgrace to the commonwealth that permitted it and which furnishes one more piece of evidence as to the inhumane and repellent characteristics of Governor Fuller. Desatnick, a twenty-five-year-old Jewish peddler, married in May, 1927, a girl of his own faith who some months previously had given birth to his child. Later they discovered that under the canons of the orthodox Jewish faith, to which they were both devoted, the child was forever illegitimate and could not be received into the church. This caused the parents unspeakable anguish.

The man brooded for a long time over the situation. There was evidence that the opprobrium of relatives further accentuated his distress. The jury found that he handed over the child to a stranger to be drowned. The child's body was found in a lake near Worcester. Desatnick maintained his innocence to the last, declaring that he had given the child to a man who had promised to place the baby in a Jewish home in New York.

When the case reached Governor Fuller some of the leading rabbis of the State went in a body to the Governor and pleaded with him for commutation to life imprisonment. It was clearly shown that the unfortunate man had been goaded to his act by the folkways of race and by an almost fanatical religious phobia. But to Governor Fuller there were no such complicated sensitivities involved. The jury had found him guilty. The law must take its course.

It is fortunate indeed for what remains of the good name of Massachusetts that Fuller leaves office at the end of this year. He will not be forgotten—the Sacco-Vanzetti case will stand as a shameful memorial to his name in the eyes of posterity. But, as if this were not already enough, a year after two innocent Italians have been electrocuted he further brands himself as a man incapable of even the most rudimentary feelings of compassion in a case where the question of innocence was not involved, but simply of fundamental human pity for a poor wretch who deserved executive clemency under our statutes if ever a human being did.

Boston, July 22

CREIGHTON HILL

A Voice from Prison

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am one of the eight victims of the Centralia conspiracy of November 11, 1919. None of the men in the Centralia group is a criminal. In fact, so anxious were they to keep within the law, even in defending themselves, that they consulted an attorney as to their legal rights before attempting to resist the raid which they had been warned was to be made on them.

The business men of Centralia had hatched a conspiracy to raid the I. W. W. Hall and run the members out of town. They had openly stated their purpose in the daily paper published in Centralia. On November 11, 1919, they attempted to carry out the plans of their conspiracy; but after smashing the windows and doors of the hall they met with armed opposition, and four of the attackers were killed.

I had just arrived in town a short time before the attack and had witnessed it from the lobby of the Roderick Hotel. Not a shot was fired until after the windows and doors had been smashed by the attackers.

So conclusively was this fact proved at the so-called trial which was farcically given to us that the judge was forced to resort to technicalities when he instructed the jury. He said: "I charge these men with doing a lawful act in an unlawful way." This because some of the men had tried to defend the hall from outside instead of from inside.

I was unarmed and had absolutely no connection with the trouble in any way, and the shooting that was done by others was in defense of life and property after the aggressors had committed acts of violence and proved their felonious intentions beyond a possible doubt.

Now we come to the "trial"; the little Legionnaire with the crooked eye came on the witness stand. I believe his name was Walters. Anyway he swore that he was standing at the head of the Centralia contingent of Legionnaires, marking time, when the shooting started; that he was flag-bearer and as he ran for cover several bullets passed between him and the flag-staff. He said he looked in the direction the bullets came from and saw a man in an upstairs window of the Avalon Hotel, shooting at him with a large rifle. The hotel was approximately 100 yards away and the man was shooting from inside the upstairs window. With a rifle to his face only the upper half of his face would be visible to the man in the street. Obviously a man could not identify his best friend under such circumstances. When asked if he could identify that man among the prisoners he said: "The third man on the bench." I was the third man.

Next came Elsie Hornbeck. She had seen the man in the upstairs window of the Avalon Hotel before the parade came past, and again when he was shooting. After she had told her story she was asked whether she could pick out the man she had seen from among the defendants, and she said: "The third man looks like him." On cross-examination she admitted she had been shown several photographs of me by agents of the prosecution. Then Mr. Vanderveer asked her: "Will you, knowing it's a case of life and death, say that you think Barnett looks like the man you saw?"

I wanted to jump up and ask: "Will you say Barnett is the man you saw?" but I thought Mr. Vanderveer should know his profession better than I, so I kept still and the witness answered: "Yes."

The jury considered the testimony of this witness the strongest evidence against me. And they accepted her answer to the question quoted above as a positive identification, while it is obviously not an identification at all. This girl, now a married woman, has since made a sworn affidavit declaring that she did not identify me, and only said that I looked like the man she saw. The court record will substantiate her claim. Her affidavit is before the Parole Board signed by Elsie Hornbeck Shirley.

Next witness, Charles P. Briffet, the large man to whom I was called out and exhibited in a hall-way at Chehalis. He testified to having seen a man coming up the alley from the rear of the Avalon Hotel refilling the magazine of a large rifle. He also told of seeing a young woman in the alley at the same time. When asked to identify the man he saw, he said: "The third from the end."

As soon as Briffet left the stand Mr. Vanderveer asked for a recess and gathered all of us defendants around him. "Now," he said, "there is something funny about everyone of these witnesses saying 'the third from the end.' All of you stand up until the next witness takes the stand, then change places so Barnett will be fifth or sixth."

We all stood up until Miss Lela Tripp, the girl in whose presence I had been kept for an hour in the sheriff's office at Chehalis, took the stand. Then we sat down and I was seventh man on the bench. Miss Tripp told of seeing the man leaving the rear of the Avalon Hotel with the big rifle. When asked to identify the man she had seen, she looked at the third man on the bench. He was bald-headed; she hesitated, looked up and down the bench and admitted she could not say which was the man. "Eugene Barnett, stand up," said Mr. Abel, one of the six attorneys for the prosecution. I sat still and Mr. Vanderveer jumped up. "No you don't," he said. "We've had enough of your kind of identifications." The witness was then turned over to Mr. Vanderveer for cross-examination. "Who told you Eugene Barnett was the third man on the bench?" asked Mr. Vanderveer. "Mr. Christenson," answered the witness. Mr. Christenson was an assistant from the Attorney General's office.

So in addition to having had me exhibited to them before the trial my position on the bench was being tipped-off to the witnesses at the trial.

Miss Tripp was asked: "What kind of a hat did the man you saw with the rifle have on?"

"A soldier's hat," she replied.

My hat, a large John B. Stetson, velour-finish, cow-boy hat, was shown to her and she declared that the hat worn by the man with the rifle was nothing like that, but was a soldier's hat.

The prosecution claimed that I ran out of town a mile or so from the scene of the shooting and hid the rifle behind a sign-board.

Mr. James McAllister and his wife, Mary, appeared and swore I was in the lobby of their hotel, The Roderick, at the time of the shooting. Both of these witnesses had been personally acquainted with me since 1911.

S. A. Hand, owner of a second-hand store, took the stand and told of walking up the avenue with me after the shooting and at the very time the prosecution claimed I was running out of town in the opposite direction to hide a rifle. Charles Roy, a young coal-miner, swore that he met me a little farther up the avenue.

Alexander Siegardon testified to having met me a couple of blocks farther up-town. Cecil Arrowsmith, a farmer boy, and a personal acquaintance, testified that he saw the man in the window of the Avalon Hotel at the same time Miss Hornbeck did. He did not know the man, but did know it was not Eugene Barnett. He was much nearer to the man than Miss Hornbeck and had an unobstructed view, while she was looking through a plate-glass window. Arrowsmith also told of meeting me in front of the wrecked hall when I stopped at the hotel to get my coat on my way home.

Walla Walla, Washington, July 18

EUGENE BARNETT

Contributors to This Issue

GARDNER JACKSON has been for a number of years the moving spirit in the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee of Boston.

C. K. BROWN is professor of economics at Davidson College, Davidson, North Carolina.

FREDERIC C. HOWE, head of the School of Opinion at Siasconset, Massachusetts, is the author of "Revolution and Democracy," "The Confessions of a Reformer," and other books.

STANLEY J. KUNITZ is a New York poet.

HAL SAUNDERS WHITE is a member of the faculty of New York University.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is the author of "A New Constitution for a New America" and other historical studies.

V. F. CALVERTON is the editor of the Modern Quarterly and author of "The Newer Spirit."

KARL F. GEISER is professor of political science at Oberlin College.

HELEN PIERCE has reviewed poetry for The Nation and other publications.

MARY REED, formerly of the staff of The Nation, is now living in Moscow.

Man Does Not Ask for Much

By STANLEY J. KUNITZ

Behold this darkling world: it is a cave
Of bitter circumstance and swift decay,
Wherein the blind soul, stumbling to the grave,
Knows nothing but the peril of the way.
Man does not ask for much, being content
With scanty joy in plenitude of grief:
A mouth to kiss, money to pay his rent,
One small coincidence to speed belief
In a divine Redeemer, sweetly kind,
Who if He maketh man diseased and wild,
Corruptible and ignorant and blind,
Yet loveth He His poor afflicted child.

Then is man happy going to his doom:
Then will he lie down singing in his tomb.

Deserted Barn

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Time grinds the slow meal of the dark
Under the rafters of this roof.
They have gone by whose feet once broke
The parted indifference—
The woven weight upon these floors.
Going, they crumbled into light
Beyond that sudden edge of hill.
They come no more again at dusk
With lantern shadows on the hay
And slow words for the sorrel horse
In the dark stall.

Elephant and Donkey

The Republican Party. A History. By William Starr Myers.
The Century Company. $4.

The Democratic Party. A History. By Frank R. Kent. The Century Company. $4.

THESE two heavy books contain about all that most persons will care to know about the history of the Republican and Democratic parties. Each appears to be a compilation based upon familiar secondary works, although the method is not the same in the two cases. Professor Myers goes at his task in the usual historian's manner, introducing a good many details into his narrative, citing authorities frequently in footnotes, stopping occasionally to express a personal opinion, and in the end constructing a story which most Republicans will probably accept as orthodox. Mr. Kent, with nearly twice as many years to cover in approximately the same number of pages, assumes that his readers already know something about the subject, and writes avowedly as a reporter rather than a historian. As he has on the whole the better literary style, Democratic readers will perhaps be led to think that his work has been better done, although in point of substance there is not much to choose between the two books.

As each of these writers seems to have made a sincere effort to be impartial, estimates of their performance will doubtless be colored a good deal by the reader's party predilections. The long record of political corruption which marks the years of Republican control is not pleasant reading, and while Professor Myers seems to stay his hand as he approaches the present time, his judgments are not often open to question. He does well to explode once more the myth of Lincoln's popularity as President, and to range himself with those who now regard a large part of the Republican reconstruction legislation as unconstitutional. When he comes to the Hayes-Tilden controversy, on the other hand, he is at swords' points with Mr. Kent. According to Professor Myers, the "high character and reputation for integrity and honesty" of the members of the Electoral Commission "precludes any charge or taint of corruption," notwithstanding "the fact that these men on both sides were Republicans or Democrats meant that they had a certain bent of mind which undoubtedly would influence and form the basis for their judgment." To Mr. Kent, the rejection of Tilden was the work of "the most unashamed, unfair, completely and contemptibly partisan body to which was ever committed a high duty calling for nonpartisanship, complete fearlessness, and rigid fairness." One wonders later if Professor Myers is qualifying for honors as a humorist in suggesting that the apoplexy of which Harding was said to have died may not have been induced by a "broken heart" over the discovery, which Professor Myers thinks Harding had probably made, of "the maze of graft, scandal, and, in some cases, personal dishonesty" on the part of those whom his "undoubted personal honesty" and "transparent sincerity" had trusted.

When it comes to mixing criticism with an analysis of situations, Mr. Kent is the better of the two. His summary of the Democratic situation since 1860 is a good example. In the sixty-eight years since the Buchanan administration ended, the Democrats have won four presidential elections and lost thirteen. What has kept the party during that long period in a condition where its only hope lay in "a division within the Republican party or a revolt against Republican administration" is, he thinks, the control of the Negro vote in pivotal States by the Republicans; the extraordinary industrial growth of the country, minimizing the importance of the agricultural and rural classes which were originally the support of the Democrats, and at the same time used by the Republicans to draw to their support the business and financial interests, which in return were rewarded with favors; and the failure of the party "to find a unifying issue in accord with traditional Democratic principles, and their habit of fighting more violently among themselves over the vibrant question of the day than with the Republicans."

This is good criticism, even if the "unifying issue" which Mr. Kent mentions is not altogether easy to discover even in retrospect. Professor Myers, who does not affect such summaries, permits himself at the end to assail both parties for their lack of leadership and their dependence upon the local prominence of office-holders and political aspirants. The final chapter of Mr. Kent's book, on the 1928 outlook, might well have been omitted, for prophecy is not history, and we do not yet know what November may bring forth.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Lenin, Philosopher

Materialism and Empirio-Criticism. By V. I. Lenin. International Publishers.

IN America, Marxism is often thought to be a barren formula, prosaic in content, and removed from the fine, embracing logic of a flexible philosophy in the gray, rigid outlines of its economic dogma. In Europe this has never been so. Marxism there has been a vital, dynamic, comprehensive doctrine, including all the various sciences, philosophies, and arts within its scope. In this volume of Lenin, for instance, we discover Marxism actively plunged into the problems of materialism and idealism, the enigmas of epistemology, and the changing conflicts in contemporary physics. More than that, it is a book in answer to other essays and books on the same theme by other Marxians, in particular Bogdanov, and numerous non-Marxians whom Lenin denounced as reactionary in their approach to these problems.

The thesis of the book is simple despite the complexity of materials which it subjects to analysis—perhaps a little too simple. In a sense it can be summarized in the words of Dietzgen: "Pure idealists are those who sound the retreat, and dialectic materialists must be the appellation of all those who strive for the liberation of the human mind from all metaphysical magic." Idealists, then, whether they be Berkeleyans, Humeans, or the modern disciples of Pearson, Poincaré, Mach, or Duhem, are representatives of the reactionary philosophy of the old order; dialectical materialists, such as Marx, Engels, and Dietzgen, on the other hand, are representatives of the revolutionary philosophy of the new order. The "in-betweeners" are attacked with not less vigor than the reactionaries. Büchner, and Dühring, and Haeckel, for example, are assailed for being vulgar materialists, without an understanding of the fundamental approach of historical (or dialectical) materialism; Huxley is scorned for being an irresolute agnostic; and Bogdanov, Lunacharsky, Yushevitch, Bazarov, and Suvorov are ridiculed for being Machians who want to be Marxians. Even Plekhanov is attacked for certain inadequacies in his dialectical approach to materialism. Epistemology, for Lenin, is a study in class-differences, and the changing attitudes in physics, with their shift from a materialistic to an idealistic point of view, and with the attitudes of Mach, Avenarius, and Poincaré supplanting those of Newton and the older school, is but another reflection of this ideological conflict.

Lenin as an epistemologist and a philosophical materialist is without question a striking anomaly. For anyone acquainted with the usual nature of philosophical argument, or accustomed to the regular methods of philosophic analysis, Lenin will burst upon them like a bombshell. However in error in his other judgments of Lenin's genius, Aldanov was correct when he said that "Lenin was interested in philosophy only as one is interested in an enemy." Philosophy had no abstract meaning for him except as a revolutionary weapon. Those who disagree with the epistemology of Engels and the philosophy of historical materialism are not only reactionaries—they are "ignorant" and "muddle-headed," and at other times "word-jugglers," "triflers," "cowards," and "liars." Scarcely ever has a philosophical treatise been written with as much venom, or, for that matter, with as much vigor.

The main attack of the book was directed against the empirio-critics, among whom Lunacharsky was conspicuous, and the empirio-monist, Bogdanov. Both Lunacharsky and Bogdanov, it is interesting to note, are today active and influential in the Soviet Union. In 1908, when "Materialism and Empirio-Criticism" was being written, Bogdanov was the leading philosophic-ideologist in the Bolshevik Party. Lenin had taken little interest in purely philosophic problems until he believed the leadership of Bogdanov, emphasized by the appearance of his book "Outlines of Marxian Philosophy," had become a misleading and subversive influence. "Materialism and Empirio-Criticism," in its endeavor to combat Bogdanov, and the various empirio-critics and empirio-symbolists as well, begins by a general assault upon the entire school of Mach and Avenarius from which Bogdanov, Lunacharsky, Berman, Bazarov, and Yuskevich had derived so much inspiration. In his zeal to ridicule the psycho-physiology of Mach, which, in truth, needs much modification today, he makes Mach out to be an idealist, which classification Mach definitely denied, and ends by annihilating a fiction rather than a fact. Despite the strictures leveled at him, Mach was as much an enemy of metaphysics and as eager an advocate of science as Lenin. In fact, in the preface to the second edition of his "Analysis of Sensations," Mach explicitly states that the aim of his approach was to eliminate "all metaphysical elements . . . as superfluous and destructive of the economy of science." It is not that there are not many flaws in Mach's logic, but that Lenin in his anxiety to prove Mach a reactionary failed to answer them. Lenin often confused realism as a theory of knowledge with materialism as a theory of "stuff." By insisting upon the naive formula that the sensation is "a copy, photograph, and reflection of a reality existing independently of it," and attacking Plekhanov for considering them only as symbols of that reality, his logic lost itself in embarrassing difficulty. In his attacks upon Bogdanov, many of which are cogent, and upon Lunacharsky, most of which are well-founded, he never feels the necessity of defending his own philosophic position, or justifying the basis of his own logic. These are the main weaknesses of the book.

There are many virtues which the book possesses that should also be mentioned. Lenin's attitude and outlook, however over-simplified, are never ambiguous or evasive. There is real challenge in his motivation; challenge for a great end. He aimed to make philosophy into a thing of action rather than a thing of escape. In his consideration of certain of the changes in contemporary physics, the tendency to dematerialize matter and materialize mind, Lenin displayed real genius at analysis. Russell's argument, for instance, that matter has disappeared and been replaced by energy, Lenin answered, by way of intelligent anticipation, by showing, in a striking manner, that "a different mode of expression does not at all wipe out the distinctions between fundamental philosophic questions and tendencies." This section of the book is excellent for its clarity as well as cogency.

If Lenin was not a great philosopher, it was not because he did not conceive of philosophy as serving a great purpose. It was his very greatness in action, which made him too impatient of those subtle distinctions and fine logic which make a great philosopher.

V. F. CALVERTON

Science and Music

Music: A Science and an Art. By John Redfield. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

The composer and the interpretative artist have this much in common: they each of them take materials that are supplied to them, and to these materials they contribute an additional beauty not present in the materials as supplied. And this adding of beauty to musical materials furnished is the second type of musical art; the first being . . . mere physical skill. But each of these types of musical art utilizes physical things as their vehicles and means of expression. And the study of these physical things constitutes musical science. The interpretative musician of whatever kind uses some form of physical instrument. . . . These instruments, all, are pieces of physical apparatus subject to the same physical laws that govern other machines. The composer, too, works with physical materials. He uses rhythms and musical notes, both of them atmospheric phenomena as truly physical in character as electricity, heat, or gravitation, and both of them quite as properly subjects for laboratory investigation. . . .

FOR Mr. Redfield the science of music is applied, useful science. He wants scientists placed in laboratories to investigate and experiment with the tone and construction of the various musical instruments, nearly all of which he considers defective, and he is sure they can improve. They will, one supposes, also investigate the technique of the instruments, as Ortmann<sup>1</sup> investigated the technique of tone production on the piano, and, one hopes, have more effect upon ation than he did. But there they will stop. Redfield himself describes the science of performance, and the instruments and their sounds as physical facts, and in his discussion of the art of interpretation, Maëls with the sounds as musical things, he does not do anything of science. In other words, while there is a science of musical performance as well as an art, it is not a science of the art, nor is there as yet any such science.

<sup>1</sup> "The Physical Basis of Piano Tone." By Otto Ortmann. Dutton.

Now the science of musical sound has even less to do with the creative art of music. There have been many attempts to formulate a theory of harmony that would account for the relations of sounds as musical facts by their relations as physical facts, the latest and seemingly the best attempt being Mr. Redfield's. These attempts have been encouraged by the fact that for a time musical procedures produced chords that were composed of the most prominent partials of the harmonic series. But the procedures have carried musical materials to a point where most of what is musically significant is not natural. The science of musical sounds as facts of nature can no longer account for their behavior as the materials of music; and changes in this behavior are therefore more likely to come from their further use in music than from the science, which would subject what is artificial and man-made to the limitations of what is natural.

But Mr. Redfield insists that the science of musical sound still has or ought to have everything to do with the idiom of music; that a physical theory of harmony still has practical value; and that a student must learn harmony not in musically significant usage, but in the physical laboratory, where "the harmonic practices of The Masters will all have to be subjected to laboratory verification, and modified to the degree that they are found capable of improvement." As a result, the chords of the last century or two sound bad to him because their structure and tuning are unnatural. Indeed he ascribes their unnatural structure to their unnatural tuning: the introduction of equal temperament "dulled the keenness of the ear's appreciation of natural harmonies" and "broadened the tolerance of the ear in favor of combinations of tones not naturally harmonic," until "almost any combination of tones is now more or less acceptable." But there is not enough difference between the just and the tempered scales to cause a major third or a major chord in the tempered scale to sound like anything but a major third or a major chord (this would be true also of intervals mistuned by the more minute divisions of the octave, which Mr. Redfield offers as a possibility to be investigated in the laboratory, after he has objected to the mistuning of the tempered scale); and unnatural tuning, therefore, is not a reason for the departures from natural chord structure. One may say rather that the harmonic sense in reaction to existing harmonic materials produced changes which incidentally necessitated the compromises of the tempered scale. However, suppose Mr. Redfield is right; his position then is that if the harmony of the last century or two is possible only at a cost of harmonic purity, he would rather keep the harmonic purity.

But the attitude of the musician is more realistic. Tovey<sup>2</sup> expresses this attitude when he accepts "the universal law that artistic ideas must be realized, not in spite of, but by means of practical necessities"; and this after pointing out that "there is no art in which the element of practical compromise is so minute and so hard for any but trained scientific observation to observe." Moreover, the choice has already been made, and, as Tovey says, "an intonation which makes nonsense of chords of which every classical composer since Corelli has made excellent sense is a very unjust intonation indeed." In other words, this is old wisdom on what is no longer an issue; and one does not expect anyone demonstrating the practical value of the science of music to attack the tempered scale, or to offer for present adoption a just scale which, with its twelve modes in each of fifteen tonalities, presents the same practical difficulties—for example, of providing keyboard instruments with all the necessary keys—that necessitated abandoning just intonation once before. If it is the modal harmonies Mr. Redfield wants, they are already in use, but with the slight alterations dictated by practical necessities.

Since Mr. Redfield has raised the question again, let it be answered completely. According to Ogden<sup>3</sup> the employment of equal intervals and their multiples is even more primitive and fundamental than the employment of harmonics and their derivatives. The principle is illustrated by the music of Java, in which the octave is divided into equal intervals with the ratio of vibration frequencies 519:596, and melodies are successions of this interval and its multiples, which do not lend themselves to harmony since they do not fuse. Our own chromatic scale of equal temperament is, then, in the first place, as natural as the scale of just intonation; and, in the second place, it is doubly useful in that it introduces into our music the equal intervals that are not found in the harmonic scale, while it preserves the harmonic trends that are not found in the ordinary scale of equal intervals. It must be noted, however, that when Ogden uses the term natural he refers not only to the nature of sound but to the nature of man; that for him the science of music comprises not only physics but physiology, and especially psychology, which brings him nearer to music as a man-made product. One would, therefore, expect his treatment to be better than Mr. Redfield's, and, in fact, it is. It is not so easy to read, but even in style it has one advantage in not having been written for the American Mercury; and those who are interested in the subject should not be deterred by a cumbrous prose and none too clear arrangement of material. On the other hand, it does not deal with instruments; and of these Mr. Redfield writes the more valuable part of his book.

B. H. HAGGIN

A History of the League

The League of Nations: A Chapter in World Politics. By John Spencer Bassett. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

IN the foreword to this volume Professor James T. Shotwell ranks the author as "one who for a whole generation had held his place among the first of American historians." And while this work—the last before the tragic death of Professor Bassett—is in a new field of international history, a field in which the imperfections of race hatred, prejudice, and insincerity still mar the pages of most works dealing with this subject, this narrative is written in a spirit of perfect detachment and with the same scholarly and interpretative style familiar to the reader of his other works.

Briefly stated, it is a history of the League of Nations—including its failures as well as its achievements—from the making of the Covenant, in 1919, to the admission of Germany as a member in September, 1926. After a discussion of the nature and government of the League there follows a description of the administrative machinery and then, in the order of chronological sequence, the actual work of the various sessions of the Council and of the Assembly, but with less—perhaps too little—attention to the Permanent Court of Justice and the International Labor Organization. But since these two organizations constitute a sort of right and left wing of the League which, while connected with the main body, nevertheless function independently, the omission of details concerning them may be justified. The Aaland Island controversy, the Polish-Lithuanian dispute, Upper Silesia and Albania, and the Corfu affair are each treated in a separate chapter in a clear and impartial manner; and the same may be said of the three chapters dealing respectively with the Geneva Protocol, Locarno, and the boundaries of Iraq and

<sup>2</sup> Encyclopaedia Britannica, article on harmony.

<sup>3</sup> "Hearing." By Robert Morris Ogden. Harcourt, Brace.

Turkey. In all of these major controversies the author applies the historical method and leaves the reader free to form his own conclusions. Thirty-five pages—the longest chapter in the book—tell of the events leading up to Germany's entrance into the League, and the thirty pages following tell us how the United States remained aloof but gradually came to cooperate unofficially. Perhaps most interesting of all is the final chapter, in which the historian, true to the historical instinct, estimates the work of the League at the end of seven years and cautiously weighs the possibilities of its future.

The author sees the chief defects of the League in the methods followed by the Council, which is "apt to be that of the diplomats who are more interested in coming to a conclusion than in finding a logical basis for the conclusion." Attention is also called to the fact that "the League is in reality governed, not from its seat, but from and by the ministries and parliaments of the states' members of the League." To what extent it may become an independent entity will of necessity determine in a measure its future usefulness, for as long as foreign ministers of the larger states compose the Council and use the League to thwart the "League spirit," it is difficult to see much progress. Will it continue to permit itself to be hampered by France and defied by Italy? Will the question of mandates, clearly within its province, be turned over to the League or will the backward areas continue as pawns in the hands of the great Powers to drive sharp bargains? These are some of the questions which the historian is not ready to answer. He can only bid us wait and see. It would be wrong, however, to give the impression that the author is not in sympathy with the League. In reading this narrative one may see its defects and some of its failures, but those who have little faith in forms and structures may also see in the League a possible agency to enlighten public opinion, to get states to cooperate through the conference method, and to give the small states a hearing in international affairs. If after seven years of observation there is still no reason why the United States should join the League, its history shows that, at least for Europe, it may be the beginning of a new idea, an idea that may bulk large when the present methods of diplomacy shall have become discredited. Who knows but that it may be the beginning of the United States of Europe?

KARL F. GEISER

Matured Grace

Trivial Breath. By Elinor Wylie. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

"TRIVIAL BREATH" consists of twenty-seven poems, in a book exquisitely designed and printed. Three of these are the well-remembered Puritan's Ballad, Peter and John, and A Strange Story of an earlier period. Their controlled narrative loses none of its distinction by the side of Mrs. Wylie's recent and more personal poetry.

With the first reading of this book one is filled again with the shock and delight of this poet who came into the world, so far as one can see, not only matured but sophisticated in her own sense of excellence. Her preoccupations, her whimsicalities, and the essence she derives from circumstances that would seem in themselves unusual stand forth clearly on the page. Her juxtapositions of earthy and ethereal, of domestic and exotic, of gentle and savage, reappear to charm the mind; deft and inimitable, she divides and characterizes lips, eyes, blood, bone, breast. She is witch-like, she is aristocratic and feminine, she has an uncanny knowledge of words, their perversities, their contrasts and harmonies. She is the most delicate anatomist among contemporary poets.

In spite of its briefness, the volume contains more substance and depth than any of her previous collections of poems. There are few poems here concerned with the decorative or the unreal. There are fewer with the urge of escape toward a

"A daring and brilliant panorama of the march of man."—Edwin Markham

654 Pages
Illustrated

A LIBERAL EDUCATION IN ONE VOLUME

HERE is a great opportunity to round out your education. At amazingly small cost! A tremendous book has been written which contains every fact that a cultured man is expected to know. Written in narrative form so that it reads like a thrilling novel. It is the epic story of mankind's progress.

Authorities of the highest standing and leading American newspapers praise and endorse The Outline of Man's Knowledge by Clement Wood. Zona Gale says: "I welcome this book as a key to unlock the world to itself." The Boston Transcript declares: "Will do much in the way of humanizing knowledge." The Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph says: "A university in itself."

Here is the whole magnificent romance of everything that human beings have done and learned and thought since the first man walked upon the earth five million years ago. From the caveman to Lindbergh; from the Tower of Babel to the New York Skyscraper; from the Psalms of David to the Rhapsody in Blue; from the discovery of fire to the discovery of a million stars—every important fact of human achievement is told in all its thrilling wonder in this superb volume.

Send No Money—Read it 5 Days FREE

You have to glance through this amazing book, read parts of it to appreciate its absorbing interest, to realize how very much it can do for you. So that you can see it for yourself, we will send it to you for 5 days' free examination. Simply send the coupon. Enjoy the book 5 days. Then decide for yourself. You risk nothing. Fill out the coupon now. LEWIS COPELAND CO., Inc., Publishers, 119 West 57th St., New York City.

Lewis Copeland Co., Inc., Dep't 1,
119 West 57th St., New York City.

Kindly send me The Outline of Man's Knowledge, by Clement Wood, 654 pages, illustrated, handsomely bound. Within 5 days I will either return the book or remit $1.50 as first payment and then $2.00 per month for two months, a total of $5.50.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

($5.00 for complete payment within 5 days.)

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

more preferable reality. Her certitude of being is more profound, and her analysis keener than before. Still developing as a poet, she apparently demands of her talent more solid and synthesized results. She makes glittering pictures with fine words, and here and there builds up a fantastic philosophy and consolation; but as well, she analyzes with an even detachment her sorrow, separation, an unsatisfying perfection, and the failure of the flesh.

Dedication, the first poem in the book, is a description of her early assimilation of language, and the first stanza is lovely in its delicate sensuousness; in this and other poems she very subtly—and justly—incorporates her critique within her own lines. Acknowledging her gratitude to this early event, and her faithfulness to it, she realizes its permanent gift to her:

In innocent bird, in iridescent music,
To be my own for all the rest of living.
Oh, this was nourishment and wine and physic!
This was a proud extravagance of giving!

In True Vine, Last Supper, and Tragic Dialogue she achieves excellence with more fugitive subject matter. She uncovers an empty finality in a seemingly Innocent Landscape, and in Minotaur argues in favor of robustness and for a more intense and integrated spirituality. Two or three poems fail from the slightness of the emotion behind them. Miranda's Supper, somewhat difficult to follow and a little false, is the one poem in the book nearest a purely decorative fantasy; still, it contains a line that somehow obtrudes from the rest and will not be forgotten, describing Bonaparte's clock "with the bees worn shabby."

With the impulses of so many of her poems obscured, To a Book, an examination of the creative impulse and its result, and A Red Carpet for Shelley interest me as being near the source of her peculiar magic. A Red Carpet for Shelley, composed of her stated inability to provide a heavenly walk for a clearly ethereal being, tries to project with "ragged syllables" a divine world, juggles with aloof moons and suns, hills and plains, and achieves nothing in the end, and is yet so graceful. In these two poems there are further details of that aesthetic preoccupation that forms the subject of Dedication: a woman's realization of the individual shape and substance of her art, and the purity of her relation toward it. This seems to me the arresting and significant note in her third volume of verse; this, and the sincerity of spiritual dissection that she expresses in Hospes Comesque Corporis, in haunting and beautiful lines:

And if the heart may split the skin
Of this intrinsic chrysalis
To make the ephemeral ghost within
The fugitive it is:

If even the thinnest raveling bind
Escape to the abandoned shell:
The heart must set the hollow mind
Replying like a bell.

Before division of the suns
Takes shears to cut a second's thread,
The mind must tick ecstatic once
To prove that it is dead.

And the small soul's dissolving ghost
Must leave a heart-shape in the dust
Before it is inspired and lost
In God: I hope it must.

Perhaps she has faults: she is an unsmiling poet, she is sometimes deliberately wilful, her work hints of a baffling inhumanity. There is no doubt that to the majority of minds a poem of hers is hardly likely to assuage a daily grief or to increase a spontaneous happiness. She is too strange to be steadily companionable. But it is a considerable pleasure to have again in her new work a graceful, incisive, and original poet who never wastes a word and seldom errs with one.

HELEN PEARCE

New Republic Dollar Books:

AMERICA SEEN THROUGH GERMAN EYES by Dr. Arthur Feiler	← just out
BRITAIN'S INDUSTRIAL FUTURE.....	Report of the Liberal industrial inquiry
POWER CONTROL.....	by Raushenbush and Laidler
THE RUSSIAN LAND (second printing).....	by Albert Rhys Williams
PARENTS ON PROBATION.....	by Miriam Van Waters
THE MEANING OF ADULT EDUCATION.....	by E. C. Lindeman
TOTEM AND TABOO.....	by Sigmund Freud
DELUSION AND DREAM.....	by Sigmund Freud
THE YOUTH MOVEMENT IN CHINA.....	by Tsi C. Wang
MOTHERS IN INDUSTRY.....	by Gwendolyn Hughes
ENCAUSTICS.....	by Stark Young
THE AMERICAN COLLEGE AND ITS RULERS.....	by J. E. Kirkpatrick
HOMES OF THE FREED.....	by Rossa B. Cooley
LAISSEZ-FAIRE AND COMMUNISM.....	by John Maynard Keynes
CONCERNING PARENTS.....	A Symposium
OUR ENEMY THE CHILD.....	by Agnes DeLima
YOUTH IN CONFLICT.....	by Miriam Van Waters
SOCIAL DISCOVERY.....	by E. C. Lindeman
THE CHILD, THE CLINIC, AND THE COURT...	introduction by Jane Addams
EDUCATION, THE MACHINE AND THE WORKER.....	by Horace M. Kallen
THE SUPREME COURT AND MINIMUM WAGE LEGISLATION edited with introduction by Roscoe Pound
THE STORY OF TEAPOT DOME.....	by M. E. Ravage
THE LABOR SPY.....	by Sidney Howard and Robert Dunn

The New Republic till after election—
newsstand value.....	$2.70
Any New Republic book.....	1.00
	<hr/> $3.70
	$2
The New Republic for a year.....	$5.00
Any 2 New Republic books.....	2.00
	<hr/> $7.00
	$5

THE NEW REPUBLIC, 421 WEST 21st STREET,
NEW YORK

Check for $.... enclosed. Send magazine and books ..... to

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

IN FULL..... N 8-22

Books in Brief

The Songs of Paul Dresser. With an Introduction by His Brother, Theodore Dreiser. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

Here are the words and music of fifty-eight badly tarnished songs by an exceedingly sentimental man who yet possessed the power of touching, as they used to say, the heart. If the author of "On the Banks of the Wabash" is on the way to being forgotten, Paul Dresser himself is likely to live for a good while not only in the introduction to the present volume but in Mr. Dreiser's book "Twelve Men," where he is one of the twelve.

The Living Bible: Being the Whole Bible in its Fewest Words.

Edited from the King James Version by Bolton Hall.

Revised by Alfred Berthelot. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

This abridged Bible omits "repetitions, ceremonial details, most genealogies, land boundaries, and matter that is no longer of general interest," and comes out only one-third as long as the original. The work of condensation has been done with evident care, though Mr. Hall will find that there is no general agreement as to which portions of the Bible are "no longer of general interest." It was perhaps not wise to save only the more famous lines out of certain Psalms; but the genealogies will not be missed by most readers, and all of the important narratives seem to have been kept.

An Elizabethan Storybook. Famous Tales from The Palace of Pleasure. Selected and Arranged with an Introduction by Peter Haworth. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.

The sources of "All's Well That Ends Well," "Romeo and Juliet," "Coriolanus," "The Duchess of Malfi," and other Elizabethan plays are here conveniently reprinted from William Painter's famous collection.

Nova Francia. By Marc Lescarbot. Translated by Pierre Erondelle, 1609. Harper and Brothers. $4.

In July, 1606, Marc Lescarbot landed at Port Royal in Acadia, now Annapolis Royal in Nova Scotia, and the northern settlements in America received their first literary artist, poet, and dramatist. He had read for the law in Paris, but found lawsuits "the bane of man's existence," and when one of his clients asked him to go out to the new settlement in America he decided to go, induced "by his desire to flee a corrupt world and to examine this land with his own eyes." In 1607 he returned and in the Easter vacation of 1608 he began his history of New France. While in Port Royal he had done much to enliven pioneer life in that very fortunate and happy early community. He assisted in the foundation and activities of the Order of Good Cheer, surely the first American fraternal organization, which existed to make a ceremony and a pleasure of a fortnightly feast and merry-making. He went further, and on the occasion of his patron's return to the settlement wrote a pageant in verse, "The Theater of Neptune," which was performed on the shore and was the first theatrical presentation in North America north of the Spanish settlements. The volume under review does not contain the play, and even in the admirable edition of Lescarbot produced by the Champlain Society (Toronto, 1907-1914) it is left in French, but the interested will find a remarkably successful translation by Mrs. H. T. Richardson, published by Houghton Mifflin last year. This Broadway Travelers edition is the flavorful contemporary translation made by Pierre Erondelle at the instance of Richard Hakluyt and is what might be expected of a man like Lescarbot—a humane, inquisitive, entertaining, and lively account of his adventures, of the lands he saw, and of the inhabitants of them. The translation, while not so accurate as Dr. Grant's for the Champlain Society, has the winsome quality of John Florio—Elizabethan English describing adventures congenial to Elizabethans.

The Architect of the Roman Empire. By T. Rice Holmes. The Oxford University Press. $5.

Since histories of the Roman Republic usually end with the death of Caesar, and those of the empire begin with the principate of Augustus, the intervening seventeen years of political confusion—in which expert guidance is especially required—seldom receive due attention. This is the very period that Mr. Holmes has now studied. As he has proved in other volumes he is somewhat old-fashioned in his devotion to political and military history, but we may forgive this failing here since the destiny of the state was determined during these years by ambitious men manipulating armies. The author has once more proved his reliable scholarship by sifting the elusive sources in a convincing manner and his sound judgment by cogently criticizing the numerous hypotheses of tendential monographs. His customary vivacity has a chance to spend its energy in the barbed footnotes directed against the vagaries of Ferrero without prejudice to the well-proportioned narrative. The volume promises to be a standard work in its field for many a day.

Jealous of Dead Leaves. Selected Verse of Shaemas O'Sheel. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Mr. O'Sheel is well known to all readers of Irish and American anthologies for his two poems He Whom a Dream Hath Possessed and They Went Forth to Battle but They Always Fell. The present selection from and revision of the two volumes which he published a number of years ago will therefore be welcome to those who collect the contemporary poets. Such readers will find several poems here that are demonstrably as good as the two mentioned above; and in general they will find a lyricist of free and delicate character.

The Grub-Street Journal. By James T. Hillhouse. Duke University Press. $3.

A useful description, digest, and bibliography of the now almost inaccessible paper which ran in Alexander Pope's time between 1730 and 1737, and the connection of which with Pope—a complicated matter—Mr. Hillhouse here helps to make clear.

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

"PORGY" III REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

III JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 8:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

III GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

—THE ACTOR MANAGERS present—

GRAND STREET FOLLIES
OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Tues. (Pop.) & Thurs.

International Relations Section

Soviet Health

By MARY REED

BEFORE the Revolution competent medical care in Russia was a luxury beyond the reach of the workers and peasants. Efforts to improve the sanitary conditions of the workers were bitterly opposed, and hygiene lecturers were arrested. Millions of peasants in outlying districts were without any medical aid. Others were at the mercy of "unqualified" doctors, that is, men who after a short term at the front as assistants to army doctors had returned to their home districts with a smattering of medical knowledge, which they exploited to the extent of making a living. Free maternity care was unknown, and the midwives who served the working-class women were for the most part ignorant and unsanitary. Icons and superstition played a leading part in the treatment of the sick. And there was much sickness because of the unsanitary living conditions—drainage systems were confined to the centers of the large cities—and because of the overwhelming ignorance on the part of most people of the elementary principles of hygiene.

In building a strong workers' republic the health of the workers became paramount. The following principles were formulated: Free medical care for all; qualified doctors; and prevention of illness. This was a gigantic task and Russia was a poor country. The first step was nationalization, unifying all branches of medicine. The next step was to make medicine accessible to the people. This involved a vast new structure of divisions and subdivisions, establishment of local hospitals and clinics, and training of doctors and nurses. But this structure, however fully perfected, could not function effectively by itself. It must be closely linked with industry, housing, city planning, education, and social legislation.

In Russia there are special health committees in the offices and factories which cooperate in the work of the clinics. These factory committees are part of the trade-union structure, but are all coordinated under district committees appointed by the Narkomsdraf, which is the central health organ of the Soviet Government. The Narkomsdraf officially controls all work related to health—the training and organization of doctors, the establishment of research institutes, clinics, hospitals, drug stores, etc., and the organization of physical-culture work and health education. In carrying out this work it is dependent upon the support of the trade unions.

For instance, a worker is examined in a clinic, and one or more of the following adjustments is found necessary: Different working conditions, different living conditions, physical culture, education in personal hygiene, special diet, special treatment or sanitarium care. Different working conditions may involve more light, more air, or more hygienic surroundings, and thus the basis is formed for the work of the trade unions in improving labor conditions. If his work is not adapted to his special needs, he may be transferred by the union to another job. If he needs better living quarters, the cooperative housing schemes worked out by the trade unions make it possible for him to obtain a better room. Some form of physical culture may be advocated by the clinic. (The physical need of the worker, not the desire for a strong team, is made the basis of athletics.) Under the cultural department of the trade union there is a physical-culture section, which is a very important part of trade-union work. Already three and a half million men and women are in organized sports in the USSR. For education in personal hygiene there are classes in the trade-union clubs, health books and pamphlets in the club libraries, and colorful health posters at every turn. In connection with the clinics special diet restaurants have been established where workers can eat food balanced according to their requirements. In the clinics, modern methods of physiotherapy—special baths, sun-light lamps, electrical massage, X-ray—are applied. If the worker is not well enough to work, arrangements can be made through the trade union to have him sent to a sanitarium. For cases which merely require special care "night sanitariums" have been established. Here the worker goes after work, bathes, gets fresh clothing, suitable food, any treatment necessary, and a good night's sleep. More night sanitariums are being built as fast as funds allow, as they have proved valuable not only in improving the health of the workers who go there, but in raising their standards of personal hygiene and teaching them to live in such a way that further treatment is unnecessary.

Preventive work has given rise in Russia to what are known as "sanitary doctors." While the regular doctors are concerned with individuals, the sanitary doctors are concerned chiefly with conditions. There are now over 1,200 sanitary doctors in the RSFSR alone. They have various functions. Food specialists advise on pure-food-law requirements, supervise research and education in food values, and plan the type of meals served in factories, offices, and schools. Then there are "communal" doctors, who control the sanitary construction of buildings, the layout of parks, etc. There are epidemic specialists, whose work is most important because of the widespread epidemics that have always existed in Russia. The maternity work, which since the Revolution has put Russia foremost among the countries of the world in its free care of mothers and infants, is planned by experts in that field. Special doctors map out the health work for the schools, and organize committees of parents, teachers, and pupils for promoting the health of the children. Physical culture experts control the laying out of sport grounds, study the effects of various forms of athletics on the individual, and plan the sport work generally.

The institutes which have been established by the Narkomsdraf are doing a most important work. There is at least one bacteriological institute in every state, and many in the cities. In Moscow alone nearly thirty institutes for research exist in various fields of medicine. A tropical institute studies such diseases as malaria, which developed in widespread epidemics following the war. There is also a tuberculosis institute, an institute for the study of venereal diseases, one for maternity, one for physical culture, and many more. These institutes serve as a training-ground for specialists and as educational agencies for making the best knowledge available on these subjects accessible to the people. It is the sanitary doctors who form the connecting link between these institutes and the workers, and who formulate methods for the practical application of this knowledge.

Health work starts with pre-natal care. Working mothers receive two months' vacation before and after child-birth, free care and extra allowance for the baby's food and clothing. There were in the USSR in January, 1927, 864 day nurseries in the cities and 4,052 in the villages. In the last three years 3,000 summer day nurseries have been established for peasant mothers during the harvest season. The education of mothers is being carried out on a vast scale through local clinics; women's clinics are increasing at the rate of 100 a year. Before the Revolution infant care for the most part consisted in baby homes for foundlings and babies whose parents were too poor to keep them. These were popularly known as "angel factories" because of the appalling high death-rate, which often rose to more than 90 per cent.

Next, the work in the schools. School-children are required to have health passports and physical examinations twice a year. So far 57 special clinics for children and adolescents have been established in RSFSR, where examinations are made by specialists in eye, ear, nose, throat, nervous troubles, etc., and where the most suitable form of physical culture is advised. Treatment is then carried out under the supervision of the school doctor. Medical work with children is closely allied with child psychology. Special diet rooms have been established for individual needs. Country schools are being established where children who need it may have sanitarium care and keep on with their school work. So far, 75 of these are in operation in RSFSR. There are 26 day sanitariums, 24 sanitariums for children with nervous troubles, and many special sanitariums. For instance, in the Crimea a well-equipped sanitarium is devoted exclusively to bone tubercular cases, taking advantage of the peculiarly curative effects of the sun rays in that region. Each of the children's clinics has a playground and equipment for sun and air baths, and serves as an educational agency for training children in the fundamental principles of health.

For adult workers a system of passports and semi-annual examinations has been introduced. Clinical work is being extended as fast as funds allow. In December, 1925, a decree was issued planning the local organization of health centers. This plan requires each volost to have a hospital, a general clinic, a maternity clinic, a baby clinic, and consultation service for women on infant care, personal hygiene, and birth control. Large hospitals have been and are being built in the factory districts. Special clinics did not exist before the war. There are now 250 tuberculosis clinics in RSFSR, as many typhus emergency hospitals, 130 malaria clinics, etc. In the last three years similar clinics have been established for venereal diseases, and already 159 are in operation. In addition there are 144 smaller stations in the villages, with one doctor and one nurse on duty. Narcotic clinics have been opened in the big cities for alcohol and drug addicts. In these clinics the hypnosis method is being successfully used.

Throughout the USSR country estates of Czarist days have been turned into rest homes and sanitariums. In 1926 350,000 workers were taken care of in sanitariums and 600,000 in rest homes. In the Ukraine a majority of all workers in the last two years have been sent to such estates. This work was started by the Narkomsdrafi and subsidized by the government, but for the last three years these places

"Yours for Personal Advancement!"

EDUCATIONAL TOUR of EUROPE

A combined Study Tour and Sightseeing Trip under the auspices of the

POCONO PEOPLES COLLEGE

90 days of fruitful education and pleasure—
(not purposeless wandering)—without the prerequisites of regular college entrance.

Leaving New York September 1st and returning Dec. 1st by fast Holland-America Liner

Tour includes A MONTH at the International Peoples College in Elsinore, Denmark; 2 WEEKS at a similar International cultural institution in Lund, Sweden; and sightseeing opportunities in London,
Berlin, Leipzig, Heidelberg, Stuttgart, Cologne, Paris and many other highly interesting places.

RUSSIA, too, at slight additional cost

All in all, a tour that will prove to be one of the most outstanding events—for benefits derived—in the average lifetime. INFORMATIVE
BULLETIN ON REQUEST.

POCONO COLLEGE TOUR COMMITTEE

100 Fifth Avenue
Room 1015

NEW YORK
Tel. CHElsea 5124

AN ESSAY ON HASHEESH

Historical and Experimental

By VICTOR ROBINSON, Ph. C., M. D.

*Author of Pathfinders in Medicine, The Don Quixote of Psychiatry,
The Life of Jacob Henle, Pioneers of Birth Control;
Editor of Medical Life.*

Upon its first publication, the author of this treatise was hailed in the medical circles of this country and abroad as "The American DeQuincey." He has done for Cannabis Indica what DeQuincey accomplished for opium. For scientific accuracy and research, for oriental imagery, for brilliance of language, this hasheesh monograph is an unequalled classic. The experimental data are remarkable. Since hasheesh is no longer obtainable by the public, it need not be feared that the perusal of this study will give rise to "hasheesh clubs."

The present edition contains a most delightful preface by the author.

Cloth bound and printed in best Vail-Ballou style.

ONE DOLLAR, postpaid.

THE MAIL ORDER BOOKERY
BOX 94, ISLAND PARK, N. Y.

have been running at a profit, which is being devoted to improving the equipment and for further construction. Up-to-date sanitariums are needed for extreme cases, and plans are under way for vacation camps for workers who do not require special care to be run at the low rate of from 40 to 50 rubles a month. In case of sickness the expense is covered by the social insurance funds of the trade unions—12 to 14 per cent of each worker's salary, paid by the management.

These sanitariums and rest homes are a picturesque phase of the work of the Soviet Government. Once forbidden parks, reserves, and estates are now overrun by troops of bare-legged, bare-armed workers. The haunts of the great of yesterday have become the playground of the great of today. Palaces where 5 to 20 persons lived with 50 to 100 servants and caretakers now accommodate 50 to 100 workers with 5 to 20 persons for the upkeep. Usually gardeners from the old regime have stayed on, and the estates are kept up to the standard of their former beauty. And many are the tales these men can tell of the life that was. "Ceychass luche" (things are better now) is a frequent commentary.

Perhaps the most interesting of these sanitariums is Livadia in the Crimea. This was formerly the Czar's palace, in a mountain forest of cypress and oak trees on the shores of the Black Sea. It is a masterpiece of workmanship, with its columns of pure marble, its intricately carved marble decorations, paneled woodwork, and golden-domed chapel. It is also an interesting example of the artistic expression of the time. For instance, in the Czar's private apartment is a large and elaborate bathroom with three huge paintings on the wall. One represents a terrific monster, symbolizing the revolution of 1905, with the heroic giant of imperialism cutting off its head; the second is a naked lady; and the third is a still life. This palace is now used as a sanitarium for tubercular peasants from all over Russia. I spoke with one who had come 6,000 versts. It accommodates 400 at a time and is open all the year, taking care of more than 1,500 peasants annually, about 20 per cent of them women. It has a clinic equipped with the most up-to-date devices for treatment.

But rebuilding the health of the peasants is only a part of its work. Classes are held in all subjects of interest to the peasant—land laws, agronomy, veterinology, hygiene, political questions; a class trains newspaper correspondents on peasant problems, and a little class is held to teach reading and writing to the few illiterate who are left. Various other activities are popular; the dramatic club, and music, with instruments supplied by the sanitarium. The peasants go back to the land not only physically stronger, but better equipped to understand and intelligently deal with the problems that confront them in their work and in their relation to the state as a whole.

It is a rule of Soviet medicine that every doctor shall be a teacher as well as a healer. Through lectures and pamphlets to some extent, but more through exhibitions, movies, and excellent posters, the important facts of health and hygiene are rapidly being made common property. The effects can perhaps best be noted by an appreciable change in the traditional aversion of the Russian people to fresh air. There are still large sections of the population that have been little touched by the work of the Narkomsdrafi. But the foundation has been laid in the Soviet Republics for the greatest health structure that the world has known.

Before they're through with this fine pretty man-made world of ours—

YOU'LL know it!—and so will your children—and your children's children!

DO you know that the organized women of America run into the millions?

DO you know how many organizations right now are quietly at work, striving with every resource at their command to effect programs of reform or social service, which, in one way or another, are bound to affect us all?

REMEMBER the organized women of America gave us Prohibition!

REMEMBER they have only begun to feel their strength!

IN THE

Year Book and Directory

OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN OF THE UNITED STATES, INC.

the story of the organized women of America is told. There you'll find not only the record of yesterday's achievements, but the promise of tomorrow's; not only what they have done, but what they mean to do.

Reference Work—Directory—History

You need this book to really know the world you live in—and the world you will live in—tomorrow.

240 pages, large readable type, complete index

Order your copy today

$2 Postpaid

DEPARTMENT N,
NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN,
370 Seventh Avenue,
New York City.

For the enclosed $....., please send me
..... copies of the YEAR BOOK AND DIRECTORY.

Name .....

Address .....

Nat.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 29, 1928

No. 3295

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	191
EDITORIALS:
Al Smith Speaks Out.....	193
The Crisis in Manchuria.....	194
The Courts on Trial.....	194
A Censor for Building.....	195
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	196
WHAT HAPPENED IN SEATTLE. By Julia N. Budlong.....	197
THE SOUTH IS STILL SOLID. By Calvin B. Hoover.....	199
THE GRAVE OF MILL. By Charles Franklin Thwing.....	201
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	201
CORRESPONDENCE .....	202
BOOKS, MUSIC, PLAYS:
The Portrait. By John Gould Fletcher.....	204
Sincere Conversation. By Laura Riding.....	204
The End of Soames. By Clifton P. Fadiman.....	204
A Study of Soviet Development. By Harold Kelloch.....	205
Roger Bacon. By Richard McKeon.....	205
Books in Brief.....	206
Music: The Ballet Russe: 1928. By B. H. Haggin.....	207
Drama. By W. P. M.....	207
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
A Call to Rumanians.....	208

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR
FRED A. KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR
MARK VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON
NORMAN THOMAS

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
LUDWIG LEWISOHN
HEYWOOD BROWN

H. L. MENCKEN
CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

WHEN NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER gets tired of his job as president of Columbia University and father confessor of the Republican Party perhaps he would like to join the staff of The Nation. Since the Presidential bee ceased singing in his ear the dictator of Columbia has been talking as if he belonged on the fourth floor of 20 Vesey Street. We are not in entire agreement with him upon prohibition, but we should have been proud to print that portion of his startling letter to the New York Times which denounces Hoover's position on preparedness. The doctrine that military preparedness makes for peace he calls "wholly false." With bitter scorn he asks:

Listen to this sentence: "We must not only be just; we must be respected." Is it not plain that the thought behind the word "respected" would be more accurately described by the word "feared"? What sort of mind and nature is it which can at this stage of the world's history deliberately find a basis for respect in force rather than in justice?

Mr. Butler recalls that Secretary Wilbur recently offered a naval program "which affronted the intelligence and the moral sense not only of the American people but of the entire world." Fortunately, public opinion defeated it, and "the Senate contemptuously threw the whole thing upon the legislative garbage-heap, where it now lies, unwept, unmonored, and unsung." A host of Republicans, he says, reject this principle of "national security," meaning thereby "swagger," and he adds:

We shall not support any policy which would at once enter upon a new and enlarged plan of naval construction under the guise of defending ourselves against some Power which has only just taken a formal pledge not to attack us. The contradiction and the hypocrisy of it all would be comic were they not so unspeakably tragic.

Bravo!

POOR WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE! He was either a fanatic or a dupe—not improbably the latter—when he made detailed charges that as a member of the New York Legislature Alfred E. Smith had consistently favored gambling, prostitution, and the saloon. As we noted in our issue of August 15, Mr. White withdrew his charges in so far as they concerned gambling and prostitution, just before he sailed for Europe, but stood pat on his accusations regarding Governor Smith and the saloon. This strange course was followed, after Mr. White reached Europe, by a message to ex-Governor Allen of Kansas, publicity director for the Republican campaign, in which the Emporia editor disclaimed his previous disclaimer and apparently went on record as reasserting all of his original charges. This message was made public at the Republican publicity headquarters and then promptly disclaimed as an official party utterance by Mr. Allen, who said it was a personal communication and had been given to the press by mistake. Governor Smith has properly characterized the whole procedure as dishonest and unfair and has made what reads like a convincing defense of his legislative record. We hope this will end a controversy which never should have been begun.

THE DEATH OF GEORGE BRENNAN, the Democratic boss of Illinois, is a serious blow to Governor Smith's chances in that State. Brennan had a profound enthusiasm for the Governor and believed that he could carry the State for his candidate. Indeed he left Houston determined to do so. As the successor of Roger Sullivan when that dictator died in 1920, Brennan was rather an easy boss, content often to sit back and watch his Republican antagonists wrangle and disgrace themselves. At the 1924 convention in Madison Square Garden Brennan led the opposition to McAdoo, which he had also largely directed in San Francisco four years previously, and likewise in the fight against the Ku Klux Klan. In 1926 Brennan astounded everybody by running for United States Senator, in order, he said, to attack the Volstead Law in Congress. Severely injured in the course of the campaign, he was defeated and went back to a task he loved—preparing the way for the nomination of Al Smith for the Presidency. Chicago was indebted to Brennan for the selection of Mayor Dever. There seems to be no successor at hand for Brennan's job of directing the Democratic Party in Illinois. We are inclined to believe that the day for such rich, warm-hearted bosses of the Irish-American type is disappearing. Whether their successors of the cold-blooded business-man type are more desirable is another question. It is a natural development of the commercialization of politics.

IN WAIMEA, KAUAI, a little village in the Hawaiian Islands, there was recently held a celebration to pay tribute to Captain James Cook, the English navigator, who landed there 150 years ago. That discovery marked the beginning of recorded history for the Hawaiian, or Sandwich Islands as Captain Cook called them. This sesquicentennial in which both American and British warships participated was a gay and gorgeous affair; there were brightly decorated ships in the harbor, salutes of honor were fired, and "speakers reviewed the glamorous events of the last century and a half and expressed the pride of today's generation in the greatness of today's Hawaii." Yet one wonders how joyously the native Hawaiians really celebrated. When the Resolute and Discovery of Captain Cook first anchored in Waimea there were something like 260,000 natives in the Hawaiian Islands. In the course of the last 150 years' progress and civilization they have been reduced to approximately 20,000, and there is every evidence that the race will completely disappear or be absorbed through intermarriage. Again, at the time of discovery the Hawaiians were the owners of their own country. Today they possess virtually none of it. It has gone to the second and third generations of the New England missionaries who went to Christianize the Hawaiian Indians. Their sons, through their landholdings and powerful sugar corporations, now dominate every phase of Hawaiian life. On the other hand, the original Hawaiians did not enjoy the benefits of Coolidge prosperity.

A HORNET'S NEST is positively pacific by comparison with the trouble which United States Judge William H. Atwell has stirred up in Brooklyn. Judge Atwell is from Dallas, Texas, and when he was transferred to Brooklyn to fill in during the vacation term he brought his local prejudices with him, among others a strong desire to make men Dry and "to keep the niggers in their place." He has spread panic in Brooklyn by his severe sentences for infractions of the Volstead Act—which was his own affair—but recently he went beyond that and reprimanded F. R. Serri, a lawyer, in a way properly to arouse the latter's anger as well as that of numerous Negroes. Mr. Serri, in defending an Italian woman charged with selling liquor to whites and blacks indiscriminately, attacked the veracity of the law-enforcement officers. In sentencing the woman later Judge Atwell is reported to have said she was "unfortunate" in her choice of counsel and to have told the lawyer: "In my section of the country, had you made any such accusation against an officer of the law, he would have smashed you before you got out of the courtroom." The judge added to the woman: "White folks and colored folks cannot live together. You should go somewhere else to live among different people. Get your inspiration from American girls who are what Americans girls ought to be."

WHEN THE LAWYER tried to reply, Judge Atwell shut him up by threatening him with jail for contempt of court. Mr. Serri has therefore appealed to Chief Justice Taft to take action against the judge for what most persons will agree was an insult and anything but a judicial pronouncement from the bench. We can assure Mr. Serri that Justice Taft will do nothing about it. Neither will anybody else. For nothing can be done other than to send the judge back to Texas or to impeach him.

Naturally he will be returned to Texas shortly anyhow, while his lapse does not justify impeachment. The trouble is not with Judge Atwell, who, like all his fellows, is human and whose opinions fit Texas better than New York. The trouble is with the autocratic power of our judges to punish for contempt owing to which they may—and do—utter all sorts of nonsense and abuse and then save themselves from rebuke by hiding behind the sacred ermine. The existing powers to punish for contempt in America are unnecessary, medieval, probably unconstitutional, and greater than exist anywhere else in the world. Mr. Serri would best forget Judge Atwell personally and join the movement to restrict the tyranny of punishment for contempt of court.

GENE TUNNEY, who by hard work in a popular art made himself rich and famous within fewer years than it takes most artists to get started, has discovered that we exact a peculiar payment for the popularity we bestow. This prize-fighter must long ago have become tired of having it said in the newspapers that he read books; but now, what with getting engaged and starting for a tour of Europe on foot with Thornton Wilder, he seems to realize how deeply he is in trouble. When he set sail from New York the other day he is represented as having looked most unhappy. For as he got out of his taxi and approached the dock he suddenly found himself the target for dozens of flash-light photographers and movie-men, whose shots and clicks followed him even up the gang-plank to the deck. As he moved along behind an escort of police he is said to have frowned unpleasantly at the press of admiring shoulders about him, and when, as he attempted to sign his name to whatever documents one executes at the last moment on shore, his hand was prevented from the free movement of a champion's flourish, he grew distinctly red in the face with anger. To the reporters he had nothing whatever to say, and indicated that he hoped he would be unmolested by the European press. Even then our newspapermen got in their good work. "There were no books in his cabin," they quietly remarked next morning.

"MEATS FOR THE MEAT EATER" is what the Childs restaurants propose to offer in the future. For several years the Childs Company fostered a vegetarian or so-called "vegetable-wise" policy. From their menus one learned how the wise old Greeks lived healthily on vegetables, and hated meats. If this intellectual appeal failed there appeared such fanciful dishes as "meatless meat loaf" or "beefless beef stew" to trick the lover of meats into eating vegetables. Alas, the cynics of this post-war period refused to be beguiled by any such camouflage! If they were ruining their health by indulging in juicy sirloins that was too bad, but they would continue to do so, President William Childs notwithstanding. In other words, what was Mr. Childs's poison was their desired dish. The gross sales of the 120 restaurants dropped off 9 per cent in the first five months of 1928, while the common stock fell from a high of 74 in 1925 to a high of 52½ in 1928. It was at this point that the voices of the stockholders were heard and the vegetarian policy of Childs was modified. But even in defeat Mr. Childs is undaunted, for his newspaper advertisements, in addition to their announcement of meats, suggest "Fruits, Cereals, Fresh Vegetables, Dairy Products, for Health and Economy."

Al Smith Speaks Out

AL SMITH has spoken out. His acceptance speech is worthy of the man and of the office which he seeks. It is one of the finest state documents which has grown out of the American political scene since our entrance into the World War set a blight upon hopes for political progress. There is an honest, straightforward ring to his words that was lacking in the complacent generalities of his rival for office. Against Hoover's smug assurance that "No one can rightly deny the fundamental correctness of our economic system" set Al Smith's assertion that he will not "accept the old order of things as the best unless and until I become convinced that it cannot be made better." We do not see how any progressive, reading the two speeches, can fail to feel that Smith would make the better President.

He begins with an expression of his political philosophy, setting what he calls "our new-world theory" that government exists for the people against the Republican Party's "old-world conception" that the people exists for the government, and that material prosperity, if real, would be "an excuse for political inequality." Governor Smith has a right to claim that he has lived up to his ideal as few American executives have done; but what does he regard as the outstanding example of political inequality in American life? Is it not the nullification of the Negro's Constitutional right to vote by Governor Smith's party in the very States which he regards as his surest territory? On that he is as mum as Mr. Hoover.

There is a partisan tone in many portions of the speech. Al Smith denounces the corruption of the Republican Party, as well he may; but he might have recalled A. Mitchell Palmer's raids and the scandals of the Alien Property Administration before he referred in quite such sweeping terms to "those standards of unblemished integrity which characterized every act of the Administration of Woodrow Wilson." It was under Woodrow Wilson's Democratic Presidency that American marines invaded Haiti and Santo Domingo, and leaders of the Democratic Party in the Senate, like Senator Swanson of Virginia, have been among the staunchest supporters of the Republican rape of Nicaragua. Nor are we much impressed by Smith's light-hearted assurance that a Democratic Administration would take the tariff out of politics.

None the less this man has opened his campaign upon a high plane. We like particularly his statement that

To no declaration of our platform do I more heartily commit myself than the one for the abolition of the practice of the President of entering into agreements for the settlement of internal disputes in Latin-American countries, unless the agreements have been consented to by the Senate as provided for in the Constitution of the United States. I personally declare what the platform declares: "Intervention in the purely internal affairs of Latin-American countries must cease," and I specifically pledge myself to follow this declaration with regard to Mexico as well as the other Latin-American countries.

We like, too, his specific rebuttal of the appalling Coolidge doctrine that American persons and property abroad remain a part of the national domain. He asks whether the American people would approve a doctrine which gave to France, England, or Germany the right to regard their citizens and property within our borders as a part of their national domain. We like his plea for further limitations of armaments, and his suggestion that the most effective outlawry of war consists in removal of the causes of war.

Governor Smith pledges his most earnest endeavor to enforce the prohibition laws. We are not sure, and we doubt if Al Smith is sure, that any President can stamp out the corruption which has followed in the wake of prohibition; but we believe that, drinking Wet though he is, he would at least make as earnest an effort at decent law enforcement as Hoover's Cabinet colleague, distiller Mellon, has done with the silent approval of Calvin Coolidge. But the Constitution also bids the President recommend to Congress such measures as he deems wise; and Al Smith judges that prohibition has not achieved or aided temperance. Although he says that he will never "advocate or approve any law which directly or indirectly permits the return of the saloon," he would like to see each State permitted to define intoxicating liquor, and even, by amendment of the Eighteenth Amendment, to manufacture alcoholic beverages for intra-State consumption only, if the people of the State by popular referendum approve such manufacture. He would follow the Canadian system of package sale. This is bold speaking. It seems to us to carry State's rights to an illogical extreme, but we like the honesty of his approach to the problem and his suggestion of popular referendums. It is miles removed from the timorous pussyfooting of Hoover's characterization of the prohibition "experiment."

On farm relief Al Smith's conclusions go little farther than Hoover's. The problem is acute, he says, and he would call in experts to help him solve it. But he begins with a frank recognition that there has been government interference with the laws of supply and demand to benefit industry, commerce, and finance, and he asserts that "cooperative, coordinated marketing and warehousing of surplus farm products" is as essential as is the Federal Reserve System which regulates and controls the flow of capital.

Most heartily of all we hail Governor Smith's statement on water-power. The "sources of water-power," he says, "must remain forever under public ownership and control." The people must own and control the site and plant at the place of operation, "must control the switch that turns on or off the power so greedily sought by certain private groups without the least regard for the public good." He denounces unsparingly the "dishonest and unpatriotic propaganda" of the utility corporations, and in so doing he must hurt certain of his friends. In this portion of his address he abandons the cringing effort to demonstrate that the Democratic Party is as friendly as the Republican to big business which has disgraced so much of this year's campaign. If Al Smith continues to speak out with that frank clarity of utterance he will win the support of most of the five million voters who supported La Follette in 1924. He will not demonstrate that his party has reformed since the landslide of 1920, or that the equality of opportunity he preaches is possible under the profit system, but he will prove that political ambition does not always turn able administrators into simian jumping-jacks.

The Crisis in Manchuria

JAPAN'S super-patriotic Premier, Baron Tanaka, is bringing Asia to the verge of another war. He is playing fast and loose with the rights of the Chinese people and defying the Washington Treaty which pledged the great Powers to respect the integrity of China.

The Sino-Japanese crisis involves a number of problems—the incidents of Nanking and Tsinan, the abrogation of an old treaty with Japan by the Chinese Nationalist Government, the control of Manchuria by Japan, and the Russian pressure on Mongolia. Overshadowing the other problems is the Japanese control of Manchuria.

The Chinese have never admitted that Manchuria is anything else than an integral part of China, and nominally the rest of the world has agreed with them. The Nationalists, pushing northward from Canton to Peking, have kept their eyes on Manchuria as the coveted goal of their ambition and the final test of Chinese control over China. When they finally captured Peking and Chang Tso-lin was killed, they opened negotiations with the titular head of Manchuria, old Chang's son, Chang Hsueh-liang, to bring Manchuria into the new Nationalist China.

It seems clear that the Chinese people of Manchuria wanted to throw in their lot with the Nanking Nationalists and that young Chang was anxious to reach an agreement. Reports from Mukden and Tokio indicate that an agreement was virtually completed when the Japanese stepped in. Under that agreement Chang Hsueh-liang was to keep control of Manchurian domestic affairs and in return hoist the Nationalist flag, swear allegiance to the principles of Sun Yat-sen, and leave the control of Manchurian foreign affairs to the Nationalist Government at Nanking. All things considered, this was a natural compromise in a difficult situation, and any nation which possessed self-government would have been permitted to carry it out.

But Baron Tanaka protested. He declared that Japan would use all its power to prevent Nationalist domination of the Manchurian Government. He sent Baron Hayashi to Mukden to see Chang Hsueh-liang, and young Chang immediately suspended negotiations with the Nationalists even when his own people were clamoring for the completion of the agreement. What caused the sudden weakening of Chang Hsueh-liang? To those who are familiar with the Japanese procedure in Manchuria the natural answer is money and military pressure. Japan has treated the Government of Manchuria as a dependency for many years and finds it even easier to dominate young Chang than his father.

What can the Nationalists do to win back Manchuria to China? Their armies are too weak to fight Japan directly, but several strong forces are on their side. Most important of all is the great preponderance of Chinese people in Manchuria. How can 200,000 Japanese control 25,000,000 Chinese who are hostile to them? Such things have been done in history, but Japan will find the control most costly. Moreover the Chinese population of Manchuria is growing prodigiously by immigration from the famine-swept areas of Central China while Japan's program of migration into Manchuria has been a failure.

Also, China has the boycott—and the former Chinese boycotts against Japan have done sufficient damage to win respect for the boycott as an effective weapon. Dr. C. C. Wu, Special Envoy from Nationalist China, threatened Japan with such a boycott in his speech at the Williams-town Institute. At the same time Dr. Wu offered to the Japanese assurance of economic opportunity in Manchuria. "We are prepared to protect Japan's economic interests," he said, "but that is no reason for usurping political control over Manchuria. We object to Japan's political domination over Manchuria, which we consider to be an infringement of China's sovereignty. We are prepared, however, to welcome further investment by Japan or other countries in Manchuria, or anywhere else."

If Japan is unwilling to accept this adjustment of power in Manchuria, the Nationalists have the ancient answer of military force. They are weak now, but an ominous revival of military spirit is sweeping China as a result of Japanese aggression. Compulsory military training has been ordered in all government schools, and the order has been met with marked enthusiasm by the students. In Shanghai alone 15,000 students, including many girls, bought cadet uniforms.

If the Manchurian crisis leads to an open war, the responsibility will rest largely upon the nations which signed the Nine-Power Treaty at the Washington Conference and pledged themselves to respect the integrity of China. The pledge was definite and unmistakable—and the United States and Japan were parties to the pledge. In the face of Japan's open violation of the pledge the least that our State Department can do is to protest vigorously and repeatedly until Manchuria is allowed to unite with the rest of China.

The Courts on Trial

"THE courts ought to be reformed." One hears this said so universally that it must represent the overwhelming majority of public opinion. Yes, but how ought the courts to be reformed? That is the practical question, and in general it brings only vague replies. In order to arrive at something definite the National Economic League recently submitted a series of more or less widely advocated proposals for reform to a special committee of about 100 lawyers, professors of law, and laymen. The answers received are summarized in the June issue of the Consensus, the official organ of the league, published at 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

In regard to whether judges of State courts should be appointed or elected, forty votes were cast for the former method as against nineteen for election. A. M. Kidd of the Columbia University Law School wrote:

The ideal is to have the lawyers best fitted for judicial preferment by reason of their character, training, experience, and temperament placed on the bench. The lawyers know best who these men are. If their recommendations, uninfluenced by political considerations, could be followed, the formal methods of selection would be immaterial. The selection of the best men may be and is as effectively thwarted by machine politics as it is by popular ignorance.

The members of the committee were asked to say also whether the term of office should be for life or a period of years. Thirty-two declared for life and twenty-nine for a term of years ranging from four to twenty. "Life tenure in office is dangerous," said Charles Stephens, a lawyer of Columbus, Kansas. "It has always led to tyranny and oppression in favor of the richest of the rich."

There is much discussion at the moment in regard to juries and considerable sentiment in favor of restricting their use and changing their methods of procedure. Fifty-five of the committee against eight said that a defendant in a criminal case should have the right to waive trial by jury and be tried by the judge. Federal Judge J. Foster Symmes responded: "In misdemeanor cases only." Harvey N. Shepard, a lawyer of Boston, said: "Jury trial should be adhered to in all criminal cases. The right has been bought at a great price." To the question "Should less than twelve of a jury be able to return a verdict?" there were fifty-nine votes in favor and six in opposition, in civil cases. In criminal cases the vote was forty-one to twenty-one in favor of a less than unanimous verdict. We think a change in this respect would be helpful. But Charles H. Wright, formerly District Attorney of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, wrote:

I believe in the existing jury system. In over twenty years both as district attorney and in private practice I think I have had nearly all the verdicts to which I was entitled. The English jury trial is the result of centuries of evolution. I do not favor tinkering with it because of miscarriages of justice due to incapacity in the trial judge or advocate, or to stupidity on the jury.

The much-discussed question as to whether a defendant in a criminal case should be required to take the witness stand brought forty negative responses to twenty-three votes of approval. Silas H. Strawn of Chicago, president of the American Bar Association, said that the proposal would entail violation of constitutional rights, and a number of others expressed the same view. Professor Kidd wrote:

Perhaps the defendant should be required to take the stand, but I am very much afraid of the unequal contest between the defendant and the district attorney. If clever lawyers can make an intelligent, honest witness look and feel like a crook, why not experiment first with a preliminary examination before a magistrate?

Perhaps the reform should be approached gradually, as Professor Kidd suggests, but we believe the change should be made eventually. No innocent person should fear it, and the practice exists in Europe.

A strong sentiment was expressed in favor of determining the mental capacity of a person accused of crime by a disinterested body of experts, thus taking it out of the forensic field. The vote was forty-two to fourteen on this proposal. L. Vernon Briggs, a Boston alienist, wrote: "The Massachusetts law requiring examination of murderers and felons by the Department of Mental Disease before trial should be adopted in every State." Clark B. Whittier, professor of law in Stanford University, commented: "In California we now have it tried by the jury, but subsequent to and separate from the question of guilt; that is a step in advance."

Thirty-two persons expressed themselves in favor of public defenders and twenty-seven as opposed. "No," wrote Municipal Court Judge Wilfred Bolster of Boston, "the District Attorney should be such. Give him an antagonist and you merely enlarge the arena." On the other hand, Judge William V. Custer wrote: "Many paupers have been hanged in this State (Georgia) when the lawyer ought to have been substituted."

A Censor for Building

FROM England comes the welcome news that at last there is a concerted effort to protect its beautiful countryside from the menace of the jerry-builder, the "subdivider," and the bogus architect who builds band boxes, or timbered and brick or cement monstrosities, and calls them houses. The Prime Minister, Stanley Baldwin, himself is in the lead and so, Ernest Marshall reports in the New York Times, influential bodies have been formed from Kent to Cornwall to prevent the entire coast becoming "one long, hideous line of ferro-concrete and rubberoid roofing." Clough Williams-Ellis, an English architect, is in arms, too, "at the manifold threat to the physical appearance of what was once perhaps the most beautiful country in the world." His remedy is cooperation by local authorities and the Government in London to check what has already made of some of the loveliest Surrey and Sussex roads "a nightmare of architectural abominations."

That the automobile has had its part in this desecration is beyond doubt. Yet this means of rapid transportation in the rural districts is surely not to be blamed for the architectural horrors erected in order to give rural and cheaper homes. The speculative builder is the chief offender. He not only cuts up the countryside without respect for any natural beauties, he is usually destitute of all knowledge of landscape-gardening and is totally unaware that a lovely cottage costs no more than a hideous one. Hence the problem for England, as well as the United States, is to enforce standards of taste. How? Must it be done by legislative fiat? That calls up visions of a rigid and stupid officialdom committed to one style for all places and needs, or for a group of official architects and artists supervising all plans and mounted on numerous hobbies. The latter is by all odds the better scheme. But this arrangement, too, has its limitations and weakness.

Yet there seems to be no escape from it. In New York City, architects headed by Harvey Wiley Corbett and J. Monroe Hewlett, and the Fine Arts Federation, are asking the creation of an architectural commission to supervise or censor public architectural plans. Mr. Corbett does not wish at first to censor private buildings, but calls for a permanent architectural commission, similar to the existing Municipal Art Commission, to act as a city planning body, to which in due course large building projects of private enterprise "will be willingly submitted" for scrutiny, advice, and approval. Something like this should come to pass, for the waste and confusion, and often the horrible ugliness of much building in all our large cities, is as shocking to the eye as any invasion of rural communities. It is, of course, impossible to conceive that any such control will go so far as to prevent economically wasteful construction. But if the general lines for a city's development could be laid down, it should be possible to set up artistic standards to which builders must conform, especially in relation to the surrounding structures, leaving the rest free for the play of individual taste and talent.

It is true that, as a whole, especially in the building of country homes, American architectural taste has improved. The mass-producer, who has no more idea of beauty than had Mr. Ford when he filled our roads with his ugly first model, is the chief offender.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

IF there should be anybody hereabouts who is a little sick of all the talk about "nullificationists" and allied scoundrels who take no proper pride in the American Constitution as amended, but is also bored with talk about the ways of prohibition agents and what the South is going to do about the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments, there is a fine field for offensive counter-questioning which has not been particularly well covered.

In all the adjurations of the Borahs and the William Allen Whites about the sacredness of our fundamental law, laid down by the fathers, amended now and again by the grace of Heaven but nevertheless immutable and eternal, and binding tighter than original sin on all those blessed by living upon these shores, there has never appeared one single whisper against two of the most insidious powers that have crept into American government—namely, the power of the members of a President's Cabinet and the power of the public-service commissions.

This matter of the Cabinet really ought to be looked into—and probably one of these days it will be, some ten to twenty years after any possibility of scotching it will have passed. By the investitures of the Constitution the President has, in all conscience, little enough to do. In fact, beyond writing messages which as such bind nobody, and passing the time of day with ambassadors from foreign lands, intimating with what hopefulness he may what are his favorite legislative measures, and making his routine appointments, he has an absurdly small allotment of actual powers. If you reread the Constitution under "President" you will be shocked by the paucity of his duties and responsibilities. But in this matter of his appointments a prodigious power has accrued to him, with none to say him nay. None has said him yea or nay.

Congress, as uppity as all outdoors about its prerogatives, as jealous as a cat about what was its due and where ran the white line beyond which the Presidential toe might not pass, has with great solemnity, great finality, and great blindness assigned by its fiats a simply staggering miscellany of functions and powers to the heads of the various departments. These department heads are designated by the President, and are accountable only to him. There isn't a law—north of fifty-three, south of it, east of Suez, or in the caverns of the moon—that binds a Cabinet member. If you think different, try and get a court review of something some one of them has done.

There isn't a Secretary in Washington who cannot do just what he pleases within the confines of his job. Well, it is true that the Constitution more or less provided for that, but the Constitution expected the confines of his job to be what you could really call confines. Congress, fanning the air to find somebody who would agree to be responsible for whatever it saw fit to ordain, has stretched the confines of the departmental powers till they dim only into the farthest skies.

Prohibition under Mr. Mellon, immigration under Mr. Davis, Nicaraguan intervention under Mr. Wilbur, this and that under Mr. So-and-So, and all of them accountable merely to the man who first put them in their jobs—with the governed individual as helpless as a baby—if all of this is constitutional government, or any part of what was outlined as basic governmental principle for this country, then the fathers were pretty unversed in making themselves clear.

But does a shout of "nullificationist" rear itself against the members of the Cabinet who have received these vast extra-constitutional powers, or against the President who has used them? Hardly. That long and ugly word is kept only for the base and unworthy who fuss about a single amendment.

It had not been the intention of this piece to complain so at length about the Cabinet and its great and growing tentacles. It was the other, the second, the State-and-federal extra-constitutional arm, that we had meant to mention—in short, these public-service commissions, both State and inter-State. Now if these were any good, they would be water on the wheel of an old socialist like me, though they would certainly be a deadly weapon against the first good Anti-Saloon League legalist who yelled "nullification" at me. As a matter of fact, the public-service commissions are worth all too little, for two reasons, first that they are made up of political appointees rather than experts, and second, that the first show of vigor and determination—to say nothing of ability—that is made by any of their personnel is greeted by some whopping offer from private capital which is almost invariably accepted.

The only point I really want to make is that this economic world of ours cannot exist half-socialist and half-capitalist as long as the capitalists have all the big wages and the good jobs and there is nothing to keep them from draining all the talent and capacity out of the governmental commissions, leaving those commissions with enfeebled and sometimes venal aggregate intelligence, plus enormous power. It makes a very poor arrangement.

I am as hot as the next one for supervision by somebody of the prices that private owners can charge us for gas, or water, or transit, or what not. I'm socialist enough to want the government to barge right in on these terrifying pirates who sell us railroad tickets and electric lights at whatever they please. But I want the thing done well, and done openly. I don't want to have to sit by while the Consolidated Gas Company persuades the Public Service Commission to let it buy up the Brooklyn Edison Company in what are practically star-chamber sessions and hasty ones at that, without any assurance that my governmental buddy is looking after my interests.

And certainly I don't want to have to sit by while public-service commissions in all sorts of States, and interstate commerce commissions, and federal boards of one kind and another, and Cabinet members with unlimited powers are all going buckety-buckety into governmental activities that concern me very vitally for which they have no more constitutional backing than I have to hang my neighbor's cat. Over these I may not exercise one shadow of control. Yet they have never a word said against them, while I am called a low nullifier of the Constitution for squawking at the Eighteenth Amendment. I have decided it is high time I also began sternly to demand "What is the country coming to?"

HEYWOOD BROUN

What Happened in Seattle

By JULIA N. BUDLONG

THE chivalry of the great open spaces seems, like the rest of our better instincts, to sustain itself only by occasional reversions to more primitive social attitudes. In no other light can we view the refusal of Seattle to return to office its competent and progressive woman mayor at the last municipal election.

Bertha K. Landes came into political life by the logical though unusual avenue of the woman's club. Her life had been spent as a university professor's wife, with home and school her major occupations and her husband's students as her hobby, until her own children were grown and she found herself left with her hands freed for less personal labors. She joined the social-service department of the Century Club, one of the largest women's city clubs, and became, in rapid succession, her department's chairman, the club's president, and president of the City Federation of Women's Clubs.

Anyone familiar with women's club work has now an adequate mental picture of her character and personality. A rapid rise in club circles denotes unbounded energy, intelligence, executive acumen, and limitless tact and charm. It also denotes an impeccable personal life: a home and family that will pass the most rigid inspection and a reputation for being an excellent wife and mother. It denotes "the right ideas," the "right clothes," membership in a Protestant evangelical church, and New England ancestry.

Mrs. Landes meets every requirement. Her ancestors settled in America as early as 1630, some coming from Denmark and some from England. She grew up in Connecticut, one of a large family presided over by a capable New England mother who with one hand cared for her numerous progeny and a husband invalidated by the Civil War and with the other was a pillar of strength in the community. "My mother was the most wonderful woman I have ever known. I don't see how she did it," says Mrs. Landes.

Bertha Knight attended college, living while she was there with an older sister who had married a professor. After graduation she returned to live with her mother and to teach—until a university appointment enabled Henry Landes to marry and take his bride over river and mountain and desert and plain to far distant Washington, where they settled down near the university campus in Seattle.

The only feature of her activities in the years to follow which seems to have been in any way a direct preparation for the opportunities to come was the habit of reading aloud to the blind and aged uncle who made his home with her. She read for hours every day and, as his tastes were catholic, she "read everything"—political science and economics included.

When the war came Mrs. Landes was made chairman of her club's Red Cross department and endured for two years the incessant strain which broke many a conscientious man and woman. It did not break Mrs. Landes. The war over, agitation for "a woman on the City Council" brought a demand that she run for the office. The idea seemed ridiculous to her at first, but the insistence of her friends and the pressure of city-wide appeals eventually persuaded her to permit her candidacy to be filed. She and her teammate were elected by a large vote on a non-partisan ballot. Three years later she was reelected by an even larger vote, though her team-mate was snowed under. She was made president of the council.

Then came Mrs. Landes's big chance and she met it like a Puritan and a general. The mayor was journeying eastward to a convention in New York. As president of the City Council, Mrs. Landes was to preside at the City Hall in his absence. "Well, there won't be much to do," he said, as he inducted her into his swivel chair behind the mahogany table. "But keep your eye on the Chief here," and he indicated the head of the police force, present for the ceremonies.

Seattle was a wicked city, there is no doubt about that. It is a seaport, the nearest to Canada on the Pacific Coast. It is a big, overgrown, boom town. It has its power corporation and its lumber barons. What else could anyone expect? Things had to be just about as they were; look at all the other big cities in America. Any politician out of swaddling clothes would know enough to let such a situation alone.

Mrs. Landes was not a politician. She was a housekeeper and a clubwoman. She had been given power. She believed in God. She lay awake all one night thinking about it, she tells us. She felt like a martyr. "Oh, I didn't want to do it!" But in the morning she wrote the Chief of Police a letter, calling to his attention certain glaring defects in his administrative force and directing him to correct them immediately. The Chief's reply was saucy. In effect he said: "The charter gives you authority to take over the police forces of the city and run them yourself. Why don't you do it?" So she did.

The next limited train leaving New York for points west had Mayor Brown of Seattle on board. Five days later he stormed into the office where Mrs. Landes sat in his swivel chair. His month's visit had been cut to three weeks. It was the wrong gesture on the Mayor's part, and the next election found Mrs. Landes established in his swivel chair by a 6,000 plurality.

But two years later found her defeated for reelection by a plurality of 19,000. Had her administration been a failure? Far from it. Her knottiest problem had been the street-car tangle. Seattle, insisting upon a five-cent fare, had taken over its street-cars under a tremendously inflated condemnation appraisal. The five-cent fare had had to be raised to ten cents and during three months of the year the employees of the system were on a voucher basis. This tangle Mrs. Landes inherited. She wrestled manfully with the problem and each year of her incumbency the city was less in debt than the year before. But, midway of her term in office, in December, 1926, the banks suddenly refused to honor the city's vouchers. Investigation revealed that, under the State law, the city could not transfer funds from one department to another to meet an emergency. It looked as if the city would have no funds with which to pay its employees, and Christmas was at hand. Then the character of the allegiance which Mrs. Landes is able to command became evident. Every one of the vouchers was redeemed—by private citizens, by downtown department stores, by small, outlying banks.

Bertha K. Landes

Why, then, in the face of this devotion, has she met defeat? Was the burden of living under a New England conscience too great for the frontier village? Did Geneva again banish Calvin? As far as reform measures went, two remarks, made by representatives of opposite schools of thought, are enlightening. Said a Portland friend's bootlegger: "Seattle? Oh, it's slow up there, you know. Got a woman mayor. Nothing much doing." Said a Seattle high-school teacher: "Well, we've had a woman in office now for two years, and there's still gambling going on, and rum-running, and graft. I can't see much difference. And," he added, "I suppose, under the new man it'll go on just the same." This difference of opinion would seem to indicate that Mayor Landes had done about as well as could be done under present conditions. Seattle was cleaned up—impressively. But it was a "reasonable" reform administration.

The only reason for her defeat which anyone has ever given is her sex. Seattle is sensitive to its reputation as a he-man city. It did not like to be teased about its mayor. It was just as irritated by the taunt: "What's the matter with you folks out there; haven't you got any men in Seattle that you have to have a woman for mayor?" as was Texas by the gibe: "The great open spaces, where men are men and women are governors." No one, not even a city, not even an honorable woman, can stand up against a campaign of ridicule.

Seattle is already a little ashamed of itself, now that the smoke of battle has cleared away and it surveys the landslide precipitated by its irritation. If the vote were to be taken today it would probably reverse itself. Masculine domination has been vindicated and Seattle begins to remember what an awfully good mayor Mrs. Landes was. Her successor comes into office as an unknown quantity, with no record and no visible backers. He ran on a sex issue only. His primary campaign expenses, excluding the army of precinct workers and the bill posters, were $15,000. His salary as Mayor will be $7,500 a year. But the astonishingly huge vote recorded at the primary in March seems to indicate that masses of voters who ordinarily pay little attention to their duties as citizens turned out to instal him.

There is a deeper moral to the story, however, and a sadder one. No one can be successful in politics without playing the game of politics. And this Mrs. Landes has steadfastly refused to do. She has contended that politics has no place in municipal government; that political parties should be national organizations concerned with national policies, while the governing of a city was a matter of civic housekeeping—of buying stores and repairing streets and keeping the city clean and well and beautiful and as good as possible, efficiently, smoothly, and economically.

To this end she made all her appointments on the basis of efficiency and fitness, and not from the standpoint of political sagacity. In only one instance, she maintains, that of a labor representative appointed to a place on the Board of Public Works, succeeding a labor man, did she appoint any representative of a bloc of voters to a post in the city's government. And this, she says, was because plain justice seemed to dictate it. Those who did the city's work ought, surely, to be represented on its board of management.

This is no way for a politician to act. It is puzzling and irritating to the old guard. It is impossible for the politicians and bosses and grafters to catch step—to understand the rules of the game. Moreover, Mrs. Landes had what she characterized as an immense advantage over a man in her position. Having no family dependent upon her, she was in a position to ignore caution and self-interest. This is the unique contribution which, she believes, the woman with a grown family may make to wise governing. But what municipality wants a mayor who refuses to "listen to reason" when a crisis arrives?

Take the post of port warden, for example. Properly handled, that one appointment may be expected to deliver at least a thousand votes. Mrs. Landes appointed a young university instructor without political backing, place, or power. All the politicians could make of it was that she was favoring an associate of her husband, putting personalities before policies. But Mrs. Landes insists that he won the place on his merit. In addition to his university training he was a naval reserve officer with a war record, and he had his ship's papers and a license to navigate in Alaskan waters, won by actual experience. And then, instead of attending to his rake-off from every passing rum-schooner, he has busied himself with matters like signal lights and police patrol. Such neglect of obvious opportunities is too much for Seattle to witness with equanimity. "Let's put somebody in who knows a good thing when he sees it!"

Such "domestic economy" built up no political machine for the Mayor with which she could counteract the sub rosa campaign waged against her from the start by the old and well-intrenched political ring. She might be indorsed by all the civic organizations in the city, as she was; she might have the editorial support of every large daily, as she had; but that is not political backing, and in American cities today good-housekeeping is not good politics, shameful as it is to admit it.

It is strongly to be doubted that Mrs. Landes will ever seek office on her own account. Her forays into the political field heretofore have been made under pressure of heavy persuasion. It is even less likely that she will renounce her principles and turn politician, to build up an organization. But if ever a good job of civic or national housekeeping demands her attention it is not likely that she will refuse the call of duty. What will probably happen is that other politicians, recognizing her administrative ability and the allegiance she commands from her own small but influential class, will keep her active in appointive positions. Certainly in politics one must stoop to conquer, and she, no doubt, will choose never to stoop. For the present, she is kept busy lecturing and attending to the honorable but not onerous duties devolving upon her as moderator of the Congressional Conference of Washington.

The South Is Still Solid

By CALVIN B. HOOVER

RECURRENT prophecies are made and hopes expressed that the South and the West are going to form a political alliance against the domination of the national government by the Northeast. The assumption is that the West and the South are predominantly agricultural and rural and can therefore be expected to recognize their community of interest in opposition to the urban and industrial Northeast.

The fundamental error which is the basis of these hopes is not so much that they are predicated upon an underestimate of the growing importance of industry in the South, although this is usually the case. But a factor of far greater importance is the dynamic influence of the industrialists upon the Southern political system compared with the static and sterile nature of the influence which the farmer class exerts. Political dominance by the industrialists is not superficially apparent. Although in no other part of the country is a political party so thoroughly dominated by an economic class, nevertheless there is nowhere such complete indifference to this situation, nor indeed so complete an ignorance of its existence, as in the South. The Northern intelligentsia talk in terms of the conflict between mill owner and mill operative. In reality such conflict is negligible. Antagonism there most certainly is, but no actual struggle takes place, simply because the mill owners are able to have their own political way without any opposition or hindrance.

This lack of dynamic conflict is one of the most characteristic features of Southern political life. The pacifism which characterizes economic affairs is carried into the management of the existing political organizations. The one-party system is not wholly responsible for this. Wisconsin and many other Northern States have as truly a one-party system, in the limited meaning of the word, as has North Carolina or Georgia. But in the South there are not even any fundamentally differentiated factions within the party organizations, such as the division into Stalwarts and La Follettites which characterizes Wisconsin politics. On the contrary, the struggle for office within the political organization is minimized as much as possible. The Southern voter is basically a good-natured individual who shrinks from conflict unless emotionally aroused. The Southern press almost solidly supports the viewpoint that political contests should be confined to issues which are not violently controversial. Anything else is offensive to good taste. Issues which contain potential dynamite are to be avoided if the aspirant for political honors is to be treated by the press as belonging in the class of honorable men. The Democratic political organization adopted this philosophy long ago, due to the necessity for white solidarity in the face of the threat of Negro suffrage. Prolonged controversy within the ranks cannot be tolerated. Democratic conventions may be tumultuous and bitterly contested, but in the Solid South, after the smoke of battle has cleared away, the command to "close ranks" is always heard, and permanent lines of cleavage are never allowed to form. Hence the defeated candidate for governor has his wounded feelings assuaged by the assurance that he will be the organization's candidate in 1932. If he plays the game, after he has served as governor he may aspire to the senatorship. The policy is the far-sighted one of receiving into the bosom of the organization all potential trouble-makers. Since the Republicans have no chance in national politics, their defeated candidate may even look to his Democratic opponent to defend him before the Senatorial committee which passes upon his qualifications for an appointive federal office.

This elimination of serious political conflict means that all hope of economic reform is effectually killed. If there were to be a real fight between Republicans and Democrats, or even between two factions of the Democratic Party, economic issues would be almost sure to arise. Points of conflict which now remain completely unagitated would present a glorious opportunity for a ride to power upon the wrath of an aroused electorate.

This smooth-working political machine has not been consistently dominated by the desire to serve the industrial capitalists. The older members of the machine, who represent their States or districts in Congress, have often in the past shown a willingness to vote for legislation which has been bitterly opposed by the industrial entrepreneurs of the nation. There were many instances of this during the Wilson administrations. The Adamson Act is a case in point. It is only recently that the Southern industrialists have felt any considerable degree of solidarity with the Northern manufacturers, and have attempted to influence the attitude of their representatives in Congress toward national problems.

Nor is it fair to classify the Southern politician of the old school as personally reactionary, or as a natural supporter of industrial capitalism, opposed to the interests of the farmer. In spite of the aristocratic tradition, and in spite of Negro slavery, Jeffersonian and Jacksonian Democracy has been something more than a shibboleth to these men. Few of the older leaders in the political machine are of aristocratic birth and breeding. They are drawn from the class of small farmers, cross-roads merchants, and country lawyers, which, shortly before the dawn of the century, supplanted the planter oligarchy as the political ruling class in the South. Such political survivors of the planter class as retained power and prestige were often hostile to capitalistic industrialism. For example, the late Chief Justice Walter Clark of the Supreme Court of North Carolina was the champion of political and economic theories as radical as and sometimes identical with those advocated by the late Senator La Follette. In the United States Senate we find Heflin of Alabama joining with the radical Republican group in opposing a real or imagined effort of the American capitalists to carry out a policy of economic imperialism in Mexico and Nicaragua.

The South is now at that stage when old economic issues have lost their reality, while those of the present have not yet become apparent to the public. The jargon of politics continues to be reminiscent of post-Civil War days. Southern Senators are frequently men to whom the issues of thirty or forty years ago are still real. To these men the South remains primarily agricultural and evangelical. Doubtless they do notice some evidences of change. They find less and less pressure from their constituencies in favor of a lower tariff. In fact, the pressure nowadays is usually exerted in the opposite direction. But these men, while they have not felt called upon to oppose industrialism in their own States, have in the conduct of national affairs remained, for the most part, true to the conception of Democracy current in the late nineteenth century.

But all this is changing. The younger leaders of the political organizations who occupy the governorships and other State offices have developed a philosophy and program radically different. They have observed the South transformed by a new Industrial Revolution. They have seen the visible effect upon the South of the development of textile mills and water-power. They have perceived that this industrial development has made it possible for the South to have good roads, schools, and even country clubs, which could not be supported during the days when the South was in economic dependence upon the industrial Northeast. The gratitude of all classes in the South to the leaders in this industrial movement has been profound. They have known what they wanted, and the new generation of political leaders has been anxious to give it to them.

There has been no other dynamic class in the South to dispute the political dominance of the industrialists. The political influence of the poorer class of farmers has waned since the alliance of the Populists with the Negroes resulted in the decisive defeat of the only real bid for economic power which this class has ever made. The radical farmers were maneuvered into such a position that any attempt to improve their economic status by means of political action involved them in the support of the Negro demand for suffrage, and the white farmer could not bring himself to betray his race to further his economic interests. The Southern farmer has remained a tenant, without hope, without even the determination to register a protest against his lot.

In this respect he is fundamentally different from the Western farmer, who is not at all diffident about asserting his own importance in the legislative halls of his State, or even in Congress if it is humanly possible. The farmer of the West—as witness the Nonpartisan movement—will try any economic experiment in the hope of finding redress for his grievances. If these experiments turn out to be failures, the urban industrialists can be forced to share the burden of the expense. But the Southern farmer constitutes a distinctly different social class. Most Southern Negroes are farmers, and a considerable number of the rest of the farming class are of the poor white type. Naturally they have never enjoyed social or political prestige. Nor is it likely that their political power will increase during the present period of industrial development.

The lack of political importance of the textile operatives is likewise in the natural order of things. They are themselves only transplanted tenant farmers who have left a miserable economic status on their barren acres for a distinctly ameliorated position in the mill village. Psychologically they are not removed from their fellows of the back country; they are as uneducated, as susceptible to religious emotionalism. Life in the mill village means at least easily accessible moving pictures; even such material advantages as a roof which does not leak. The mill worker does not make any articulate protest against his present lot, since, at the worst, it represents a distinct improvement in material well-being over his previous status. Practical politicians continue to make their appeal to this class in terms of anti-evolution and anti-Popery; never in terms of labor legislation.

The mercantile and professional classes of the South support the economic and political philosophy of the industrialists with great unanimity and enthusiasm. The small business man knows that the development of industry in the South has been a tremendous boon to him. It has meant that he could have a standard of living which included Buicks and bathtubs, radio sets and golf. And he knows that low wages constituted the advantage which made it possible in the beginning for Southern industry to compete with Northern industry. To industry, therefore, he would concede a lower tax rate, a low scale of wages, anything, in short, which guarantees him a sufficient pay roll in his town to provide the purchasing power for his wares.

Those political prognosticators who prophesy a union of the Western and Southern farmers against the Northern industrialists are thinking in terms of the South of thirty years ago. In like manner those liberals who look forward to the "smashing of the Solid South," with the hope that a clear-cut alignment of political forces would result, certainly overlook the tremendous advantages which would accrue to conservatism from such an upheaval. Undoubtedly the South would cast in its lot with a conservative-industrialist party rather than with a liberal-agrarian one.

If, in the coming election, the Solid South were to be broken, the inevitable result would be that the younger generation in the Democratic and Republican machines would become dominant. Perhaps the Republican Party might temporarily or even permanently capture a few States. But the industrialists would view such a result with equanimity. The seductive appeal of the protective tariff has been making the Republican Party more acceptable to them. The rapprochement of the Southern industrialists and the Republican Party has resulted in a steady waning of interest in the Negro on the part of the younger Republican leaders. Certainly the triumph of the Republican Party in the South would not constitute a threat to white hegemony.

The important result of such an upheaval in the South would be the elimination of a political "time-lag" which up to the present has prevented the final consolidation of political power in the hands of the industrialists. With this time-lag eliminated, the power of the younger politicians of the South, who are hard-boiled conservatives, would spread from State to national politics. As long as the political equilibrium is undisturbed, however, the representatives of the South in national politics, on account of their traditional opposition to the Republican Party, will often support the national program of the radical Republicans from the West, for the pure joy of putting a Republican administration in a political hole.

At some time a liberal or even a radical political party may develop in the South. But such a development, if it ever comes, lies far in the future. Meanwhile the agrarian influence upon Southern politics is rapidly becoming of importance only to the historian. The man of the hour in politico-economic affairs is neither the laborer nor the farmer, but the industrialist.

The Grave of Mill

By CHARLES FRANKLIN THWING

THAT the body of John Stuart Mill rests in Avignon involves strange contrasts. For Mill was a master of philosophic thought in England during a generation which enrolled the greatest thinkers. Among them, in the larger relation, were Peel, Palmerston, Cobden, Brougham, Disraeli, Gladstone, Macaulay, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Browning, Tennyson, Darwin, Huxley, and Spencer. In the smaller circle were included Carlyle, Ruskin, Bentham, George Grote, Ricardo, Maurice, and the Austins.

The little city of Avignon, on the contrary, represents medievalism. It is a treasure house of the government and history of the Middle Ages. Here Pope and Anti-Pope ruled. It also bears one back to the conquering Roman period. In such an environment rests the mortal part of one who made rich contributions to three great departments of learning, of thought, and of life—political science, economics, and inductive logic. The place hardly seems fitting as a last and lasting resting place of a life so diverse and so active.

No such contrast belongs to Keats, resting in a quiet part of the English cemetery in Rome, or to the entombment of Shelley's heart. One recalls Rupert Brooke's great sonnets. Perhaps it is true for each that wherever the great of English life lie buried, there is to be found a part of the soil of England.

On a wet morning of a dark day in February I went to Avignon. One purpose of my going was to visit the grave of Mill. Without difficulty I found the sacred spot. The keeper said, in answer to my question, that very many persons came seeking for the grave—English, American, German, Swedish, "and all," he added. For Mill's grave is one of the world's shrines for those who hold clear thinking, moral excellence, loyalty to conviction, desire to serve humanity as the supreme treasures of the race.

The grave is in the St.-Veran cemetery. Mill's wife, too, lies buried there. A simple sarcophagus it is, of white marble, standing above the ground's level. At each end of the marble is inscribed Mill's name; on the side are inscribed his name and the dates of his birth and his death. The top of the marble bears that marvelous testimony written by Mill for his wife. I quote it:

To the Beloved Memory of Harriet Mill, the dearly loved and deeply regretted wife of John Stuart Mill. Her great and loving heart, her noble soul, her clear, powerful, original, and comprehensive intellect, made her the guide and support, the instructor in wisdom, and the example in goodness—as she was the sole earthly delight of those who had the happiness to belong to her; earnest for all public good, as she was generous and devoted to all who surrounded her, her influence has been felt in many of the greatest improvements of the age and will be in those still to come. Were there even a few hearts and intellects like hers, this earth would already become the hoped-for heaven. She died to the irreparable loss of those who survive her, at Avignon, November 3, 1858.

Has there ever been written a eulogy by a husband to a wife more moving? The epitaph, however, is simply a condensation of what Mill has written in his autobiography regarding her. On several pages of the book he seeks to interpret her: "the most valuable friend of my life." . . . "What I owe, even intellectually, to her, is in its detail, almost infinite."

It is known to all that the marriage to Mill was his wife's second one. That sense of admiration—to use no stronger word for the earlier feeling—for Mrs. Taylor began relatively at an early age. Mill wrote in a rather singular paragraph:

Married at an early age, to a most upright, brave, and honorable man, of liberal opinions and good education, but without the intellectual or artistic tastes which would have made him a companion for her, though a steady and affectionate friend, for whom she had true esteem and the strongest affection through life, and whom she most deeply lamented when dead.

It should be said, however, that those who knew both John Stuart Mill and his wife—and I have talked with those who knew both—confess that they found in her no such supreme qualities in a degree so supreme as Mill describes. It has, indeed, been intimated that, unconsciously, of course, she gave back to Mill what Mill had already given to her. He recognized the greatness of the ideas without recognizing their origin. John Morley quotes Carlyle as saying: "She was a woman full of unwise intellect, always asking questions about all sorts of puzzles—why, how, what for, what makes the exact difference—and Mill was good at answers." But this is Carlyle; and Mill is the better and the best judge.

Here in foreign soil rests the mortal part of one who was a master of the higher philosophic thinking of England for a generation. Without being a graduate of Oxford, he was yet a master in Oxford. He was not a product of Oxford tutors or of the common room. Lacking many of the typical traditions and possessions of England, yet he seemed to belong to England. He was the soul and center of a great generation. In many a paragraph of his "Recollections," John Morley writes of him in noble interpretation and loving loyalty. Of the last day that Morley ever spent with Mill, he says: "He was impatient for the song of the nightingale. Then I drove him to our roadside station, and one of the most delightful days of my life came to an end, like other days delightful and sorrowful."

In the Driftway

EUROPE or America first? That was the question put to six New Yorkers the other day by the inquiring photographer of the Daily News. The question in full was: "If you were given $1,000 for traveling, would you see Europe or America first?" As a travel expert, the Drifter feels he should have been consulted also. For him it would be purely hypothetical, since he never expects to have a thousand dollars for travel. But his opinion, as a seasoned drifter on nothing at all, would surely have been a contribution.

* * * * *

AS might have been expected, the answers were prevailingly patriotic. "America would be my choice." "I would rather see America first." Only one of the six, a young lady, preferred Europe. Her reason was not flattering to either continent: "You can see America any time. . . . Besides there is likely to be a war in Europe any time." Another young lady—the sexes were evenly divided—was bolder: "I could see both Europe and America on $1,000." This approaches the Drifter's point of view, but he fears she does not know the difficulties of the undertaking. Drifting on nothing is an art; it cannot be learned in a day.

* * * * *

THE three men questioned were uniformly orthodox. America had better "scenery," they opined. "We have high mountains, sea shores, valleys, and prairie, and I would rather see this than all Europe." One young man even introduced the idea of duty into the situation: "I think every man owes it to his country to see it first." This is surely commendable and touching; it connotes a loyalty to one's native land that transcends mere patriotism. America's feelings will be hurt, says this devoted son, if I slight her. In which he flatters America as well as himself. But in all the answers the Drifter was glad not to find the most modern attitude toward traveling, that of avoiding the best-known places for fear of being taken for a tourist. "Don't let's go to Notre Dame," cry the intelligentsia; "everyone has been there." And they stay away, and Notre Dame remains as it was before, despite the thousands who have or have not looked at its noble pile. These finicky persons eschew the worn paths of touristdom; they seek out "little villages" and "quaint, unknown inns." Not for them the purity of Chartres, the dignity of Westminster, the bewildering variety of the Louvre, the translucent tower at Pisa.

* * * * *

ALONG with this sniffing at places because they have been often visited goes the desire to find more persons of the same mind. Thus Paris is cluttered with Americans trying to act as if they were in America; thus a gentleman of the Drifter's acquaintance complained all during a trip through Spain because the food was Spanish, the baths were not American, the hotels were inferior to those in New York. For persons of this mind, America first is surely preferable, and America not more than a mile from their own doorsteps. Unless a traveler can be also an adventurer, with his eyes and his mind open for new sensations and new sights, he had far better follow the example of another of the Drifter's friends. He is eighty-four; three nights of his life have been spent out of the house in which he was born. "No," he says. "I ain't one to travel. I expect there's a good deal of human nature wherever you go, and I got enough of it here to do me."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Crew of the Italia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Reams of criticism of Nobile and Mariano and Zappi and of their ill-fated expedition continue to fill considerable space in the press. Easy-chair scientists have hastened to make charges of mismanagement and incompetence before the rescued men have had time to recover sufficiently to tell their story.

From Moscow comes the intelligence that Dr. Wise, commander of the Russian relief ship Malign, explains the cause of the disaster to the Italia. He says ice fragments thrown off by the propellers ruptured the envelope of the ship, causing it to crash. His conclusion was confirmed by Lieutenant Viglieri, head of the group rescued by the Krassin near Foy Island. This judgment by these two men, in itself, answers the charge that mismanagement caused the crash.

Mariano and Zappi, under the leadership of Malmgren, were sent over the ice to bring succor to six companions they left behind. The story of their sufferings on the floes is known to all. Malmgren, dying, urged his companions to push forward. Mariano and Zappi found themselves in a peculiar situation. Should they abandon their dying companion, or should they remain with him and perhaps sacrifice the lives of the six men left behind?

The six men pinned their hopes on the walking party. Their radio was disabled. Later it was repaired, and communication was effected. But Mariano and Zappi did not know this. Firmly convinced of Malmgren's imminent death, they continued on their way. It would have been cowardly to quit while their comrades awaited, as they believed, the outcome of their trip for help. Mariano and Zappi were still struggling on when they were found almost in a state of collapse.

But the drama is not yet ended. Out on the ice shall yet come vindication for a courageous band of men whom history will place among the great heroes in the conquest of the Arctic.

This letter is written in behalf of the two hundred members of the Italian Young Folks League.

Brooklyn, N. Y., July 21

MAURICE P. YUPPA,

President, Italian Young Folks League

Teachers and the Power Trust

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In connection with your articles on the Power Trust and its propaganda in the schools, may I call your attention to the position and history of the American Federation of Teachers in this matter.

At the twelfth convention of the American Federation of Teachers in Chicago, in June, 1928, the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, The power interests are known to be seeking every opportunity to use the public schools to spread their propaganda; and

WHEREAS, The American Federation of Teachers holds the opinion that the public schools of this country which belong to the people, with their varying political and economic convictions, should provide for the presentation and discussion of both sides of controversial questions, but should not be exploited for the purpose of advocating the particular conviction or beliefs of any group; therefore,

Be it Resolved, That the American Federation of Teachers goes on record as unalterably opposed to all efforts of private or public service corporations, such as the Hydro-Electric Power Trust, to inject covert propaganda into the public schools; and

Be it further Resolved, That we oppose all attempts to censor textbooks in the social sciences that do not harmonize with the views held by the power interests of America.

The report of our Education Committee said this:

When this committee in its report to the last convention directed attention to the Ely Institute for Research on Land Economics and Public Utilities, it seems to have been a foretaste of revelations of astonishing magnitude. The committee felt keenly the danger to education of an organization posing as an institute of research, and so closely associated with a great university as to be popularly considered a part of it, which was yet financed by businesses whose interests were largely concerned with the outcome of their ostensible research.

The committee would be glad to claim, perhaps, that it realized not only the danger of the principle, but the extent of the practice. But the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission of the activities of the power interests has revealed a situation more ominous even than we feared. . . .

The National Electric Light Association, the chief propaganda agency of the power interests, has been subsidizing the Harvard School of Business Administration to the extent of $30,000 a year for its "research staff in public utilities management," and the records of the National Electric Light Association show that the subsidy is largely to "produce an adequate textbook on public utility corporations" which "would better appear under academic auspices than as a publication of this association. In addition it is obvious that such literature bearing the imprint of Harvard University would be quite generally adopted by other institutions."

Dr. Ely's Institute at Northwestern has also been receiving a subsidy from the National Electric Light Association of $25,000 a year, and has apparently been delivering a satisfactory return, since Dr. Ely felt free to write the association on February 16 of this year, asking additional support to finance a study of municipal ownership of utilities in California, where the private power interests are attacking public ownership with especial bitterness. Illustrations could be multiplied, but the policy is clear. Managing Director Aylesworth of the National Electric Light Association in addressing the 1923 convention of the Mid-West Utilities is quoted in part as saying: "I would advise any manager here who lives in a community where there is a college to get the professor of economics interested in your problems. Have him lecture on your subject in his classes. Once in a while it will pay you to take such men getting five or six hundred, or a thousand dollars a year, and give them a retainer of one or two hundred dollars a year for the privilege of letting you study and consult with them. For how, in heaven's name, can we do anything in the schools of the country with the young people growing up if we have not first sold the idea of education to the college professor?" . . .

But even more serious than this alarming success in buying the camouflage of academic prestige and supposedly disinterested authority is their censorship of high-school textbooks. In a number of States, their records show, they have had every text on economics used in the schools of the State examined, and where statements detrimental to their interests were found, pressure was brought to bear on school authorities to take the book out, or to place it on the shelves as a reference book.

They boast that they overlook no opportunity in our educational system from the eighth grade up. Their records show that they utilize every avenue they can succeed in reaching in each situation from the individual teacher or principal through board members and superintendents up to State superintendents of public instruction. . . .

At this point let us avoid misunderstanding by repeating our declaration of a year ago. It is not a question of the sincerity of any given individual's convictions, or of the right of organized private groups to finance research. The growing control of research by private endowment does create a difficult social problem, but we are not concerned with it here. We freely grant that scholars of high integrity may and do legitimately serve private foundations. But the issue is still one of masquerading under false colors. . . .

The American Federation of Teachers, as the first organization of educators publicly to call attention to this danger, owes it to itself and to the profession it seeks to protect to protest against the use of our schools by any business interests to inculcate in immature minds principles of economics favorable only to those interests.

The American Federation of Teachers also should urge its members to be alert to detect other attempts so to use our schools, and to realize their own importance as the protectors of the minds of the youth of the land and hence of the future of the nation.

This would seem to be as vigorous a statement on the subject as you will find promulgated by any organized body, and in view of the record of the American Federation of Teachers it is to be expected that these statements will be made effective.

The American Federation of Teachers hopes to do not a little this year to show that your own attitude of "There seems to be no concerted movement to throw the textbooks edited by the utilities men out of the schools and to purify the educational system" is too pessimistic, that the attitude of the Power Trust toward educators is too sweepingly contemptuous, and that the statement recently made by an educational leader, "The teachers themselves appear to have no desire for freedom," applies to a constantly decreasing number.

Chicago, July 30

FLORENCE CURTIS HANSON,
Secretary-Treasurer, American Federation of Teachers

Hoover's Touchiness

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read the review of William Hard's book on Mr. Hoover by Mr. Villard, in which Hard is quoted as stating that Hoover broods over his clippings. I know this to be true. I remember writing an editorial attacking him over the terrible conditions in the Alaskan canneries. In the whirl of events I had forgotten the editorial when along came a long telegram from Hoover begging me to inform our readers that he was not responsible, etc.

Mr. Hoover has the engineer mind, but will it triumph over his political environment? I guess not. You might as well expect Mr. Villard to acknowledge the logical conclusion of his exposure of politics and politicians in America and vote for William Z. Foster for President.

Dublin, Ireland, July 20

JACK CARNEY,
Former editor of Labor Unity

Another !
Glorious !

ALL-RUSSIA TOUR

Special Sailing Sept. 22d to Leningrad and Moscow, nerve centers of the Soviet Republic, to ancient Kiev, Odessa, the Crimea—Riviera of Eastern Europe—the Ukraine, oriental Tiflis, Baku, the far-sung Volga, Nijni Novgorod.

15 OTHER RUSSIAN TOURS

of one week to one month or longer on fast steamers of Cunard, French, or Holland-America Lines.

SAILINGS WEEKLY

RUSSIAN VISAS ASSURED

First class accommodations throughout Russia.

Select itineraries for special parties. All expenses $340 and up

WRITE, PHONE OR CALL FOR LITERATURE

AMERICAN - EUROPEAN TRAVEL BUREAU

Representative of Official Russian Travel Bureau

100 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

CHElsea 5124-4477

Books, Music, Plays

The Portrait

By JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

Through his eye searching far
Over the bone-stretched rondure of my face,
Exploring every scar,
And lingering on the meaning of each trace,

Through his hand searching to fulfil
The image left unalterably in a brain
By the packed cohorts of my thought and will Materialized in flesh, I shall remain

Not mine but mine and his;
A link twixt thought and act none can discern.
Yet my portrait is this,
And to it all my days unspoken turn.

Yet only doubly unknown time may mark
What a hand wrought in color, line, and tone;
And a shape uttered outwardly of that dark
And changeless silence where life broods alone.

Sincere Conversation

By LAURA RIDING

The small, the far away,
The unmeant meanings
Of sincere conversation
Encourage the common brain of talkers
And steady the cup-handles on the table.
Over the rims the drinking eyes
Taste mutual congratulation
And are satisfied.

Happy room, meal of securities:
The fire distributes feelings,
The cross beam showers down centuries.
How close in friendliness
Creep words from where they shiver and starve,
Small and far away in thought,
Untalkative and false.

The End of Soames

Swan Song. By John Galsworthy. Charles Scribner's Sons.
$2.50.

IN this book, the last link in the Forsyte chain, Mr. Galsworthy is clearly trying to do three separate things at once. In the first place, he is endeavoring to step into Mr. Wells's patented role of recorder and interpreter of current events. We see the Forsyte family, particularly Michael and Fleur, old Soames's daughter, posed against the background of the general strike of 1926. The first third of the book is taken up with a careful, quite unnecessarily conscientious elucidation of their views on the strike and the social problems connected with England's present situation. Let us waive the obvious objection to the novel which would act as a faithful mirror of the recently contemporary. Mr. Wells may or may not, according to your prejudices, have shown the futility, if not the impossibility, of such a novel form. In Mr. Galsworthy's case the trouble does not inhere in any fundamental aesthetic error but simply in the fact that his characters are at once too simple-symbolic and by this time too familiar to us for their social commentary to arrive with any force or freshness. It is merely wearying, for example, to listen again and again to young Michael's tentative, decent-minded, Parliamentary liberalism.

If one wishes to construct a very long narrative (and of course "Swan Song" is nothing if not a part of a longer narrative) in which the views of the characters are to play a significant part, one must conceive these characters as complicated and continuously incomplete. Otherwise the reader will too easily become a prophet of their reactions. In other words, he becomes novelist instead of observer. This difficulty is beautifully avoided in the immense tales of Dostoevski where the personages are continually discovering and rediscovering themselves. But Mr. Galsworthy, who sees life as a much clearer and simpler thing, evolved his characters completely in the previous volumes of the Forsyte Saga. Consequently, with this new book, our main interest attaches not to their personalities or to their commentary on the changes in their environment—but simply to their fates. We are merely curious to know what happens to them.

This contraction of the reader's interest works also against the second of Mr. Galsworthy's purposes. It seems clear that in Fleur and Michael, Jon and Anne, he is trying to construct a picture of post-war youth on almost the same scale as his great Victorian portrait. But it does not quite come off. For first, as has been mentioned, his young people are too easily comprehended, too clear. If young Englishmen and Englishwomen are confused and groping and cynical, they are surely not as explicit about their confusion and groping and cynicism as young Fleur is. Put it this way—they have not had time to become simplified into articulate symbols in the way that Soames is simplified into a symbol of the acquisitive drive. Indeed, this matter of the patina laid on by time is at the root of Mr. Galsworthy's triumphs and failures. When he can look back and see his people in perspective, he is mellow and convincing; when he records the life around him he is bare and monofacial. Proust's gift of creative reminiscence he possesses to a marked degree. Proust's talent for abstracting the passionately complex and essential from a contemporary world he does not possess.

But it is probable that neither of these two purposes—that of recording a commentary on current events and that of constructing a picture of post-war youth—was predominant in his mind when he wrote this volume. Primarily "Swan Song" seems written to effect an artistic and symbolic conclusion to the fortunes of the Forsyte clan, and in particular to round off the career of Soames, unquestionably his greatest character and equally undeniably one of the greatest characters in modern English fiction. So far as concerns the technical handling of this rounding-off process, little exception can be taken. Mr. Galsworthy is a really extraordinary master of pure narration: his sense of tempo is infallible and elegant, here as it was in the earlier volumes. Yet the death of Soames—occurring as a result of his attempt to save his two great possessions, Fleur and the picture collection—does not have about it the grandeur and inevitability presumably intended for it. Not only is the catastrophe a little too slickly symbolic to be very moving, but it is reduced to mean proportions by being juxtaposed with the rest of the fable. For Mr. Galsworthy's Victorians—old Jolyon, Swithin, James, Soames himself—had a dignity and grandeur about them that made their every action weighty and arresting. They were comic giants but they were giants and they lived amid giants, even monstrosities. But the piddling youngsters in "Swan Song," with their trifling love affairs and talky social reforms and tuppenny adulteries, reduce the narrative to such niggardly proportions that Soames himself loses, instead of gains, in tragic grandeur. His end should have had something noble and Greek about it. Instead it comes merely as an acceptably fitting accident, the death of a ghost among pigmies.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

A Study of Soviet Development

Russian Economic Development Since the Revolution. By Maurice Dobb, assisted by H. C. Stevens. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

MR. DOBB has produced the most ambitious, comprehensive, and dispassionate study of the Soviet economic scene available in our language. He traces carefully the unfolding of the Soviet order, from the first desperate and somewhat bewildered beginnings to the present day, evaluating each phase of the development, applying to each the litmus tests of the economist, and leaving his reader finally with a vantage view of future possibilities—with the prudent proviso that the perspective is subject to change without notice.

Particularly fascinating is Mr. Dobb's survey of the earlier precarious years of the Soviet enterprise. Lenin, having driven his party to the seizure of power, transformed himself overnight from the tireless aggressor to the cautious statesman, so cautious indeed that rash spirits among his associates ran ahead of his conservatism. He realized better than they that while one must seize the desperate chance in attack, once the position is won the main task is one of patient consolidation. Unyielding in matters of ultimate policy and plan, he never hesitated to alter his campaign to accord with day-to-day emergencies.

When the State Bank was used to finance the foes of the Soviet state he brought it under state control. When the other banks sabotaged he swallowed them also. The land his government nationalized immediately, for it was already nationalized in the national consciousness. Industry represented a more complicated problem in which he moved more slowly than the impatient workers sometimes found tolerable. Lenin temporized with the idea of a diarchy in which impatient factory committees shared power with exasperated managers or owners. After some months this stopgap broke down. A growing number of "expropriations" by local committees augmented the growing economic chaos. It was not, however, until late in June, 1918, seven and a half months after the Bolsheviks seized power, that Lenin yielded to a general nationalization decree for large industries, and even then he yielded primarily to fix the legal status of industries in the Don Basin for which the hands of invading Germans were outstretched.

When the iron ring of Allied invasion and blockade closed about the Soviet state, military communism was decreed as a desperate measure to keep the country alive. It was, in Mr. Dobb's view, a measure of sudden military necessity, rather than a deliberate attempt to realize economic theory. "The needs of the army and the pressing necessities of life for the civilian population become the ruling obsessions," he writes, "and under such conditions it was almost inevitable that there should be excessive centralization, and that semi-military methods should be generally applied, particularly in the absence of an adequate administrative apparatus and personnel. 'War communism' was, therefore, the product, not of theories, but of war-time improvisation."

Certain Communists, Mr. Dobb points out, regarded "war communism" as a permanent goal attained. In his view Lenin did not regard it as an ultimate form. For his practical mind, says the author, communism was not a form to be "deduced a priori from first principles," but a society, to be erected on a base of communal ownership and classlessness, "and the forms of the superstructure would be those which experience would prove to be most adapted to and consistent with that base." Mr. Dobb's interpretation of Lenin seems a fair one. When the crisis was finally weathered, Lenin scrapped military communism and began to sketch the design of his base which is now being created in the Soviet state. Most Occidental critics have inferred that in creating the new economic policy he scrapped communism because "it would not work." In Mr. Dobb's view Lenin merely released from a too centralized control the creative forces of the country to give the opportunity to construct the necessary foundation for the collectivist society of tomorrow. The very consistent trend to collectivism and socialization during the past few years gives weight to Mr. Dobb's interpretation.

Mr. Dobb's study of the economic recovery is carefully worked out and interspersed with glimpses of a new society slowly integrating itself amid grave natural handicaps. The coming of the sound currency and the liquidation of the financial chaos, the problem of town versus country, the rise and fall of the "goods famine," the growth of "rationalization" and state planning, the rapid advance of the cooperatives, the development of the labor unions and their creative position in the Soviet state, the unique phenomenon of the party—all these have their appropriate places in the author's economic drama.

Mr. Dobb finds the progress surprising in view of the obstacles. The country is confident and forward-looking. It has embarked high-heartedly on many ambitious projects beyond the scope of accomplishment in the old days. It is facing its many grave problems with vigor and intelligence. These problems—of the dearth of basic capital, of bureaucracy, of the altered basis of rural economy—Mr. Dobb does not under-rate, but against the background of achievement during the first decade his conclusions incline to optimism.

It is not impossible that the next decades may hold for Russia an industrial revolution as rapid as in Japan or Germany half a century ago. Some declare that Moscow already wears the signs of an American city, with a drive and an activity she did not have before. In her streets there is certainly a new rhythm of life to be felt and heard. A new spirit of creation is abroad, elemental and crude and strong. On the lump of the old Russian temperament the Communists are ruthlessly working as a new leaven—an energizing, a leveling, a Westernizing force. Perhaps in this "laboratory of life," as one observer calls it, the scientist is evolving some new historical element of great moment to the world.

HAROLD KELLOCK

Roger Bacon

The Cipher of Roger Bacon. By William Romaine Newbold. Edited with Foreword and Notes by Rolland Grubb Kent. University of Pennsylvania Press. $4.

The Opus Majus of Roger Bacon. A Translation by Robert Belle Burke. University of Pennsylvania Press. Two volumes. $10.

MYSTERY and the reputé of strange knowledge build a fascination about this newest attempt to decode what may be one of the rumored ciphers of Roger Bacon. Professor Newbold has taken the last page of the Voynich manuscript for the key to the Bacon cipher, and the present volume retails the course of his attempts to arrive at meanings concealed in the document and in other writings. Unhappily the work was interrupted by his death, and therefore the consequences of the research are not completely elaborated nor clearly presented: some of the chapters are semi-popular expositions of Bacon's thought and cipher which Professor Newbold presented before learned societies, others are unfinished chapters of the book he projected, and still others were reconstructed from his correspondence and his fragmentary notes.

This incomplete state of the work is particularly regrettable since the device that Professor Newbold evolved is so very elaborate. The Latin cipher had to be flexible enough to permit an apparent (though often nonsensical) meaning to the text as well as the hidden meaning conveyed by the symbols. To permit such flexibility, however, requires a highly articulated scheme of alphabets, and Professor Newbold has worked out a series so elaborate that a single phonetic value may have as many as eighty symbols and in turn a single symbol may have a half dozen alphabetical equivalents. Since the order of the symbols may be rearranged, this means that the device will achieve, as well as a high degree of concealment, a considerable degree of ambiguity. With Professor Newbold's series of values it would be possible to take any piece of Latin, say a page of Cicero, and discover in it a concealed as well as an apparent meaning! There would be only this difference—that in the Bacon text all the symbols would in the end be used, whereas the decipherer of the Cicero would probably finish with some letters left over. But then there must be added the frequent warning that the Bacon interpretation is not complete, and that sometimes a passage ends, deliberately, with nonsense syllables. And finally in addition to the Latin cipher there is a short-hand text in which signs may be constructed and superimposed into what seems to be a single letter (apparently with the aid of a microscope since sometimes more than a dozen minute strokes might go into the making of a letter), and the confusion is heightened with that ultimate concealment until Professor Newbold confesses: "I frequently, for example, find it impossible to read the same text twice in exactly the same way."

The chief token of the correctness of the interpretation, therefore, must be sought in the items of information previously unknown to the decipherer which have been verified from other sources. The date of a comet, of an eclipse, and of a riot at Oxford, the location of the Great Nebula of Andromeda, a formula for the production of metallic copper, a bit of classical lore, an account of the illness of a pope and the remedies prescribed by Bacon and a few others make up the present list. Unfortunately the work of this book had to be devoted so largely to following out of the clues of the cipher that very little application has been made of the key, and that little is as yet of slight importance to the doctrine of Bacon. Some interesting points, however, have been turned up: the history of the manuscript suggests that it may once have been in the possession of the famous Doctor John Dee (the original of Prospero) and opens thus the possibility of a connection with Francis Bacon; the interpretation which the key affords of a cipher in a Vatican manuscript suggests a possible influence of Raymond Lully on Roger Bacon. But much of the Voynich manuscript is apparently still uninterpreted. Whether or not the key is correct, and whether or not important discoveries may be made by applying it further, can scarcely be hazarded. But the account of what has so far been done is an ingenious—and not wholly plausible intellectual detective tale.

The translation of Dean Burke makes available for the first time to English readers the complete "Opus Majus" of Roger Bacon. Since surprisingly little of the large philosophical production of the Middle Ages has been translated, this contribution is of no slight importance if a widespread understanding of medieval thought is to be hoped for. The translation is smooth, intelligible, close to the text, and for the most part exact. What faults occur, arise from the fact that Dean Burke seems to be more expert in Latin than in the Middle Ages or in Aristotle. Rather frequently a sense perhaps of classical elegance conceals a medieval syntax from him; such slips are seldom crucial—of the type of the one which occurs on page 586 of volume II: Bacon has insisted that a man may repeat the truth without understanding it, like an ape (Dean Burke translates) "that relies on the aid of men to perform its part," when the text ("quae opera hominum nititur peragere") says like an ape "that attempts to perform the actions of men. . . ." There is no need, however, to enumerate such errors. It is more important that Dean Burke falsifies the intellectual background from time to time by translations which are verbally permissible but doctrinally erroneous. Thus, he does not observe the sharp Augustinian-Platonist distinction between sapientia and scientia—sapientia is knowledge of eternal changeless things, the archetypes which bear the impress of divine ideas, whereas scientia is knowledge of particular changing things, the things of time and space: Dean Burke translates sapientia, sometimes knowledge, sometimes science, sometimes wisdom, as if sapientia were only a verbal variant of scientia, and that procedure permits him to take scientia usually as if it were the constant invocation of experimental science; the doctrinal significance and continuity are wholly lost, for Augustine no less than Bacon speaks of scientia and sapientia. Or, to give another example, Bacon contrasts Intelligences or angels (which are separated substances) with souls (which are substantial forms and therefore in need of union with a body); the Intelligences in question are, of course, those that rule the heavenly spheres and perform like angelic functions—but Dean Burke renders intelligentia "intellect" and leaves the passage (vol. I, p. 45) with little if any significance. So, too, words like esse, potentia, species are translated with a laxity that must shock an Aristotelian, but the supreme sin occurs when (vol. II, p. 635 and again p. 795) the practical intellect (intellectus practicus) is confounded with the active intellect (intellectus agens), as if the long controversies of the Middle Ages on the active intellect were not sufficient to warn the translator of a medieval document that the practical intellect with its contrast in the speculative intellect is far from the contrast of the active intellect with the possible. The error is the more disturbing since the active intellect is correctly rendered in one passage (vol. I, pp. 44-48) in which the further Baconian doctrine which identifies it with God is definitely stated; such an identification would be unintelligible in the case of the practical intellect. Such objections, however, are only occasional and should not disturb the reader who may come to these volumes for his first reading in Bacon—and the chance Aristotelian who may wander into them will find definite enough marks of the Aristotelian terminology to permit a ready reconstruction.

RICHARD MCKEON

Books in Brief

Julius Stockhausen, der Sänger des deutschen Lieds. Nach Dokumenten seiner Zeit. Frankfurt: Verlag Englert und Schlosser.

This excellent biography is the homage paid by a daughter to her famous father. It is a sketch of the wonderful master-singer Julius Stockhausen, and the work unfolds itself in a wide correspondence—with his parents and with his great contemporaries Clara Schumann, Brahms, and others. In this book, admirably printed and heartily to be recommended, we admire a sensitive spirit and participate in an artist's struggles and triumphs as teacher and singer of songs and oratorios.

Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. American Supplement. Waldo Selden Pratt, Editor. Charles N. Boyd, Associate Editor. The Macmillan Company. $6.

An American supplement may have been necessary in 1920 to remedy the omissions of the second edition of Grove; but there is no obvious reason why in 1928 the facts about American music and musicians should not be included in the main body of the new third edition (as indeed many of them are). Nor is there any excuse for putting out what is called a new edition of this supplement with new material, in which, on the contrary, nothing seems to have been added to what was given in 1920; in which even the cross-references are to the second edition of Grove; and in which as a result, Farrar and Caruso still hold forth at the Metropolitan, Strinsky is still at the head of the Philharmonic, Huneke still writes for the Times, and so on.

Up Eel River. By Margaret Prescott Montague. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Tony Beaver is the name of Paul Bunyan among the mountain lumbermen of West Virginia, but as interpreted by Margaret Prescott Montague he is a much more spiritual character than the wholesome but material Paul. Tony Beaver could see in a dew-drop all that Blake ever saw in "a grain of sand." He was—yet is—a kind of mystic magician, dancing with dogwood trees and reversing the "wheels of time" so as to fetch up yesterdays and hog-tie tomorrows. He is a kind of giant fairy; yet at the same time he is as earthy as Bottom. As he says, "The earth owns me." "Up Eel River" is written with real charm.

Contemporary American Authors. By J. C. Squire and Associated Critics of the London Mercury. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

Milk-and-water pronouncements by the correct generation of English critics—Squire, Priestley, John Freeman, Osbert Burdett, etc. The American writers discussed are Willa Cather, Edith Wharton, Lewis, Hergesheimer, Frost, Lindsay, Dreiser, and Robinson. These are "literary essays" par excellence. One can object to nothing in them; indeed, their un-American coolness and skepticism are welcome and intelligent. Yet on the whole they are almost unreadable. They are so soberly genteel, so level, so even. Their judgments are so clearly and dully just. Criticism to which one can do little but mildly assent may be necessary—but it is far from important.

Music

The Ballet Russe: 1928

Paris, July 20

THOSE who treasure their recollections of the Diaghileff Ballet Russe will do best to stay away from it when it visits New York again this fall.

The performances of 1916 were not distinguished merely by the brilliant dancing and miming of individuals like Jijinsky and Bolm. The very rank and file shared this brilliancy, so that at times the entire stage was alive with patterned movement. The performances were further notable for their light and color, particularly those of the ballets that were based on Russian or Asiatic legends. But above all, in these elements, and in the complete performances into which they were combined, one sensed an alert, vitalizing intelligence and taste which could find its good and use it. Today there seems to be less good to use. In the performances I saw recently in Paris ("Pulcinella," "Apollon," "L'Oiseau de Feu," "Noces," "Ode," "L'Après-midi d'un faune," and "Barabau") the only exceptional dancing was that of Woznikowsky in "Pulcinella." Most of his associates were heavy, and often, therefore, out of time. But if they had all been Woznikowskys they would only have emphasized the poor quality of the supporting company. A worse exhibition of slovenliness than it gave in "L'Oiseau de Feu" it would be difficult to imagine. The stage at time was choked with unwieldy groups, and not a concerted movement was actually begun or ended in concert. Opposed to this confusion was only one element of order and poise, the working of Massine's body in its various movements in his old role of the Prince. Formerly Massine did not stand out so. But there seems also to be less intelligence to use what good there is.

The 1916 performance of "L'Après-midi d'un faune" was given against a somber backdrop by Bakst, and on a dimly lighted stage. The program in the Paris performance mentioned only costumes by Bakst, for there was now a shabby backdrop of an ugly solid color (a light blue, as I recall it), with a skimpy platform for the faun; and the stage was in a glare that revealed every quiver of Lifar's muscles as he held the faun's attitudes. Nor was this only the simplicity of the newer ballets, the precise, purposeful simplicity, for example, of the Picasso set in "Pulcinella"; it was plain shabbiness. Nor was the reason poverty, for the theater was crowded; there seems rather to have been a deterioration in the intelligence that formerly governed matters so well.

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama

FOR those who have wondered what feelings and emotions tug and pull at the newspaper reporter's heart (if he has one) while he is busy gathering the Truth for the public, "The Front Page" at the Times Square Theater is quite the best thing that has yet come to Broadway. The various episodes take place in the press room of the Chicago Criminal Courts building and have what has come to be the inevitable background of every play laid in the Chicago scene: crime and politics. On top of that, and adding immensely to the robust entertainment of the play, is an incessant stream of reporters' wisecracks mingled with an unusually rich, bald profanity—a profanity which is, however, magically unobtrusive in the vigorous and sincere rhythm of the play. No doubt the authors, Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur, have written more humor, speed, and caricature into three hours than the average newspaperman experiences in three months, but they have also stuck closely enough to reality to make the melodrama as a whole seem like little more than an extraordinary piece of good newspaper reporting. Lee Tracy and Walter Burns as the reporter and the managing editor give fine portrayals of their parts, and they are supported by a uniformly good cast.

W. P. M.

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

"PORGY" ||| REPUBLIC
THEATRE, W. 42nd St.
Matinees Wed. and Sat.

||| JOHN GOLDEN Theatre, 58th St., East of Broadway
Dinner intermission Eves. only at 5:30

Eugene O'Neill's

"STRANGE INTERLUDE"

THEATRE GUILD ACTING CO. in

ALL THIS WEEK AND EVERY WEEK THEREAFTER

"VOLPONE"

||| GUILD THEATRE, WEST 52nd STREET
Matinees Thursday and Saturday

THE ACTOR MANAGERS present

GRAND STREET FOLLIES
OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Tues. (Pop.) & Thurs.

International Relations Section

A Call to Rumanians

A tremendous gathering of Rumanians took place at Alba Julia on May 6, last, called by the National Peasant Party to protest against the present regime of the Liberal Party. It is estimated that as many as 100,000 peasants were present, some of them coming on foot from as far away as fifty miles. The following appeal was issued by the National Peasant Party in connection with the gathering:

THE National Peasant Party at this moment of grave depression of our national life considers it its duty to appeal to the civic and national conscience of the whole country and to call the nation to a task far above all considerations of petty trivialities and partisan rivalries.

The fight which the National Peasant Party is carrying on is not limited to a simple discussion of current political issues. It is nothing less than the continuation of the long struggle of the Rumanian people to attain their liberty and national unity.

After the war which freed our land from foreign masters the Rumanian people thought that as a result of their heroic efforts they would be able to live as a free and united nation.

But the enthusiasm of the masses and the faith of the people were abused by an oligarchy of plutocrats, devoid of scruples and determined to exploit the tragedy of the people for their selfish purposes of domination and oppression.

The war was ended ten full years ago.

During these ten years the newly annexed Rumanian provinces, having thrown off the yoke of foreigners, have been trying to establish the foundations of a national Rumanian state, free and independent.

But by the cruel irony of fate the army, with which the Government was intrusted in 1926 for the purpose of defending the country against foreign enemies, has been utilized by a coterie of plutocrats in a war against the "liberated" provinces, against the productive classes, and against the masses of the people throughout the whole country, who by their sacrifices have won the right to assume their proper place in political life.

Thus for ten years we have lived under a regime of oppression and exploitation in which the police force, martial law, the censorship, and an utter disregard of all the laws have constituted the only means by which the Liberal Party has maintained its domination, open or disguised.

CITIZENS, In theory we have a constitutional state based on universal suffrage, representative government, and ministerial responsibility. In practice universal suffrage is a deception. For eight years there has been no such thing as national representation.

The ballot boxes have been stuffed, individual liberty trampled under foot, the press shackled; the administration, the police force, the courts, the army have been drawn away from their great purposes of maintaining order, establishing justice, and defending the nation, and have been transformed by an unscrupulous Government into instruments of corruption and electoral oppression.

The legislative bodies have been the products of the artifices of violent politicians, of administrative frauds, and often, unfortunately, of the abuses of judges unworthy of their high mission.

CITIZENS, The economic life of the country, placed on a false basis by the government, is ruined.

Our agriculture brings no profit because the new organization, created by the necessity of agrarian reforms, is unsuitable and inefficient and also because agriculture is subject to the cruel persecution of high tariffs, which prevent the procuring of cheap agricultural tools and supplies, and of export taxes, which discourage intensive production.

Legitimate industry is closing its doors and the taxes collected from the agriculturists are being used for the maintenance of parasitic industries.

Honest business is going bankrupt in order to make way for the commerce of exploiters.

The financial policy adopted by the Liberal Government for the purpose of restoring the value of our currency, but maintained for the express purpose of protecting the interests of the banks of the members of the Liberal Party, has completely failed and the government has been obliged to resort to the plan of stabilizing the currency, without, however, accepting the logical consequences of the utter failure and abject abandonment of its economic program.

The policy of building up the country with indigenous capital, the so-called "by ourselves" policy, doomed from the very beginning by the lack of mobile Rumanian capital, which had been destroyed by the war, prevented the import of foreign capital, made necessary a disastrous moratorium on our obligations to foreign creditors, and gave us the bad reputation of haters of foreigners, through which our credit has been ruined and our economic recovery frustrated.

Under the mantle of economic nationalism the Liberal Party has proceeded systematically and persistently to lay its hands on all the sources of wealth in the country, such as coal, oil, natural gas, minerals, waterfalls, health resorts, woods, factories, pipe lines, fisheries, means of transport, trade in cereals, and the banks. Everything in the country of any value has passed under the control of trusts, either by the help of laws which serve as instruments of pillage or by the help of the whole administrative apparatus, as a result of which the enormous wealth of the country has been gathered in a few hands and transformed into a murderous parasitic enterprise, nourished by the misery of the masses.

CITIZENS, Although our state is theoretically decentralized the present administration is characterized by excessive centralization, which is the direct result of an absolutist system applied throughout the country.

The newly annexed provinces were accustomed to a regime of local autonomy, centuries old and deeply rooted in tradition, and were dominated by a powerful spirit of loyalty to laws, so they have been overwhelmed by this brutal centralization, which, applied by a corrupt administration, has provoked universal indignation against the Balkanic methods and oppressive spirit which the Liberal Party displays in its administration of affairs in general and especially in the newly annexed provinces.

CITIZENS, Although the war caused a large number of unnecessary casualties, due to our lack of technical preparation, yet even now, ten years later, the condition of our army is still deplorable, in spite of the fact that it is our supreme defense in the face of dangers which are becoming more menacing every day.

The external situation of our country also reveals to us in a no less convincing manner the incapacity of the present regime. Eight years of an imperfect understanding of events, of the lack of foresight and of indecision, have brought Rumania into discredit and isolation.

Today Hungary, disarmed by the treaties, is able to arm and to agitate the question of treaty revision and of altering our frontier, without a word of protest or a single manly act in our behalf by our Government, so lacking is it in authority, dignity, and patriotism. Such a political regime, guilty of such serious iniquities, cannot continue a single day without endangering the very existence of our state and menacing the vital strength and resisting power of our people.

CITIZENS, In the political struggle which is developing today there stand face to face two forces: a despotic, predacious clique, on the one hand, and the Rumanian people in their entirety, on the other.

The National Peasant Party has shown in the elections, as well as in the large mass meetings that have recently been held in all parts of the country, that it represents the real will of the people and it takes upon itself the sacred mission of carrying to a successful conclusion the struggle for the emancipation of the people and the purification of the state.

CITIZENS, Inasmuch as our struggle is not an ordinary political combat but a real national crusade, you must all give it your aid and support for the sake of final victory.

Our national honor and the respect which we cherish for those who have gone before oblige us to work together for the immediate removal of the baneful liberal clique.

Contributors to This Issue

CALVIN B. HOOVER is professor of economics at Duke University, Durham, N. C.

JULIA N. BUDLONG, a resident of Portland, Oregon, recently wrote on the public utilities problem in that city for The Nation.

CHARLES FRANKLIN THWING is President Emeritus of Western Reserve University, Cleveland, Ohio.

JOHN GOULD FLETCHER is the author of "The Tree of Life," "Parables," "Branches of Adam," and other volumes of verse.

LAURA RIDING is an American poet.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN frequently reviews fiction for The Nation.

HAROLD KELLOCK is the author of "Houdini."

RICHARD MCKEON is in the department of philosophy at Columbia University.

ACROSS EUROPE TO RUSSIA
SPECIAL FALL 35 DAY TOUR
$375 and up
Easy Payments $25 down

7 Days in Moscow and Leningrad

Witness the Celebration of the NOVEMBER REVOLUTION

CUNARD S. S. MAURETANIA

Sailing October 17th

Via: London, Helsingfors, Copenhagen, Leningrad. Return: Moscow, Minsk, Warsaw, Berlin, Paris.

FREE VISAS INTO RUSSIA

WRITE FOR DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

AGTS. FOR OFFICIAL U.S.S.R. TRAVEL BUREAU
69 Fifth Ave., N. Y. ALGonquin 6900

$55 to $75 monthly

2 and 3 room apartments in Greenwich Village

RIVERVIEW STUDIOS

with every convenience and attraction. Completely equipped legal kitchens, steam heat, spacious roof garden overlooking the Hudson; wood-burning fireplaces; foyer halls allow individual privacy. In other words, they are amazing values at these rents.

Very convenient location—2 short blocks to Ninth Ave. "L" Express station, and Hudson Tubes. Four blocks from Seventh Ave. Subway.

Apartments now renting.

FRANCES SPENCER

61 Christopher Street

Spring 1970

Do You Really Know What Happens

WHEN YOU DIE?

HAVE YOU LOVED ONES WHO HAVE GONE BEYOND?

Do you know what Science has Actually Discovered of the Spiritual World?

Here is a book with a wonderful message for you because it tells what has REALLY been demonstrated concerning LIFE beyond "physical death."

"THE GREAT KNOWN"

By J. E. Richardson, TK (Harmonic Series)

A book of vital interest to YOU if you are seeking FACTS about the Life to Come—if you have loved ones who have passed beyond. 33 Chapters, including fascinating, up-to-date, reliable information on such matters as: WHEN DEATH BEGINS and ENDS—is it DEATH or SUSPENDED ANIMATION? SOUL and SEX in the Spiritual World; Psychic Effects of SUICIDE; Spiritual Communication; Spiritual Penalties; Spiritual Education; Spiritual Wars; Dreams and Prophecies; CREMATION; HELL and many other KNOWN and PROVEN FACTS. 384 pages; 5½ x 8¼ inches; cloth bound; gold die stamped.

Examine It Free

Mail Coupon; the book will be sent at once. Read it 5 days. If you find it vitally interesting and inspiring, send only $3. Otherwise return the book. Use Coupon RIGHT NOW.

Pioneer Press, Publishers, Dept. 22-W, Hollywood, Cal.

Please send me a copy of "THE GREAT KNOWN," by J. E. Richardson, TK, on approval. I agree to send $3 or return the book in 5 days.

Name .....

Address .....

City and State.....

RESTAURANT

The Russian Inn

wishes to see its old Friends
in its new home

COOL AND AIRY

23 W. 49th—N. Y. C.

Tel. JERsey 10443

EDUCATIONAL

OAK LANE Country Day School

New Residence Department for Boys
A large progressive country day school with trained boarding group under competent masters.

Address

WILLIAM B. CURRY, Oak Lane, Philadelphia Pa.

OPEN SHELF

A BOOKSHOP BROUGHT TO YOU

Wherever you are we offer intelligent, individualized service. Books sent anywhere in the United States post free. Send for particulars.

The Post Box Bookshop,
16 E. 4th St., New York.

Two or Three
THE FRENCH BOOKMAN
301 WEST 14TH ST. NEAR BROADWAY
French books and magazines exclusively, low prices.
Catalogue by request.

LANGUAGES

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN
75c. Short Course. Surprising results.
Per Lesson. Native Teachers.
PRIVATE SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
104 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK
Established 1898 Between 85th and 86th St.

CONVERSATIONAL

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN
Two or Three. Daily 4-6 P.M.
Experienced native teachers; rapid progress.
University Institute, 104 Lexington Ave. (80th)

PROPERTY FOR SALE

FOR SALE—In Adirondacks, 4 acres, 3 room camp.
Garage. Price $1,500; part cash. Over 100 other camps and cabins to pick from. Write for booklet, Dan Woodward, Hadley, N. Y.

FOR SALE—House and garage. Practically every desirable surrounding feature, especially schools.
This superb lot appears once. Business transacted. Have lowered price $1,000. Will make reduce to responsible party. Act before Sept. 1st.
S. C. 400 W. P. Blvd., Manhattan, N. Y.

SHARE APARTMENT

A BUSINESS girl desires to share her cozy downtown apartment with a congenial young lady.
Write Box 218 to The Nation.

FOR RENT

GREENWICH VILLAGE RENTING EXPERT— 1 to 5 rooms. Furnished or unfurnished. Studios, modern—refrigerator, parking, telephone, hardwood floors, heat, hot water, electricity. Convenient locations. RM 40. Le Grand Spring 1937.

FOR SALE

FOR SALE—Mauquing Three-Pounder bed and Bathing and spring. Very reasonable. Can be seen on appointment. Write Box 218 to The Nation.

S U M M E R

AN ADULT CAMP
OF DISTINCTION

...INVITES YOU FOR SEPTEMBER...

The most glorious time for a vacation.
Accommodations of the finest; superior cuisine; dietary laws; all sports; open throughout entire month of September.

SCOPUS in the Adirondacks
P. O. LAKE GEORGE
NEW YORK

Specially Reduced Rates for September

A new retreat
for a few campers
Robin Hood Lodge

on beautiful Echo Lake—in the Adirondacks—near Lake George.

Capacity—25

All camp activities

Rates: $27 per week

Address

JEAN POY
ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg, N. Y.
Tel. Warrensburg 106 F-1

Uncas Lodge, Uncasville, Conn.

Small rustic camp, limited to 16, situated on 160-acre farm, bordering twin lakes. Tennis, handball, basketball, swimming, boating, dancing to a fine orchestra. Golf within 10 minutes.

Delightful overnight sail over L. I. Sound, $4.44
Dietary laws observed. Food American style.
Phone Ambassador 4684 evenings, or write Lafayette 1071 4th St., Brooklyn, 9. Greenhouse, or direct to camp. Rates $25 per week.

CAMP EDEN Cold Spring on the Hudson, N.Y.

The Refuge from the Ordinary

Only 50 miles from New York. Boating,
Tennis, Basketball, Concerts, Discussion,
Bathing, Baseball, Ping Pong, Lectures,
Dancing groups, etc. Rates, $22 per week.

Write for particulars to manager

New York Office to E. 100th St., Lenox 1932

HELP WANTED

CLOTHING workers co-operative apartment seeks

SOCIAL DIRECTOR to conduct recreational work with children and educational program for adults. $800 a month. Apply by detailed letter or phone for personal appointment. Amalgamated Cooperative Apartments, 1944 Dickenson Ave., Bronx, N. Y.

RESIDENT English teacher wanted for the upper grades of the Home School. Knowledge of Yiddish essential. Term begins September. State experience and salary desired. Home School, R. P. D.
No. 4, Philadelphia, N. J.

TEACHERS seeking opportunity want groups 1 to 11 years. New York progressive private school, with excellent teaching experience. Positions require cultivated young women interested modern educational thought. Box 861, to The Nation.

CAMP TAMIMENT

FOR ADULTS

FOREST PARK, PA.

Every modern facility for outdoor sports. Sixteen Tennis Courts. Dancing. Safe, delightful bathing. Entertainment. Dramatics. Excellent food. Occasional lectures. Reasonable rates.

Write Forest Park, Pa. Tel. Stroudsburg 7112

BAILIN'S MAPLEDALE HOTEL

"THE HOTEL WITH THE CAMP SPIRIT"

A resort of distinction with all modern conveniences, set in a circle of majestic peaks,
1,750 feet above sea level.

All sports and aquatic activities. Elaborate evening programs. Capable social director. Liberal atmosphere. Excellent Jewish cuisine. Special tables for vegetarians and those in need of a diet.

RATES FROM $25 UP TO $40.

Special rates for September.

For booklet and particulars address

Bailin's Mapledale Hotel, Rescoe, Sullivan Co., N. Y.

AUTO TOUR

Five day tour over Labor Day to

NIAGARA FALLS

Over the picturesque Lockawanna and Sullivan trails via Shawangunk Water Gap, Pawnee Mountains, Saratoga, Elmira. Return via Syracuse, Seneca Springs, Albany and Storm King road. Day driving only; very congenial and capable driver. Cost
$95. Stern Auto Company, 100 Fifth Ave.
Call Longacre 2880 between 2 and 7 P. M.

POSITION WANTED

YOUNG writer, five years newspaper and editorial, four years college, and two months marital experience, seeks position which may eventually support two. Box 861, to The Nation.

VOCATIONAL SERVICE

GERTRUDE STEIN, INC., 16 E 41st St., N.Y.C.
Lexington 2686
Usual secretarial and social service positions. We are glad to hear from Nation readers who need workers or who are looking for positions.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1928

No. 3296

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.....	211
EDITORIALS:
Leo Tolstoi: 1828-1928.....	212
Those "Peace Pacts".....	214
Decency in Divorce.....	214
Vacations.....	215
The Exploited Indian.....	215
Viscount Haldane.....	216
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	217
TOLSTOI AS A NOVELIST. By John Galsworthy.....	218
AMERICANS WE LIKE—XV. CHARLES J. FINGER—LITERARY
ADVENTURER. By Charles Morrow Wilson.....	219
SKETCHES FROM CHILE. By H. E.....	221
THE NEWS FROM MEXICO. By Ernest Gruening.....	223
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	225
CORRESPONDENCE.....	226
BOOKS AND MUSIC:
Three Sonnets. By Merrill Moore.....	228
Mr. Underwood Reflects. By William MacDonald.....	228
Ten Neglected Centuries. By Clifton P. Fadiman.....	229
A Boy's Long Days. By Alice Beal Parsons.....	230
The Original Monroe Doctrine. By William Spence Robertson.....	230
The Idea of the State. By Lewis Rockow.....	231
Books in Brief.....	231
Music: Bayreuth—1928. By B. H. Haggin.....	233
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Kellogg Treaties Sanction War. By Edwin M. Borchard.....	234

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR

MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

IT IS SIGNIFICANT that the first anniversary of the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti was observed throughout the world on August 23 without any violence anywhere. These two men upon whom a complacent and prosperous society laid violent hands, preferring to put them to death without a fair trial rather than endanger—as it supposed—the safety of its economic system, have happily not left a trail of similar violence behind them. Their memory has been commemorated in peace and reason as they themselves would have wished. After great difficulty in obtaining a hall, the Sacco-Vanzetti sympathizers in Boston gathered to pay quiet and sincere homage to the dead Italians. In New York City there was an outdoor meeting at which a large guard of police had nothing to do, while the Debs Memorial Radio Station devoted its afternoon program to Sacco and Vanzetti. There were many other observances in this country and abroad in spite of the verdict of the Boston Herald a year ago: "The chapter is closed." Perhaps one chapter is closed, but another has been begun and many others will follow. May they all be as free from violence and unreason as the memorial meetings this year!

THE LIVELIEST INCIDENT in connection with the Sacco-Vanzetti observances was the conclusion reached by the Boston police that in the remarks which he made at the meeting in their city, Horace M. Kallen had been guilty of blasphemy according to the Massachusetts statute of 1640, the law under which Anthony Bimba was prosecuted. What stirred the religious sensibilities of the Boston police was Dr. Kallen's assertion that "if Sacco and Vanzetti were anarchists, so were Jesus Christ, Socrates," and others, a conclusion in which all reasoning persons would agree. But Boston police are sensitive plants, and the idea so shocked them that they sought and obtained a warrant for Dr. Kallen's arrest after he had departed from their city. Dr. Kallen, who is attached to the staff of the New School for Social Research in New York, was the star pupil in Harvard University of William James and later became his literary executor. The passion of pious Boston to burn him as a witch—possibly on a pyre in the middle of the Harvard Yard—should make even marble-hearted Massachusetts rock with laughter. The justice of a State which in the case of Sacco and Vanzetti showed itself as incompetent and blood-seeking is now revealed as uproariously ridiculous.

CHURCHGOERS WHO SO DISLIKE the new parson that they turn in dudgeon to the parson of a rival sect across the street, usually proclaim loudly that they have not deserted the faith of their fathers. Some of the political sectarians do not like the new parsons, but none of them admits that the parson makes the creed of the church. Nicholas Murray Butler has added to his denunciation of Hoover's doctrine a canonical indorsement of Al Smith's acceptance sermon, but he insists that he does so as a good Republican; ex-Senator Owen is barnstorming for Hoover in Oklahoma as, he says, the apostle of old-fashioned, pre-Tammany Democracy. Henry Curran, once the Republican candidate for mayor of New York City, comes out for Smith, but as a Republican. Meanwhile the staid New York Herald Tribune, still dripping Wet but staunch for the Grand Old Party, performs daily miracles of political gymnastics in attempting to prove that the best way to end prohibition is to vote for Mr. Hoover. The Hoover strategists of course count on party loyalty to outweigh the Wet-and-Dry issue in the East, and the Smith generals rely upon the South to remain faithful to the holy Democratic church even though its candidate repudiate every principle for which the Southern Democracy has ever stood. It is an amusing spectacle. It is also a healthy chapter in American political education. However much we differ on his chosen issues we pay our tribute of respect to every politician who dares to set principle above party loyalty and bolt.

NICE GIRLS CAN STAY at the New Bedford Y.W.C.A. but girls who get arrested on the picket-line in a strike are not nice girls. That is the interpretation of Christianity and law and order made by the executive committee of the New Bedford Y.W.C.A. which ejected Miss Sadie Reisch of the Women's Trade Union League and Miss Josephine Kaczor of the United Textile Workers because they were arrested by New Bedford police while leading picket-lines of strikers. The Y.W.C.A. officials prejudged the case of these girls who had committed no act of violence but who had been captured by the police in a general raid upon strike pickets who were peacefully walking on the street. Fortunately for the reputation of the Y.W.C.A. the action of the New Bedford officials is not approved by the national organization. In a letter to President William Green of the American Federation of Labor the National Industrial Committee of the Y.W.C.A. deplores the action of the New Bedford group. Also the papers of New Bedford have joined in a chorus of condemnation. Meanwhile the strike of 28,000 cotton-mill workers against a 10 per cent wage-cut goes on with sustained enthusiasm and courage. Few strikes in American labor history have been more remarkable. After nineteen weeks of fighting and starving, and after police have reduced the strikers' picket-lines to a mere shadow by frequent and arbitrary arrests, the mills are today almost as idle as when the strike began.

THE FATE OF BEN BESS, a colored man in the South Carolina State penitentiary, is still undecided. He was pardoned by Governor Richards about three months ago; shortly thereafter he was placed in prison again for "safe keeping." His pardon came, after he had served thirteen years of a thirty-year sentence, when the charge of criminally assaulting a white woman which had caused his conviction was withdrawn by the woman who had originally made it. Believing that she was on her death-bed, Mrs. Maude Collins signed an affidavit to that effect. But Mrs. Collins recovered, and the document which she had hoped would ease her conscience led instead to a threat of trial for perjury. She then issued an explanatory statement declaring that she had not understood (since she could neither read nor write) what she was signing in the confession affidavit. She had not intended, she said, to repudiate her original charge against Bess but had merely wanted to "forgive" him for what he had "done" to her. Governor Richards revoked his pardon on the ground that it had been obtained through fraud. Meanwhile, however, M. C. Townsend, a master in equity for the Richmond Circuit Court, has reviewed the evidence in the case and handed down a decision. He has ruled that "no fraud whatsoever was perpetrated against" Mrs. Collins and that in signing the affidavit "she, together with her son, had plenty of opportunity to acquaint themselves with the true facts set forth therein." Furthermore, it was found "that the statement it was only to forgive the accused was made after it was brought to her attention that probably she would be prosecuted for perjury." But Ben Bess is still in prison.

ASIGNAL VICTORY for free speech was scored by the Debs Radio Station when the Federal Radio Commission voted to extend its license beyond September 1. The victory belongs to the thousands of progressives in all parts of the United States who deluged the Radio Commission with protests when the license of Station WEVD was threatened. Perhaps the Radio Commission realized that the suppression of this non-profit-making progressive station at the height of the Presidential campaign would underscore the Socialist charge that power interests dominate the air. At any rate the commission was fair and courteous in handling the Debs-station case and it announced that the director of the station had pursued "a very satisfactory policy." Now that the station has won the right to exist, it is making a vigorous demand for better wave-length and time distribution. Its low wave-length now excludes it from many Manhattan receivers, and it has only one night a week to reach the labor audience at home. An ambitious educational program has been worked out for the fall and winter with a weekly forum on Sunday afternoons and lectures on Tuesday evenings. The program is excellent, but who will hear it? The Debs station, with nationally prominent educators and lecturers, must yield nearly all its most valuable time to commercial competitors who fill the air with trivial entertainment. We would like to see WEVD given a wave-length and time distribution with which it could make a thorough test of the radio as an instrument in workers' education. This might be accomplished by another deluge of letters addressed to the Federal Radio Commission, Washington, D. C.

AMONG THE NEWEST publications we welcome the New England Quarterly, published, curiously enough, in the city of Baltimore, which was once so glad to jail that New England champion of abolition, William Lloyd Garrison. But the town of publication is accidental. The spirit of the Quarterly is thoroughly that of an enlightened New England, whose life and letters, the cover announces, are to be the subject matter—not that Massachusetts which executed Sacco and Vanzetti and is as ready to lynch any heretic as its broadcloth mobs of the eighteen-forties were ready to hang Abolitionists. The board of editors, of which the notable Harvard historian, Samuel Eliot Morison, is the senior, with Lawrence S. Mayo as managing editor, gives promise that we shall have an historical magazine worthy of the name, and the first three issues affirm the promise. Not that we believe the editors will find their work easy, or desirable manuscripts too many. But the opportunity is there which we look to see well utilized. The July issue is distinguished by the delightful reminiscences of one Joel Shepard, who went to the Revolutionary War, and by an article Walt Whitman Looks at Boston, the city which compelled in 1882 the withdrawal from publication of "Leaves of Grass" as today it continues in the stupid and dirty business of suppressing other worth-while volumes.

CYNICAL AND ABLE, at times brilliant, George Harvey was. Yet neither in his conduct of the Harper's publishing company nor of the North American Review was he a success. True, his own editorials were amusing, biting, censorious, and often unusually well-informed, but when he laid down his pen the Review lapsed into a desuetude from which it is only beginning to emerge. As a politician Harvey earned more praise than he deserved. He was the first editor to bring forward Woodrow Wilson as a Presidential candidate and, until the episode with Henry Watterson which Wilson accepted as an effort to deliver him to his bounden enemy Big Business, Harvey was truly the Warwick of the Wilson preconvention campaign. But he cooled rapidly and later became one of Wilson's bitterest and most effective critics. His lack of principle became apparent enough later, when he joined forces with Warren Harding, the antithesis of Wilson in personality and in purposes. When the saintly Mr. Harding arrived in the White House, Colonel Harvey achieved the original aim of his Wilson days—he became American Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, where he interested and at times amused his British audiences but achieved none too much. He was plainly meant by nature to achieve far more than he did with cynicism's heavy hand always upon him.

Leo Tolstoi: 1828-1928

TOLSTOI'S fame in his closing days was best measured, perhaps, by the almost universal consternation aroused by the news of his disappearance from Yasnaya Polyana in November, 1910. The spectacle of this gigantic old man wandering alone over Russia in an endeavor to find God at last and to come to peace with himself could not fail to impress, even to terrify, any human being conscious of what had been going on in the world throughout the nineteenth century, and conscious too of what had gone on in the mind and soul of Count Tolstoi.

What went on there we are not so presumptuous as to say. No one knows precisely, even in this day when biographers are so ready to dissect the souls of famous men and publish the construction thereof. But that a tumult was there no one has ever doubted; and only mean minds refuse to respect that tumult, whatever they may conclude as to its justification or its significance. It was the agony of a man sick with civilization and exhausted by a lifelong attempt to reconcile the ideas of that civilization with the facts of his own nature. We now know, if we never guessed before, that Tolstoi was caught in such a struggle from the days of his youth when he first began to think and feel. The recently published "Diary" of his formative years reveals a young man beset with all the conflicts which he was to try to resolve during his many days of fame as author, land-owner, husband, and social philosopher. And the psychological portrait in Hugh I'Anson Fausset's book last spring, "Tolstoi: The Inner Drama," was convincing evidence of a certain major conflict always faced without ever being truly resolved.

Tolstoi was no player with paradoxes. He never said anything save through compulsion, and so he was not echoing the eighteenth-century doctrine of nature when he declared against all modern civilization. That is a pretty idea, and one which has furnished themes to thousands of poets, story-tellers, and sociologists; but it had no attractions for Tolstoi. Tolstoi, indeed, pulled back from his contemplation of nature—at least of the nature within himself—with the same horror and loathing that he came to feel for the morals of most men. When he renounced desire in the forms of sex and greed it was as if an element had turned against itself. That the renunciation was never wholly successful is a tribute to the power of nature, and perhaps it is the proof that Tolstoi was wrong. But that does not matter. Tolstoi wrong was vastly more impressive than other men right, just as the new Russia, right or wrong, is immeasurably more impressive than the comfortable nations which persist in calling her absurd. There is something about the Russian temperament which makes it go wrong—if it does go wrong—sublimely. Tolstoi's primitive Christianity is as different from our fundamentalism as Russia is from Rhode Island, or as any of his novels is from any of ours. Nowhere on earth today, says a distinguished American, is there an optimism so simple and so terrible as that of the new Russians. And nowhere during the hundred years since Tolstoi's birth has there been an artist so powerfully compelled as he.

To say that Tolstoi is the greatest novelist of these hundred years is to say something which cannot be proved in view of the many gulfs between him and such figures as Balzac, Flaubert, Zola, Proust, Dickens, Thackeray, Hardy, Bennett, Hawthorne, James, Dreiser, Mann, Nexo, Hamsun, and, in his own country, Dostoevski. But it may be said that no writer of narrative in any age was ever more convincing than the author of "The Cossacks," "Anna Karenina," "War and Peace," "The Death of Ivan Ilyitch," "The Kreutzer Sonata," "Twenty-three Tales"—yes, even "Resurrection," propagandist as it was. And it may be said of him with reference to the other novelists just named that his range includes many of theirs; he hugged their styles and universes to his bosom along with his own. It is customary to contrast him with his greatest contemporary, Dostoevski, and there are those worshipers of Dostoevski who cannot see in Tolstoi anything at all of the command over mystery which certainly distinguishes the author of "The Brothers Karamazov." Yet it is blindness not to see what Tolstoi accomplishes in this direction. It means nothing to call him a realist, at least if one intends by that term to denote that he was confined to an account of externals—whatever externals may be. A great novelist is much less concerned than the rest of us with the distinction between outside and inside since he is better aware of both. Tolstoi, as it happens, never spoke of anything except the things of human nature which can be seen and heard, yet it is doubtful if he was any the less successful in suggesting the depth of man's universe.

Maxim Gorki, visiting Tolstoi in his old age, noticed that his hands were like no others he had seen. They were creatures in themselves, with life and character and animal identity, so that when the aged prophet reached across the table to pick up a card it was as if, says Gorki, the hand felt the card to be alive—a bird there on the cloth waiting to be caught. That is the kind of artist he was. The world for him was living in every stick and hair, and his sense of this is communicated to the reader of his books by means much too subtle for analysis. He did not have to resort to devices for making his people or his situations real; they were real for him before he wrote a line, so that all he needed to do, apparently, was to proceed directly and very simply with the events at hand. So it would seem. There was art, of course, in his singling out the large ears of Alexei Alexandrovich for description in "Anna Karenina"; they are perhaps the chief means by which, as Mr. Galsworthy says elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, we are made to feel toward Anna's husband as she feels herself. But it was art of which he may have been unconscious. And it was art of such a sort that, being a perfect master of it himself, he could despise it when he saw it being striven after in the books of others.

"What is Art?," which repudiated virtually all the art of the world including his own, is outrageous—and mainly true. Tolstoi's discussion of emotion and its communication through music and painting and story is one of the few profound contributions ever made to aesthetic theory, whatever we may think of his specific judgments. But he was always profound, as he was always simple and—if you like—insane. There was never any man like him before, and we must not expect to have his like again.

Those "Peace Pacts"

THE Kellogg peace pacts have been signed at Paris by the United States, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the British dominions; and other nations will be permitted to ratify them at a later date. Upon the earnest insistence of Germany, it is reported, even Russia's signature will be accepted. Talking motion pictures have recorded every moment of the solemn ratification of this new "charter of peace"; and the world has been informed in extenso that war has been outlawed and a great forward step toward peace been made.

There is no doubt that these treaties are the product of a world-wide demand that the statesmen move to outlaw war. They have never been popular in the chancelleries; and it has been the people's voice for peace which has insisted that they be drafted and signed. But in the drafting, perhaps, something of the original ideal has been lost. Edwin M. Borchard, professor of international law at Yale and one of America's leading international jurists, analyzed the pact at the Williamstown Institute (his address is reprinted in our International Relations Section this week) and concluded that "It constitutes no renunciation or outlawry of war, but in fact and in law . . . the most solemn sanction of specific wars that has ever been given to the world. . . . No such broad claim of the right to make war has ever before been recognized." No one refuted Mr. Borchard's analysis of the technical legal effect of the treaties and their accompanying notes. Those who disagreed with him asserted, first, that the notes were not to be taken as seriously as the treaty itself—a strange quibble for those of us who would take the pledges of nations seriously; and, second, that whatever the legalistic meaning of the documents their psychological effect was to commit the world against war.

We believe in reading treaties before signing them. Mr. Borchard's analysis deserves the most careful attention. The United States Senate will shortly be faced with a most cruel dilemma. It will be called upon to ratify, or refuse to ratify, a treaty initiated and sponsored by our own Administration about which the hopes of the world for peace have clustered. A Belgian at Williamstown warned his hearers that Europe could not stand the shock of a rejection of the treaties by our Senate; it "would be water dropped on the mill of the Bolsheviks." But if disillusioned men cry out again that their statesmen have deceived them, whose will be the fault—those who point out the illusions dangled before the peoples or those who cynically prepared the pretty mirage?

The world has been led to believe that these treaties point the way toward peace. Despite the subtleties of the reservations and interpretations of their phrasing, they can still be made a force for peace. If the statesmen who preached peace at the birth of these pacts carry on with the logical consequence of their own words, and begin a real disarming, the world will be reassured. The test of the pudding is in the eating; if the statesmen believe in their pact the obstacles to disarmament are slight.

Unfortunately, there is more talk of an Anglo-French naval agreement than of disarmament, and there are more men under arms in Western Europe today than in 1913.

Decency in Divorce

AMERICAN divorce used to be considered a scandal; it has become an institution. It used to be considered a menace to the home; it may come to be looked upon as a bulwark of marriage. Once marriage was regarded as a sacrament in which the Deity played an important mystic role, and no amount of misery was held to justify dissolution of the superhuman bond. But with mysticism and magic out of the way, marriage appears as an arrangement in which two human beings join, eager to form a satisfactory, lasting partnership, but liable to make mistakes. And in such a common-sense light the institution of marriage seems to be most dangerously attacked by those who, insisting that people who have ceased to love each other should continue in joint misery, seek to make divorce difficult.

The idea of indissoluble union has reluctantly given way to the assumption that even the church should permit divorce upon proof of serious injury by one party to the other. A compromise has been effected, but the grounds for divorce are still in part based on the old idea of religious sanction. We say today: "Whom God has joined together let no man put asunder, unless one of this wedded pair commits adultery or other sexual crime, or is intolerably cruel, or, in some States, abandons the party of the second part for certain specified periods of time." The law limps along after social practice; and decent people, looking for divorce but shunning the grosser forms of collusion, travel to Paris or Mexico to find their freedom with a minimum of indecent exposure.

A valuable article in Harpers Magazine for July deserves wide reading, for it describes the American divorce situation and contrasts it with the present procedure in Scandinavia. There divorce by mutual consent on mere grounds of incompatibility is allowed after certain formalities and the lapse of a reasonable period of time for reflection and reconsideration; and divorce upon petition of one party is also granted after a slightly longer delay.* The author of the article, Stephen Ewing, examines the effects of this overthrow of the orthodox dogma regarding marriage, and finds that no alarming changes have occurred in the home life of Norway, Sweden, or Denmark. Procedure has merely been made to coincide with current usage and the desires of the people. What has resulted is a growth of tolerance and reason in divorce; at least the more violent outcroppings of hate and jealousy can find no legal expression. The state concerns itself with the proper registration of marriage and divorce; it sees to it that homes are not broken hastily or impulsively; it guards the future of the children. But it does not insist that before a divorce is granted one party must violently attack the character of the other.

America is aware—thanks to Judge Lindsey and other commentators—of the discrepancies in our American practice and theory. We know that our divorce laws encourage—in effect, necessitate—the crime of collusion. But Americans tend to prefer bootlegging to laws that fit the facts. We keep our piety and our practice in separate compartments, and do lip-service to one while we indulge the other like a vice.

* The provisions of the reformed Scandinavian divorce laws appeared in The Nation for April 24, 1920.

It would be useful if a more extended study could be made of the effects of the Scandinavian divorce and marriage laws. The Russian laws are equally liberal, but they form a part of a system of social values quite distinct from our own. The Scandinavians are closer to the Americans in many respects than any other people in Europe. They are Protestants and Nordics; they have a strong penchant for regulation and reform; they shun the "Latin" attitude toward sex and marriage; their women are independent. If they face the facts of their national life with more realism and courage than we, at least their ways are not alien. We could study them as we study ourselves. By such study we might throw light into some of the darkest places in our national life; and none is darker than the processes of American divorce.

Vacations

A VISITOR from Mars arriving in midsummer would see headlines in the New York papers: "Three Die in Heat," "Woman Killed in Crush by Crowds Fleeing from City Heat Wave." But he would be told that the "most important" people were out of town on their vacations.

Our philosophy of vacations is like our philosophy of work. It is not a reasoned theory so much as a grotesque collection of habits based upon class power and perpetuated by inertia. When a subway guard getting twenty-four dollars a week for forty-eight hours of work fifty-two weeks a year is allowed one week's vacation, while a stockholder of the transit company spends the summer in Quebec, the arrangement excites no comment. As Bernard Shaw pointed out long ago, it takes a fresh eye and an alert mind to detect the established fraud in economic practices.

The ordinary man is insensible to the fraud just as he is insensible to the taste of water, which, being constantly in contact with his mucous membrane, seems to have no taste at all. The villainous moral conditions on which our social system is based are necessarily in constant contact with our moral mucous membrane, and so we lose our sense of their omnipresent meanness and dishonor.

The accepted practice of our industrial system is to give brief vacations or no vacations to manual workers, longer vacations to clerical workers, and still longer to executives, owners, and professionals. The Department of Labor of the State of New York discovered by investigating 1,500 factories that 91 per cent of the plants gave vacations to their office workers, 68 per cent to their foremen, and only 18 per cent to their production workers. The lucky 18 per cent of production workers usually received one week's vacation, while the clerical workers received two.

Government agencies and large corporations tend to be more generous in their vacation policies for manual workers than small concerns. Even the scrubwomen hired by the State of New York get a full month's vacation with pay. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has worked out in its home office a plan for vacations based upon length of service which is more or less typical of many large corporations. The company gives two weeks for clerical workers the first year of service, fifteen days after five years' service, seventeen days after ten years' service, and twenty days after fifteen years' service. But the manual workers of this company, as of many others, are given only a single week of vacation after many years of service.

Behind this corporate and community practice in granting vacations is a vaguely defined philosophy. Men and women who work with their brains are sensitive, fine-strung, in constant need of replenishing burned-out energy; men and women who work primarily with their hands are stolid, ox-like, in need of a thick beefsteak and a sound sleep to prepare them adequately for the next day's work.

This traditional theory of the effects of fatigue on industrial classes has no more truth in it than the superstitions once held by historians concerning the fine blood and biological gentility of the aristocracy. Everyone who works needs a vacation, and the need is greatest among those who work the hardest. A ditch-digger gets tired. Fatigue will destroy his mind and body just as surely as it will destroy the mind and body of a bank president. True, the bank president needs a somewhat more alert mind for examining mortgages, shaking hands cordially, and remembering first names. But this need of extra alertness in the professional and business classes is already provided for by shorter hours of labor. When August comes, the bank president takes a vacation and the ditch-digger does not, because the bank president has the power to take it and the ditch-digger has not.

That is all there is to our theory of vacations. That and habit. For those who have the power to take vacations there are special philosophies and diversions ranging all the way from deep breathing to the perusal of Thoreau. For the manual workers who have not the power to win this extra leisure, there are Sundays—and Coney Island.

The Exploited Indian

THERE are no wild statements or harsh and bitter words in the 847 pages of the latest study* of the Indian in the United States. One is impressed, in fact, by the studied moderation of its language, a moderation maintained in the face of facts and conditions that point to a most wanton neglect, if not downright betrayal, of the American Indian on the part of our government and the Indian Bureau. Yet it would be difficult, were one ever so gifted, to paint a more depressing and appalling picture than this report gives. There are pages that one reads and then rereads with amazement, saying, all the while, surely this cannot be true today in the United States. In this report the Indian is stripped of all the romantic lore and hocus-pocus that the movies like to show, his gaudy beads, gay headdress, and startling war dances. What remains is a race of downtrodden men whose picturesque rituals and culture have been shattered by our missionaries and men of business, who have been left helpless and destitute without a fair opportunity to adapt themselves to the white man's world.

It is in the fields of education and health that the greatest need for immediate attention appears. In the boarding schools, for example, an attempt has been made to feed the children at an average cost of eleven cents a day for each child. And although this meager allowance is supplemented somewhat by supplies from the school farms, milk and fresh, green vegetables are virtually lacking from the diet. With more than 27,000 children subjected to these dietary deficiencies the resulting prevalence of disease, especially trachoma and tuberculosis, is easily understandable. The schooling itself is of a most backward character, administered by inferior and incompetent teachers. This is not because the young Indians are incapable of learning, since intelligence tests of various sorts have demonstrated the contrary, but simply because the government has failed to provide sufficient facilities. Schools with a capacity for only 850 have been compelled regularly to enrol a thousand or more, even, the report says, "if there was no place to put them." Actual school work takes up only half the day, the other half being consumed in work to help support the school. The conditions are such that

* The Problem of Indian Administration. By the Institute for Government Research. Johns Hopkins Press. $5.

In nearly every boarding school one will find children of ten, eleven, and twelve spending four hours a day in more or less heavy industrial work. . . . The work is bad for children of this age, especially children not physically well-nourished; and most of it is in no sense educational.

Then there is evidence that the Indian schoolboys are most heartlessly exploited during their summer vacations. One group of 29 Navajo boys returned to school after 63 days in the Colorado beet-fields "with average net earnings of $5.62, or less than nine cents a day." Only two of this group were over 14; more than half were 11 or 12. No wonder that many of these young Indians when they have finished their "schooling" are in subnormal health, tubercular or deformed, and manifest an intense dislike for farming, if not for all routine labor.

Health administration among the Indians is in a similarly deplorable state. Compared with the general population their mortality rate, both for infants and as a group, is very high. In Arizona the Indian tuberculosis death-rate is seventeen times greater than the general rate for the whole country, while in the Menominee tribe of Wisconsin it is 40 1/3 times the tuberculous death-rate of Wisconsin as a whole. Little, however, is done about this. Sanitariums are inadequate and ill-equipped. Not one, according to the report, meets the minimum requirements of the American Sanitarium Association, and "not a single institution maintains a complete case record of its patients." Again one reads: "At the present time no hospital has an X-ray unit. In some few cases one may find a microscope, but ordinarily their appearance indicates infrequent use." The conditions of poor health are due chiefly to the low standard of living among the great majority of the Indians. Because of their extreme poverty they must live on a cheap diet of ill-cooked starches and meat instead of one rich in milk, green vegetables, and fruit—which go far in combating tuberculosis and trachoma.

In addition to the sections on health and education, the report covers with extraordinary thoroughness the economic, social, and legal status of the Indian and presents a program of intelligent reform. Most important, perhaps, is its recommendation that Congress appropriate "at the earliest possible moment $1,000,000 to be immediately available to improve the quantity, quality, and variety of diet available for Indian children in boarding schools." Yet this would be hardly a gesture in the direction in which Congress should move to repay the Indians for the inhuman conditions that have been forced upon them. And whatever the excuse of the Indian Bureau may be for the present situation it can never again be one of ignorance of the facts.

Haldane

VISCOUNT HALDANE may have died a disappointed man, yet his death provoked a chorus of appreciation such as comes to few men in English public life. Tory, Liberal, and Laborite joined to do him honor; and Lloyd George declared that he had been "treated with the basest ingratitude." Lloyd George spoke with authority; if he had spoken in that tone in 1915 the last decade of Haldane's life might have been happier.

Haldane was one of those men of many talents who have enriched the history of England. He was a lawyer by profession, a philosopher by preference, a statesman by instinct. His first published work was a life of Adam Smith; later he translated Schopenhauer; but he was best known in philosophic circles as an Hegelian metaphysician. Such was the man whom Campbell-Bannerman called to take charge of the War Office in 1905. Almost his first act as Britain's War Minister—strange enough in view of subsequent history—was to go to Berlin, where, as guest of General von Einem, he settled down to study at its headquarters the organization of the Prussian army! He returned to reorganize the British army, replacing the separate militia and volunteer forces by the single territorial force which did such effective service at the outbreak of the World War.

When, early in 1912, following the storms which had brought Europe to the verge of war, the British Cabinet and public looked hopefully across the North Sea and decided to try out the ground for a rapprochement with Germany, Haldane was selected for the task. Sir Edward Grey, the Foreign Minister, and Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, both recognized that in these conversations on naval programs and foreign policy the philosophic chancery lawyer was the outstanding man. The Germans, accustomed to specialists, could not understand the selection; but the Kaiser reassured the astounded Tirpitz, saying, "We must not forget what an amazing adaptability the Anglo-Saxons have, which fits them for occupying positions which have no relation to their previous life and training." Haldane was fitted indeed, but the time was not ripe. Tirpitz insisted upon his navy bill in Germany, and Sir Edward Grey, always suspicious of the Germans, was determined to stand by his embryonic alliance with France and Russia. Haldane made progress, but with men like Tirpitz and Winston Churchill stirring up the nationalist lions in the two countries no solution could be reached.

When the war broke out Haldane was Lord Chancellor of England. The expeditionary force and the territorial army which he had organized performed their task; but he received scant gratitude for his services. Petty jingoes recalled that German philosophy was his "spiritual home" and bayed so bitterly that Asquith felt forced to drop Haldane out of the Coalition Ministry of 1915. Haldane calmly retired to write "The Reign of Relativity," surely a fruitful field of study in war time, and returned to political life only for a brief period when the old Liberal served as Lord Chancellor in Ramsay MacDonald's Labor Cabinet. The participation of this peer who had ranked as one of the elder statesmen of the Liberal Party did much to give the struggling MacDonald Ministry prestige in England. He was one of the few men who held high office before the war who were able to build bridges into the future.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

EARLY in the campaign Life announced that it would feature Will Rogers as a potential President since he would be a bunkless candidate. By now I think that Mr. Rogers might as well retire. Of course, it has not been a fight wholly without pose and pretense, but at least the issues have been drawn with far more frankness than anybody had reason to expect. Both Smith and Hoover have been more candid than their platforms. Each has gone up stream against the advice of certain supposedly shrewd tacticians.

The greater boldness, I believe, lies with Governor Smith. There was a time when he seemed very likely to run upon a dry plank and a wink. Certainly this was the plan suggested to him by politicians. They argued that since everybody knew that Smith was Wet he had best talk only in such a way as to refrain from alienating the Dry and Democratic South. This advice the Governor threw overboard. Cynics may say, if they please, that he took another course because he is the most accomplished politician of them all. Possibly a policy of silence on the prohibition issue would have been ruinous to Smith's chances such as they are. Still, there is no getting round the fact that he has been frank and honest in his utterances, and if this proceeds from enlightened self-interest that too would seem encouraging. It may be that at last political America is coming of age.

Herbert Clark Hoover's contribution to free speech from the platform has been slighter, but even so he has been rather less vague than is the custom. In his acceptance address he did manage to convince everybody but the New York Herald Tribune that he is Bone Dry. In taking such a stand Hoover must receive some credit for his courage. He, too, had political advisers who suggested a pussy-footing course. It was said that since the Dry vote was his in any case he might wisely hold out some small crumbs of comfort to the Wet voters in the East. On this issue, at least, Hoover seems to have spoken from conviction rather than expediency.

Not all the development away from bunk depends entirely on the personality of the two men who are running for office. At last the radio has begun to justify itself. Even those who weary of "pale hands" and "I can't give you anything but love, baby" must admit that broadcasting has brought about a better era in politics. No longer need the candidates campaign in every State. The speech from the back platform of the train has almost gone, and we youngsters have an excellent chance to find it wholly vanished in the days to come.

Herbert Hoover has already refused to kiss a baby for publication and Al Smith would not pose for the photographers in the act of laying bricks. Never again will America descend to the vulgar depths of Calvin Coolidge and the sap bucket and the same gentleman in cowboy pants. A candidate no longer needs to indulge in such monkeyshines. Through the microphone he may reach millions where in other days a few meager thousands were all that could be brought within the sound of his voice on any one occasion. It is rather better that candidates should be heard and not seen.

To be sure, new style politics may rob Al Smith of some few advantages. Hoover is among the poorest of platform speakers, but his voice is not bad at all over the radio. However, it seems to me that even in this medium not all of the dramatic and passionate quality of Governor Smith's voice is lost.

Gestures, of course, have a diminished value. There is no point in swinging your arms for the sake of an invisible audience though I have no doubt that many speakers still indulge in this luxury even before the microphone. Since I am, myself, no veteran on the air, I invariably pound one hand against the other and, also, make faces indicating earnestness though there are none to see. In my own case I have had good reason to doubt whether there were many to hear, either, and so it was not altogether foolish to put on the speech with lugs meant to satisfy myself and no others.

In time gestures will disappear from the equipment of all public speakers, and I think that the whole quality of speeches will be vastly affected by this change. Pin a statesman's arms to his side and he will be much less likely to point with pride. Fewer will make the rhetorical flight from the rockbound coast of Maine to California's sunny shore. These phrases were seldom uttered for their own sake but were employed chiefly to give the orator some setting-up exercise to open up his lungs. The flag will be waved in future just a little less.

People sitting in small groups in their own homes avoid the contagion of audience psychology. The heated utterance which may go well in a crowded hall is likely to fall flat when it is presented more casually to a man in his own arm-chair equipped with pipe and slippers. Nor can the statesman indulge in old-fashioned introductions. He must get to his point with some celerity. Walking out on an orator has become delightfully simple. Henceforth the speaker of the evening must bear in mind that it is up to him to be at least as interesting as the jazz band just two notches away upon the dial. Speeches will be better, shorter, franker, louder, and funnier.

The familiar charge that the two major parties are identical seems to me less true than usual. Although Al Smith deserves to qualify as a progressive he is not entitled to the vote of any orthodox Socialist. The problem of liberals who have on many occasions voted the Socialist ticket is more difficult. As one of that number I expect to support Smith. This is frankly an opportunist vote. The argument that Norman Thomas has no chance to be elected does not influence me much. As a matter of fact a victory for Smith would come as a sensational surprise. But it is important that Smith should make a showing. If he is badly beaten we shall all find ourselves in the hands of the Anti-Saloon League. That issue is far broader than prohibition itself. It does not seem to me absurd to argue that the crowd behind Hoover actually contemplates a return to old-fashioned Puritanism. Such a world is so acutely distressing to me that for the moment some of the larger economic issues fail to command my enthusiasm. The choice lies between Smith and Sahara. And I'm for Smith.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Tolstoi as a Novelist

By JOHN GALSWORTHY

TOLSTOI is a fascinating puzzle. So singular an instance of artist and reformer rolled into one frame is not, I think, elsewhere to be found. The preacher in him, who took such charge of his later years, was already casting a shadow over the artist-writer of "Anna Karenina." There is even an indication of the moralist in the last part of that tremendous novel "War and Peace." About his work, in fact, is an ever-present sense of spiritual duality. It is a battlefield on which we watch the ebb and flow of unending conflict, the throb and stress of a gigantic disharmony. Explanation of this mysterious duality must be left to the doctors, now that our personalities are controlled by our glands, so that if we have plenty of pituitary we are artists, and too little adrenal—is it?—moralists.

In choosing a single novel to label with those words so dear to the confectioners of symposiums, "the greatest ever written," I would select "War and Peace." In it Tolstoi rides two themes, like a circus rider on his two piebald horses, and by a miracle reaches the stable door still mounted and still whole. The secret of his triumph lies in the sheer interest with which his creative energy has invested every passage. The book is six times as long as an ordinary novel, but it never flags, never wearies the reader; and the ground—of human interest and historical event, of social life and national life—covered in it is prodigious. A little, but not much, behind that masterwork comes "Anna Karenina." Also of stupendous length, this novel contains, in the old prince, in his daughter Kitty, in Stepan Arkadyevich, Vronsky, Levin, and Anna herself, six of Tolstoi's most striking characters. He never drew a better portrait than that of Stepan Arkadyevich—the perfect Russian man of the world; the writer of this preface has known the very spit of him. The opening chapters, describing him at an unkind moment in his fortunes, are inimitable. As for the portrait of Anna's husband, Alexey Alexandrovich—it inspires in us the feelings that he must have inspired in Anna. The early parts of this great novel are the best, for I have never been convinced that Anna, in the circumstances shown, would have committed suicide. It is as if Tolstoi had drawn her for us with such color and solidity in the beginning that we cannot believe she is not in the end dismissed by him rather than by herself. Anna, in fact, is a warm pulsating person, with too much vitality to go out as she did. The finish strikes one as voulu, as if the creator had turned against his creature; and one forms the opinion that Tolstoi started on this book with the free hand of an unlimited sympathy and understanding, but during the years that passed before he finished it became subtly changed in his outlook over life, and ended in fact a preacher who had set out an artist. It is, however, no uncommon flaw in writers to misjudge the vitality of their own creations. An illustration of the same defect is the suicide of Paula in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray." Ladies with her sort of past have too much vitality to put a period to themselves, except in plays and novels. With this reservation, "Anna Karenina" is a great study of Russian character and a great picture of Russian society—a picture that held good, with minor variations, up to the war.

Tolstoi's method in this novel, as in all his work, is cumulative—the method of an infinity of facts and pictorial detail; the opposite of Turgenev's, who relied on selection and concentration, on atmosphere and poetic balance. Tolstoi fills in all the spaces, and leaves little to the imagination; but with such vigor, such freshness that it is all interesting. His style, in the narrow sense, is by no means remarkable. All his work bears the impress of a mind more concerned with the thing said than with the way to say it. But if one may add to interminable definitions: "Style is the power in a writer to remove all barriers between himself and his reader—the triumph of style is the creation of intimacy," then, though such a definition will put many out of court, it will leave Tolstoi a stylist; for no author, in his story-telling, produces a more intimate feeling of actual life. He is free, in fact, from the literary self-consciousness which so often spoils the work of polished writers. Tolstoi was carried away by his impulses, whether creative or reformative. He never stood on the shores of streams, tying first one foot and then the other—that pet vice of modern art. To have life and meaning art must emanate from one possessed by his theme. The rest of art is just exercise in technique, which helps artists to render the greater impulses when—too seldom—they come. As with the painter who spends half his life agonizing over what he ought to be—post-impressionist, cubist, futurist, expressionist, Dadaist, Paulo-Post-Dadaist (or whatever they are by now)—who is ever developing a new and wonderful technique and changing his aesthetic outlook, and whose work, like his mood, is self-conscious and tentative, so with the writer. Only when a theme seizes on him is all doubt about expression resolved and a masterwork produced.

The prime characteristic of Tolstoi as a novelist was certainly his unflinching sincerity, his resolute exposition of what seemed to him the truth at the moment. Remembering how he swung between the artist and the moralist, we have in that trait at once his strength and his weakness. Frankly loyal, true to the vision and mood of the moment, he had a force that philosophic reflection lacks, together with its corollary—deficient balance. His native force is proved by the simple fact that, taking up again one of his stories after the lapse of many years, one will remember almost every paragraph. Dickens and Dumas are perhaps the only other writers who compare with him in this respect.

The character of Levin is undoubtedly a Selbst-Porträt,

Count Lyov Nikolaievich Tolstoi was born in Russia on September 9, 1828. He died in 1910. In connection with the centennial of his birth the Oxford University Press is publishing this year a new edition of his writings, translated by Louise and Aylmer Maude. This article is the introduction to "Anna Karenina."

or at least a study of the side of Tolstoi's own nature which was preoccupying him at that period. The chapters describing Levin in the country are very clearly a rendering of his own efforts and feelings, just when he was beginning to be profoundly disturbed about the meaning of life and to develop his "peasant" philosophy of existence. And in this part of the novel we again have a feeling of earnest message at the back of portraiture. The whole of Tolstoi's writing life, indeed, after this novel, is very much of an effort to prove that what he himself felt and saw was what the average man could feel and see. And in all this long attempt we are conscious of the distortion which comes when an artist and thinker tries to put himself into the skin of the normal man, or rather, tries to put the normal man into his own skin. A useful illustration of such distortion occurs in one of Conrad's early stories, "The Return," where a notably matter-of-fact English husband agonizes over his wife's departure, in Slavonic fashion, during many long and intricate pages. In the light shed by history and more recent analysts we must be permitted to doubt whether Tolstoi really understood the Russian peasant, whom he elevated into a sort of arbiter of life and art. Perhaps he understood them as well as an aristocrat could; but he is not so close to the soul and body of Russia as Chekhov, who came of the people and knew them from inside. In any case, the Russia of Tolstoi's great novels, "War and Peace" and "Anna Karenina," is a Russia of the past, perhaps only the crust of that Russia of the past—now split and crumbled beyond repair. How fortunate we are, then, to have two such supreme pictures of the vanished fabric!

Americans We Like

Charles J. Finger—Literary Adventurer

By CHARLES MORROW WILSON

FOR the benefit of those who have come to believe that romance among modern-day romancers is dead it is worth

The Fifteenth in a Series of Personality Portraits believes. He gives with unfenced generosity.

reporting that at least one free spirit remains—Charles J. Finger, writer of adventure stories and adventurer in his own right. This Englishman, who has been by turns music-master, sheep-herder, sailor, gold-hunter, cowhand, boiler-maker, auditor, anarchist, railroader and railroad executive, is now become a country squire, in Arkansas, where from his office in a bramble-grown hollow out in the back hills he writes books and edits his paper, All's Well.

Charles J. Finger is a picturesque person. His head is large, his hair gray and fluffy; he is five feet seven tall, broad-chested, well-muscled, a strongly built specimen of man. His voice is deep, he speaks with a broad English accent, and his gait is that of a sailor. His appetite is hearty and dependable, and he is a keen judge of teas, roast beef, home-baked bread, ham, and cheese. He is a man of violent likes and dislikes. He chooses friends and enemies with precision and pleasure. To in-betweens he pays the minimum of attention. Astonishing contrasts are to be noticed among his closest circle of friends—army officers, outlaws, editors, policemen, artists, dentists, rangers, writers. He enjoys to the fullest poetry and prize-fights, books and ball games, wine and song. His attitude toward youth is one of optimism and tolerance.

In philosophy Finger tends toward complacent pantheism. Although he is now in his late fifties, age and death appear to play a small part in his thoughts, and he is given neither to spasmodic depressions nor unseasonable hilarity. He is essentially a child, and the vagaries of childhood—gnomes of rebellion and fantasies of delight—are easily discernible in his way of living. He decorates his house with a stunning display of flags; he objects violently to taking medicine or to staying in bed on days when he is ailing; he delights in buying trinkets; in a crowd he is likely to be the general entertainer, solicited or not; he is eternally devising whimsical make-

The son of an altogether conventional English manufacturer, he passed his boyhood in a proper state of complacency, attended well-supervised private schools in London, wore black velvet pants and embroidered blouses, played jolly little games with adjacent nice little boys, and studied music in Germany and at King's College. Then business reverses came upon his father and young Charles, by that time in his early twenties and a devoted Fabian, his hair glistening black and grown long, set out as a tramp sailor to see the world. He tells of travel in out-of-the-way places—the Sahara, Tierra del Fuego, the Andes, Patagonia, South Africa, the Falkland Islands. South America saw much of him. He landed first in Chile, where he joined the Chilean army, but after three days deserted and in the company of several other young men of high hopes and modest means went forth to pan gold along the Chilean coast. This venture failed; there was no gold to speak of and the panners grew tired of panning. The party disbanded, and for a time Charles Finger acted as a guide for the late-Victorian tourists who desired to see with safety the wilds of South America. By turns he worked as laborer and ranch-hand and became a wandering minstrel offering entertainments in the mellow atmosphere of South American saloons with his God-given voice and a self-evolved accordion—which he still plays. He was hired to guide the Franco-Russian Ornithological Expedition of 1893 across Tierra del Fuego. This he did, evidently in a manner altogether satisfactory, for in the journal of that expedition one may find pictures and high praise of the guide.

Then he went in for gold hunting and guerrilla warfare in Tierra del Fuego. It happened that one of South America's most famous frontiersmen, Julio Popper, a misplaced Austrian nobleman, had been granted exclusive gold rights in Argentine Tierra del Fuego by the government of Argentina. Popper forthwith hired a rough and ready guard, resurveyed the boundary between Chilean and Argentine Tierra del Fuego, and issued a proclamation to the effect that any foreigner found poaching on Argentine gold holdings would be shot and his belongings confiscated. Finger, then a Chilean, having found gold-hunting along the stream-beds of the Chilean province unprofitable, proceeded to invade Popper's dubious concession and was discovered by a posse of Popper's vigilantes. Having first captured his horse and equipment, they proceeded to open fire on him.

But either through the benevolence of fate or the poor marksmanship of the patrol, young Finger escaped. A few weeks later he met Popper in a boliche, wine shop, in Buenos Aires. Popper, well in his cups, announced to the assembled customers his intention of favoring them with a violin solo. Finger volunteered to provide a piano accompaniment. So they played and played again, Popper becoming more and more mellow as the evening made progress. When leaving time came he invited his newly acquired accompanist to ride with him to his quarters. He sprang into the saddle, spurred his splendid horse, and, looking pityingly at Finger's less pretentious mount, asked if he expected to keep pace on such a pathetic nag. On being answered in the affirmative, Popper laughed uproariously, and suggested that they exchange horses and run a race. This they did, but young Finger, turning mirth to practical ends, rode away into the night, leaving his challenger the loser in an unanticipated horse trade.

The two men met a second time in a Buenos Aires saloon, shook hands, drank together, and agreed that ability to stand a few hearty jokes constitutes the true test of good-fellowship. Together they went upstairs into a ballroom. Here Popper, defying even the simplest rules of Argentine etiquette, stepped up to an army officer who was dancing with his fiancée, banged him on the back, and before the preoccupied captain could protest danced away with his girl. The Argentine captain waited until the dance was finished, bowed to Finger, grasped Popper's hand warmly, and suggested that the three of them step outside and smoke.

Outside, Popper and the captain took swords, and, with Finger as witness, fought a duel in the moonlight. Both fenced brilliantly for a time; then Popper's sword went wild and the captain ran him through the body. And Popper, romantic master of the Argentine frontier, dropped his sword, shook hands with his opponent and the witness, laughed, and died.

After visiting England for a time Finger set forth again, made a port call at Houston, Texas, and attended the Dallas County Fair. When it was over he found himself with hazy senses and empty pockets, confronting the vastness of the State of Texas. Taking to the open road he landed a job as sheep-herder for a rancher near Knickerbocker. He went from one job to another, finally in Ohio he took to railroading, rising through the ranks until he became general manager of a group of small lines.

In 1919, then at the age of fifty, Charles Finger decided that the time had come to settle on a career.

"I rather wanted to deal in horses or mules," he says, "but, on the other hand, I wanted to write." By a compromise of fate he became an editor. He picked up the fallen torch of Reedy's Mirror in St. Louis, and for several months labored manfully to save the life of that interesting journal. But to no avail, and in the summer of the following year (1920) Charles J. Finger with his family arrived in north-west Arkansas, settled on an abandoned farm three miles from Fayetteville, and made ready for literature.

The citizenry of Fayetteville was garrulously astonished at the coming of a Northern writing man; but when this Northerner began, amiably enough, to write in plain terms what he thought of the countryside about him astonishment turned to disdain. There were dark mutterings, damning letters from University of Arkansas faculty members, and editorials of condemnation in the local newspaper. But this mudslinger from the North, discovering that a soft, warm Southern town can be the hardest and iciest settlement possible, stood his ground, fenced his farm, built a modest country house, which he calls Gayeta Lodge, and settled to writing. He produced nickel bluebooks for fifty dollars each and only that, turned many of his own experiences into tales of adventure, revamped Nick Carter yarns, wrote informal essays and serious stories. And it was not long before the local press and public began to take pride in their distinguished critic.

Next he launched All's Well, a personal journal. The first edition of thirty-five copies he carried home in his overcoat pocket, mailed them from his dining-table, and marveled at the might of type and circulation. All's Well has survived, in a state of rare independence, non-endowed, non-commercial, easy-going. Meanwhile various other magazines began to ask for contributions, and after two years his first book, "In Lawless Lands," a collection of adventure stories, was published. "Highwaymen" and "Bush-rangers" followed, and the publication of "Tales from Silverland," a collection of folk stories for children, clearly demonstrated its author's desire to break away from the exclusive production of smashing romances of strong and ready frontiersmen.

Charles Finger writes persistently and rapidly. Six of his books appeared almost simultaneously last year: "Frontier Ballads," "The Spreading Stain," "Tales Worth Telling," "Life of David Livingstone," "An Ozark Fantasia," and "Romantic Rascals." Besides all these, he has been writing prolifically for periodicals. He declares that his best work remains yet to be done, that he proposes doing it, and that, indeed, he is about to do it now. The fact that he is nearing sixty in no way diminishes his enthusiasm.

He travels a great deal, leaves unexpectedly for distant places, and upon his return writes all the harder in order to recoup his finances. He has amended in various ways his philosophy of the simple life. He has substituted a Ford automobile for his horse and buggy, and whereas, formerly, he assembled his family from neighboring hill-sides by firing the household shotgun, now he rings a bell swung high in the barn loft. He has given up farming in the Ozarks as financially impossible, and is converting his farm into a model country estate with rolling heaths, strolling sheep, and a sweep of open sky—"like old England." He dines handsomely, drinks and smokes moderately, and entertains lavishly. Much of his time he spends among young children, leading them in games, telling yarns, true and otherwise. He devises indoor theater, plays strange contradictions on the piano, sings frontier ballads in a lusty orotund bass, plays flute solos, and squeezes mournful melodies out of his accordion. Recently he has acquired a bagpipe.

Finger is a man of great energy, high hopes, boundless gusto, and a capacity for sudden and astonishing changes. From a wandering adventurer he has become a jovial and benevolent country squire, and I predict that his magazine and his future novels will reflect this metamorphosis. So far the bulk of his writing has been essentially a sloshing over of the magnificent romance of his life. Interesting and altogether characteristic, it seems to me, are these concluding lines from the introduction to "Romantic Rascals":

It would be a diverting thing to write a complete history of rascality, but the task would be almost like writing a history of the human race if anything like completeness were aimed at. Yet I think that I shall make an attempt some day, even if my contribution to the whole turns out to be nothing more than an autobiographical novel.

Sketches from Chile

By H. E.

The Carabineros

THE carabineros are good fellows. With the whole nitrate region under martial law and supposedly dry, they did not enforce prohibition in the American club. They used to come into the bar-room in the afternoon and shake us for drinks and tell us of the day's liquor raids in Calama and Punta de Rieles.

The captain looked like a laughing youth of twenty-three. He was the youngest military man of his rank in Chile. Technically a body of state police, the carabineros are a purely military organization.

Before being sent to Chuquicamata, the captain had been condemned to death for his activities in several military coups in the South. The sentence was mitigated to one of service in the Atacama desert. He delights in making love to the gringo girls of fifteen or sixteen. In his work he is the most fearless devil I have ever seen.

The men felt his presence as soon as he arrived at the mine. Two weeks later they called a general strike, and made the captain's dismissal one of their major demands. He heard that two thousand of them were holding a mass meeting in Punta de Rieles and were working themselves into a frenzy over the brutality and the tyranny of the carabineros. Two thousand Chilean rotos are dangerous when they work themselves into a frenzy. The captain went down to Punta de Rieles alone, pushed his way through the crowd to the speaker's platform, and addressed the gathering.

"I hear you are talking about me. Here I am."

One or two shouted weakly "Tyrant! Murderer!" He looked at them and they were silent.

Then he made them a speech. There was nothing original about it. He told them what the newspapers and the capitalists have been telling the laboring men for ever so long, what the doctors and the lawyers and the restaurant men have been telling one another and their wives for years and years under the name of wisdom. Perhaps it is wisdom. How should I know?

He told them there was no objection to their having meetings, but he would tolerate no mob gatherings. They must elect their representatives, who could meet and talk things over. But they must invite him. He, their captain, wanted to attend. Eventually he got one or two of them to shout "Si Capitan." Then he pushed his way out of the crowd, jumped on his horse, and rode away.

If he keeps on in that manner, and is lucky enough to get into a nice little war or revolution to help his fortunes along, his swashbuckling bravery will make him one of the heroes of Chile.

In the native camp at Chuquicamata some eight thousand men were milling around, ready to stampede. Word had been sent to Calama for a battalion of infantry. The troop train was approaching, and the laborers gathered near the track, collecting sticks and stones, apparently preparing for battle.

The laughing captain said: "This will never do. If the soldiers arrive and see this mob, they will run away." He made a few cavalry charges with his eighty carabineros and cleared the way for the battalion of infantry. A few stones flew, a few bones were broken. If any lives were lost, the fact was hushed up.

The Chilean roto has good reasons to be more afraid of the carabineros than of anything else on earth. A year or more ago I heard vague reports of strikes and riots in the nitrate pampas near Iquique. Eventually the fact simmered out that a crowd of people had been herded into one oficina and riddled with machine-gun bullets, to the death of over two thousand of all ages and both sexes. Two hundred labor agitators had been deported.

Has anyone ever seen a Chilean labor leader who has been deported? According to the tales that are current in bar-rooms and barber-shops, the men are taken a few miles out to sea on a warship and then lined up at the gun-wales. The rail is taken down behind them and a squad of marines makes a charge with fixed bayonets. Thrown overboard? What am I talking about? They jumped overboard in an effort to escape. The official naval report says so.

The carabineros have a similar trick. If they have to take a man a long way after arresting him, if the desert sun is hot and they are anxious to get home, if the prisoner walks too slowly to keep up with their horses, they stop and tell him to run away. If he doesn't want to run, they pummel the desire into him with the stocks of their guns, or prod it into him with their lances. After he has run some fifty yards, they level their carbines and shoot him.

They are trained to get their man, dead or alive. They can always turn in the report that their prisoner tried to escape and they had to shoot him.

I have seen two carabineros pick up a man who was lying, dead drunk, in front of the hospital in Chuquicamata. They made him run to the cuartel in a jog-trot. They sat on their horses and prodded him with their lances. He was so drunk that he fell down at almost every fifth step. Then the horses pawed him and mauled him with their front feet until he got up again. The comedy was repeated all the way to the cuartel, almost two miles away. I am told that there the unfortunate drunkard said an impertinent word to an officer. Three of the biggest of the carabineros were ordered to strip to their waists and batter the prisoner into unconsciousness.

I have seen many men arrested in Chile, and not one of them was ever treated like a human being. Off duty, and toward us gringos, the carabineros are the most gentlemanly and polite body of soldiers I have ever seen. In their work they are the most brutal.

Once, two carabineros rode toward Chuquicamata from Punta de Rieles and were waylaid by a band of rotos. One of them was killed. The other escaped after they had taken his gun and his saber and his uniform away from him. But he never appeared at the cuartel. Some time later I asked a trooper what he thought had become of the man.

"He deserted, of course. If he had come here, the captain would have said 'Take this man and beat him within an inch of his life. He let the rotos get the best of him!' We have good beaters among us. They might have forgotten about that last inch."

There are many who say that this relentless efficiency is necessary among the workers in the nitrate fields, that downright brutality is the only means of controlling people who are three-quarters children and one-quarter wild beasts. As things are now, I agree with them. But perhaps—if the rotos had not been treated so brutally for decades—perhaps they wouldn't now be three-quarters children and one-quarter wild beasts. That, of course, is conjecture. How is a mere engineer to know?

The Rotos

We built a road over the desert and had a camp of some two hundred men. They received six pesos a day and didn't do much work. I wouldn't either, for sixty cents. Whenever possible, we gave them a contract—so much road built, so much money. If they didn't like the contract, we rammed it down their throats.

If they thought they had a chance to make money on their contract, they worked hard and sometimes earned as much as a dollar and a half a day. But if the final liquidation turned out too favorably to them, the engineers in Chuquicamata generally refused to OK payment on it. Then we had to break our word to the men and they lost faith in us and worked less than ever. Only by continually juggling contract prices and quantities so as to keep the liquidations within the liking of both the men and of our chiefs at headquarters could we get anything like work out of our camp.

They were often sick and we were never sure whether they were shamming or not. When a man was sick he was given Epsom salts, no matter what the complaint. If he improved he had been shamming and his pay was docked. If not, he was loaded on a truck and taken to the hospital.

Just before pay-day a lot of new men always came to the camp and asked for work. We knew they were professional gamblers, bent on taking the money from our flock. We were always glad to give them work. The more gambling goes on in a camp, the more men are broke and the more construction men you have.

Those who still had money the day after pay-day quit their jobs and walked to Punta de Rieles, which was anywhere from five to thirty miles away, depending on the location of the camp. If they didn't get themselves killed in some brawl, or land in jail, they always came back to camp four or five days later, after a thorough drunk.

They were always up to petty thievery, and we searched their tents regularly as a matter of routine. We found cans of sardines and cans of peaches, and pieces of steel that they were grinding down to make stilettos, and table knives that they were pointing for social purposes, and blasting caps, and pieces of fuse. We watched our supply of dynamite carefully, but I am sure they got away with a lot of it anyway, and hid it in the hills along the road. It may become very useful to somebody when the big Chilean revolution finally breaks out.

They stole our blankets and our picks and shovels and traded them for liquor in Punta de Rieles.

They went on strike one time because I had told them to bring their picks and their bars into camp so the blacksmith could sharpen them. They didn't think one ought to expect them to walk a mile and a half from their work to camp and carry their tools as well. The strike lasted half an hour, until I went to the telephone and pretended to call the carabineros.

They were terribly afraid to come into our tent even when we told them to. That was because the blacksmith had made us a few souvenirs in the form of knives and stilettos with pretty handles, and we had them lying on the table. They are far more afraid of a knife than a revolver.

They can be cajoled like children and herded like sheep when one has them out in the open. But no man is safe walking alone at night over the desert. Some have been stunned and robbed and left for dead; some have had their heads cut off. After every pay-day the hospital in Chuquicamata is full of stabbing cases that have been brought up from Punta de Rieles.

Above Chuquicamata is a cemetery with some two hundred crosses that belongs to the now dead little mining town of Placilla. Not a single man, woman, or child in that cemetery is supposed to have died a natural death. Strangulation or shooting or stabbing, every form of violence that men think of is said to have done for them all.

Recent events in Chile, the military coups in the South, the labor uprisings in the North, have doubtless brought the great revolution nearer. It is always being talked about in the hidden places where there are no witnesses.

It will be a terribly bloody revolution. Once the Chilean roto gets out of control, he will stop at nothing. And it will be so easy to raise havoc in the desert of the North. A few sticks of dynamite under a few pipe-lines—pough! What will the nitrate oficinas and the mines and the cities on the coast do then, when they have no drinking water? Even railroads are run with water.

The carabineros are brutal and rough. They have to be. They have to be lively and jump around on the lid of the kettle in order to keep it from blowing off. Perhaps if they hadn't been so lively in the past the pressure under the lid wouldn't have mounted so high.

Perhaps they can still save the situation. Perhaps things won't look so bad if they ease up and treat the rotos like human beings, and persuade the employers to treat them like human beings, and give them decent wages and decent food and decent houses, instead of treating them like the sheep that walk on the treadmill that grinds out the nitrates and the copper.

And perhaps that wouldn't help at this stage of the game.

The News from Mexico

By ERNEST GRUENING

A CONSTANT factor in our United States-Mexican relations has been lack of understanding. Whenever a sensational event south of the Rio Grande has aroused interest in the United States the American public has lacked facts, interpretation of those facts, and the historical background against which current Mexican events assume a recognizable shape. Every time an eruption takes place in the Indo-Hispanic volcano belt at our door, be it a flare-up of the six-century, or older, struggle for land and water, the century-old clerical conflict, or the politico-military spoils warfare which is endemic in all countries of Hispanic origin, our dailies duly devote columns to news dispatched from Mexico City. They introduce a few new names, usually garbled, repeat a few familiar ones, contradict one day what was published the day before, and leave their readers mystified. Then as the smoke from Mexico increases but the light does not, newspapers and newspaper syndicates in a burst of commendable enterprise rush a "staff correspondent," or a "special" correspondent, mayhap even an editor to Mexico City. They, within a few days, begin transmitting "interpretative" news gleaned from an interview or two—through an interpreter—with some public official, or from dinner talk in the American colony or in the lobby of the Hotel Regis, unexcelled as a rumor and half-truth factory. But the resulting net information is often negligible. A frank admission to that effect was contained in a recent leading New York World editorial, which confessed that that newspaper, despite its almost daily editorials on developments in Mexico and the daily telegraph dispatch from its correspondent, did not understand what was happening there.

Yet, except for the startling and momentous assassination of the President-elect, events in Mexico, "land of the unexpected," have followed a logical, consistent, and—for one familiar with Mexican history, psychology, and contemporary society—an almost prophesiable course. Three Mexican constants have underlain every incident worth noting in our neighbor state during the last five weeks. These are: (a) The struggle between church and state; (b) the one-man, "personalist" character of Mexican politics; (c) the shaping of Mexico's destiny by the United States through the American ambassador. (The first two ran strictly true to form; the third reversed precedent merely in the form of the influence exerted. United States ambassadors have been traditionally hostile to Mexico in her darker hours. Mr. Morrow, by reversing that attitude and being militantly friendly, has exerted a profound influence on the present situation and on Mexico's future.)

But the greatest approach to understanding Mexico lies in appreciating the anachronism that our neighbor state presents. This is particularly difficult for Americans—who as a people so largely fashioned their destiny out of prime, unspoiled materials—to grasp. A developing native culture many centuries behind the European was arrested in its evolution by the Conquest four centuries ago, and the imposed civilization suffered like retardation. Spain, concomitantly, furnishes plentiful evidence of the almost complete stagnation of one of Mexico's parent cultures.

Consequently, characteristics, roughly speaking, of fifteenth-century Europe and fifteenth-century Anahuac prevail largely in Mexico. If one will view Mexico's violent politics, its mercenary army, its barely disintegrating feudal land tenure and serfdom, and its often fanatical clergy in terms of fifteenth-century continental society, nearly all that may be viewed as national shortcomings, become explicable merely by relating them to time rather than to place. This categorization is of course too sweeping to be literally and all-inclusively applied. Exceptions are plentiful and today the Mexican panorama unfolds on a grapple of the twentieth-century spirit with medievalism. That, in a word, is the Mexican Revolution. Small wonder that it has lasted seventeen years and will continue for years to come!

The major part of the "news" emanating from Mexico in the five weeks since Obregon's death has been devoted to discussing the possible guilt of supposed instigators of the assassination. President Calles charged the Roman Catholic Mexican clergy with responsibility; the vocal part of the agrarian movement, the two city leaders, Deputies Antonio Diaz Soto y Gama and Aurelio Manrique, blamed Morones and the CROM leadership (one and the same thing) with "psychological responsibility"; and now, belatedly, we have a counter-blast from the Vatican, whose official organ flatly charges President Calles with being the "murderer." It was almost certain that such charges would fly; they are symptoms of Mexico's illnesses, or, if one prefers, moves in her struggles, one with clericalism, the other with political vice. The net effect of these conflicting accusations has been to confuse the American reader. What basis, if any, is there for such recriminations?

The agrarians' charges may be dismissed as groundless. They were made in the passion and temporary demoralization of what appeared a staggering blow at Mexico's welfare. They had these bases of justification: Morones has on at least one previous occasion resorted to assassination to remove a political foe—Senator Francisco Field Jurado in 1924. The shooting of the Senator—overtly a De la Huertista in the capital when the De la Huerta rebellion was at its height—was carried out after a public threat by Morones against the enemies of the Government safely ensconced in Mexico City, and working there to assure the rebels' success. Field Jurado perished at the hands of a group of Morones's bravos headed by one Preve, subsequently the Laborista candidate for the governorship of Campeche. Vendettas, though not peculiar to Mexico, are still characteristic of Mexican politics. Morones himself has barely escaped a fatal bullet half a dozen times.

Within the Revolutionary movement a split between the leadership of the Mexican Federation of Labor, the CROM (one wing, and hitherto the most important, of Mexican Labor), and the leadership of the agrarians had been widening for three years. The rank and file of both groups had no part in these political maneuvers. Originally both leaderships were friendly to each other; both seemed to embody the really sincere Revolutionary objectives, as distinguished from the politicos, who had merely climbed aboard the Revolutionary bandwagon for personal vantage.

The agrarian leadership, however, while honest at the top, proved incompetent as an organizing and administrative force. Calles early in his regime reached the conclusion that land reform to which he himself was devoted was retarded by the injection of politics. While remaining personally friendly with its leaders, he frowned on the National Agrarian Party as a political force, and it disintegrated. The CROM leadership, on the other hand, had shown great organizing ability, and in the sunshine of official patronage prospered. Morones sought to enlarge his power by attempting to organize the peasantry, for which the CROM, with its purely urban psychology, was unfitted. His not unjustified attacks on the shortcomings of the agrarian reform as carried out up to 1925 drew return fire from the farm leaders. They were politically "outs," while Morones and his following were very much the "ins." The agrarians therefore turned to Obregon and militantly supported his Presidential candidacy. He accepted their support. He shared the steadily widening resentment against the arbitrary and ruthless tactics of CROM trade unionism and the incident promotion of personal fortunes. Morones, "labor leader," had grown rich, indulging meanwhile in the orgies of an Oriental satrap. Meanwhile many workers still wore huaraches—the leather sandals which mark an intermediate step in the rise from bare to shod feet. The great opportunity which Calles had given Morones in making him Minister of Industry, Commerce, and Labor, to foster the nation's industry and develop a working arrangement between capital and labor in Mexico, he forfeited. Business got small help or encouragement from him; the rank and file of the toilers made no appreciable gains. Almost alone he and a few satellites profited.

Under Obregon's presidency Morones was slated for political retirement. With Obregon's death Calles accepted Morones's resignation, which had been clamored for by Obregon's followers, who then and there raised the cry of "psychological responsibility" for their leader's death. Calles was under no compulsion to yield to that clamor which he knew to be unjust. But he evidently felt a moral obligation to carry out his dead successor's purposes. Also it is possible that Calles's illusions about Morones, long and tenaciously held, had begun to fade. The fear expressed that the eclipse of Morones is a blow to organized labor in Mexico is baseless. The workers will be better off. The accompanying resignation of Celestino Gasca, generally considered second in line, and for four years head of the Federal military-supply factories, is another matter. He is honest and a rarely disinterested type of public servant. His involvement with Morones is a piece of political irony, and it seems inevitable that before long Gasca will be recalled to public service where his character and abilities are needed.

The Morones-Obregon antagonism was of a kind totally different from that which impelled the youth Toral to murder Obregon, "so that Christ could be wholly King of Mexico." The verbal attacks which the labor leader delivered against the Presidential candidate during the campaign were indited from a laborite angle; they implied not errors of commission on Obregon's part but that from the radical Revolutionist viewpoint he had not gone far enough. Such attacks, if they had been noted by Toral at all, would have been deemed by him favorable to Obregon, rather than condemnatory.

The charge that Calles is responsible for the killing of Obregon is too absurd for consideration. No informed person will take it seriously. The Obregon-Calles friendship was a rare example of genuine affection between two men who might conceivably have been rivals, but worked in harmony for fifteen years.

On the evidence to date the instigation of the murder cannot be fastened on any group—laborite or clerical—as a whole. That the slayer was influenced by the teaching he received from certain members of the clergy his own confession reveals, although he claims to be solely responsible for his act. It is obvious that he was unbalanced, and that the antagonism to the Mexican Revolutionary leadership which had been instilled in him was perverted beyond the intent of any of his religious teachers. Certainly the doctrine of moral responsibility in their case would scarcely seem justiciable in any recognized system of modern criminal law. The Mexican Roman Catholic clergy has of course been bitterly hostile to the Mexican Revolutionary administrations and they have been hostile to it. The clergy has made no secret of its animosity. It has considered itself deeply persecuted. And it has not hesitated to use its spiritual power to combat government policies and officials. Mexican bishops have told me so in no uncertain terms. But there has been no consistent uniformity in their acts. The wide disparity in the statements concerning the assassination by Bishop Pascual Diaz of Tabasco, who condemned it unsparingly, and Archbishop Leopoldo Ruiz y Flores of Michoacan, who virtually condoned it, is illustrative. Various Mexican prelates are on record as disapproving the armed rebellion against the Government which followed the withdrawal of the clergy from the churches on August 1, 1926. On the other hand, Archbishop Valencia of Durango issued a pastoral from Rome in February, 1927, giving the rebellion his implicit support. Certainly the episcopate never with one voice has condemned the armed rebellion under the banner of "Long Live Christ the King," in the course of which trains were assaulted with priests acting as chaplains, and innocent victims—women and children—slaughtered. In short, violence has not been unmistakably effectively repressed by the Mexican hierarchy while two years of guerrilla war spilled much blood and kept Mexico in a ferment.

The "Christ King" doctrine as inculcated in Mexico cannot be understood in terms of any theology familiar to Americans, to whom such a device would seem to be, and would be, wholly spiritual. In Mexico the political purpose and connotations of the campaign which was given a vigorous impulse by the Apostolic delegate, Archbishop Ernesto Filippi, were patent. Throughout central Mexico from 1923 to 1926 many houses bore placards with that device and with "Long Live the Pope." In the minds of many communicants the power represented in Mexico by the clergy was thereby set up on a plane higher than the civil authority represented by the Government. In the wake of this sanction came a more effective campaigning against the public schools, agrarian reform, the civil marriage law, and other reforms to which the Mexican administrations were committed. When this campaign culminated in January, 1923, in the dedication on the top of the loftiest mountain in central Mexico of the cornerstone of a temple to "Christ, King of Mexico," amid elaborate ceremonies, President Obregon expelled the Papal delegate who had officiated. The technical charge was violation of the constitutional provision forbidding religious processions outside of regular places of worship. At the ceremonies Bishop Miguel de la Mora of San Luis Potosi preached a sermon in which he stated that "from His new position of vantage towering above Mexico, Christ would defy His enemies as He had defied the Jews who had crucified Him."

A similar suggestion of medieval intolerance is found in the latest Osservatore Romano statement, in which reference is made to Mexico's Foreign Minister as "a Protestant Jew who opened the gates in the most barefaced fashion to the immigration of his coreligionaries." This information—or misinformation—about Aaron Saenz* (who is a Presbyterian) is derived from Mexican clerical circles, where the terms "Protestant" and "Jew" are today in common use as opprobrious epithets. I have repeatedly heard them so used by the Mexican clergy, and have frequently heard them employed interchangeably with "atheistic," "Bolshevistic," and "Masonic." The tolerance which the Mexican Roman Catholic clergy complains is denied it, it is not yet extending to members of other sects. Incredible as it may appear to persons in the United States, Protestant missionaries have within the last three years been set upon by mobs and killed for no reason other than that of their faith and calling.

For Obregon's assassination no one will, of course, accept "moral responsibility." No one person other than the assassin himself can justly be blamed therefor. The nearest approach to implicating any one person came from the aforementioned Bishop de la Mora. In his statement exonerating the Mexican Roman Catholic clergy (August 6) he asserted of Mother Superior Concepcion de la Llata (who was named as having influenced Toral indirectly): "It is public knowledge that her brain is not normal and that in her family there have been cases of insanity." But how could the Mexican hierarchy tolerate as the responsible head of a convent a person whose mental abnormality was of "public knowledge"?

In his testimony Toral stated that in the confessional previous to assassinating Obregon he had made no mention of his design because he considered it no sin. He stated that the moment before the shooting Obregon's kindly smile had made him waver and almost renounce his purpose, but that he had uttered an "Ave Maria" and thus fortified himself. Thus the mother of Christ was invoked to aid crime, as Christ Himself has been repeatedly invoked to sanction bloodshed in Mexico in the last two years.

Out of all this, one tragic truth stands out. In ground fertilized by hatred, bigotry, and fanaticism, an assassination that its perpetrator did not consider a sin or a crime but a noble deed could easily be spawned. Such a soil, such mental processes, and the deed which can grow out of them do not belong to this day and age. They reveal that the distance that separates at least a portion of the Roman Catholic clergy of Mexico from their brothers of the cloth in this country is not to be measured in miles but in centuries, in time rather than in space. Recognition of this fact by the Roman Catholic hierarchy outside of Mexico, and efforts on its part to reform the clergy there, would far more speedily bring about peace and a healing of deep wounds than blind support of Mexican clericalism because it, too, wears an outward garb that presupposes sanctity and sanity.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has a friend who has rented a farmhouse for the summer. It seems a fairly innocent thing to do, especially since the friend behaves himself decorously on the whole and breaks none of the more important laws of church or state—at least not obviously. But the neighborhood has its eye on him and about him its tongue is wagging. When he stirs abroad they ask him about it, and behind his back they lay wagers or merely wonder. And the point at issue, the great question of the season, is, will he or won't he buy the place when the summer is over?

* * * * *

PERPLEXED, the Drifter inquired the reason of all this seemingly idle curiosity. "Don't you know," one said to him frankly, "that buying property and getting married are public matters, in which the community cannot help but take an interest? Let a young man make eyes at a girl, or let a girl begin to call a young man by a pet name, and all the friends of both are at once interested. And let a man, safely married now perhaps, but begin to flirt with a real-estate agent, and every man he knows is advising him about the furnace and the pipes and every woman wants to decide on the color of the dining-room curtains." The Drifter is not disposed to argue with social wisdom given so confidently. And on the whole, observation has taught him the truth of these remarks. They could, of course, have been further generalized. For when a man marries, or dies, or spends money he contributes to the social pattern, and the other members of society are affected by and interested in his acts.

* * * * *

ONLY one person of his acquaintance has ever refrained from being social in any of these ways. He has, by his own account, never married. And looking at him, the Drifter can well believe it. For he is not a prepossessing figure. His beard grows long on his bosom; once a year, so the legend goes, he shaves and has a bath. He lives quite by himself in a little house perhaps eight feet by ten, set snugly against a hill and with a sawdust pile at the front door. How he got possession of the property remains a mystery; certainly he never bought it. For a month or so in the summer he works at desultory gardening; with the capital so acquired he lives through the rest of the year. He is said to be an excellent if not too fastidious cook, but the keeper of the village store never sells him anything but flour and, less often, bacon. Perhaps he has learned the secret of drying berries into a loaf for winter consumption; perhaps he traps and shoots enough game for his needs. However he lives, he keeps it to himself. He can be seen almost any evening, a solitary figure leaning on a cane, for he is lame, walking soberly along the road. He will wave his arm in response to a hail, but when accosted his conversation is as brief as possible. He has almost entirely succeeded in living without society; yet society cannot live without him, for the most intense curiosity prevails with regard to him. All sorts of stories about him are current. He cannot read, they say, yet he takes regularly a French newspaper. He makes his bed when the moon changes, and * The origin of the report in Mexico that the Saenz family is Jewish as well as Protestant is based on nothing more than that its members were given Old Testament names. Aaron Saenz's brother Moises (Moses) is Under Secretary of Education.

Frontiersman and idealist,

George Rogers Clark has been the hero of fact and of fiction. Now James A. James, lifelong student of midwestern history, has—as William E. Dodd says—“put the last and best stone in the structure” recording his achievements. GEORGE ROGERS CLARK. $5.00

What is our “Mexican situation”?

Wouldn't you take an hour to find out? In Mexico three men speak with authority, with sincerity, and from totally different points of view—José Vasconcelos, Mexican patriot; J. Fred Rippey, critical historian; Guy Stevens, lawyer and representative of the foreign investor. Ranged together, their fearless opinions take on an extraordinary significance. MEXICO: American Policies Abroad. $1.50

The “rediscovery of childhood”

is going on in countless homes. Here is workable, intelligent advice for the better understanding of your own children from men and women who have given their minds and their energies to solving the problems of many children. BUILDING CHARACTER. A Symposium. Paper $1.00. Cloth $2.00

Looking at the nominating system of this country over a period of twenty years, C. E. Merriam finds many interesting experiments, changes, developments. In his new book, with Professor Louise Overacker, he analyzes them and presents a constructive, suggestive program of nominating development. PRIMARY ELECTIONS.

$3.00

“The Wealth of Nations”

has been commemorated by a series of lectures delivered at the University of Chicago by John Maurice Clark, Paul H. Douglas, Jacob H. Hollander, Glenn R. Morrow, Melchior Palyi, and Jacob Viner. ADAM SMITH, 1776-1926.

$3.00

The heart of the Middle Ages

is here revealed in James Westfall Thompson's account of the dramatic struggle between the Papacy and the Medieval Empire. FEUDAL GERMANY.

$5.00

The University of Chicago Press
5807 Ellis Avenue Chicago

if the change occurs on a cloudy night, he waits till next time. He is very old, and he fought for France in 1870. But whatever the truth about him, gossip cannot let him alone, any more than it can the Drifter's summer renter. Only a Drifter, one who never stops long enough in one place to be recognized, can hope to evade the prying eyes of his neighbors.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence Norman Thomas on Al Smith

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Hoover's acceptance speech was at best the speech of a benevolent bureaucrat devoted to an outworn economic philosophy. Governor Smith's clever and emotionally sincere appeal to liberals demands closer examination. The all-important point is that Alfred E. Smith is no dictator but the candidate of a party. He must work with and through his party. And such a party! On every liberal issue of the last decade its record is as bad as the Republican; its platform can scarcely be distinguished from the Republican, and its organization, as I have observed in fourteen States of the South and Middle West, is more stupidly incompetent than the Republican.

Nor is it true that Governor Smith's record is such as to inspire faith that he can and will whip this mass of blundering, quarreling, reactionary politicians into line. Governor Smith appeals to his record. So be it. It has its good points. But he was pledged to the hilt to the child-labor amendment; under pressure he cleverly dodged his pledges. He talks somewhat vaguely against the injunction evil, but the happy warrior has done nothing effective on this issue as Governor of New York. He promises, again somewhat vaguely, to hang on to our public water-power sites and to protect the ultimate consumer. Again, with the exception of the fight against the St. Lawrence grab, his record on public utilities is poor. He appointed all the members of one of the most reactionary public-service commissions in the country, one of the worst of the members being his preconvention manager. He appointed New York's bungling transit commission. It is freely charged that he is in sympathy with those who would break down our five-cent fare in New York. Certainly, he has not helped in solving the transit tangle. Finally, this marvelous leader, who is to whip Tammany Hall, the corrupt city ring of Memphis, Tennessee, and the mossback politicians of Arkansas into a party of progress, has lacked the desire or the will to consider specific charges against the Mayor whom he gave New York or to help by one least effort in the struggle for an honest count in New York City elections. And to cap the climax, he has chosen as his chief of staff Raskob, the open-shopper, the profiteer on every war, a member of the group which sought the St. Lawrence water-power franchise.

In the South and even in the Middle West Democrats are tearfully protesting that prohibition is no partisan issue at all. Indeed, they stand for stricter enforcement! In Missouri Democratic politicians hopefully count on rural Drys to vote for Hay, a Dry Senatorial candidate, and get Smith, and the urban Wets to vote for Smith and get Hay. Politically speaking, the Governor's liquor program is fantastically impossible. One may sympathize with his candor and with much of his criticism of conditions and yet agree that his plan would put the issue deeper into partisan politics rather than take it out.

As for farm relief, the Governor has nothing to offer radically different from the Republicans. Neither will the tariff become a major issue unless the Governor goes farther toward concrete advocacy of lower rates than he shows any sign of doing. On labor Smith opposes “unwarranted” injunctions, while Hoover opposes “excessive” ones.

There remain the two high points—from a liberal standpoint—of the Governor's speech: his declaration on water-power sites and on imperialism. It is hard to tell just what the Governor proposes to do with Muscle Shoals or how he will manage Boulder Dam in view of the failure of the seven States to make the treaty he advocates. He is still weak on the problem of transmitting power publicly produced. What kind of contract will he be able to make for distributing energy when the transmission lines are in the hands of a close-knit, notorious monopoly which will be master of our democracy unless we master it?

That the Governor speaks plainly on Mexico and Nicaragua is to the good (so did Harding, the candidate, speak on Haiti), but he does not promise to withdraw our marines. He forgets that in Mexico, Haiti, and Santo Domingo the Wilson Administration did worse things than the Coolidge Administration. He ignores the recognition of Russia, debts and reparations, the World Court, and the League of Nations, and the right of the President, even with the consent of Congress, to collect private debts in backward countries by the marines. These questions must be dealt with positively one way or another by the next President. Where does Governor Smith stand? And where does he stand on the race question, and on taxation of land, inheritances, and incomes? What solution has he for the problem of coal? These are questions liberals and progressives, unless they are children pacified by kind words and a few toys, will want to ask.

Socialists are less concerned with these specific questions than with the evidence this campaign affords that a few decent and liberal inclinations in a candidate are powerless to save us so long as both parties belong to the same general business interests and think only in terms of the right of men to own for their own power and profit property which should belong to society and be managed for the general good. For our political salvation we need not a happy warrior but our own party!

New York, August 27

NORMAN THOMAS,

Socialist Candidate for President

$10 and "Make Good"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was sentenced in the lower courts of Boston the other day for a larceny offense to twenty days in jail and a fine of $10. The irony of that sentence you will see if you read on.

In 1900 I was committed to the Concord Reformatory for an indefinite term. Upon my release from that institution I received $3 and the best wishes of the warden to "make good." But I had no intention of "making good." That well-meaning official might just as well have spoken to the surrounding prison walls. I was just launching upon a criminal career that covered a period of twenty-seven years—twenty spent behind prison walls and seven in precarious liberty.

My first burglary offense went to the jury on July 10, 1902. I was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. Upon my release I received $10, a prison suit of clothes, and again the best wishes of the warden to "make good." On ten dollars.

A well-known shoe manufacturer of Boston had a beautiful home in the suburbs of the city. Some of us broke into it at night. I was the candidate to stand trial for this offense, and I went back to the Charlestown prison with a sentence of six to eight years. But everything has an end, and once again I stood in the warden's office to receive the State's $10 and the warden's best wishes to "make good." I believe every warden uses the same expression. Our parting was merely a brief formality. "Make good"—on $10.

The money Massachusetts gave me furnished my transportation to New York. On the Bowery I met an old pal of mine who was a "paper-layer," a forger. Together we let loose a score of bad checks. In order to elude the authorities I enlisted in the army. But my career as a soldier ended abruptly with a two-year sentence at the military prison at Leavenworth.

The army is a little more liberal with "conduct time" for good behavior, so in a year I received my discharge from that institution. My liberty was short. The New York authorities were at the outer gates to take me back to stand trial for the bad checks. A visit up the river under Warden Osborne's administration finally terminated, and again I stood in the warden's office and received my discharge, $10, and the admonition to "make good."

I have now become a fifth offender. I received my discharge the other day, but my $10 from the State of Massachusetts has not yet given me a new start in life.

Since my release I have done a little figuring. According to my calculation, I have accomplished thousands of dollars' worth of profitable work. For this I have received $50 from the States of Massachusetts and New York. I do not seek to excuse myself. But it strikes me there is bad management in the way I have been treated. Once out of jail, I was always up against a line-up that made it practically impossible for me to get and hold a job, because of the prejudice against an ex-convict. In one place, the other workmen began taking their coats out of the washroom when they heard about me. Society naturally headed me back toward crime, instead of encouraging me to "make good." That is an injustice, so is the fact that I never left prison with anything like a fair balance of pay for the work I had done behind the bars.

I hope that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York, so far advanced in many other things, will make it possible for discharged convicts to get a new start with sufficient cash to make good.

New York, July 18

LEAVENWORTH 20,803

Venizelos

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation of August 1 carries an editorial note on Eleutherios Venizelos, on the occasion of his return to politics. Speaking about the Cretan, it says: "In 1917 . . . with the aid of French marines, [he] became Greece's first President." Venizelos, although a Republican and Premier, never was Greece's President. And further on: "But, despite Lloyd George's support, he could not hold Turkey against the Turks; the disastrous defeat of the Greek army and the burning of Smyrna in 1920 seemed to end Venizelos's career with a great smoky smudge." The disaster of the Greek army and the burning of Smyrna took place in 1922. Venizelos's career seemed to end after the general elections in which he was badly defeated, in 1920, but that was two years before the burning of Smyrna. The "great smoky smudge" belongs to the executed ministers who were governing Greece when the smoke went up at Smyrna. The responsibility of the debacle in Asia Minor can be laid at Venizelos's door only to the extent that he failed to foresee, first, his own defeat in the elections of 1920, and, second, the unbelievable stupidity of his successors.

The editorial continues: "Yet he is in the premiership again and has forced the unwilling President, Admiral Koundouriotis, to dissolve parliament and change the electoral law so that the Cretan may rule untrammelled." If the implication is that that he is on the way of becoming a dictator, I think it is not true, and rather unfair. The elections he has conducted so far have all been above board, and he has respected the will of the people even when it went against him, as in 1920. In addition, this time he has picked a royalist, Mr. Zavitsianos, for the post of Minister of the Interior that his opponents may rest assured that the elections are going to be on the level.

Fitzsimons, Col., August 2

C. L. TERZOPOULOS

Books and Music

Three Sonnets

By MERRILL MOORE

Warning to One

Death is the strongest of all living things,
And when it happens do not look in the eyes
For a dead fire or a lack-luster there
But listen for the words that fall from lips
Or do not fall. Silence is not death,
It merely means that the one who is conserving breath
Is not concerned with tattle and small quips.
Watch the quick fingers and the way they move

During unguarded moments—words of love
And love's caresses may be as cold as ice
And cold the glitter of engagement rings.
Death is the sword that hangs on a single hair
And that thin tenuous hair is no more than love
And yours is the silly head it hangs above.

Sturm und Drang

We are too young and have not seen enough
Yet to interpret properly the wind's sough
And the story of branches beating on each other
When the storm-clouds bring them bitter weather.
We cannot wrest from Chaos her bright book
Long enough to open it and look
And read—for we could read what she has written
But yet not now, there still is too much din!

And back of the two rich gates that are your eyes
Guarding the fragrant orchard that is your mind
I can see that you have well defined
The proper answer to this situation,
So, letting tomorrow care for what may arise,
Today let us attend the slow transition.

Pandora and the Moon

Minds awake in bodies that were asleep
Caused the winged troubles to be born
That made Pandora onetime feel forlorn,
Because, in spite of the box, she could not keep
Her troubles there, the worrisome animalcules
Fluttered out never to be regained,
For every method of evil especially trained
And subject neither to God's nor the devil's rules.

What shall she do? Nothing, but sit and ponder,
Watch the dying leaves drop from the tree
Until they all are gone and she may see
The same moon then that used to make her wonder
At the unbelievable stories she sits and reads.
And if she succeeds in that then she succeeds.

Mr. Underwood Reflects

Drifting Sands of Party Politics. By Oscar W. Underwood.
New York: The Century Company. $3.50.

TWENTY years' service in the House of Representatives, followed by twelve years in the Senate, ought, it would seem, to give almost any man of intelligence and high character a sensible and worth-while point of view from which to look at American politics and the American governmental system generally. Mr. Underwood is an illustration, all too rare in the history of the past thirty years, of a man to whom a prolonged and varied experience of public life at Washington has brought not only knowledge but reflection; and reflection, when buttressed by historical inquiry and the calm temper of a gentleman, is pretty certain, as in his case, to produce convictions not wholly in accord with the superficial and repetitious dogmatism which constitutes, for the politician class, the larger part of the intellectual stock in trade.

Mr. Underwood appears in his book as, in all essential respects, a Democrat of the old school. He agrees with Jefferson in holding that the best government is the one that governs least. He believes in all seriousness that when Congress and the States, fearful of federal intrusion, insisted upon declaring in the Tenth Amendment that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," they not only meant what they said, but that they also created an obligation in the federal government to see that the prescription was observed. What impresses him, however, as he looks about, is the extraordinary extent to which the constitutional obligation has been disregarded, and he appears to have written his book principally as an indictment of the vast encroachment of federal authority which is today not only one of the most striking characteristics of American politics, but a daily menace to personal and political liberty as well.

What he has to say on the subject is not, to be sure, especially new, for others before him have spoken out, but what he says carries weight because he himself was long in a position to see and know exactly what was going on behind the curtain. He knows, for example, how tariffs were made, and his account of the influences which sustained and enlarged protection under Republican auspices will not inspire any voter with a conscience to support the Republican ticket next November. He punctures the bubble of a tariff commission, shows the fundamental weakness of the Federal Reserve banking system, whose recent handling of the credit situation has set the banking and investment community by the ears, points out the evils and dangers of multiplying federal commissions and boards, scores the espionage and sedition acts of the Wilson régime, and compares national prohibition with the Constitution. The Supreme Court, which has so substantially aided the overriding of State rights, does not escape, and the Progressives, to whom "the guaranty of the federal Constitution stood not as a safeguard for the protection of their lives, the preservation of their liberties, or the insurance of their happiness, but rather as an impediment in the way of the humanitarian or class legislation that they determined was best for the mass of the American people," receive their share of chastisement.

The criticism to be passed upon Mr. Underwood's book is that the remedies which he offers are little more than counsels of perfection. He would abolish "the discretions that are now vested in a bureaucratic government," "divorce the federal government from any intimate association in the domestic affairs of the people," confine legislative authority to Congress and executive authority to the President, and break the hold of organizations like the Anti-Saloon League by removing "the rewards that associations battle for." This is all very well, but nothing of the kind can be done without legislation, and the legislation will not be forthcoming so long as the voters, for whose welfare Mr. Underwood sincerely cares, are content to support representatives whose primary concern is with the maintenance of the system. It all comes back to the character of the electorate, and how to impart high character to an electorate the vast majority of which has been taught to look upon politics as either a gamble or a joke is not easily discoverable in Mr. Underwood's book.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Ten Neglected Centuries

The Romanesque Lyric: Studies in its Background and Development from Petronius to the Cambridge Songs (50-1050).

By Philip Schuyler Allen. With Renderings into English Verse by Howard Mumford Jones. The University of North Carolina Press. $4.50.

IN his well-known collection of Goliardic verse, "Wine, Women and Song," John Addington Symonds in 1884 expressed the conventionally contemptuous judgment on the Latin poetry immediately preceding the twelfth century: "There is little need to dwell upon these crepuscular stirrings of popular Latin poetry in the earlier Middle Ages. To indicate their existence was necessary; for they serve to link by a dim and fragile thread of evolution the decadent art of the base Empire with the renaissance of paganism attempted in the twelfth century, and thus to connect that dawn of modern feeling with the orient splendors of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries in Italy." This dilettante judgment is hardly more liberal or acute than the rigorously academic point of view which prefers to see early medieval Latin poetry as an integral body of traditional Roman matter, and no more. It is the admirable achievement of Professor Allen to have crowned his many years of conscientious and scholarly labors in a difficult field with a book which at least shows the way toward an appreciation of this verse as a distinct and important entity, an actual poetic form, characteristic and expressive of a new type of experience, a form which is no "crepuscular stirring," no "dim and fragile thread of evolution," but a sturdy and logical growth, susceptible of extended study.

To this poetry Professor Allen assigns the apt and suggestive term "Romanesque" which he defines as "that mutation of the classical Roman form which resulted from the avowed attempt to adapt classical forms to Christian purposes." Actually his exposition of the subject gives a much wider significance to the term, but the definition will serve. It should be understood at once, however, that Professor Allen is speaking constantly of a "mutation." He does not become over-excited by his thesis and plunge into a Spenglerism. While he insists on the Romanesque lyric as a "characteristic" form, he champions with equal vehemence the idea of the continuity of cultures. He is no exclusionist. To him the Romanesque lyric is partially an outgrowth of the classical experience, but he makes clear that from that experience it extracts a new note of sensibility, romanticism, and mutability, which Professor Allen claims to discover first in Petronius.

But not only is it dependent on the classical tradition; it is also largely a function of the partially non-Roman, highly complicated Gaulish society of the pre-Caesarian era. Thus it exists for many centuries side by side with a petrified and sterile pure classic tradition, but it differentiates itself sharply from this tradition, as in the Merovingian poetry of Fortunatus and Walahfrid Strabo. Its first flowering comes with the Carolingian renaissance, whose significance Professor Allen is possibly inclined slightly to overrate: and achieves a high point of intensity and sophistication (relatively speaking) in the Cambridge songs (1050) where the "sway and thud" of the imminent vernacular poetry can already be heard. But the career of the Romanesque lyric has been affected by non-continental influences still further removing it from the classic tradition. Among these influences Professor Allen points out the Gaelic poetry of the sixth century, brought to the mainland by Columban and other Irish monks; and the Arabico-Persian love poetry of the sixth to the tenth century. In the ninth-century Platonism of Ibn Dawoud, for example, we are shown a possible source for the occidental symbolisms of mariolatry and Platonic love.

It is his constant and pertinent insistence on the importance of the Romanesque lyric as a characteristic form rather than his exposition of the thesis that forms the valuable element in the book. Professor Allen finds his greatest difficulty in naming the characteristics which go to make up the Romanesque poetic experience. The qualities he assigns to it—sweetness, mutability, freshness, romanticism—all offer difficult problems in definition, some of which are not clearly solved. The situation is not rendered any simpler by Professor Allen's use of the term "Gaelic temper," applying it to verse which seems, at least from the translations, fairly remote from whatever the Irish spirit is supposed to be at this date. His exposition is further complicated by the fact that his subject is a highly controversial one: he has not always been able to prevent the ink-screens of academic bickerings from obscuring his ideas. He devotes a whole chapter, for instance, to a virulent and largely unimportant refutation of the comical German theory which would evolve the medieval minstrel and jongleur from the vaudeville mime of late Latinity, as we see him in the pages of the Satyricon. This controversial interest tends to lend his style a note of irritating acerbity which occasionally alienates the sympathy of the reader.

Certain exaggerations should also be noted, particularly his stressing, worthy of a Sinn Feiner, of the cultural influences of the Gaelic monasteries in the sixth century. He is so eager to prove his theory of the constant transmission and exchange of culture through the medieval trade routes that he forgets that a thousand years of commerce between two countries may never carry over a single poetic form or idea from one to the other: witness our own lamentable ignorance of the poetic culture of South America, with whom our trade relations are of the busiest and most complicated. Finally, in his laudable desire to construct a solid social and historical background for his poetry, Professor Allen too often blurs our sense of the poetry itself and its chronological and self-contained evolution. We cannot see the trees for the wood.

Despite these faults, the book will remain a standard and arresting work in its field, with implications that lie far beyond the mere subject matter. It should be read by every student of poetry and certainly by every student of the Middle Ages. It serves to whet one's appetite, not only for Professor Allen's promised volume on the Carolingian lyric, but for his sequel to the present book which will, of course, deal with the poetic renaissance of the eleventh, twelfth, and early thirteenth centuries. Anyone who has read at all in Edelstand du Mérid and the "Carmina Burana" must have had an indefinable yet persistent sense of two divergent types of poetic emotion, represented respectively in the professional Goliardic songs and in the popular Latin love poetry, often so hard to distinguish. It is to this interesting problem in differentiation that Professor Allen's projected sequel will devote itself.

Space forbids more than an inhumanly casual mention of the brilliant translations by Howard Mumford Jones which stud the pages of "The Romanesque Lyric." In one or two cases, notably that of the oft-attempted Pervigilium Veneris, he seems to have achieved a classic version. Particularly worthy of praise is the sureness of his humorous touch, where the macaronic Cambridge songs require it. If he can do equally well with the Goliards and the secular hymnology of the eleventh century, he will easily displace the rather affectedly clever translations of Symonds, hitherto the main source for those whose Latin is uncertain.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

A Boy's Long Days

Day of Fortune. By Norman Matson. The Century Company. $2.50.

THIS is the most interesting novel I have read for many months. It will certainly take its place as one of the half dozen best of a year that is notable for the continued emergence of a group of new writers with major possibilities.

In form Mr. Matson is less consciously a literary artist than Hemingway, Westcott, Aiken, and Wilder. The scenes of Peter Chezness's life unroll before us in a series of episodes, sometimes quite unrelated, sometimes revolving around a central experience such as his first newspaper job, his editorship of a labor paper in a small Western town near San Francisco, his mother's death. This particular form has of late been out of favor with American reviewers and American publishers, partly because, having no obvious rules, it is immensely easier for the beginner to "get away with" than a plotted novel. Because, some years ago, the public bought largely and read avidly certain long, apparently formless scrap-bags of reminiscences and recorded emotions and opinions, a great number of meager talents set themselves to serve the same dish, with disastrously dreary consequences. In the salutary reaction which is reaching its peak today, novels of this description have fallen into disrepute, and we are already in a fair way to admire form regardless of content. For this reason, and because today few spectacles are considered more deliciously amusing than a young man who believes in the amelioration of the human lot, it required courage for Mr. Matson to issue his book. The measure of his success is shown by the fact that my mind harks back at once to the joy with which we read "Jean-Christophe," "The Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man," and "Pelle," after the smooth nothings of the imitators of Howells and James.

Perhaps it is time to invent a new name for the stream-of-experience novel. If it were named, modern critics might recognize modern examples of it as belonging to a very respectable genre. Unnamed they brand it as formless and deprive us, in so far as their censure affects publishers, of one of the most perennially interesting of literary forms. It is in effect autobiography, except that under the cover of fiction the author tells things that no autobiographer, barring Cellini, Moore, and Rousseau, would tell, and that whenever it is necessary to portray the true inwardness of a situation he invents the requisite episodes. I am reminded here that no one today reads those romances of which Rousseau so plumed himself, although his autobiography is read as eagerly as when it was new; and that Moore's most ardently conceived novels are dull indeed compared with "Hail and Farewell." So I, at least, am content to let Mr. Matson find his own path.

The Chezness family comes from Norway. Mary, the mother of Peter, was a little child, just old enough to remember the voyage, when the family emigrated to Chicago. A few pages commemorate her girlhood, vaguely, as her son would have remembered it from old stories told around the kitchen table; and then the book emerges into the daylight in Grand Rapids, Michigan, with Peter as the medium through whom things are seen and felt. The next hundred and twenty-three pages are a delightful reconstruction of a boy's long days.

The endless world radiates from Our House, a peaked white cottage behind a maple-tree. The world is flat. It is cut in halves by Turner Street. Alas, nothing is exact! Time and space change according to their relation to Our House. Time in Leonard Street, half a mile away, goes faster; and a "city block" gradually, at a mounting rate, lengthens as one walks from the center of the world. "Do you like this street?" one asks of the boy who lives three streets away, and one means, "Do you like the quality of life here?" Because the quality of life must be so different. . . . Oh, the days went by like clouds, like soft elephants drugged with boredom, invisibly moving, and one groaned with a dim and intolerable fainting, and one didn't know, and there was no one to say, that this was the hunger for words and memories with which to build a tolerable reality!

When Peter was fourteen or thereabouts, the family moved to San Francisco in hope of better luck. He washed bottles in a drug-store, went to night-school, worked in a railroad freight office, and finally embraced enthusiastically the chance to give up a twenty-dollar-a-week job in order to earn five as a cub reporter. Almost too many things happened in the next eight years for credibility. There was the fire, there was the war, to which Peter did not go, there was revolution. No book yet has compassed those years successfully: yet we read each new attempt eagerly, for no years have borne a greater burden. Mr. Matson succeeds better than most, for his emphasis is never on that amazing tide of events but on the boy who struggled through them.

Yet the book suffers a bit from the richness of life. It reminds one at times of Peter's perplexity as he sat in the sunny courtyard of a restaurant in the county seat and "looked quickly all around him, trying to feel the moment as a whole, despairing ever to write a true word—life was so brilliant, rapid, and unexpected. If he wrote of this moment and left out one shining wine glass, one green leaf, he would be a liar; but if he put all in, there wouldn't be paper enough in the world to bear his words."

Mr. Matson is still too inebriated by life to be always the literary craftsman. In the end his book makes its effect cumulatively, because of its wealth of poignantly remembered and honestly described experience. And even estimating its cumulative effect, one sees that the two most tenderly and poignantly drawn portraits, Mary and Knut, are not wholly there, lack those final revealing touches that only a man mad with genius dares to give. One sees that, as a work of art, the book exists because of its lyric qualities; and that Mr. Matson, embroiled in his agitating and deeply realized experience, did not sufficiently see this. If he had seen it the book might have stood beside "The Time of Man," for he can be delightfully the literary craftsman, as the first passages I quoted sufficiently show. As it is he has produced a memorable and fine book, one notable for its detachment, its candor, and its total absence of all kinds of intellectual or artistic hokum.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

The Original Monroe Doctrine

The Monroe Doctrine, 1823-1826. By Dexter Perkins. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

THIS treatise is the most thorough study of the origin, reception, and promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine that has yet been made. To secure materials Mr. Perkins carried on an extensive search in archives and libraries in the Old World and the New.

His monograph presents a fresh discussion of the causes for the promulgation of the famous message of December 2, 1823. Its principle, directed against future European colonization in America, was clearly an American reaction against the Czar's ukase which announced the existence of a Russian sphere of influence in the north Pacific. Rightly does the author scout the notion, which has been entertained by students of diplomacy, that by a secret treaty signed at the Congress of Verona in November, 1822, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia pledged themselves to put an end to the system of representative government in whatever country it might exist in Europe, and to prevent it from being introduced in those countries where it was not yet known. He was unable to discover that in 1823—aside from a prevailing dislike of republican institutions—there was imminent danger of intervention by the Holy Allies in the affairs of South America. However, he accepts the view that France had for some time entertained a design to establish Bourbon monarchies in the Spanish Indies, which was an attempt to reconcile the interests of French commerce with the principle of legitimacy.

In regard to the much-discussed problem of the authorship of the Monroe Doctrine, this study somewhat readjusts the emphasis. Credit for the formulation of the non-colonization principle is assigned chiefly to John Quincy Adams. With respect to the promulgation of the principle of non-intervention, the author gives more credit to Monroe than has ordinarily been attributed in recent years. The "republicanism of the message," Mr. Perkins declares, "sits with a better grace upon Monroe than upon Adams." Sagely does he remark that the original Doctrine of Monroe derived its power and authority mainly from the fact that it expressed the beliefs of many Americans, both great and small.

Although he believes that the message was favorably received in Spanish America, yet Mr. Perkins minimizes its contemporary influence. He rightly appreciates its broader significance as indicative of a clash between two opposing principles: the one of intervention based upon absolutism and the other of non-intervention based upon popular rights.

Some slips mar the high scholarship of this monograph. The famous archival repository at Sevilla is repeatedly designated as the "Archivo General de las Indias." The author did not find all the significant documents concerning intervention that repose in European archives. He has produced, however, a book that should modify American notions in regard to a cardinal feature of our foreign policy. If he has occasionally been a little too iconoclastic, perhaps the net result will be ultimately to chasten that popular idealization of the Monroe Doctrine which has even cast a romantic halo over the heads of its authors.

WILLIAM SPENCE ROBERTSON

The Idea of the State

Sovereignty. A Study of a Contemporary Political Notion. By Paul W. Ward. London: George Routledge and Sons.

THE theory of sovereignty predicates that in every state there is some final and unquestioned center of ultimate authority. Professor Ward's book aims at giving an analysis and criticism of this doctrine as presented by contemporary writers. In an introductory chapter the author traces the historical development of the theory of sovereignty. He then discusses such British Hegelians as Bosanquet and Muirhead and the criticism of Hegelianism by Dewey and Hobhouse. In Sir Henry Jones Professor Ward could have found a more moderate statement of Hegelianism than in the writers he has chosen. The author's sympathy is with the pluralists, but his summary of the views of Figgis, Laski, Cole, and Duguit is eminently dispassionate. It is not, however, true that guild-socialism is now an active movement. As a movement it is a spent force. Nor is it defensible to dismiss syndicalism with a bare reference and to omit entirely fascism and communism. The impact of internationalism on sovereignty is in the main dealt with by a discussion of the views of Krabbe. In a concluding critical résumé, the author follows faithfully the teaching of John Dewey. Within its limited range the book is useful and lucid.

Yet to some aspects of his problem Professor Ward fails to give due appreciation. He is not wholly correct in designating the pluralist criticism of sovereignty as a defense of social groups and not of individuals. The essence of pluralism is individualism. The contemporary emphasis on the group is merely a means to the freedom of the individual. It is the stress on the "inexpugnable variety of human wills" that forms the common basis in the varied views of Hobhouse, Russell, Cole, and Laski. As a matter of fact, the issue between the critical individualism of Professor Laski and the acquiescent statism of Bosanquet is in no vital sense different from the issue between Locke and Filmer, Paine and Burke, Bentham and Blackstone. In the age of Locke, critical political thought aimed at protecting the individual against the then existing authority by endowing him with natural rights and by a departmental separation of governmental powers. Now, however, the aim is at safeguarding the individual not by a departmental separation of powers but by a functional decentralization. In the age of Locke, the liberty desired was political; now it is economic. The setting and applications are different, but the approach is the same.

Again, Professor Ward is not wholly adequate in stating that political theories are offered as mere subsequent justification of interests. The relation between theory and fact is reciprocal. Theory not only justifies but enforces interests. The mere reiteration of the defense of a certain interest tends to strengthen that very interest. Thus, for example, guild-socialism is, surely in part, the expression of a desire on the part of the workers for self-government in industry, but the exposition of that theory undoubtedly has tended to enforce that desire. Furthermore, critical political thought is also prophetic. Significant radical thought is based on an elaboration of the newer tendencies of contemporary society, which tendencies promise fuller development in the future. In such books as Professor Laski's "Grammar of Politics" and the Webbs's "Constitution" we may see in blurred outline some tendencies of the state of the future. Of course, only radical writers can throw such light, for conservative writers such as Bosanquet, Mallock, and McDougall merely justify the present and hence cannot indicate the direction of events. Critical theory is thus not merely passive but active and creative.

LEWIS ROCKOW

Books in Brief

The Practical Application of Sociology. A Study of the Scope and Purpose of Applied Sociology. By Herbert Newhard Shenton. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

The purpose of applied sociology is to discover ways and means of reducing the expenditure of human energy and of minimizing the economic costs of social control. When Lester Frank Ward was writing his voluminous tomes and wielding a genuine influence upon the social thinking of the latter part of the nineteenth century he was inspired by the belief that sociology would, like the "woman-soul" in Faust, lead us upward and onward forever. Telesis was to him that attribute of society most sharply opposed to genesis, by means of which society moved toward its approved goal, while applied sociology assumed the task of pointing out this goal. Ward's confusion of sociology and ethics, together with his emphasis upon meliorism, has not been accepted by a later generation of more practically minded students of society. Mr. Shenton is concerned not so much with purpose as with ways and means. Social control has become a technique which we now see as capable of use for either good or ill. Particularly in connection with business and industry does applied sociology offer assistance to the entrepreneur in controlling his workmen. Everywhere men strive to get other men to do what they want them to do. A study of social motivation in large and small groups, the discovery of the appeals which bring action and the technique of making these appeals, introduces into sociology many of the aspects of industrial and efficiency engineering. Mr. Shenton feels that each of the sciences has developed most rapidly when men began to see some practical use for it; it is his belief that applied sociology is about to come into its own, after which it will in turn serve to enrich the "pure" science from which it sprang. It will serve to unite the progress of sociological knowledge with the practice of empirical science and be useful in devising ways and means of achieving proximate social ends.

Hymen, or the Future of Marriage. By Norman Haire. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

To one who has been immunized against so-called "startling sex discussions" this brief discussion of marriage today and its future tomorrow seems to have fallen short in its prophetic proclamations. The book contains a plea for companionate marriage for the young, accompanied by the necessary frankness in sex discussion. All this would avail naught without legalized birth-control information and easy divorce. So much for the today of marriage. Tomorrow there will be brilliant possibilities for marriage as an institution. Though "life-long monogamous marriages are the ideal," legalized polygamy will also prevail. Men and women will be equally self-supporting. Children will be educated and cared for by the state if it is economically necessary. Men and women unfit to become parents will be sterilized, and the logical accompaniment of this will be legalized abortion and state infanticide of unfit children. To cap the future of marriage, as it were, there will be artificial reproduction or ectogenesis. Babies will be born in glass tubes! This little book contains a galaxy of sex concepts—all of them have been found in one or another of man's Utopias.

Spokesmen. By T. K. Whipple. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

Critical essays on our established literary figures, written with an attractive sobriety. Mr. Whipple has little that is new to say; but that may be the result of the simplicity of his subject matter. His major thesis is a familiar one: the middle generation of writers, from Robinson to O'Neill (though, very properly he begins with a consideration of the buccinator, Henry Adams) are primarily engaged in a portrayal of the spiritual frustration inherent in American life. It is a gloomy formula inherited from Van Wyck Brooks and applied with no little skill and a tact that precludes irrelevant aesthetic judgments.

Aphra Behn. By V. Sackville-West. Annie Besant. By Geoffrey West. Lady Hester Stanhope. By Martin Armstrong. Bianca Cappello. By Clifford Bax. Representative Women Series. The Viking Press. $2 each.

The glamor of the Italian Renaissance, bloody, amorous, colorful, and cruel, may be what makes the tale of Bianca Cappello immeasurably the most fascinating so far in the series of which these volumes are the first. One suspects, however, that Mr. Clifford Bax has made the most of his history of the young, beautiful, and intrepid Venetian girl, whom he calls a genius, the mistress and later the wife of Francesco di Medici, who successfully defied the great Medici family, and from her beginnings as the declasse wife of a Florentine nobody, and the despised mistress of a notorious rake, came to be Grand Duchess of Tuscany and Daughter of the Venetian Republic, the latter a title which even the powerful Medici could not but respect. Lady Hester Stanhope, too, is painted by Martin Armstrong in broad, flowing strokes. Niece of William Pitt the younger, "lively, fascinating, garrulous, concealed," she ended her days romantically enough walled up in a deserted monastery in the heart of the Druse country, after thirty years of splendid living and traveling in the mysterious East. Beside these two glowing pictures, the studies of Aphra Behn and even Mrs. Besant seem a little dull and thin. But these women, and doubtless all women who in any age when men were masters were able to rise above their sex's slavery, have something in common—a certain arrogance, the pride and courage usually thought of as masculine, and the fascination of personality.

Some of them had the advantage of beauty, but all of them were (and Mrs. Besant at eighty still is) compelling, lively, full of burning energy, and irresistible because they were interesting.

Nuits de Princes. By J. Kessel. Paris: Editions de France.

Two years ago, in "L'Équipage," M. Kessel steered his way between "Le Tombeau sous l'Arc de Triomphe" and "Tout Ce Que Vous Voudrez, Mon Général," and treated the war without a thesis. Now he takes another subject which is usually done either all in black or all in white and views the Russian émigrés in Paris as human beings. The obscure life of a respectable Paris pension, which is recorded in the first half of the book, and the hot alcoholic suffocation of a Montmartre café-chantant, which fills the second, are joined by M. Kessel's delicate suggestion of a common factor, the submerged tension between the past and the present of his characters. It is present in them all; some it makes tight-lipped; others loose-mouthed; in each it is ready to flare to a climax of mad forgetfulness, whether it be the insane riding of Prince Fédor at the Cossack exhibition or the scattering of Hélène's seamstress's earnings in flowers to decorate the New Year's table. M. Kessel came to his theme prepared by his two previous books on Russia, "La Steppe Rouge" and "Les Rois Aveugles" (in collaboration with Hélène Iswolsky), which dealt with the present and the past regime respectively. He had already had experience in dealing with a group of people all living under the same tension, for it was the strain on a flying squadron in active service which knit "L'Équipage" together. It is consequently not remarkable that "Nuits de Princes" has already gone to 100,000 copies.

The Minor Prophets in the Freer Collection and the Berlin Fragment of Genesis. By Henry A. Sanders and Carl Schmidt. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

This is another example of the remarkable work that Professor Sanders of the University of Michigan has been doing in recent years to make generally available the remains of ancient documents recovered from the sands of Egypt. The papyrus fragments here assembled contain a considerable section of the Minor Prophets in Greek from a manuscript thought to have been written in the latter part of the third century A.D. In the second part of the volume Professor Schmidt of Berlin edits a similar Greek papyrus of about the same date containing the greater part of the first thirty-five chapters of Genesis. The volume is splendidly printed and illustrated.

Monsieur Croche, the Dilettante Hater. From the French of Claude Debussy. With a Foreword by Lawrence Gilman. Viking Press. $2.

Debussy writes about music in the manner of Dorothy Parker about books. The results are almost always amusing, and at times, in their quiet way, they are side-splitting (for example, his discussion of Wagner's "Ring," which, regrettably, he omits from this volume). The refined irony and malice are those of the sensitive person who is apt to have sharply defined, intensely felt sympathies and antipathies, and to astonish one alternately with his penetration and his lack of understanding. Often, therefore, when he is most amusing, Debussy is unsympathetic and unfair. And so the value of his remarks, as Mr. Gilman observes, "is not always so much in the light that they throw upon their subject matter as in their disclosure of the mind of the writer."

The Development of English Biography. By Harold Nicolson. Hogarth Lectures on Literature Series. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.25.

This is an excellent combination of scholarly research and suave artistry. One may occasionally question Mr. Nicolson's judgment—notably his over-adulation of Lockhart's "Life of Scott"—but one can question neither the soundness of his learning nor the skill of his presentation.

Music

Bayreuth—1928

Bayreuth, August 1

BAYREUTH stands for authenticity in the performance of Wagner. In Bayreuth are preserved the traditions received from Wagner himself by his associates and disciples and handed down by them to others. In Bayreuth is achieved also the perfection in the stage ensemble, in the singing of the chorus, that comes only with weeks of patient rehearsal by persons devoted to their task. In Bayreuth one hears an orchestra that is the pick of German orchestras, playing in a theater with remarkable acoustic qualities, and in a sunken pit which enables the singers to be heard clearly. In Bayreuth one sees the best settings and stage arrangements, the product of the talents of that great regisseur, Siegfried Wagner.

This is the legend; and it caused me to postpone hearing Wagner almost entirely until I could hear him at Bayreuth. And indeed, putting aside the talents of Siegfried Wagner, which did not strike me as an asset, and the typical German woodwind section of the otherwise magnificent orchestra—putting these aside, it was true that even when the acting was bad, which it was for the most part, there was a working together instead of as individuals which gave the productions a tone of nobility and elevation. It was true that while the chorus looked and behaved quite like the choruses in most opera houses, it sang beautifully, as most other choruses do not. It was true that, what with the smaller size of the theater and its acoustic excellence, the singers—Larsén-Todsen and Melchior, for example—sang better than in New York. The singing, in fact, exceeded expectations. Very little of it was poor; most of it was good (there was a better Tristan in Gunnar Graarud, a better Parsifal in Gotthelf Pistor, than we have heard in New York); and some of it—notably of Larsén-Todsen and Friedrich Schoor, and of Frieda Leider, who was in addition the one female singer whose movements were dramatically effective—was superb.

As for the conducting, the opening performance, of "Tristan und Isolde," conducted by Karl Elmendorff, was what one had been led to expect: it was not spirited or inspiring, but it was lucid, carefully modeled, and perfectly finished. The second performance, of "Parsifal," exceeded expectations, for it was conducted by Karl Muck, the last of the early Wagner conductors, who at the age of seventy gave a performance that was almost incredible in its strength and control, its dramatic intensity and point. But then came the first of the Ring cycle, "Das Rheingold," conducted by Franz von Hoesslin; and I have never heard a performance with pretensions to being first-rate that was more wretchedly bungling. Von Hoesslin seemed unable to set and maintain any particular tempo. This was evident immediately in the prelude, in which moreover neither the sound of the brass nor that of the woodwinds synchronized with that of the strings, so that the confusion was complete. If this was the result of five weeks of rehearsal, von Hoesslin was not fit for his job; and I should say this was so even though the succeeding operas sounded successively better; for they were bound to do so, being successively so much better music, and his deficiencies remained in evidence throughout. The close of "Götterdämmerung" was a mess.

I do not, therefore, agree with Siegfried Wagner that the most urgent needs of Bayreuth are tenors and money. He cannot, as he says, give "Tannhäuser" for lack of a suitable tenor; while Muck claims not to know of a single good Tristan. And he is further hampered by lack of money in the face of high and rising costs. For this he is himself partly to blame.

Bavaria is, of course, the home of reactionary, anti-Republican, anti-Semitic opinion in Germany; and Bayreuth is one of the foci of the infection (during my stay there was a meeting at which a General von Epp, described as the savior of Munich, spoke on the good old days of the German army, and the way to salvation for all Germany). The Siegfried Wagners seem not only to have sympathized but to have done so officially. They not only entertained Adolf Hitler at Villa Wahnfried, but, as we read in America, permitted nationalist demonstrations in the Festival Theater and until this year flew the old imperial flag above it. The result was a strong sentiment against the Bayreuth Festival in the rest of Germany, particularly among such wealthy Jews as patronized and subsidized artistic activities; and this sentiment the Wagners have not yet succeeded in changing by public disavowals.

Perhaps, then, one urgent need is a change in management; but I started out to say that the most urgent need was not tenors or money, but good conductors. It is, however, a need of Bayreuth because it is a need of all Germany, as we have recently had occasion to observe in America. Muck ascribes it to the war: a link is missing, he says; a whole generation was lost, he himself knowing of five young men with great talent who were killed. The result is that young men who show the slightest talent, instead of being trained by older men, are seized upon at once to fill responsible positions into which they have had no time to grow; and that most of them have not enough talent to begin with. What, he asks, is the use of teaching traditions to such men? A traditional tempo was set, and was given its value, by a genuine feeling for the music performed; how can it be taught to someone who does not start with the feeling; how can he give it any value; how can he deal with the real situation; which is that there is no single traditional tempo, that if one has a good singer one can hold back, and if one has a poor singer one has got to go faster?

Muck could conduct every production at Bayreuth, but he has not the strength to rehearse it. Since there is nobody else to conduct "Parsifal," he feels obliged to do that; and so his "Parsifal" is the sole glory of Bayreuth and, for some time at any rate, its last.

B. H. HAGGIN

THEATER

THE ACTOR MANAGERS present

GRAND STREET FOLLIES

OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Labor Day & Sat.

Help Yourself

Jerome: or, The Latitude of Love,

by Maurice Bedel

John Brown's Body, by Stephen Vincent Benét

Swan Song, by John Galsworthy

Bad Girl, by Viña Delmar

The Bridge of San Luis Rey,

by Thornton Wilder

Any one of these books will be sent FREE in return for one new subscription to The Nation (at $5) secured outside your immediate household.

Address Department 11

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York City

International Relations Section

The Kellogg Treaties Sanction War*

By EDWIN M. BORCHARD

I

THE origin of the negotiations between the United States and other Powers leading to the conclusion of the so-called Kellogg Treaties is well known. Beginning with an expression of good-will in M. Briand's note of April 6, 1927, commemorating the entry of the United States into the war and expressing France's willingness to conclude a treaty renouncing war between France and the United States, the negotiations developed rapidly. On June 20, 1927, the French Foreign Minister presented the draft of a treaty embodying his proposal, providing for a condemnation of "recourse to war" and renouncing war as between France and the United States as an "instrument of their national policy." The settlement of all disputes was never to be sought "except by pacific means."

On December 28, 1927, Mr. Kellogg proposed to the French ambassador the extension of the proposed declaration to all the principal Powers. It was argued in the United States that, if the treaty were signed by the United States and France alone, it would be a treaty of alliance. In his accompanying draft of a treaty, Mr. Kellogg recommended the outright and unconditional renunciation of war and the solution of disputes by pacific means only.

The French press was critical. It was maintained that France had obligations to the League of Nations and could not make these new commitments. But the criticism was dropped after forty-eight hours on the publication of the French reply undertaking to renounce "wars of aggression." This gave apparently a new turn to the negotiations. The State Department did not reply officially, but officers of the department pointed out that the term "aggressive" changed the entire meaning of the proposition and was not acceptable to the United States. In this position the State Department seems to have had the support of the American press. Editorially it was agreed that "renunciation" was too intricate an expression to define and that the French interpolation of this qualification left Mr. Kellogg's proposition denatured of its vital part and meaningless. Mr. Kellogg pointed out in his new note that the first French note of June 20, 1927, contained no limitation of wars of aggression. In this connection it is well to note that Sir Austen Chamberlain rejected the attempted definition of "aggressor" in the Geneva Protocol as, I believe, one who declines to submit a dispute to discussion in these words: "I therefore remain opposed to this attempt to define the 'aggressor' because I believe that it will be a trap for the innocent and a signpost for the guilty."

Considerable correspondence took place in the early part of 1928 as to the construction to be given to the proposed treaty. In his note of February 27, 1928, in explaining his objection to qualifications on the obligation to renounce war, Mr. Kellogg stated:

The ideal which inspires the effort so sincerely and so hopefully put forward by your [the French] Govern- ment and mine is arresting and appealing just because of its purity and simplicity; and I cannot avoid the feeling that if governments should publicly acknowledge that they can only deal with this ideal in a technical spirit and must insist on the adoption of reservations impairing, if not utterly destroying, the true significance of their common endeavors, they would be in effect only recording their impotence, to the keen disappointment of mankind in general.

The same thought was expressed in Mr. Kellogg's speech to the Council of Foreign Relations on March 15, 1928, in which he said:

It seems to me that any attempt to define the word "aggression" and by exceptions and qualifications to stipulate when nations are justified in going to war with one another would greatly weaken the effect of any treaty such as that under consideration and virtually destroy its positive value as a "guaranty of peace."

The subsequent negotiations, however, disclose the unfortunate fact that these very exceptions and qualifications to which Mr. Kellogg objected as so nullifying in effect have, in fact, found their way into the treaty as now universally construed.

The French Government maintained that the treaties must be construed so as not to bar the right of legitimate defense, the performance of obligations under the Covenant of the League of Nations, under the treaties of Locarno, under its treaties of alliance with its allies—now for some unexplainable reason called treaties of neutrality—that the treaty was to become ineffective if violated by one nation, and that it was to be signed by every state before it became effective as to any state. With the exception of this last reservation, Secretary Kellogg agreed to this interpretation of the French Government in his speech before the American Society of International Law on April 28, 1928, and incorporated his interpretation of this reservation as to self-defense, wars under the League Covenant, under the treaties of Locarno, and certain undefined and evidently unknown "neutrality" treaties, in his note of June 23, 1928, to the Powers, some fifteen in number, adding that "none of these governments has expressed any dissent from the above-quoted construction."

In his note of May 19, 1928, accepting the American proposition in principle, Sir Austen Chamberlain for Great Britain expressed his assent to the reservations made by France and added a new one in the following paragraph:

There are certain regions of the world, the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety. His Majesty's Government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions cannot be suffered. Their protection against attack is to the British Empire a measure of self-defense. It must be clearly understood that His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect. The Government of the United States have comparable interests, any disregard of which by a foreign Power they have declared they would regard as an unfriendly act.

*An address delivered before the Williams Institute of Politics.

The words in italic were repeated in the British note of July 18, 1928, undertaking to sign the treaty only on the understanding that the British Government maintain this freedom of action with respect to those regions of the world in which it had "a special and vital interest."

II

The original proposition of Mr. Kellogg was an unconditional renunciation of war. The treaty now qualified by the French and British reservations constitutes no renunciation or outlawry of war, but in fact and in law a solemn sanction for all wars mentioned in the exceptions and qualifications. When we look at the exceptions we observe that they include wars of self-defense, each party being free to make its own interpretation as to when self-defense is involved, wars under the League Covenant, under the Locarno treaties, and under the French treaties of alliance. If self-defense could be limited to the terms "to defend its territory from attack or invasion," as suggested by Mr. Kellogg, it would be of some value, but it is understood that no specific definition of self-defense is necessarily accepted. Considering these reservations, it would be difficult to conceive of any wars that nations have fought within the past century, or are likely to fight in the future, that cannot be accommodated under these exceptions. Far from constituting an outlawry of war, they constitute the most solemn sanction of specific wars that has ever been given to the world. This cannot be charged primarily to Secretary Kellogg, whose intentions were of the best, but is a result of the reservations insisted upon by European Powers, which, it is still to be feared, comprehend peace as a condition of affairs achieved through war or the threat of war. The mere renunciation of war in the abstract in the first article of the treaty has but little scope for application, in view of the wars in the concrete, which the accompanying construction of the treaty sanctions. It is idle to suppose that the official construction given to the treaty by all the signatory Powers is not as much an integral part of the treaty as if it had been made a part of Article 1.

Again it will be noticed that we recognize a British claim to use war as an instrument of national policy in certain undefined "regions of the world," any "interference" with which by anybody, including the United States, will be regarded by Great Britain as a cause of war. To this we subscribe. When the United States at the first Hague Conference secured recognition by our cosignatories for the Monroe Doctrine, it was regarded as an achievement of American diplomacy. But the Monroe Doctrine has geographical limits known to everybody. To this new British claim there are no geographical limits. The vague and expansive terms of the British claim to make war, now recognized by us, covers any part of the world in which Britain has "a special and vital interest." No such broad claim of the right to make war has ever before been recognized.

But the most extraordinary feature of this treaty still remains to be mentioned. It will have been noticed that we recognize the legality of League wars and Locarno wars. As Europe correctly seems to assume, we are now bound by League decisions as to aggressors and League policy generally but without any opportunity to take part in the deliberations leading to League conclusions. We indeed

BOOKS

What I Believe

By Dr. WILLIAM J. ROBINSON

The clear, frank, unequivocal and complete CREDO of a man who has never beaten about the bush. All questions of interest to eager, forward-looking men and women discussed and answered.

Price: $2.50. Introductory price: $2.00.

THE CRITIC AND GUIDE

12 Mt. Morris Park West,

New York City

Ask for free sample copy of Critic and Guide.

THE MYTH OF ADAM AND EVE By Paul Lafargue

The Genesis story studied in the light of modern anthropology. Brilliant, fascinating, suggestive. 25 cents, postpaid.

Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago

Atheist Tracts Free

"Godless Evolution" and "The Bible in the Balance".

Write: American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, Inc., 119 East 14th St., New York City.

IMPORTED WOOLENS

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS

Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price. Postage Paid.

Suit Lengths Cut to Order. NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired.

EUROPEAN SCHOOLS

The American Schools in the Old World

Chateau de Bures Par Villennes, Seine et Oise, France

Country Boarding School to Prepare Boys for American Colleges

80 acres. Own farm. New dormitories with outdoor sleeping porches. Gymnasium. Athletic fields. 17 miles from Paris.

Paris American Day School 57 Rue Boileau, Paris, XVI For boys and girls under 12

Both Schools—Modern Progressive Methods, Music, Art, Sciences. 25 American and Foreign Masters

For information address, The Secretary, Box 675, Amherst, Mass.

Your Fall Problem Apartments

Let The Nation help solve your apartment problem. We are doing it all the time for others.

This advertiser had an apartment to rent . . .

"My apartment advertised in The Nation was rented the day the magazine appeared on the stands."

This advertiser was looking for an apartment . . .

"We've rented a delightful apartment through the ad we ran in your publication."

Rates: Minimum 1/2 inch (30 words)..... $3.08
Each additional 6 words..... .62
Discount for 3 insertions..... 5%

THE NATION—20 Vesey St.—New York City
Telephone—Whitehall 7750

recognize by this treaty the legal right of the League to make war against us, and it will be observed that Sir Austen Chamberlain in his note of May 19, 1928, frankly admits that respect for the obligations arising out of the Covenant is "the foundation of the policy" of Great Britain. Whether the further European claim that we are bound to support League conclusions as to "aggressor" nations, and other political conclusions, either by joining with the League or by refusing to trade with the League-declared pariah, is sustainable or not, at the very best it places us in the uncomfortable position either of being bound by decisions in the making of which we had no part or of having recriminations leveled against us for refusing to support our treaty. The new contract begins with diverse interpretations of its obligations, for European views, reflected by Mr. Edwin James of the New York Times, leave no doubt that Europe regards this treaty as a means of involving us in European politics. And we are entangled in the most dangerous way, for we are bound by decisions made in our absence, even decisions made against ourselves—because the recognition of the French and British reservations, now made the authoritative interpretation of the treaty by all the signatories, is a commitment for us. Our hands are tied, not theirs. The reservations are made at our expense, not theirs. Far better and safer would it be had we openly joined the League of Nations and been privileged to take part in deliberations which may lead to most important consequences. We might have been able to prevent undesirable conclusions and use our bargaining power to obtain occasional benefits and advantages instead of disadvantages only. We are now about to sign a treaty in which we expressly recognize the right of the other signatories to make war upon anybody, including ourselves, for the purpose of enforcing, even against us, their mutual obligations under the Covenant of the League of Nations, not to mention individual undefined national interests in any part of the world. They alone will determine the occasion of such action, without our participation.

In justice to Europe, it cannot be said that they have left us in doubt as to their conception of our obligations. Indeed, these obligations are expressly or implicitly contained in the very reservations which the United States has accepted. Should we repudiate these commitments, we shall be denounced as a violator of our own treaty and not without some justification.

It has not been a pleasant task to analyze these treaties. The original American proposal was progressive, pure and simple, to use Mr. Kellogg's expression. The European amendments transformed the proposal into something entirely different—into a universal sanction for war, into a recognition by us of Europe's right to wage war, even against the United States, whenever the individual interests of certain nations are deemed to require it and whenever the League, in its uncontrolled discretion, decides upon it.

Need more be said? Would it not be far better either to join the League outright and have a share in those deliberations which to us may be so portentous or, better still, make the recourse to arbitration of justiciable issues and the submission to conciliation of non-justiciable issues obligatory at the request of either party? That would be a positive commitment which would make war extremely difficult, whereas the present treaties make war extremely easy. It is to be doubted whether the supposed valuable psychological effects of renunciation of war in the abstract can counterbalance the positive legal sanction for war in the concrete. If this treaty is ever ratified, the test of its efficacy will be its effect on a limitation of armaments. The President's declaration that it is not expected to have any such effect and the avowed pleasure of certain foreign official newspapers at that promise hardly justify at the moment strong hopes of such a result. The abolition of war will, therefore, have to be pursued along other lines. Possibly in the elimination of the economic causes of conflict, including the attempted monopoly of raw materials and markets and in the entente of business interests across national boundaries, there lies more hope than in legal efforts to preserve by force the status quo. Other machinery is needed to make changes in existing conditions, when time and circumstances require. To that effort but little attention has yet been paid. These matters are mentioned merely to indicate that, even if the Kellogg treaties are not ratified or are accompanied by explanatory reservations on our part, the solution of the problem of war and peace among independent nations has, perhaps, hardly been begun.

Contributors to This Issue

JOHN GALSWORTHY, English poet, novelist, and playwright, is the author of "Swan Song," "The Forsyte Saga," "The Fugitive," "Escape," "Justice," and other works.

CHARLES M. WILSON is assistant editor of All's Well, published in Fayetteville, Arkansas, by Charles J. Finger.

H. E. is a pseudonym.

ERNEST GRUENING, former managing editor of The Nation, is now editor of the Portland, Maine, Evening News.

MERRILL MOORE was a member of the "Fugitive" group of poets of Nashville, Tennessee.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is the author of "A New Constitution for a New America."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS frequently contributes to current periodicals.

WILLIAM SPENCE ROBERTSON is professor of history at the University of Illinois.

LEWIS ROCKOW is a member of the faculty of Syracuse University.

EDWIN M. BORCHARD is professor of international law at Yale University.

THE GRANDSON OF THE LIBERATOR

A biographical sketch of Oswald Garrison Villard

by

R. L. DUFFUS

Reprinted from THE AMERICAN MERCURY

Ten cents

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., N. Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1928

No. 3297

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	237
EDITORIALS:
The Importance of Six Men.....	240
What Brookwood Means.....	241
Hot Weather .....	241
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN. By Heywood Broun.....	242
INSULL-ATING THE COOLIDGE CABINET. By Frederic Babcock...	243
EITHER WAY, THE SOUTH WINS. By J. N. Aiken.....	244
CITIZEN, DO YOUR DUTY! By William Jourdan Rapp.....	245
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	246
CORRESPONDENCE .....	247
BOOKS:
Autumn. By Charles Norman.....	248
The Problem of Dialect. By Clifton P. Fadiman.....	248
American Specialists in Russia. By Norah Meade.....	249
A New Logic. By Mortimer J. Adler.....	250
What Manner of Man Was Grey? By Harry Elmer Barnes.....	251
Books in Brief.....	252
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
World Copyright. By L. J. de Bekker.....	253

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROUN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

SOVIET RUSSIA'S REPLY to France's invitation to sign the Kellogg "peace pact" was so pertinent that it is almost sure to be ignored. We regret, the Russians said, that your pact includes no obligations whatsoever to disarm, for "universal and full disarmament is the only actual means of preventing armed conflicts because in an atmosphere of general feverish armament every competition of the Powers inevitably leads to war." Furthermore, they remarked, it is not enough to renounce what is technically known as war; there should also be a ban upon "such military actions as, for instance, intervention, blockade, military occupation of foreign territory, foreign ports, etc." They even suggested that when the Powers were agreeing to use only peaceful means in settling their disputes they might abandon as unpeaceful means "the refusal to establish peaceful and normal relations or the rupture of these relations between peoples because such actions mean the suspension of peaceful methods in solution of disputes and by their very existence contribute to the creation of an atmosphere favorable to the breaking out of wars"—truths which will hardly be relished in Washington or in London. The Russians next attacked the British reservations to the pact (which indeed seem to rob it of all pacific meaning), asserting that they constitute "an attempt to use the compact itself as an instrument of imperialistic policy." Nevertheless, since the pact imposes certain obligations on the Powers, before the bar of public opinion, and since it offers a new occasion to raise the question of disarmament, the Russians express their readiness to sign it. Trouble-makers they are indeed! We have not heard such healthy common sense talked about the pact since it first took form.

"WHAT IS THE MONROE DOCTRINE?" sounds like a simple question. But the Council of the League of Nations pondered it for an entire day, and decided that on the whole it was safer not to answer, nor even to ask the United States, but to leave it an unsolved international conundrum. The Covenant of the League includes a clause expressly recognizing the Monroe Doctrine, and Costa Rica, which some years ago retired from the League and has been invited to return, politely inquired just what it was she would be asked to indorse. The grave heads of Geneva looked at one another, but none dared reply. At a secret all-day session of the Council, it is said, the representatives of three Latin-American nations told the European plenipotentiaries "very interesting" things, but the conclusion of their deliberations was that Costa Rica had been indiscreet and that it was better to leave it understood that the Monroe Doctrine was just the Monroe Doctrine. Doubtless that was the safest course. But we wish the League had asked Washington to define the Monroe Doctrine. It would be a shock to some of our imperial statesmen if they ever found themselves compelled to read President Monroe's modest declarations and to compare them with the extravagances of our present policy.

PRESIDENT CALLES DOES NOT CHOOSE to run for President again; he says so in terms which cannot be misunderstood, and gives reasons for his choice. Mexico's dictator refuses to dictate, and his refusal marks another stage in Mexico's democratic evolution. "Perhaps for the only time in our history," he told the Mexican Congress, "there will be an opportunity for a democratic contest in which all men, civilian or military, may engage." There are few parallels in history to this voluntary renunciation of power, and Calles's solemn appeal to the army—which so often in Mexico's history has settled elections as it willed—to be loyal to the legal institutions of the state was as impressive as novel. When Obregon was assassinated, it seemed as if Calles must remain in power to save Mexico; but he has found an even better way of serving his country—by teaching it the meaning of constitutional civilian government.

MICHAEL KAROLYI'S BOAT stopped over two days in New York, on its way from Mexico to Spain, and Michael Karolyi spent the two days ashore and made a speech. Yet, so far as we are aware, no one slept the worse because of the presence in the United States of the first President of the Republic of Hungary. A State Department official gave up his Saturday afternoon golf in order to meet the Socialist aristocrat; no other disturbance has been reported. Yet four years ago a set of silly Washington bureaucrats, more or less under the influence of the reactionary gang that rules Hungary today, told Count Karolyi that he could come to this country only on condition that he make no speeches; and two years ago the same officials refused a visa to a very charming lady simply because she happened to be Count Karolyi's wife. This stupid ban, and the consequent protests, of course made Count Karolyi and his cause better known in this country than his speeches, made with the double handicap of an alien tongue and an impediment in speech, could possibly have done; and perhaps the bureaucrats have learned a lesson. At any rate, they graciously permitted Count Karolyi two days in the United States this year. Give them time, and they may recall that in an earlier age the United States sent a warship down New York Harbor to greet the exile Louis Kossuth, who expressed in Hungary three-quarters of a century ago the same warm-hearted democratic spirit that Michael Karolyi expresses today.

THE TEMPERATURE of the Sino-Japanese negotiations has dropped several degrees. The American note of July 24, announcing our readiness to recognize Chinese tariff autonomy on January 1, 1929, may have had something to do with the change of tone. Britain and America have both given unmistakable indication that recent Japanese aggression in China has not their support; and Japan can hardly contemplate without fear the effect upon her trade of open warfare in China. Precisely what the Japanese have been doing is, as usual, hidden behind an Oriental mist. Quite possibly the Foreign Office, the army, and certain private interests have been pursuing contradictory policies—that has happened before. The report of British engineers upon the railway explosion which blew up Chang Tso-lin's train and killed the old master of Manchuria three months ago tends strongly to confirm the Chinese charge that the catastrophe was the work of skilled Japanese army engineers; but there is no direct evidence. Furthermore, it is difficult to believe that the defeated Northern troops which remain encamped just inside the Great Wall have not had foreign support; and now they are beginning to make trouble again, interfering with railway transport between Mukden and Peking. In Shantung, for the moment, all is quiet, but Tsinanfu is still occupied by Japanese troops. On the other hand, the Japanese Foreign Office has felt compelled to issue a diplomatic denial that it ever warned Chang Tso-lin's son against allying Manchuria with the Nationalists, and even if the denial is not believed it indicates a healthy sense of guilt.

ACHMED ZOGU BEY has decided to be crowned King of Albania, with the resonant title of Scanderbeg III. Time was when the Albanians prosaically offered their throne to Mr. George Fred Williams of Boston, who sagely declined it, realizing, perhaps, that his cognomen and antecedents were too simple for the task. Prince William of Wied, a few antiquarians will recall, accepted a rather tottering kingship in 1912, calling himself mpret, but some time after the outbreak of the World War mpret William stole home to the more comfortable shores of the Rhine. Since his day Albania has seen premiers and presidents come and go—among others a young graduate of Harvard who was also a bishop. Achmed Zogu rose to power as a pupil and protege of Mussolini, but there are incidents in the career of the first Scanderbeg, from whom Achmed takes his new name, which may cause Mussolini a little thought. Some five hundred years ago Giorgio Castriota, alias Iskender Bey, alias Scanderbeg, alias the Dragon of Albania, became a Moslem and took service with the Sultan of Turkey, under whom he held high office for twenty years. Then, when the Hungarian Hunyadi Janos had won a convenient victory over his masters, Scanderbeg suddenly recalled that years before the Turks had villainously poisoned his own two brothers; he turned Christian, rallied the mountain clans about himself, and fared forth to battle, slaying 3,000 Turks, according to tradition, with his own brown fists. Just what part of the first Scanderbeg's history does Scanderbeg III wish particularly to recall?

LIBERIA'S RUBBER PLANTATIONS, far away on the tropic coast of Africa, dominated the closing days of the Williamstown Institute of Politics. Raymond Leslie Buell, research director of the Foreign Policy Association, repeated the story which he told in The Nation for May 2. Following Mr. Hoover's screams about the British rubber monopoly, he said, Harvey Firestone and his associates planned a rubber empire in the little Negro republic, and the State Department supported his dream. William R. Castle, Jr., Acting Secretary of State, promptly came forward with a "denial" which abundantly substantiated Mr. Buell's essential charges. Liberia is today an American colony. The revenues of the Government can be expended only in accordance with a budget drawn up by a financial adviser designated by the President of the United States; the Liberian treasurer cannot write a check until it has been preaudited by an American auditor. The customs are collected by Americans, at a cost of 24.3 per cent, as compared with 4.5 per cent in the neighboring British colony of Sierra Leone. Firestone has taken over a million acres of land—4 per cent of the entire territory of this jungle country—for his plantations, and is recruiting a labor army on terms which, while comparing favorably with those used on some other African colonies, still constitute, as Mr. Buell says, "virtual slave labor." While enlightened British and French colonial administrators are seeking to build up a native small-farm system, the United States throws its influence in behalf of the murderous plantation system which has ruined the Congo. We hope that Secretary Castle will issue more "denials"; they advertise hidden facts.

DISASTERS LIKE THE SUBWAY WRECK of August 24 in New York City are usually followed by a tedious and agonizing game of legal hide-and-seek. Claim adjusters and "ambulance-chasers" vie with each other in frightening or cajoling inexperienced victims, and sometimes both the victims and the corporations are robbed of huge sums by these middlemen of the calamity market. Delay in winning damages in our overcrowded courts is one of the worst features of such disasters. In the case of five women workers poisoned by radium in a New Jersey factory only the vigorous campaign of the New York World brought about a settlement in time for the compensation to be of any use to the victims. Obviously, the proper place to settle damage cases in which the responsibility for the disaster is clear is a committee of arbitration. We heartily indorse the campaign of the New York Telegram to bring about a settlement of all the claims growing out of the Times Square subway wreck through arbitration, with immediate payment of hospital bills and emergency relief funds by the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. Perhaps the use of temporary arbitration committees will lead to the establishment of permanent State or federal bodies to take such cases out of our overburdened courts.

WE NEED MORE COAL BARONS like Josephine Roche of the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company of Colorado. In a State which is dominated by anti-union employers and made notorious by the slaughter of miners in great strikes Miss Roche has set out to make her mines a model of social justice. She gained control of the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company a little more than a year ago and put its five mines in charge of progressive officials for reorganization. On September 1 a contract between her company and the United Mine Workers went into effect for an increase of wages, the elimination of certain working conditions, the substitution of peaceful collective bargaining for strikes, and the establishment of a new department of medicine and sanitation. The miners receive twenty-three cents a day more than under the prevailing wage-scale in the district, and they agree to cooperate in maintaining efficiency so that the company can afford to pay the differential. A complete system of socialized medical service is set up under the joint support and control of the miners and the company. The most significant thing in Miss Roche's policy and the thing which differentiates it most clearly from the Rockefeller company-union policy in Colorado is that she trusts the miners to choose their own leaders and affiliate with their own national organization. We hope that the miners will justify her confidence and demonstrate that social justice in coal mining is commercially practical.

BEFORE THE NEW BEDFORD ROTARY CLUB serious-minded New Englanders recently discussed the problem of getting rid of the "Red menace" that has loomed so large since the start of the New Bedford textile strike. The speaker of the day was Edward H. Hunter, executive secretary of the Industrial Defense Association of Boston. He reported enthusiastically the handling of Reds in other localities; he told how the radicals in Colorado had been locked in box-cars and sent out of the State, and how the police in Lynn and other cities had issued "warnings" forceful enough to result in the departure of radicals. Another speaker, John L. Burton, a mill agent, told how the strike in Lawrence was broken when one of "Big Bill" Haywood's followers was "taken up an alley and everybody, police and all, had a belt at him." As soon as questions were in order Mayor Ashley rose to speak.

I have been criticized [he said] a great deal by men sitting before you now for not driving the so-called radicals out of this city . . . or for ever allowing them to come in. Mr. Hunter, do you know of any law that gives me or the chief of our police power to ship them out of New Bedford?

Alas, at this point Mr. Hunter was a disappointment: he did not know of any such law and could only suggest "education" as a means of combating the Reds. Why, that's the sort of stuff the intelligentsia and Bolsheviki talk.

THE FRENCH POLICE lacked the Gallic flair when they stopped ten stalwart women at the gates of Rambouillet. Not understanding the enthusiasm of American feminists for martyrdom they arrested them; and accordingly they put the cause of equal rights for women on the front pages of some thousands of newspapers. Miss Doris Stevens and her associates of the Committee on International Action of the National Women's Party had seized the occasion of the signing of the Kellogg peace pact to demand a hearing on their proposed international treaty guaranteeing equal rights for women. Their letters were not answered, except in an ill-humored and uncalled-for statement by Mrs. Frank Kellogg, but the undaunted feminists persisted. When the President of France invited the plenipotentiaries to lunch at Rambouillet Miss Stevens's little army arrived ahead of time. They presented a note, requesting a ten minutes' audience. The police officer in charge thought the ladies out of place and told them so; apparently he tore up their note and threw it on the ground. The ladies sought to enter the grounds, and soon found themselves in the town jail. The police officers offered them freedom if they would promise to return peaceably to Paris—a grave misunderstanding of feminist character—and, of course, they refused. "The fact that we were stopped is proof of the existing international subjugation of women," announced Miss Stevens. Nonsense! A raiding party of men would have been far worse treated.

STEAMSHIP SPEED has become a topic of animated discussion again with the launching of the new North German Lloyd liners Europa and Bremen. A good deal of secrecy surrounds the potentialities of these vessels, but English shipping journals concede the probability that the German liners will prove to be the fastest afloat, capturing the blue ribbon for speed on the North Atlantic which Great Britain has held for the past score years, thanks to the fleetness of the no longer new but marvelously enduring Mauretania. It is said that the Europa and Bremen, sister ships, will be capable of averaging 26½ knots an hour, which if realized will give them a slight edge on the "Big Mary," whose record passage from New York to Cherbourg was made at an average of 26¼ knots. It is known anyhow that the new liners are 938 feet in length, the longest in the world, although their gross tonnage of 46,000 makes them considerably smaller than several other vessels. This means an unusually narrow hull, evidently built for high speed. For many years there has been practically no competition in speed on the North Atlantic. Rivalry has been in the direction of size, and more lately luxury. The Germans first won the speed pennant on the North Atlantic in 1897, holding it for a decade, originally with the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and later with the Deutschland. If they regain the blue ribbon when the Europa and Bremen go into service, it may open a new era of transatlantic speed competition.

"BARE LEGS? What of them?" said William J. Bogan, superintendent of Chicago schools, when the important question of stockingless girl students came to him for final judgment. He regarded such questions, he said, "as being none of my business—and none of the business of the school-teachers." This sounds to us like old-fashioned horse sense of a variety infrequent among school superintendents. Let the girls come to school in one-piece bathing suits, if they want to—and the trend of the times seems to indicate that they may soon want to. It will do nobody any harm: and perhaps, if they meet no astonishment or rebuke, they may discover that they prefer ankle-length skirts or some other novel and exciting form of clothing. The prurient meddlers who have been shocked in the past by low necks, short sleeves, bobbed hair, and knee-length skirts have gradually become accustomed to the idea that there is nothing inherently immoral in certain portions of the human figure, and as time goes on bare legs may well become as commonplace as bare arms. Bare legs are no more indecent in a schoolroom than on a bathing-beach, and Chicago is a better city for having discovered that fact. The world will be a more comfortable place, and a decenter, when we progress to the point when both men and women can comfortably go to work in bathing-suits—with pockets.

The Importance of Six Men

CONGRESS, of course, drafts the bills and votes them, a vastly important task in this republic, but in a Presidential year a foreign visitor would be led to believe that Congress was negligible and that we were electing a dictator. It is Smith or Hoover, and all the rest goes by the board; the most important thing a candidate for the national legislature can do, apparently, is to vow his faith in his party's candidate for the Presidency.

But when Work and Raskob have spent their four or five million dollars each in "educating" the country, and when the votes have been counted and either Al or Herbert sits in the White House, the country will wake up to discover that the really decisive factor upon almost every issue which the candidates are discussing is the make-up of Congress. Prohibition, farm relief, water-power, imperialism, tariff, taxation—upon every one of the issues the President can only recommend, or, in the end, veto. Congress will initiate the legislation; and the leaders of Congress will put their stamp upon the bills.

This country owes a vast debt of gratitude to its Congress in recent years. The Presidency has been a disgrace, and the executive departments have abandoned functions assigned them by the Constitution. Even Mr. Hoover today is hesitating to praise the Harding Administration of which he was a distinguished part; the Republican leaders have abandoned the attempt to maintain holy the memory of those evil days. For salvation from that sink of corruption we owe thanks to no one in the responsible executive departments, but to a nonpartisan band of able, honest, fearless men in the two houses of Congress, particularly in the Senate. It was a group of such Senators—notably Senators La Follette and Thomas Walsh—who discovered and explored the oil scandals and forced an unwilling President to prosecute Sinclair and Doheny. It was Senator Wheeler's committee which forced the President to abandon the unspeakable Daugherty. But for the progressive bloc in the Senate Albert Fall might still be a respected leader of the Republican Party. But for that same progressive bloc, led in this instance by Senator Norris, the enormous water-power resources of Muscle Shoals would have been tossed away to private interests for a song and the Boulder Dam site been lost.

"Whether progressives vote for Smith or Hoover or Thomas is comparatively unimportant," says the People's Legislative Service; "the all-important thing is to stabilize the power of the saving progressive forces in Congress. The presence of George W. Norris in the Senate means immensely more for human rights than the presence of anybody in the White House who can be placed there by the process of climbing up the golden stairs." That is true; and we hope that voters in the States where progressives are coming up for reelection will realize the national importance of their votes. With the candidates among whom we are likely to choose it may make little difference whether a Republican or a Democrat is elected to the Senate from New York, Ohio, or Michigan; but the voters of Washington, where Senator Dill, Democrat, is seeking reelection; of Montana, where Wheeler, another Democrat, again faces the electors; of Wisconsin, where "Young Bob" La Follette asks indorsement of his service; of Minnesota, where Shipstead is again campaigning under the Farmer-Labor banner; of Nebraska, where the fate of Senator Norris's colleague, Robert Beecher Howell, is at stake; and of North Dakota, where Lynn Frazier, another Republican, asks to be returned to the Senate—the voters of these six States, we say, are casting votes of importance to every progressive in the country. To lose any one of these six men from the Senate would be a calamity; it would seem to mean that the voters of the Northwest, long the torchbearers of progressive political principles, had turned their backs upon men who, in this last dark quinquennium, have been in a real sense saviors of the nation.

Party means little to these men; and in their grouping about principles and issues lies one of the chief hopes of the American democracy. We are still far from the formation of an effective third party in the country at large; but in the Senate these men have acted as a third party of significance. At times other Senators have joined forces with them—notably, among these seeking reelection this year, Hiram Johnson of California and David I. Walsh of Massachusetts. Senator Neely of West Virginia has also sometimes shown independence of party ties. (Senator Bruce of Maryland, for that matter, has voted more often as a Republican than as a Democrat, but while we respect his personal independence we detest his antiquated Bourbon principles.) The significant thing about these men—the thing which we should like to believe has a meaning for the American future—is that they are campaigning upon their records. They do not say "Reelect me because I have been true to my party." They say "Reelect me because I have served you, the people of my State, because I have fought corruption in high places, stood for decency in international relations, fought to save the national resources from selfish grabbers."

Party lines are breaking all over the country. The break is, to be sure, most marked in what may in the long run be the least significant issue—prohibition. Senator Blaine of Wisconsin, Republican, has given a partial indorsement to Candidate Smith, Democrat, because of his stand on the prohibition issue. Senator Simmons, Democrat, of North Carolina, has announced that he will vote for neither candidate. Ardent Drys in the erstwhile Solid South are deserting Smith; Wet business leaders in the East, normally Republicans, flock to the Smith banner. We welcome this bursting of party ties; we hope that it will leave behind it a strengthening of the Mugwump tradition of party independence. The fetish of party regularity has been a curse in American political life, and the time will come, we hope and believe, when men will feel it a personal disgrace to say that they vote as their fathers voted, or to boast that they have never split a ticket.

Meanwhile we appeal to our readers to recall the importance of the Congressional campaign and to reelect men who, not in this campaign alone but throughout their political careers, have set progressive principle above party. La Follette, Wheeler, Shipstead, Frazier, Howell, Dill—the return of those six men to the Senate is a matter of importance to every progressive-minded citizen of America.

What Brookwood Means

MATTHEW WOLL says that workers' education must teach only such doctrines as he approves. Mr. Woll, who is vice-president of the American Federation of Labor, succeeded in persuading the executive council of the federation to urge affiliated unions not to support Brookwood Labor College. The action is not only the most serious blow which reactionaries have struck at workers' education in the United States, but it is a blow below the belt. Brookwood was tried without a trial and condemned without a hearing. No person having any official connection with the college even knew that an investigation was in progress. Vague charges were made that the college was encouraging anti-religious teaching, antagonism to the American Federation of Labor, and pro-soviet demonstrations, and apparently Mr. Woll thought that such charges were enough. But as soon as the action of the executive council of the federation had been announced such a deluge of protests from educators and labor leaders poured in upon President William Green that he hastily announced a postponement of "decisive action" until members of the council should have an opportunity to examine protests. The only adequate reply he can make is to issue a call for a public hearing on all charges.

Brookwood is not a doctrinaire institution. Its teachers are men of academic distinction and its graduates have a notable record of constructive work inside the American Federation of Labor; and control of the college rests in the hands of labor directors who are faithful members of the federation. It is one of the few educational institutions in America which practice complete freedom of speech and democracy in control. Faculty and students participate in the management of the school; and if on occasion the students have elected two or three Communists as members of a board of directors which has nineteen members, what does that prove? A. J. Muste, chairman of the faculty, sums up Brookwood's educational method in these words:

At Brookwood all issues confronting the labor movement are discussed, all points of view are given a hearing, no effort is made to indoctrinate anybody, to force any opinions down anyone's throat, to tell people what to think. But rather we strive to develop in the students the ability to think for themselves and to settle problems on the basis of facts and not prejudice or mere opinions.

Behind the Brookwood situation lies the failure of the Workers Education Bureau to maintain vigorous life under the policing of Matthew Woll and other labor officials. This bureau, to which Brookwood is affiliated, was founded by progressives seven years ago and turned over to the rule of the American Federation of Labor in the hope that the federation would develop its program. It seems that the hope was not justified. The bureau has published excellent labor textbooks, but it has received only lip-service from orthodox labor leaders. The moderate success of workers' education experiments in Philadelphia, Portland, Denver, Baltimore, and Boston has not been due to the national bureau. If Brookwood, which has been the most hopeful part of the Workers Education Bureau, is now forced out, the logical result would be the formation of a new workers' educational body standing squarely for intellectual freedom.

Hot Weather

WITHOUT too much conviction we should like to put in a word for hot weather. We say without too much conviction, because there are times when we doubt our ability to stand much more of it and because we do not too confidently expect to be agreed with anyway. But there is something to be said for July and August—otherwise, it occurs to us, how could the Roman makers of our calendar have been willing to name these two months for two rulers whom they obviously respected? There is something to be said for them in spite of the fact that they bring with them the dog days, torrential rains, and the Fourth of July.

It is simply that Americans talk too much about heat. Long ago it became fatal to make a certain distinction between heat and humidity; but we still take the whole matter much too seriously. Why, we know nothing at all of heat if we call our summers hot. We creatures who exist in a thermometrical region which measures only 200 degrees from top to bottom know nothing, really, of the things nature could do to us if she liked. Like mites we crawl along the lower reaches of her mercury tube, and like mites we suppose we experience all that is to be experienced. And to be sure, when we winter in the Antarctic or go walking in some of the incredibly cold mountains of little-known Siberia we are within less than 200 degrees of absolute zero, or the coldest temperature that science can demonstrate to be possible. But we are so far from the other end of the scale as to be quite negligible among creatures of heat. Consider the sun, whose surface, if by any chance we approached it, would volatilize us so quickly that only the spectroscope could testify to our presence there among the other gases. The sun's surface is 2,000 degrees Centigrade above the boiling-point of carbon, or some 6,000 degrees in all. That, we admit, is heat—though we are prepared to entertain conceptions of systems by the side of which our solar one is as a dish of ice. Indeed, at this time of year we like to play with such notions; or else we merely remember that in certain laboratories men with goggles over their eyes are experimenting with temperatures that go up the scale not by tens of degrees about which we write articles in the newspapers but by the hundreds and thousands that only the gases know.

Every American family has, or ought to have, a young son who scorns "the terrible heat" and makes a brave show of enjoying it. We know many such, and it would seem that they achieved their philosophy through hearing too much complaint from Mother, Aunt Lettie, and those other women folks whose tradition it is to turn fiery red in August, seize palm leaves, and suffer even while they fan. These are the boys who know how to open the necks of their shirts and take the season easy; who relax and expand as the air grows generous around them; who see in the stationary days of July and August a truce patched up by earth with passing time; and who seek the shade of a sycamore, if they seek shade at all, with dignity and composure. It is the one portion of the year when they can wear so little clothing as to be unconscious of it, and in more important ways it is the freest time they will ever know. We do not wish them cold summers by any means; and we suspect that no one does, not even Aunt Lettie.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

I HAVE always been a little dubious as to the validity of the familiar theory about the artist and a life of sin.

If one were an artist it would, of course, be a convenient theory. Some hold that it is good for the man of high talent to be fairly footloose from inhibitions. With certain nice reservations it may be to his advantage, and to the advantage of the world in the long run, that he should find in life the things he wants. But, for that matter, the same rule holds good for other individuals who are not artists.

The flaw in the theory of looseness for art's sake is that immorality is responsible for almost as many catchwords and false traditions as virtue itself. Only very fine spirits have ever been able to sin without self-consciousness and a sense of obligation. Eighty-three per cent of all dissipation is undertaken not so much from any honest longing as from a feeling that it is the thing to do.

The reservoir in Central Park could be filled to overflowing with cocktails which were imbibed by persons who did not really want them at all but feared that refusal would seem a little churlish. Perhaps there was a time in the dim past when such things could go simply by preference. It is not that way in our own day. The man who refuses a cocktail, whether he wants it or not, is set down by the company as one who intends to vote for Herbert Hoover, as a prig and a Puritan, and as a jingo who believes in the maintenance of a big navy and intervention in Nicaragua.

There are sharp claws in the velvet of gallantry. The emancipated woman may be a courageous soul who has just come into heaping handfuls of new freedom. But the emancipated male has precious little freedom. Indeed he confesses as much by adopting the descriptive phrase "a regular fellow."

Without doubt Joseph of the Bible is the most maligned character in all history. He fled from an entanglement for the sufficient and excellent reason that it was not to his liking and for centuries since his name has been held up to scorn. To say of a man that he is a Joseph is to call him prude and cad. To this extent at least I believe in the single standard of morality. The world holds that the conduct of a woman is excellent when she refuses the advances of a man. That same world sniggers contemptuously when it hears of any man who has refused the advances of a woman. There is no sense in that. I am choosing to assume for the sake of the argument that in this modernistic world there may be women who make advances.

For me the most eloquent moment in "What Price Glory" was not directly concerned with war and battles. Through one brief scene the play touched something much more fundamental. We watched Captain Flagg, just back from turmoil in the trenches, make love to the resident French belle of the village. Louis Wolheim played the incident superbly. He acted the part of a man consumed with deep fatigue. Even his shoulder-blades seemed to sag. But so puritanical are the wicked that they set up for themselves certain standards which must be followed even in grave default of desire. There is an old wives' tale that soldiers home from the wars, even for an hour, must be gallant and insistent in their dealings with all women. Captain Flagg was under the tug of this tradition. His inclination could not be considered. And so with all the good-will he could muster he made hot love to the fat siren. She refused him. With a happy sigh he accepted the rebuff and went to quarters bearing with him brandy. Under the circumstances no blame could be attached to him. He had asked and been turned down. Honor, at least, was satisfied.

And so, if I were an artist, I would not pay much attention to the theory that genius must develop by promenades along the primrose path. Certainly I would not walk there through any sense of duty. It does not seem to me that the artist in search of educational experiences presents a very attractive figure. No matter what he says his words must convey the thought, "Please fly with me and be my love, because I am planning a new novel and it must be animated by fire and by passion." I should hardly think that any woman would regard it as an endearing proposal.

For that matter, what is the source of this nonsense about a writer's having to experience life in order to write about it? Very possibly a person never touched by any emotion will find it difficult to create in his own stories authentic pathos and passion. But surely it is silly to suppose that he must mirror his own experiences in any exact way. Almost the best chapter in modern fiction about a wild, rough party in a French cabaret occurs in a novel by May Sinclair. It seems to me a good bet that Miss Sinclair was never present at such an orgy. Indeed that would be much the best way in which to deal with the incident. The greatest tales of adventure are those written by innocent bystanders. If a publisher wanted a first-rate story of the prize ring he would be far more shrewd to try to enlist the services of Thornton Wilder than to sign up Mr. Tunney.

Since literature is one of the widest and most popular avenues of escape it is not well for art to have all frustrations and inhibitions erased from life's potentialities. I do not mean to suggest that there is any very present danger that such a state of things will come to pass. Still, in the future it may be that Freud and all the little Freudians will manage to bring about the death of writing. When no shoe pinches there will never again be anyone to sit down and spin a tale about a prince, a princess, and a glass slipper.

All of which brings me back to the theory that the primrose path is no proper thoroughfare for the creative artist. I am prepared to argue this from two angles mutually exclusive. In the first place nobody ever shed an inhibition simply by going out and behaving in anti-social fashion. In psychiatric fields man is not saved by works. Salvation comes through faith alone. But if it were true that in high jinks there lay emancipation still this form of escape were best denied to those who want to paint, or sing, or write. Let them stew in their complexes and from out the cauldrons there will come in time a sweet and potent incense. St. Paul was speaking merely of Christians in general when he said that it was better to marry. Those to whom the torch is flung had better burn. Indeed before they ever blaze up with any bright and all-sufficient flame there must be years in which they smoke and smolder.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Insull-ating the Coolidge Cabinet

By FREDERIC BABCOCK

NEARLY forty years ago a bright young man arrived in Chicago from a small town downstate. He had little money, but he was ambitious, and he knew what he wanted.

Admitted to the bar when he was only twenty-two, Roy O. West decided that his road to success lay via politics, and he knew that success in politics comes from unquestioning, unswerving devotion to the dominant party. Such are the opportunities offered in our glorious republic (where, as Mr. Hoover pointed out in such original fashion when he first heard of his nomination, even the humblest boy can rise to be President) that within four years' time Mr. West had become Assistant County Attorney. The year following that he was appointed City Attorney and three years after that he was made a member of the Board of Review of Cook County.

Entering the last-named position while still in modest circumstances, he held it for sixteen years. In that time he passed upon the tax assessments of many thousands of individuals and corporations, including some of the wealthiest persons and some of the greatest corporations in the country. At the end of that time he retired, wealthy in his own name. His recipe for success had been tried and found not wanting. But, after having worked all those years on a salary of $7,000 a year, and kept up his family's position in the meantime, how he could quit with a fortune was, and still is, a matter of considerable speculation on the part of Cook County taxpayers.

Whatever may have been the source or sources of his income, his long "public service" enabled him to make some highly desirable connections, including those with railroads, mining interests, and one Samuel Insull. He became attorney for those interests, for Mr. Insull, and for other persons and interests that have cause to deal with the public. And he represented a number of them even while he was acting in his supposed capacity as a guardian of the common good.

Meanwhile, he continued his profitable political work. He served for ten years as chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, was four times delegate to the national conventions, and at length reached the eminence of secretary of the National Committee. During all that time he was a valued member of the Deneen gang—the organization that biennially battles the Bill Thompson gang for the pie and patronage of Chicago and Illinois. It is not recorded that he was much of a lawyer, but it is not denied that he was a great politician; that is, if you can call a faithful Friday to Senator Deneen a great politician.

On July 27, 1926, Mr. West appeared before the Reed committee investigating the campaign expenditures of one Frank L. Smith, and testified that he had handled Insull money in the Illinois primaries, that he had been attorney for the Insull crowd since 1897, and that he had "always conferred with Mr. Insull as to investments, particularly concerning his own companies, and as to politics, during these twenty-five or more years." Mr. Insull, as everyone knows, is the power behind the power combine that is fast reaching out to grab up the nation's natural resources and weld the populace into one vast, benighted serfdom. The primary in question was the one in which Mr. Insull contributed $125,000 to put Mr. Smith in the Senate, Mr. Smith being at that time, and having been for several years, chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, with direct supervision over the rates and earnings of Mr. Insull's Illinois public utilities.

On July 20, 1928, one Calvin Coolidge announced the appointment of Mr. West as Secretary of the Interior. As such, Mr. West now finds himself face to face with the question of whether Boulder Dam shall be operated under public or private control, a similar question as to Muscle Shoals, and the perplexing problem of harnessing the power combine of Mr. Insull and his associates. To put it a bit more bluntly, Mr. Insull's attorney, holding large blocks of stock in Mr. Insull's properties, now sits as judge and final authority in matters involving Mr. Insull's interest as opposed to the public interest. Mr. Insull failed in his effort to send his friend Mr. Smith to the Senate wing of the Capitol, but he did even better by sending his own man to rule under the very shadow of the dome. And we, the people, let him "get away with it."

In a letter not meant for publication the director of "the Missouri Committee on Public Utility Information"—in other words, a glorified press agent for the power interests—a few years ago referred to country editors as "God's fools." Perhaps he meant to include all of us.

It is true that already there is agitation against confirmation of the appointment by the Senate, but it also is true that the power combine already is boasting that the movement will lead nowhere. Legal advisers are reported to have informed the Administration that Mr. Insull's hired man is safe under the practice by which a recess appointee holds office—unless adverse action is taken on a request for confirmation—until the last day of the following session of Congress.

Inasmuch as President Coolidge and his Cabinet will go out of office March 4, 1929, the last day of the coming session of Congress, those who have received recess appointments may serve until that date without any Senate action whatsoever. Thus we find the door open for a cowardly entrance of a Cabinet appointee who never could face the glare of a Senate searchlight. The Senate turned down Mr. Smith, but it looks as if its hands would be tied in case it tries to do the same to Mr. West.

The President remembers only too well his experience with the recalcitrant Senate in the naming of Charles B. Warren—to mention only one. It is generally understood that he has no wish for a clash on appointments in the closing days of his Administration, and it also is generally understood that if there is any danger of adverse action on the name of Mr. West, either that name will not be sent to the Senate at all or else the Administration friends (meaning, principally, one Charles Curtis, majority leader and Vice-Presidential nominee, and one George Moses of the Hoover managers) will see to it that the question of confirmation does not come to a vote. Thus, only in the event that Mr. West is reappointed by Herbert Hoover (assuming that Mr. Hoover is elected President) will Senate approval be necessary.

Query No. 1—Mr. Coolidge, what promises, if any, were made to you or anyone else, by Mr. Insull or any of his allies, of contributions to the 1928 Republican campaign fund in return for the appointment of Mr. Insull's attorney to sit in your Cabinet?

Query No. 2—Mr. Hoover, what do you, as a reputed friend of public ownership of Boulder Dam, purpose to do about continuing in office, after you get in office, the attorney of the men most active in fighting that public ownership—the men who, as shown in the Federal Trade Commission hearings, have sought to debauch the press, the schools, and the nation itself in order to gain their ends?

Query No. 3—Mr. United States Senator, do you recall the case of one Richard Ballinger, a Secretary of the Interior in the pre-war days, when we still clung to the quaint notion that a public office is a public trust, and do you recall what happened to Mr. Ballinger when it was found that he was too closely connected with certain private interests that came within the purview of his office? Is your memory long enough to recall the case of one Albert B. Fall and a certain desolate tract known as Teapot Dome? If so, do you purpose to sit supinely by while this newest deal, this latest brazen assault on the body politic, is perpetrated by the executive branch of the government? Will you permit the tragi-comedy to go so far as to have Insull put his man-servant in the seat of the one who is supposed to act as the watchdog of our natural resources? Must we now complete the trilogy with another Ballinger, another Fall, in the Interior department? Might not a nice little investigation of the whole stinking mess by the United States Senate prove interesting?

Query No. 4—Mr. Common Citizen, what do you, the victim in all such transactions, purpose to do about it?

But, after all, why raise all these distressing doubts and questions? Mr. West is an eminently respectable citizen, a member of the Union League Club, and a strict Methodist. His personal life is pure. In the Cabinet he will be a fit playmate for Mr. Wilbur, the Sunday-school teacher from California, and Mr. Sargent, the Great Stone Face from New England.

Either Way, the South Wins

By J. N. AIKEN

PRESIDENTIAL politics, usually a tame business in the States below the Potomac, is warming up. With an effrontery which a large number of Southern voters cannot understand, the Democratic Party has nominated for the Presidency a candidate whose religious affiliation and whose attitude on prohibition run counter to long-established Southern taboos.

As a result, there are explosions of Democratic discontent in Dixie. Men and women who have been accustomed to regard their politics as a sacred inheritance from the past are openly leaving or threatening to leave their party to vote the oil ticket rather than support a Democratic candidate who is a Catholic and a Wet.

So seriously is the tendency to bolt regarded that in many quarters lugubrious voices are heard prophesying that this year the electoral vote of the Southern States will go to a Republican, and it is even suggested that the nomination of Governor Smith may give Republican candidates for Congress a chance in some districts unchangingly Democratic in their complexion since the Civil War.

It is not the purpose here to pass on these—from the partisan viewpoint—dire prophecies. It is intended rather to emphasize the point that Governor Smith's nomination has made the South debatable political territory and inaugurated a real Presidential contest in a region where Presidential contests have for years been perfunctory. In this prospect is an omen of great promise for the South. Sharp political conflict nearly always holds the seeds of progress, and from the clash over Governor Smith's candidacy the South will reap a particularly rich harvest. Whatever the result of the poll, the Southern States stand to gain in freedom and in understanding.

Consider the possibilities. First, there is the possibility that the South may abandon its Democratic affiliation and vote for a Republican or an independent. For a section which for half a century has closed its mind to all except the partisan modes of thought suggested by the Democratic Party, this would be a notable step forward. Perhaps it would not lead immediately to the creation of a permanent minority party throughout the South. Southerners refusing to vote for Governor Smith might find themselves drawn back into the Democratic fold in ensuing elections. Democratic supremacy might be reestablished for a time, as has happened in Tennessee, which swung back to Davis in 1924 after voting for Harding in 1920. But if a large proportion of Southern voters should repudiate the Democratic candidate in the approaching election, the first step toward the establishment of a two-party system would have been taken. It would be apparent to the South that it could vote Republican without causing the sky to fall or the earth to open and swallow the nation. Later on, if an issue should arise on which voters might properly leave the Democratic Party and establish a permanent political affiliation elsewhere, the departure would be easier and less fraught with foreboding.

There is no need to elaborate on this possibility. It has been repeatedly canvassed both in the South and in other sections of the nation. An equally important possibility arising since the nomination of Governor Smith is one that seems to have received only slight consideration.

In its issue of August 29 The Nation published an article by Calvin B. Hoover expressing the opinion that whatever its party affiliations might become, the South was destined for many years to remain solidly conservative in its economic principles and insistent in its demand for white hegemony. The author of the present article approaches the question from a different angle, and suggests other interesting possibilities.

It is the possibility that the South may support the Smith candidacy, and in so doing throw off its religious prejudices and the allegiance it has long owed to an ecclesiastical hegemony which through the Methodist and Baptist denominations and the Anti-Saloon League has exercised a preponderant influence on Southern life and thought. The South would gain just as much by escaping from the domination of this clerical group as it would from scrapping the one-party system.

The clerical leadership of the South has been singularly powerful and singularly unenlightened. It has been either directly or indirectly responsible for most of the intellectual atrocities that have made the South ridiculous in the eyes of the world these last few years. Clerical agitation created the state of mind which made possible the Tennessee anti-evolution law and the abortive attempts to enact similar legislation in other Southern commonwealths. Clerical leadership must, in the last analysis, accept responsibility for the attack on academic freedom at the University of Tennessee a few years ago and for unsuccessful ventures in the same direction at Wake Forest College and other Southern educational institutions. It is to blame for nearly all the attacks on liberty made under the guise of Dry-law enforcement. It cannot be said that the ministers leading the fundamentalist anti-evolution fight and encouraging the restriction of academic freedom are the same as those who have directed the prohibition agitation. But both groups stem from the same narrow root, and they are united in their opposition to the Smith candidacy, the chief basis of their opposition being their common suspicion of the Roman church. Southern voters supporting the Smith candidacy would in effect be repudiating the leadership of these groups and weakening their hold on Southern thought.

In making this statement it is only fair to point out that the Southern clergy are by no means unanimous in resorting to political means to attain religious ends. Outside the evangelical denominations and within them there are many ministers in the South who look askance at the ventures of their more dogmatic colleagues into the fields of politics and popular agitation. But the existence of this intelligent minority does not alter the fact that the South has long suffered from a plague of ecclesiastical Heflins whose activities have imposed a serious intellectual and political handicap on the entire region.

There can be no assurance that the South will repudiate these mischief-makers in the November election, but such a repudiation seems to be quite as much of a possibility as a repudiation of the Democratic Party. In support of this statement a reference may be made to the fact that straw votes in the Southern States indicate a surprising popular disregard of clerical leadership on the Smith candidacy. For example, while 346 Democratic ministers out of 479 participating in an Anti-Saloon League poll in Virginia said they would vote for a Dry Republican in preference to a Wet Democrat, Governor Smith captured two-thirds of the total vote in newspaper polls conducted in Richmond and Norfolk. Popular sentiment would seem in this instance to run decidedly counter to ecclesiastical sentiment.

Heretofore the purposes of the Democratic Party and those of the ecclesiastical politicians in the South have been sufficiently close together for the Southern voter to follow both without difficulty. But with the nomination of Governor Smith, the paths of the two influences diverged. On the one hand, is the party with which the South has been affiliated since Reconstruction times asking the Southern States to remain true to their traditional party allegiance. On the other, are the spokesmen for the ecclesiastical group demanding continued recognition for the voice of the church in political affairs. The Southern voter cannot follow his ministerial advisers without repudiating his party. He cannot follow his party without repudiating his ministerial advisers. Whichever path he chooses, he will have to leave behind an affiliation which has for long years acted as a brake on his political and intellectual progress.

Citizen, Do Your Duty!

By WILLIAM JOURDAN RAPP

MARY belongs to the League of Women Voters, the main function of whose members, as far as I can ascertain, is to get their husbands to vote. Thus the first day of registration saw us both at the little hut of the Board of Elections on the corner of our street.

"When did you last vote and where?" the clerk demanded.

"In California, in 1924," we both replied.

We must have looked like Democrats, for the Republican watcher came forward and said: "You can't register! If you've never voted before in this State, you've got to give proof of literacy."

"We'd be glad to read anything—a newspaper, or this book!" I picked up a copy of the election laws.

"That's no good! We ain't examiners!"

"Well, both my wife and I are college graduates. I should think that ought to be enough proof of literacy."

"Got your diplomas?" The watcher looked at us suspiciously.

"I think we have."

"Bring them and let's have a look at them!"

Mary and I meekly left to do as directed.

Although my wife located her diploma without difficulty, I was unable to find mine after looking through innumerable drawers, trunks, and suit-cases. Finally Mary suggested that if I took along a few of my publications, they might prove adequate. So I armed myself with copies of half-a-dozen reprints of my contributions to various scientific periodicals and a volume entitled "Acanthia lectularia as a Disease Carrier," which was my Doctor of Philosophy thesis. Surely these would prove that I was literate.

This time Mary passed muster. Her diploma was an "open sesame" to registration. But my articles and book proved worthless. Somebody else might have written them for me. Don't Henry Ford publish books, and they say he can't either read or write? The Chicago Tribune's attorneys in the famous libel case couldn't get him to read on the witness stand. These were the Republican watcher's arguments. I concluded that I must have all the ear-marks of the perfect Democrat, and I took an oath that just for spite I would vote under the star for the rest of my life.

By now, I was determined if necessary to die in order to register. "How can I prove my literacy?" I demanded angrily.

"You'll have to take the test at the Public School."

Saturday night, the last day of registration, found me at the Public School. I had been unable to get there sooner. About a score of men and women were seated at the students' benches in one of the classrooms. They were mostly foreigners and seemed rather frightened at the ordeal before them.

The examiner entered. He was a large florid man and had the belligerent air of a court attendant. He disdainfully handed each of us a printed form, and then rapidly read off in a sing-song voice the following instructions:

This is a test to see whether you can read and write English. On the other side of this sheet there is a selection for you to read. First, read the selection. Next, read the first question. Then, go back and read the selection until you find the answer to this first question. Usually, the answer will be only one or two words. When you have found the correct answer, write it on the dotted line after the first question. You need not answer in a complete sentence. Write the answer as plainly as you can, for this is a test of both reading and writing. Answer all the other questions in the same way. When you have answered every question, read the selection and answers to your questions over again, and make sure you have made no mistakes.

I turned over the printed sheet. At the top was this paragraph.

George Washington is called the Father of His Country. As a boy he was strong and powerful, and liked sports. He always obeyed his parents and showed the best manners toward everybody. While he was still a schoolboy, he wrote a fine list of rules on good manners. This list of rules was for girls and boys to follow. As a man Washington loved his country. He was America's greatest leader in the Revolutionary War. After the war, he was elected the first President of the United States. He was President two terms, and refused a third term. He ranks as one of the greatest men of human history.

Then came these questions: 1. What is George Washington called? 2. Whom did he obey? 3. To whom did he show good manners? 4. On what subject did he write a list of rules? 5. Who were to use this list of rules? 6. What did this boy love when he grew up to be a man? 7. Of what country was he the greatest leader? 8. In what war was he the greatest leader? 9. To what great office was he elected after the war? 10. How does he rank among the men of the world?

Having read both W. E. Woodward and Rupert Hughes on our first President, these questions were a challenge. My answers were not orthodox. Number four I answered: "On the art of brewing." Number five: "The Americans of 1928." And number six: "A good drink!"

When the examiner read my replies, I thought his eyes would pop out of his head.

"Say, are you trying to kid me?" he asked.

"Not at all!"

"Well, where do you get this stuff?"

"Those are my honest opinions!"

"Nobody was asking you for your opinions. You're supposed to give the answers in the paragraph at the top of the sheet. If you don't, how do I know you can read?"

"You can see that I can write!"

"Yeh! But this is an examination in reading as well as in writing. I can't pass you on this. This ain't no proof that you're really literate."

I didn't register and I won't vote!

In the Driftway

THE Drifter took a cigarette the other night from the package that was passed to him. "Stop," said the man on his right. "Don't you know you should never put that end of a cigarette in your mouth?" The Drifter hesitated, as he always does when spoken to in a loud, firm voice, and looked at the cigarette. He had removed it from the pack with two fingers; by some sleight-of-hand of which he was at the time unconscious he had turned it about so that the end which protruded from the package was the end that he inserted in his mouth. As he still looked blank, his friend went on to explain: "It's easy to see you don't work in a laboratory"—("Or anywhere else," said the man on his left, sotto voce); "if you were dealing with poisons of which a thousandth of a gram was fatal, you'd be careful to put in your mouth the end of a cigarette that is buried in the package, for fear something on your fingers might eventually get into your stomach!"

* * * * *

MEEKLY the Drifter obeyed; with life hanging by as slender a thread there was nothing else for him to do. But as he did so he pondered how a man guides his behavior by the daily occurrences of his life. Ordinarily familiarity with danger makes a man careless of it. Thus many a time the Drifter has watched steam riveters nonchalantly tossing red-hot rivets back and forth and catching them in a bucket while looking down into the street forty stories below; thus sailors leap along the rigging like monkeys with a mile of ocean down below; thus men, and even women, step into an airplane, smile at the news-reel photographers, and presently leap off into space with nothing between them and eternity but the cord of a parachute. Nothing of the sort had happened to the Drifter's friend of the poisons and the cigarette. Daily he collects on his fingers the means of death; it behooves him to mind his gestures. Not for him the luxury of licking his finger as he turns a page; not for him the bitten nail. He is familiar with death sure enough; but he can take no liberties with it.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has often wondered how it would be to know that he had only a few hours to live. What, for example, do men trapped in a submarine think about before the waters rise or the air grows thick? What does a man adrift on the sea, with no means of rescue in sight? What are the thoughts of men in a mine, far below air and safety, waiting for the help that never comes? Probably if the truth were known they think of very ordinary things. Their immediate concerns, their minute discomforts are of more moment to them than oblivion just around the corner. Wet feet seem more important than putting their house in order; damp matches are more distressing than the necessity of making their peace with God. The truth is that men avoid the presence of death as much as they can; they pretend it is not imminent; they swagger and shrug their shoulders as if they were going to live forever. When they speak sharply, when they act ever so little on edge, it is to caution a friend, to push a fellow-mortal away from the abyss. For themselves they are not afraid.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

How Upton Sinclair Votes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I got some mail, and happened to see on the outside of one of the envelopes the name "Henry J. Allen." It sounded familiar. Many years ago I read "The Martial Adventures of Henry and Me," by William Allen White.

I opened the envelope, and found that it was the same Martial Henry. He has written me a letter, which I hope is not confidential. In order to "form a definite opinion as to the popular status of Hoover support" he wants to know my preference for President, and my reasons. I have replied that my preference is Norman Thomas because I want a man who did not sit in the Harding Cabinet and keep his mouth shut.

Long Beach, California, August 18 UPTON SINCLAIR

Political Bigotry

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of your editorial on behalf of an immediate and unconditional pardon for Tom Mooney and Warren K. Billings, may I call the attention of The Nation's readers to the unhappy contrast between the statesmanlike clemency of Governor Alfred Emanuel Smith of New York, as exemplified in his release of Larkin and Gitlow, his espousal of the political rights of the Socialist Assemblymen, his repudiation of the Lexow Committee hysteria, and his stand for even the liberty of Senator Heflin to abuse Smith and the Catholic church, and the insistent intolerance of Republican governors, both in California and the State of Washington, with respect to the class-war prisoners whom they continue to keep in jail in spite of their obvious innocence of crime? Mooney and Billings and the Centralia boys one and all are in jail only because Republican governors in the two States named have lacked the moral backbone and the political judgment to withstand the patrio-neurotics, and set these men free. I have no interest in seeing a Democrat elected as President, but as far as the Pacific Coast is concerned the Republican Party is steeped in political bigotry and economic intolerance. Smith's record for tolerance shines like a sun as compared with that of any Governor California or Washington has had in this generation. It is not too late for a changed record here, but the time is short.

La Crescenta, California, August 26 ROBERT WHITAKER

Rum, Romanism . . .

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My father, Matthew Watson, was a Chartist in Scotland, came to this country in 1850, voted for Frémont and Dayton in 1856, was a Black Abolitionist and a Republican until his death in his ninety-first year. It was in this tradition I was reared and was a Republican until after Grant's second term.

I have not voted any ticket but the Socialist, and deeply regret that I will not be able to vote for Norman Thomas, as there will be no Socialist ticket in Florida. Therefore if I vote at all, I have no choice but to vote for Governor Smith, as I have had all the Coolidge imperialistic policies I can stomach, and Mr. Hoover is pledged to make them his policies.

Many of the readers of The Nation will remember that the Rev. Burchard's "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" defeated James G. Blaine for the Presidency. The fanatical Rev. Mr.

Straton gives promise of doing the same thing for Mr. Hoover. It would be a just return for such a publicity stunt.

St. Petersburg, Fla., August 10

AGNES C. WATSON

How Dry Is Hoover?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As I have always read The Nation with a feeling that its editors never knowingly took an unfair stand on men or issues I must write my protest against your treatment of Governor Smith. You, after the manner of a garbage snooper, detailed his purported liking for cocktails—at best it was only hearsay or privileged evidence. It was hardly fair, but I felt that you were going down the line and would give your readers the same information on Watson, Curtis, Dawes, and Hoover. But you didn't. Is Hoover a personal Dry? I hear that he is not.

Los Angeles, August 23

WALTER M. BIXEL

Two Pictures of Rumania

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Two American travelers recently returned from Rumania. One, the Rev. Dr. Charles S. MacFarland, general secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, reported that the conditions of the Jews and other minority groups in Rumania was still extremely bad. The other, Leo Fischer, vice-president of the United Rumanian Jews of America, reported that conditions had bettered very much.

Dr. MacFarland is an American clergyman who, so far as is known, has no bias either for or against the Jews of Rumania or the Rumanian Government. He made a careful study of conditions in Rumania, and that study has led him to confirm the elaborate report made only a few months ago to the American Committee on the Rights of Religious Minorities (whose membership includes Messrs. Herbert Hoover, Willis, Howard Taft, and others) by a deputation of five prominent and impartial clergymen. This commission reported, after visiting the country, that Rumania has constantly violated its obligations to its minority groups—Jews, Hungarians, and others.

Mr. Fischer says that he went to Rumania expecting to find conditions very bad, and that he was agreeably surprised to find that they were very good. This would be interesting if true, but it should be recalled that even before Mr. Fischer went to Rumania his organization engaged in propaganda for the floating of a $60,000,000 Rumanian loan in this country, on the grounds that conditions were already improved and that reparations were being made for the frightful outrages of last December, in which Rumanian students traveled on government railroad passes from town to town in Transylvania, brutally attacking Jews, destroying property, desecrating synagogues, and causing several deaths.

I think it should further be known that Mr. Fischer was received in Rumania by the Queen and high officials, who showed him through the country. While there is no reason of which I know to question Dr. MacFarland's impartiality, it should be borne in mind that Mr. Fischer is printer to the Rumanian Legation at Washington.

On July 10 dispatches in Hungarian newspapers reported that Jewish passengers at the railway station of Marmaros-Sziget were maltreated, and that a factory owned by Jews was destroyed in a riot in that town. Later the Federation of Liberal Jewish Communities in Transylvania met and disclosed the fact that Transylvanian Jewry had not received a single penny from the indemnity allotments made by the Rumanian Government for the institutions destroyed in December.

New York, July 20

HERBERT SOLOW

Autumn

By CHARLES NORMAN

The wind lunged against the trees, fumbled the apples and stroked the leaves,
the night shrank coldly to the moon;
and in the sky there was a flight of stars serenely eastward o'er the heaps of hills, and past the men in armor that stood guard at either end of the drawbridge went a light:
and for a space the Court Inviolable assumed the splendor of a miracle heretofore recorded in no wise save in this chant that hath not reached men's ears and will not ever, though the world endure, be credited; but howsoe'er this be,
unto the very turrets of the town ensconced behind the wall that girt it round, despite the forest of tall men upon it,
the light unwavering appeared and stood wheresoever there was shadow eke, and smote the sight of all those marveling as had a golden army from the sun filled all the air with soundless flaming shafts.

The Problem of Dialect

The Happy Mountain. By Maristan Chapman. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THIS is the mildly charming idyl of a hill-billy moon-calf, his disillusioning outland peregrination, and his relieved return to the happy mountain whereon dwell serenity and love. Though it should and undoubtedly will afford a transitory pleasure to thousands of readers, it is not in itself a work of any importance. But it does possess an extrinsic interest by virtue of the problems suggested by its use of a beautiful dialect.

The locale of "The Happy Mountain" is the hills of eastern Tennessee. There live a people who for generations have been so fortunately insulated from the standardizing currents of town and metropolis that they have preserved almost intact their peculiar speech and folk-ways. Their dialect appears to be a curiously rich and evocative mixture of rural neologisms with the spacious elegancies of the older English tongue. The associations of the tongue, recalling not only the Elizabethan age but Chaucerian and even pre-Chaucerian times, are exciting and many-vistaed. It is a speech at once so homely and so poetic that it strikes the appreciative reader as an instrument of extraordinary utility and beauty. The vocabulary itself is not varied (the really strange words defined in the glossary amount to barely a hundred) but the constructions are suppler than those of our everyday speech and many expressions which would ordinarily seem rather formal are used with a casualness that lends them a novel glamor. To his friend who may be outland-bound the Tennessee mountaineer will bid farewell with the grave and lovely phrase: "Give you good venture." Here is a typical conversation between the hero, Wait-Still-on-the-Lord Lowe, and his father, who is trying to dissuade the son from leaving the family hearth:

"Then you aim to let go home and to journey forth?"

"That's the way my head is set."

"Got some saved wages laid by for the journey?"

"I'd despise to be so forehanded. Hit'd be plain pointing scorn at the Lord, who's give me a strong body to win what I need to keep life within."

"You'll not go with my willingness or consent."

"Then sorrowfully I must go without it."

The combination here of rustic crudeness and a certain Puritan-like calm gravity is thoroughly delightful.

But the very excellent poetry of this mountain tongue presents a difficult problem for anyone who would use it not as a philological curiosity but as a dignified vehicle for the presentation of human character. Primarily, no dialect must emphasize itself unduly. The finer the dialect the thornier the problem. For if the reader's attention is continually diverted to the moving qualities of the language itself, he will be unable to reduce it to its proper position as a subordinate element in the work of art. To avoid this sense of disproportion the serious worker in dialect will try to do one of two things, or possibly he will do both, like Synge, perhaps the finest craftsman in dialect that modern English literature can boast of.

Happily, Synge was a dramatist; and the very form to which his genius was naturally attracted helped him to solve the first of the problems. This we may state by saying that the worker in dialect must avoid mixing his special speech with his conventional literary language. For otherwise the latter will call undue attention to the former; and once this splitting of the attention occurs, all is lost. Synge, of course, wrote plays, into which literary language cannot intrude except in the unimportant stage directions; but the same unity of speech is more frequently secured by the device of a dialect-speaking narrator, as in the Uncle Remus stories. This latter plan is probably the one that Mrs. Chapman should have followed. She sees the problem intelligently but solves it inadequately. Her idea is to forge, for the purposes of her non-dialogic narrative, a reminiscential speech which is to represent a grafting of the Tennessee dialect upon a conventional literary language. This is a dangerous and difficult thing to do; and only those who, like James Stephens, already possess a beautiful and distinctive English style have been able to effect the delicate fusion. Mrs. Chapman's melange is unsuccessful largely because her own regular style is merely pretty; it lacks originality and sinew and stands in sadly strong contrast with the vigorous language of her mountaineers. Consequently, the reader tends to skip the intervening narrative passages and concentrate on the dialogue, with the result that the book is broken in its effect.

The second problem presented by dialect is a more fundamental and serious one, depending, as it does, upon the depth of the artist's personality or upon the exactness of his sense of the harmonious. He may secure a subject of such profound implication and treat it with such profundity that the reader is moved simultaneously by it and by the language in which it is treated. This is the case with "Riders to the Sea," whose tragic grandeur resides as much in the central dramatic conception as in the melancholy strength of the Aran Islanders' speech. Here the question is obviously one of great writing; and Mrs. Chapman's is mediocre writing. Her story is oversimple and conventional; its climax, led up to by a cinematic chase during which the villain falls over the mountain-side, is melodramatic; and its poetical hero is automatic and unconvincing, uttering sentiments that clearly originate in Mrs. Chapman's own mind.

But the artist in dialect may be of very small caliber, his personality may be shallow, as Synge's was not; and still he may be able to create beautifully out of his special speech. This he may do by selecting a subject so peculiarly and exactly suited to his dialect as to fit it like a glove and so prevent again that bifurcation of the attention noted above. This is the method of Joel Chandler Harris. But Mrs. Chapman's story is not adapted for expression solely and perfectly through her mountain language. Here her hero is mainly at fault, for we have met his bewildered idealism a dozen times before in the pages of Mr. Dell, Mr. Anderson, and others. It seems probable that Mrs. Chapman got her major impulse to write "The Happy Mountain" from her sense of the picturesque values of the Tennessee speech; and then proceeded to construct a thoroughly mechanical story in which to embody it. This is not the procedure of the artist, and the utmost that can be said of the author of this novel is that she is a sensitive recorder of a colorful, rhythmic American folk-tongue.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

American Specialists in Russia

Soviet Russia in the Second Decade. A Joint Survey by the Technical Staff of the First American Trade Delegation. Edited by Stuart Chase, Robert Dunn, and Rexford Guy Tugwell. The John Day Company. $4.

THIRTEEN specialists, composing the technical staff of the First American Trade Union Delegation, here present a dissection of the new social and political organism named by its creators the USSR. Having split the Russian body into its component parts, they allocated among themselves the sections on which their individual experience best qualified them to report. The result is not so much a unified work as a collection of résumés for as many books as there are chapter heads. To say that all its parts have general as well as specialized interest is high tribute to both authors and editors, who in three cases are identical. In no case has a writer forgotten the living body in examining his allotted limb, and we have, therefore, an analysis of enormous value to those interested in the progress of the Russian experiment. That it is progressing and not foundering in a Sargasso Sea of impractical dreaming, corruption, or incompetence is indicated despite the scrupulous care with which the technicians preserve their impartiality.

The year 1922 is given as that in which Russian reconstruction really began. The Bolsheviks who emerged to power in 1917 because they knew what they wanted created during the chaos of the intervening years the opportunity for the work which they are now directing. What that work is may be gathered from these sentences in the chapter entitled Industry and the Gosplan:

To integrate in detail the economic life of one hundred and fifty million people over a six thousand mile stretch of territory is a bigger job than has ever been attempted in administrative annals. Only time can tell whether or not it is too big for human minds to cope with. But one can only stand bareheaded before the audacity and courage of the experiment.

This job has been intrusted since 1923 to the State Planning Committee, popularly known as the Gosplan. Legally it is only an advisory body, a branch of the Council of Labor and Defense. Actually the Supreme Economic Council, a cabinet department controlling the several hundred trusts which operate the bulk of industrial production, refers to the Gosplan for acceptance or revision all its own proposals. "Every agricultural center, every factory," writes Stuart Chase, "prepares reports that ultimately come into Gosplan calculations. . . . As a result every industrial unit knows where it functions, what it is expected to produce, what niche it fills in the whole national economy. I found no factory manager, no director of even the smallest agricultural station, who did not know all about the Gosplan, who did not feel its hand on his day-to-day work."

In a highly industrialized country like the United States such detailed and far-reaching state control would mean the almost complete socialization of the nation's resources. In Russia, indeed, less than 20 per cent of industrial production

"Like viewing the universe from a hilltop."—Toledo Times.

"Done with skill, taste and ability."—Chicago Tribune.

"More dramatic than drama, more interesting than fiction."—Birmingham News.

"A university in itself."—Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph.

"The ONE book to read and know."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

700 Pages. Octavo.
Large Type.
Handsomely
Bound. Maps. Illustrations, etc.

A Background that will Broaden Any Mind

NOW you can have at your command what man has learned in the six greatest branches of human knowledge and culture. Six great romantic outlines, six comprehensive sections—compressed into one 700-page volume—will bring you the thrilling story of the world's HISTORY down to date—the stirring march and trends of RELIGION—the thought and wisdom of man's PHILOSOPHY—the intriguing beauty of the ARTS—the all embracing survey of every branch of SCIENCE—and a complete panorama of the world's LITERATURE from the first Neolithic scribbles to the work of modern authors of all nations.

A Liberal Education—in a Single Volume

THE OUTLINE OF MAN'S KNOWLEDGE, by Clement Wood, is the ONE book, the only book, that gives you the fascinating story of what man has learned and accomplished from the world's birth in a flare of meteoric splendor up to the arrival of radio, aviation and television. Here is the whole story—all of it—Science, Art, Literature, History, Philosophy and Religion—in one large beautiful volume that you can actually BORROW for a week at our expense.

Send No Money—BORROW it at Our Expense

Clip and mail the convenient coupon and it will bring you, prepaid, a copy of THE OUTLINE OF MAN'S KNOWLEDGE, by Clement Wood. Examine it. See for yourself how fascinating is the story of knowledge. Read it freely for a week. See how much you have missed in the realms of things you OUGHT TO KNOW. If you are not completely satisfied, send the book back within seven days. Otherwise, keep it as your very own and remit the astoundingly low price of only $1.50 and two dollars a month for two months thereafter.

But don't decide now. See this all-absorbing work first. You can do that at our expense. Send no money. Just clip and mail the coupon. Do it before the present edition is exhausted. Fill in the coupon and put it in the mails at once. Do it now. LEWIS COPELAND COMPANY, Dept. 6, 119 West 57th Street, New York, N. Y.

TEAR OFF ALONG THIS LINE AND MAIL TODAY

Lewis Copeland Company, Dept. 6.
119 West 57th St., New York City.

Kindly send me THE OUTLINE OF MAN'S KNOWLEDGE, by Clement Wood, 700 pages, illustrated, handsomely bound. Within 7 days I will either return the book or remit $1.50 as first payment and then $2.00 per month for two months, a total of $5.50.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....
($5.00 for complete payment within 7 days.)

remains in private hands. But Russia, it must be remembered, is 83 per cent an agricultural country, and 90 per cent of all agricultural output which finds a market is produced by peasant proprietors. The Russian peasant, therefore, is, as Bartlett Brebner calls him, "the ultimate dictator" of Russia, and only for his own purposes has he become the "ungrateful but determined defender" of the Bolshevik revolution. But here enters the paradox so omnipresent in all Russian affairs today. While a reluctant supporter of national legalized communism in his country, the peasant has always been and still is a non-legal communist in private practice.

The Russian agriculturist has never been a private proprietor in the sense in which the American farmer is one. He does not occupy a homestead in the midst of his own land, but lives in a village of other peasants often miles removed from the strip of earth he is entitled to cultivate. He is accustomed, then, to a communal life, and cooperation both in his social and economic affairs is forced on him by the very nature of his situation. It is no part of the Soviet Government's policy to alter this situation, but rather it aims to overlay a scientific, self-conscious form of communism on the existing primitive variety. Education both in the theory and practice of Marxism is being used by the Government to attain this end, the object being to modernize the peasant for his own advantage and that of his country. It is obviously a dangerous experiment to awaken a potential and possibly antagonistic future ruler of Russia to a realization of his pivotal position in the Socialistic Republic, but with its usual audacity the Soviet Government has undertaken it.

To give adequate attention to all the Russian internal problems analyzed in this book would, of course, be impossible. Stress has been laid on the economic situation, since inevitably it is the foundation stone on which the whole Soviet Socialistic structure is raised. Not only is it the heart of the organism here dissected, but it is also the life-blood in that organism's veins. The interest of this work, however, is by no means confined to the sections discussing it. Possible investors will do well to turn to the last chapter, learn what a Russian concession is, and why some concessions succeed and others fail. Politicians will find here described for them the organization of the Russian Government, and sociologists will receive here enlightenment on how uneasily lies the head that aspires to wear the thorny crown of Marxism. Most absorbing for the general public probably will be the discussion of Soviet education and its effect on the mentality of the much-misunderstood Russian people. In this connection one cannot do better than quote from George S. Counts, who, after paying tribute to the "vitality of the forces" at work, declares:

Without doubt one of the greatest accomplishments of the Revolution in the field of education is a psychological change which must eventually prove of great significance. The authority of conventional ideas and practices has been greatly reduced, if not annihilated, and energy has been released on a large scale for the solution of the educational problems. . . . Openness of mind may be regarded as one of the most important products of the Revolution. It has already given birth to many new institutions, and it will doubtless continue as a creative force until the present generation transmits its achievements as a heritage to its successors.

NORAH MEADE

A New Logic

The Technique of Controversy. By Boris B. Bogoslovsky. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

MR. BOGOSLOVSKY proposes a new logic. Its radical principle is the denial of the law of excluded middle, since Aristotle one of the three sacred laws of thought. The postulates that A is A, that A is not non-A, and that A is either B or non-B establish the static logic of classes or of qualitative terms and relations, and it is in opposition to this orthodoxy that Mr. Bogoslovsky formulates a dynamic logic which arises in the postulation that A is both B and not B, and which, of course, must also propose that A may not be A, thus abrogating in one breath both the laws of identity and contradiction.

A great many readers may not appreciate the hazards and hence the courage of this undertaking, not knowing well enough the aged impregnability of the wind-mill against which Mr. Bogoslovsky has broken his lance. Strong restrictive laws always inspire subversion, even if they be merely logical laws; there have been repeated attempts to contradict the rule against contradiction, usually subsiding with the paradox that to deny it affirms it, and it were better ignored. To attack excluded middle results somewhat similarly. Mr. Bogoslovsky's substitute, the law of included middle, becomes convulsed with paradoxes. Included middle operates within a quantitative continuum between B and non-B. It is the formulation of this polarized continuum with reiterated emphasis upon crude quantitative indices that, along with many illustrative applications, forms the burden of the book. The proposition "Al Smith is an anti-prohibitionist" does not contradict "Al Smith is a prohibitionist," for by the principle of included middle he is both, and the only dynamic logical problem is to ascertain how much of either he is. Construct a continuum between these poles, and it may be found by empirical investigation, after argument has ceased, that he is less than half of 1 per cent dry. That may be an important practical question to decide, but in one's excitement over any scheme for doing it one must not forget that neither the polarity nor the continuum could be stated or constructed if "prohibitionism" and "anti-prohibitionism" did not exclude one another in their defined meanings. Mr. Bogoslovsky has blurred the nature of continua in his desire for continuity; he has forgotten that the continuum is a logical series composed of logical individuals (points, instants, real numbers, etc.) and that logically an individual subsists by its exclusiveness and impenetrability. The illusion of continuity between polarized opposites may be obtained by the gesture of using quantified indices but, after all, even such terms are qualified by definition, even the fraction of a per cent must be just that fraction and no other.

Both ordinary logicians and Mr. Bogoslovsky will agree that this criticism is irrelevant except in so far as it points out that "The Technique of Controversy" is not concerned with a logical problem at all. It is interested in the a-logical level of discourse in which the properties of things, facts, or existences are discussed. The laws of logic which Mr. Bogoslovsky assails are intended to apply only in the field of definite entities, i.e., concepts. I yield to no one in my devotion to excluded middle. Yet I should be willing to admit that Mr. A may be both a good and a bad man; but that does not obligate me to deny that good is good and bad is bad, or to accuse Hamlet of pondering a false dichotomy.

Mr. Bogoslovsky's treatise is a delightfully earnest and cultivated presentation of a traditional uneasiness in philosophy that has culminated in Professor Dewey's type of pragmatism. From Heraclitus to Bergson there have been men who, in their sensitiveness to flux and confusion in the world, have tried to make logical processes correspondingly dynamic and indefinite, forgetting that the logos is with God, and that its incarnation is a mystery. No doubt there is a worthy practical problem in such attempts to provide regulative norms for exclusively empirical controversy. It is an appropriate enough program for pragmatists, but if they, in their zealous preoccupation with things, conclude that their quixotic effort to make thinking as confused as experience, establishes a new logic with heretical implications, they should reexamine the logical foundations of the science of probability which is directed toward the identical problem of the empirical judgment, to find how orthodox its basis is. Or, better, they should become aware of the exclusively different traits of ideas and things by consulting the chapter on Conception in "The Principles of Psychology." William James was one pragmatist who, for a time at least, recognized the proper sphere apart of logic, utterly and irremediably static, and perforce, idle, useless, and uninteresting to pragmatists.

MORTIMER J. ADLER

What Manner of Man Was Grey?

Lord Grey and the War. By Hermann Lutz. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THIS splendid volume was reviewed in the German original by Professor William L. Langer in the Nation for July 20, 1927, and the present reviewer would only commend that excellent appraisal. The reviewer wholly agrees with Professor Langer that the only weak portion of the book is Lutz's thesis of the pacific nature of Sazonov's policies up to July 28 and his contention that Russia came in chiefly because of the Austrian refusal to guarantee the sovereignty and integrity of Serbia. Neither of these contentions can be successfully defended at the present stage of our knowledge. In regard to Grey and English policy, however, we may regard Lutz's discussion as really definitive and impregnable.

It has been an interesting practice of writers on war-guilt literature to compare American and European writers. Professor Renouvin, for example, has recently declared his affinity with Professor Fay, and Professor C. J. H. Hayes has confirmed this resemblance in a recent review of Renouvin. Nothing could well be more misleading, however, than any such effort to represent Renouvin as comparable with Fay as regards either erudition, objectivity, exposition of the facts, or general interpretation of these facts. Having read both the latest edition of Renouvin and the proofs of Professor Fay's impending book, the reviewer can say with finality that Fay differs from Renouvin throughout as to general attitude, statement and analysis of the facts, and final conclusions. The American analogue of Renouvin is Bernadotte Schmitt and not Fay. Though Count Montgelas certainly far surpasses any other living scholar in his immediate and precise command of the facts of the 1914 crisis, the European writer on the subject of war responsibility who may be most fairly compared to Fay is none other than Herr Lutz. For a combination of encyclopedic knowledge of the sources and the facts of war-guilt, of objectivity and judiciousness of tone, of absence of partisanship, and of almost exasperating caution, Lutz is the only European writer who may, with fairness to both, be aptly compared with Professor Fay. And the general resemblance is made particular through the fact that, of the whole group of straightforward revisionists, Lutz and Fay judge Austria much more severely than do the other members of this group of writers.

For American readers drawn from the intelligent public the most interesting aspect of Lutz's book will be his magisterial portrait of the character and policies of Lord Grey, which we herewith reproduce in summary fashion and conclude:

Gentle in personal life, full of good-will and good feeling. A thoughtful, true, and loyal friend; a harsh and bitter enemy. No Machiavelli, and subjectively no hypocrite; nor the hawk-headed evil spirit with rapacious clawed fingers that many Germans imagined during the war. No true statesman. A man with a narrow insularity of outlook, his view dimmed by strong predilections and deep prejudices; unconscious of the enormous encouragement which his Entente policy gave to the nationalists in power in Russia and France. Accessible to suggestion and greatly under the influence of auto-suggestion. A man who came unwillingly to his post, who imagined that he was steering his ship with a sure hand, unaware that other hands were also on the wheel; who

"A Brilliant and Memorable Book"

LENIN

Thirty Years of Russia

By VALERIU MARCU

This is a new interpretation of the life and work of Lenin, a giant of our era, the Napoleon of the Russian Revolution. Valeriu Marcu, brilliant young German historian, narrates the life story of a man who made his way out of nameless depths into the Kremlin as absolute ruler. For twenty-three dark years a hunted fugitive slinking in obscurity. Then, a dictator in frayed trousers who sat in the gilded palaces of the Tsar and changed the stream of history.

"A brilliant and memorable book . . . the life story of a figure great, heroic, mysterious in itself. . . . Lenin stands forth against the Russian masses as a voice against a sombre orchestral effect. The book is both scientific and imaginative, both exact and poetic. It is probably one of the most important biographies of recent years."—LUDWIG LEWISOHN in the New York Herald Tribune.

Illustrated $5.00—at all bookshops

The Macmillan Company New York

Special Sailing Oct. 20th

ATTEND THE

Eleventh Anniversary Celebration

of the

RUSSIAN REVOLUTION

in

Moscow, November 7th

A gala event of unsurpassed magnificence and splendor! See the U.S.S.R. in its glory!

Visas assured. All expenses included. . . . . $350 UP

MAKE RESERVATIONS NOW

AMERICAN - EUROPEAN TRAVEL BUREAU

Official Representative of Russian Travel Bureau

100 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

CHelsea 4477

imagined himself free and saw nothing of the thousand threads of his own spinning that had combined into an unbreakable tow-rope and towed him in the course of others. A well-meaning, peace-loving nobleman whose heart longed for the simple joys of communion with nature. An upright man of the true British pattern, earnest but humorless. A man with two sets of human values, two standards, and a double morality. Not a great man, and not a strong man. A man with a kink in his soul. A man whom a policy of unintentional ambiguity stamped with some involuntary and, in his heart, detested features of Machiavelli; unworthy features, which will never disappear from his melancholy brow. An unhappy figure, not without elements of innate tragedy.

This was the man who in the last resort held in his hand during the crisis of July, 1914, the decision between peace and war.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Books in Brief

Reliquiae. By A. D. Godley. Edited by C. R. L. Fletcher. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $6.

A. D. Godley, long beloved tutor of Magdalen, was the perfect Oxonian. Dispassionate follower of duty, devotee of lost causes, addicted to the modest recreations of bicycle riding and mountain climbing, he jested in Greek and tossed his Latin like a gentleman. Despite much serious scholarly work, an edition of Tacitus, a translation of Herodotus and another of Horace, he was best known during his lifetime for his contributions of learned wit to the Oxford Magazine, which benefited by his sparkle for nearly forty years. The two posthumous volumes of his fragmentary poems and essays, for the most part concerned with university interests, give us the inmost life of the Oxford of the first quarter of this century. But there are larger interests touched upon as well, notably in the five lectures on English literature which contain many a shrewd bit of criticism. Godley could be wise and objective when he chose, but usually he chose to coddle his prejudices amusedly, and to write witty prose and wittier verse, expressive of a nature that, in the inevitable defeat of life, knew how to laugh without bitterness, becomingly. In "Reliquiae" one tastes the finest flavor of a mellow autumnal culture.

Endymion. A Poetic Romance. By John Keats. Type-facsimile of the First Edition. With Introduction and Notes by H. Clement Notcutt. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

"Endymion" is not a great or even a good poem, but it will always have interest as being the first extended effort of Keats, and the present edition will be valuable for students because of its scholarly and illuminating notes.

The Skull of Swift. An Extempore Exhumation. By Shane Leslie. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.50.

A good book on Swift is very much needed. This one, though it makes more of the great Dean's exciting tragedy than has been made before, does not quite fill the bill, being unnecessarily clever in its presentation of the evidence and in its delineation of the drama. A good book on Swift will be simpler than Mr. Leslie's—simpler and profounder.

Shipmates. By Felix Riesenber. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

The writer of these sketches, many of which are familiar to readers of the Nautical Gazette, is no correspondence-school graduate of the sea. The number and variety of ships, the range of time, the extent of geography, all reveal the seasoned mariner. But there is more than knowledge in these reminiscences of men and events afloat—there is an understanding of human nature and the spirit of his time. One detects, also, a wistful regret at having left the stern life of the sea for work ashore which pays more in money and ease and reputation but less perhaps in solid self-respect.

Dollars and World Peace. By Kirby Page. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.50.

Mr. Page has written another pamphlet designed apparently for Y. M. C. A. consumption. It argues that until the problems rising out of nationalism, industrialism, and imperialism are solved, no exhortations on behalf of peace and pledges not to fight will be of value. He has done his job upon a higher plane than many of our political evangelists.

A Political Handbook of the World's Parliaments, Parties, and Press as of January 1, 1928. Edited by Malcolm W. Davis and Walter H. Mallory. Harvard University Press and Yale University Press.

The "Political Handbook of Europe" prepared under the auspices of the Council of Foreign Relations a year ago has grown into this "Political Handbook of the World." Summarizing party programs and leaders, and listing the chief newspapers of sixty countries, it will be a useful desk-book for editors and students of foreign affairs. The task has been painstakingly performed, with a scrupulous effort at impartiality. But it is impossible to touch politics without any bias. Venezuela is frankly called a military dictatorship, Peru appears to be a constitutional republic. Sacasa, Solorzano, and Sandino's names do not appear among the leaders of the Nicaraguan Liberal Party; Moncada's does. And the explanations of the status and importance of individual newspapers are somewhat erratic. These, however, are minor defects, and, doubtless, will fade out in the subsequent annual editions.

The Building of Cultures. By Roland B. Dixon. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.

Dr. Dixon has given us a thoughtful exposition of the processes of the origin and spread of culture. Discovery and invention, the diffusion of these after they have been made, the manner in which they combine into what are termed "trait complexes," and the fashion and conditions under which these, in turn, are diffused, all play important parts in his discussion. The oft-debated question as to whether the same manner of doing the same thing can be independently developed or not is gone into with some care, and there is a chapter devoted to the theories of the English and German diffusionist schools that shows the fallacies on which the ideas of the two groups are based. Dr. Dixon pays his compliments to Wissler's method of making historical reconstructions by the plotting of distributions of traits and complexes of traits, and demonstrates how Wissler has failed to meet the criticisms that can be leveled against his position. A final chapter is devoted to the processes through which civilizations come into being; the author comes to the conclusion that "we live in a three-dimensional world, and human culture is built in accordance with it. . . . We of today have builded high indeed, but upon a base so extensive these who come after it may well build far higher." The book is stimulating and written with the authority of Dr. Dixon's extensive information of cultural data. It should prove useful to any interested in the processes of human civilization.

□ THEATER □

—THE ACTOR MANAGERS present—

GRAND STREET FOLLIES

OF 1928

BOOTH THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

International Relations Section

World Copyright

By L. J. DE BEKKER

PROTECTION of the creator of a literary or artistic work was the sole purpose of the Berne Convention of 1886, which brought into being the International Copyright Union, and of the Berlin revision of 1908, by which the powers of the union were augmented, and no less of the latest revision, completed in Rome last June. As in 1886 and in 1908, the uppermost question in the minds of all concerned is, What will the United States do about it?

After 1886 the United States did nothing. After 1908 the United States talked about it, and the following year enacted a law amending and consolidating all the acts concerning copyright so far as the United States was concerned. Beyond that, nothing. The Typographical Union insisted that the protection of copyright should be extended only to works manufactured in the United States. The manufacturers and jobbers of books were not loath to have protection against the invasion of their markets from countries of cheaper production. Authors, architects, artists, composers, and playwrights were not organized; hence their views concerning their rights were not heeded. Out of sheer generosity the twenty-eight Powers signatory to the Berne Convention provided a loophole by which Americans could obtain "courtesy" copyright. Publication simultaneously in a country belonging to the union, if an American could obtain it, did the trick, and that solely upon the payment of Register's fees and the deposit of copies in the United States. And simultaneous publication could and frequently can be had for Americans in Great Britain. The United States was thus placed in the position of accepting for American citizens universally recognized legal rights which were denied to the citizens or subjects of other states.

But the Rome revision of the Berne Convention may change all that. Article 28, which is new (the complete convention as revised being a document of 11,000 words, with much additional material), provides that when six ratifications have been obtained the convention shall become effective as between the six Powers within a month. On July 1, 1931, the amended convention will apply in full force to all Powers which have ratified it, but: "Those countries foreign to the union will be permitted to join the union by way of adhesion until August 1, 1931, under the convention signed in Berlin, November 13, 1908, or the present convention. After August 1, 1931, they will only be able to adhere to the present convention."

The "present convention" being more elaborate in its specifications of the rights of the author presents difficulties for the United States which do not exist in the Berlin revision. Moreover, it contains an addition to Article 6 by which, upon written complaint to the headquarters in Berne that a "country foreign to the union" does not sufficiently protect the rights of authors who are resident in one of the countries of the union, the "courtesy" copyright already referred to may be withdrawn. That is tantamount to saying to Uncle Sam: "Come in now; the water's fine. Hands up if you don't."

The United States was represented by impartial observers at the meeting in Rome, and knows officially what to expect. It knows that the United States must continue a policy of "splendid isolation," which American authors frankly regard as that of an outlaw, or that this country must cease to be "un pays étranger à l'union," which is outer darkness to the rest of the world, despite the numerous treaties by which the State Department has sought reciprocal privileges with other governments for its citizens, and despite the Pan-American copyright agreement.

Copyright covers, the International Copyright Union now declares, all productions in the literary, scientific, and artistic domain, regardless of mode or form of expression, such as books, pamphlets and other writings, lectures, speeches, and sermons, and other works of the same nature; dramatic or dramatico-musical works, choreographic works or pantomimes, if the action (mise en scène) is fixed by writing or otherwise; compositions in music, with or without words; works of design, of painting, architecture, sculpture, engravings and lithography; illustrations, geographical charts; plans, details, or plastic works relative to geography, topography, architecture, or the sciences. Photographic works and works obtained by analogous processes are specifically included, and the author is protected not only on his original work, but on all adaptations, translations, musical arrangements, and other reproductions or transformations of a work. Works of art applied to industry are, however, relegated for legislation to the various countries of the union, as are political speeches and judicial debates and other material subject to reproduction in the newspapers.

The duration of copyright is extended to fifty years from the death of an author, or the death of the last surviving author, if the work be one of collaboration.

Full control is accorded the author or composer in the matter of reproduction of his work by means of moving pictures, radio and "canned-music" instruments, and, although he may have disposed of certain rights, he continues to retain the right to "oppose all deformation, mutilation, or modification of said work which might be prejudicial to his honor or his reputation."

If the United States is to give its adhesion to the International Copyright Union, the foreign author, if of a country which is a member of the union, must be accorded these privileges, which are denied to citizens of the United States:

There need be no notice of copyright on the work copyrighted.

There need be no deposit of copies with the Register of Copyright.

There need be no payment of registration fee.

Complete protection must be accorded without regard to whether a work is manufactured within the United States or not.

Perhaps the greatest difference between the conception of copyright expressed in the Berne Convention as modified in Berlin and in Rome, and as set forth in the present copyright law of the United States, is in the recognition by the International Copyright Union of all the rights of the author, artist, or composer as divisible, while the United States expressly holds that there can be only one copyright to a work, and that it is not divisible.

In practice the American author usually reserves by contract all rights except those specifically assigned. Thus the novelist may assign serial right to a magazine, second serial to a newspaper syndicate, book right to a book publisher, dramatic right to a producer, movie right to a movie corporation, translation right to a foreign publisher, and still retain rights to abridge or enlarge, etc. For the protection of motion picture, "canned music," and other rights the American Copyright Act of 1909 has been amended, but the process of simplification in industry now going on is a sufficient argument in support of the contention of the Authors' League that when, and if, a new general copyright law is enacted, this division of rights should be recognized. In fact H. R. 8913, introduced by Mr. Vestal at the last session of Congress, favorably reported by the Committee on Patents, and therefore a possible subject for action next winter, expressly states that "All rights comprised in a copyright are several, distinct, and severable."

Legislation to enable the United States to join the International Copyright Union may be introduced at the next session of Congress, in the opinion of Thorvald Solberg, United States Register of Copyright. Every man and woman engaged in creative work, it is safe to assume, will favor early action.

Contributors to This Issue

FREDERIC BABCOCK is a Chicago journalist who contributed Pineapple Politics to The Nation of April 25, last.

J. N. AIKEN is associate editor of the Virginian-Pilot of Norfolk, Virginia.

WILLIAM JOURDAN RAPP is a journalist whose home is in New York City.

CHARLES NORMAN is the author of "Tragic Beaches."

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN regularly reviews books for The Nation.

NORAH MEADE has frequently reviewed books on contemporary Russia for The Nation.

MORTIMER J. ADLER is the author of "Dialectics."

HARRY ELMER BARNES, professor of history at Smith College, has written extensively on the World War.

L. J. DE BEKKER is a journalist living in New York City.

Cash for Your Spare Time

A NEW feature of the Literary Guild enables you to earn a liberal commission by enrolling members and at the same time build a permanent business for yourself.

Spend a few minutes of your spare time daily in this pleasant and dignified pastime. Your efforts backed by $80,000.00 advertising program this fall. No previous experience necessary. We have prepared a booklet which tells you how to present the Guild plan and make selling easy. Send for a copy TODAY. Address

Mr. Michael Shepard, Dept. S-4

THE LITERARY GUILD OF AMERICA, Inc.

55 Fifth Ave., New York.

USEFUL KNOWLEDGE

By
GERTRUDE STEIN

This is the American something that makes romance everything. And romance is Useful Knowledge. $5.00

PAYSON & CLARKE, Ltd.

THE HOUND & HORN

A HARVARD MISCELLANY

for Fall

WILL INCLUDE

Fugue .....SEAN O'FAOLAIN

Adam Winthrop .....G. L. KITTREDGE

Four Harvard
Architects .....RUSSELL HITCHCOCK
(WITH PHOTOGRAPHS)

Politicon .....R. P. BLACKMUR

Jean Giraudoux .....JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Drawings .....{FAIRFIELD PORTER and E. A. AUSTIN

Notes on Printing .....G. P. WINSHIP

Also Notes on Politics, Book and Periodical Reviews.

THE HOUND & HORN

BOX A

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

50c a copy. $2.00 for one year. $3.50 for two years.

SHORT STORIES

Send the short stories you have completed and those you are working upon to Daniel O'Malley, Author's Agent, who will sell them to the suitable publications for you. Thousands of authors are enriching themselves by this arrangement. A reasonable commission is charged only when story is sold.

Daniel O'Malley, Esq.
Dep't "N," 296 Broadway New York, N. Y.

BOOKS

THE MYTH OF ADAM AND EVE By Paul Lafargue
The Genesis story studied in the light of modern anthropology.
Brilliant, fascinating, suggestive. 25 cents, postpaid.
Charles H. Kerr & Co., 347 East Ohio St., Chicago

IMPORTED WOOLENS

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers
at Manufacturer's Price
Suits Lengths Cut to Order Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland Write for patterns stating shades desired.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1928

No. 3298

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	255
EDITORIALS:
The Roots of Corruption.....	258
Labor Strategy .....	259
The Consumer's View.....	259
Blasphemy à la Mode.....	260
EXCLUSIVE. By Hendrik van Loon.....	261
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	262
THE HOOVER WHISPERING CAMPAIGN. By the Unofficial Spokesman.....	263
JUGOSLAVIA AT THE CROSS-ROADS. By G. E. R. Gedye.....	264
MEXICAN MESSIAHS. By Anita Brenner.....	266
BACK FROM CARCASSONNE. By Malvina Lindsay.....	268
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	270
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Two California Poems. By Hildegard Flanner.....	272
Case Studies in Our Imperialism. By Paul H. Douglas.....	272
The New Historical Novel. By Clifton P. Fadiman.....	273
The Irrepressible Conflict. By Allen Tate.....	274
The Drifting Grey. By Eugene N. Anderson.....	274
Fiction Shorts. By C. P. F.....	275
Orientalia. By L. S. G.....	276
Books in Brief.....	276
Drama: A Comedy. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	276
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Freedom in Nicaragua.....	278
Ugarte on Sandino.....	280

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR

MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

ELABORATE PREPARATIONS ARE BEING MADE for the Yankee-supervised Presidential election in Nicaragua. Airplane units are to pick up the news from Marine Corps observers stationed at isolated polling-places. Never, probably, did so many soldiers stand guard to prove that an election was "free." In the sense that illiterate peons will be free to walk to the polls unmolested and cast their votes as they may wish, this election doubtless will be free. But the fundamental question is, how do they determine how they "wish" to vote? And there, of course, the enormous power of the United States comes in. Both the Liberal and Conservative candidates for the Presidency are seeking to pose as the favored candidate of the American officialdom. The Nationalist Party, whose program we print in this week's International Relations Section, is not permitted to appear on the ballots. The candidates are ready to promise anything; they believe that such promises will help them win. Perhaps they are mistaken; we hope so. But if the rumor should prove true that another loan is being arranged to finance the present Government of Nicaragua through its preelection difficulties, it would leave a black blot on the American record which the most earnest efforts of General McCoy could never wipe out.

FAR INTO THE JUNGLE the marines have penetrated, but still Sandino eludes them. Week after week the American officials report more surrenders by his band, until the surrenders total far more men than he has ever commanded. Still Sandino continues his romantic struggle against the overwhelming force of the invaders. And now a Nicaragua paper prints a roster of the "immortal legion" with which Sandino first took to the hills in May, 1927. They were thirty, including the general. The oldest was fifty-four, the youngest twelve years old. And now, after sixteen months in the field, four of the thirty, this Nicaraguan paper says, are dead; and every one of the other twenty-six is still in the field, fighting.

THE DELIBERATELY DISHONEST CHARACTER of most of the personal attacks upon Governor Smith is well illustrated by the appearance in a pamphlet on the Governor written by the Rev. "Bob" Schuler, of Los Angeles, of the rhetorical questions asked by the editor of The Nation in the article on Al Smith which appeared in this journal on November 30, 1927. These questions were cited as those being asked by snobs, rumor-mongers, gossipers, and religious fanatics, and they were set at the head of the Smith article in order to be answered as they deserved to be. The very reverend "Bob" apparently has torn these questions from their context and deliberately closed his pamphlet with them as if they were the opinions of The Nation's editor and represented his attitude toward the Governor of New York. This is, we repeat, characteristic of the underhand campaign being waged by the Governor's adversaries, especially the rabid clerical ones. It is well that Dr. Work, Mr. Hoover's chairman, has disavowed them. But if Mr. Hoover has a spark of chivalry in him he will take an early opportunity to denounce the whole whispering campaign of which, as our Washington correspondent points out elsewhere in this issue, he is increasingly the beneficiary.

THE REPUBLICANS DREW FIRST BLOOD in the Maine election, sweeping the State in the gubernatorial contest by the largest majorities in Maine's political history. The Democratic alibi is weak—the Democratic national organization, knowing that it was in for a bad defeat, kept scrupulously out of the State contest, whereas the Republicans, desiring the prestige of a smashing victory, sent in their heaviest available guns, including Senator Curtis. The Republicans deliberately stressed national issues, recalling that Maine was one of the first prohibition States in the country, and being aware that some of the State Democratic leaders had deserted Governor Smith on that issue. The young Democratic candidate for governor attempted to make export of Maine's water-power an issue, but the Republican candidate successfully sidestepped.

"YOUNG BOB" LA FOLLETTE won his renomination as the Republican candidate for United States Senator from Wisconsin by an overwhelming majority; and he carried his progressive ticket for State offices to victory in every instance except the governorship. For governor a conservative Hoover supporter, Walter J. Kohler, received 220,000 votes; Congressman Joseph D. Beck, the La Follette progressive candidate, 200,000 votes; and the present governor, J. Fred Zimmerman, 83,000 votes. Zimmerman had the indorsement of the Anti-Saloon League, which is supposed to have cost him votes; he also was held responsible for certain unwelcome tax legislation; and, what was probably most important, he had entirely lost the confidence of both wings of the Republican Party in Wisconsin. He ran for office two years ago as an old friend of the elder La Follette, spreading abroad an indorsement given him by the Senator years before; he also denounced the "Madison ring," and thereby gained enough support from the conservatives to defeat the real La Follette candidate for the nomination. But he could not long keep the La Follette mantle wrapped about himself, while the taint of his early affiliations hurt him with conservatives. Zimmerman's smashing defeat, even though Kohler led the poll, helps to consolidate progressive leadership in the State. "Young Bob" and Wisconsin are to be congratulated.

ARISTIDE BRIAND'S SPEECH before the Assembly of the League of Nations was one of the strangest in the history of that contradictory statesman. Briand first attracted public attention in France nearly thirty years ago as a fiery champion of the general strike; he won another sort of fame, as Premier, by using the military to suppress a strike. He was one of the war-time prime ministers, and one of the post-war fire-eaters, but when he fell from office after playing golf too assiduously with Lloyd George he exclaimed proudly "If I fall, I fall to the Left" and proceeded to regain prestige as a champion of reconciliation. He was the man of Locarno, who sipped beer with Stresemann at Thoiry, and the inspirer of the Kellogg pacts to outlaw war—and now he has amazed Geneva by a pessimistic speech which would have been unworthy of Poincaré. He sneered at Russia's pleas for disarmament, and declared that the Bolsheviks—whose standing army is, in fact, less than half the size of that maintained by the Czar in 1913—were increasing their army and glorying in it. He sarcastically praised the personnel of Germany's little army of 100,000 and used its valor as a justification for France's maintenance of an army six times its size. Finally, he gave a patently insincere history of the recent Anglo-French naval negotiations—inspired, he said, solely by the desire to reduce armament!—and complained of criticism of it. If the agreement has been misunderstood, surely only those who kept it secret can be blamed. But it is a continental tragedy that M. Briand, who in the sunset of his life was earning the title of European statesman, should have proved himself again just a cheap French politician.

THE CRITICAL STAGE in Germany's reparations history began on September 1 when, for the first time since the adoption of the Dawes Plan in 1924, she was required to meet the standard annuity under that plan. This amounts to 2,500,000,000 marks (approximately $600,000,000), whereas the payments in cash and deliveries in kind during the past four years have totaled $1,301,860,000. While it is true that Germany has made all her payments—which increased progressively in size from 1924 to 1928—on schedule time, there are several factors that distinctly weaken the force and meaning of the statement. Most important is the fact that during this four-year probationary period Germany has borrowed from foreign countries something like 10,000,000,000 marks ($2,380,000,000), or more than the total of her reparations payments. Furthermore, despite the reorganization of her production Germany's exports have consistently, even increasingly, fallen below her imports. In April, 1927, her imports exceeded her exports by 299,000,000 marks; in April, 1928, the excess was 376,000,000 marks; and monthly data indicate that the gap is growing even wider. Meanwhile internally the governmental expenses—particularly in the constituent states—have been mounting steadily. From 1924 to 1928 the total increase was over $500,000,000. Parker Gilbert criticized this tendency severely in his report last year, yet it has continued parallel to the corresponding rise in State and local expenditures in the United States. Any increased contribution toward reparations from the German budget, therefore, must necessarily conflict with the internal development of Germany and with the growing demands of her states, which Berlin has not been able or willing to control.

NO WONDER THAT GERMANY, facing an unfavorable trade balance and rising governmental costs, is pessimistic as to her ability to meet the new burdens. With no limit to the number of years that the standard annuity shall run the outlook is even more doleful. New foreign loans could be made, but that would only postpone the final day of reckoning, as to a large extent the loans of the past four years have been doing. A year ago J. M. Keynes predicted that the Dawes Plan was likely to break down at this phase. He reasoned that the experts had never expected Germany to carry the full burden of the fifth yearly annuity. They had merely hoped that after postponing the final settlement of the reparations problem a few years much of the ill feeling existing in 1923-1924 would have evaporated, making the chances of a just and adequate settlement more auspicious. The French view of Germany today had, in fact, become saner and less emotional than it was four years ago, until the unfortunate utterances of M. Briand, which play, of course, directly into the hands of the most violent German Nationalists and the survivors of the old military group.

SUGAR IS CHEAP despite Cuba's efforts to limit production, and as a result the Cuban Government is giving up its restrictive legislation. Two years ago, in the hope of raising prices, the Cuban mills stopped grinding after producing 4,884,658 tons of raw sugar, and last year they held Cuba's product down to 4,500,000 tons—as compared with 5,100,000 tons in the year before the restrictions went into effect. But the rest of the world, in particular Java, went on producing cane in abundance—adding 1,379,000 tons to its yield in the two years. In the glutted world market the price of sugar went down, and Cuba, despite the fact that she had left a third of her cane standing uncut in the fields, got only lower prices for her sacrifice. The Czech producers, who had agreed to join Cuba in an effort at restriction, also suffered. And the net result, like the net result of the British effort to control the price of rubber in the world market, is another demonstration of the futility of government efforts at price-fixing. It is a lesson which might well be heeded by those who see in price-fixing a solution of the farmers' ills in this country.

FLORENCE S. KNAPP, the first woman to hold high office in New York State, has been sentenced to serve thirty days in the Albany County jail. The Special Deputy Attorney General who prosecuted Mrs. Knapp urged a suspension of sentence, but Supreme Court Justice Stephen Callaghan refused, remarking that the records "furnished indisputable proof that funds amounting to $27,604.18 were improperly paid by the State on false certifications by the defendant," that, apparently, she had received some $24,000 of this, that there was evidence before the grand jury to justify "at least thirty" instead of only twelve indictments, that she had sought to obstruct the course of justice, and had committed perjury and subornation of perjury. "The purpose of punishment," said the judge, "is not that society may wreak vengeance against the guilty, but is rather for the salutary purpose of warning others that they may not commit like offenses against the law." And what kind of warning is it when a shabby young man is sent to prison for life for picking four pockets, while a well-dressed woman official who steals $24,000 from the State she has sworn to serve goes to jail for only a month?

COMMERCIAL FLYING, so long dormant in this country, seems to be waking to its possibilities with the inauguration of a combined airplane-railway service between New York City and San Francisco and a similar line between the former city and Chicago. The failure of commercial flying to make progress in this country has long been an almost inexplicable puzzle. Passenger routes have criss-crossed Europe since the end of the World War and have long been an accepted means of communication there. With the far greater distances to be traversed in this country, the American desire for speed, and a large traveling public willing to pay handsomely in order to save time, commercial flying should have developed faster here than abroad. Instead, it has evolved scarcely at all, but it is not improbable that its growth may now become the more rapid on account of the long delay. Although our great distances seem to offer unusual opportunities for airplane travel, they also present some handicaps. Eight or ten hours is about as long, in present circumstances, as passengers care to remain in the air. But if a passenger is landed then and allowed to pass the night in a hotel, much time is lost. In the lately started transcontinental service the passenger flies during two days and is hurried on during the succeeding nights in a railway sleeping-car. In going from Chicago to New York, the traveler quits the former city late in the afternoon, reaches Cleveland by nightfall, and there boards a sleeper bringing him into New York in the morning.

COUNT BROCKDORFF-RANTZAU, who has just died while German Ambassador to Moscow, deserved well of his countrymen for two reasons. To his everlasting honor he laid down the office of Foreign Minister rather than sign the Treaty of Versailles. "It is demanded," he said to the Allied statesmen, "that we acknowledge sole guilt for the war. Such a profession would be a lie in my mouth." Privately he declared that he would rather have his right hand cut off than sign the treaty which was so monstrous an injustice in so many ways and threatened the very existence of Europe. To the German Cabinet he said: "Don't sign—we shall have to go through hell lasting two or three months at most. If we sign, it will be a lingering sickness and the entire people will go to ruin"—it did in the inflation days. Man after man followed his example in refusing to sign the treaty, while the Allies waited in trepidation, for their armies were disintegrating, and Lloyd George himself eagerly asked travelers from Germany how far the Germans could be pushed without turning upon the Allies. Had there been a united German front like Brockdorff-Rantzau's the post-war story of Europe would have been entirely different. Finally, Hermann Müller, now the Chancellor, was found to sign a document to which no honest German should ever have put his name. In 1922 Brockdorff-Rantzau was appointed Ambassador to Moscow. Here again he deserved well of his people for his share in the initiation and maintenance of the broadminded, decent, and humane policy which the German Government has consistently maintained toward Russia. A diplomat of the old Prussian school, he was quick to accept the republic, and he served it with absolute fidelity and loyalty.

MARY GARRETT HAY IS DEAD, and there is sorrow among women's organizations throughout the country. Wherever women gathered, for half a century, she was a vigorous and important figure, organizing, speaking, raising necessary funds with an enthusiasm and a shrewd knowledge that were invaluable. She was a moving force and a high official in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the National Woman's Suffrage Association, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the League of Women Voters, the Women's Law Enforcement League. She spent her life fighting for two causes, prohibition and woman suffrage. And after she had boosted them into the law of the land, she set about trying to make them the habit of the land. Herself an influential Republican, she urged women to join a party, to take part in politics, to use the vote for which she had fought. An uncompromising teetotaler, she insisted that prohibition be enforced, and she organized women who agreed with her into a fighting body. She was a square little white-haired person with snapping blue eyes and a voice that dared one to start an argument. It was a treat to hear her speak her mind. She feared no man or woman, and she said exactly what she thought. Violent in her beliefs, her loyalties, her prejudices, she saw everything clearly black or white, without shadows or nuances. A crusader she was, marching against the liquor interests, against the entrenched male voter, against political crookedness, shams, and evasions. Marching, fighting, giving no quarter, swaggering a little in her invincible rightness, she belonged to that generation of feminists and reformers to whom doubts were treason.

PEKING, August 21. The Municipal Bureau of Public Safety has declared that Peking women under thirty years of age must bob their hair or pay a "degeneracy tax." Mayor Ho Chi-kung is determined to eliminate feudalistic habits still adhered to by some of the Peking people. He has ordered that men who insist upon wearing queues must pay a heavy monthly tax.

HAVE you heard the latest news?
Now the Revolution's there,
Peking men must dock their queues,
Peking girls must bob their hair.

Fine the folks if they delay.
Tax them if they say they won't,
That's the modern Western way—
Shake a stick and grumble "Don't."

Peking girls must bob their hair,
Peking men must dock their queues.
Do they wish to? Who should care?
Smash their feudalistic views!

The Roots of Corruption

PHILADELPHIA is rubbing its eyes. A grand jury investigating gang murders has come on the trail of organized crime upon a scale to make Chicago gasp. A highly organized criminal ring, intimately associated with the Police Department, has been making crime a profession in Philadelphia, and eminent attorneys have assisted it. Redistilling plants operated so close to a police station that the officers on duty complained of the fumes, but protection had been paid, and the business continued. Machine-guns were sold without permits to the thugs who carried out the gang's murder orders. An unofficial bootleggers' court settled disputes between rival gangs, with the aid of expensive counsel. Meanwhile, police officers were opening bank accounts that ran into the hundreds of thousands of dollars; and to this day not one officer of the city police department has aided the investigation.

The details are new, and the existence of a district attorney and a grand jury with the courage and ability to expose such facts is novel; but the main outlines of the story could probably be repeated in any one of a score of large cities of the United States. Chicago's homicide rate, like Detroit's, is even higher than Philadelphia's; and probably murder and bootlegging are more elaborately organized in all the cities along the Canadian border. New York City, too, while—despite campaign legends—considerably cleaner and better policed than the cities of Mr. Hoover's allies Bill Vare and Bill Thompson, has its organized gangs, and no diner-out in the city can be unfamiliar with the fact that police protection is a commodity for sale on the market.

Philadelphia, to be sure, has a distinguished record for corruption. It was twenty-five years ago this year that Lincoln Steffens wrote his famous article describing Philadelphia as "the worst-governed city in the country," and asserting that while "All our municipal governments are more or less bad and all our people are optimists, Philadelphia is . . . the most corrupt and the most contented." It still is. Steffens, a quarter of a century ago, looked back upon the sad history of reform movements in Philadelphia, and tempered his enthusiasm over the apparent reawakening of civic conscience in the Quaker City. Well he might. Philadelphia, under the Vares, is as rottenly corrupt today as it was then under Matthew Quay, and prohibition has added incentives to crime and opportunities for corruption which did not exist even in the palmiest days of South Philadelphia's four-corner saloons. There is no more chance for District Attorney Monaghan and Mayor Mackey to succeed in cleaning up the city today than there was for General Smedley D. Butler when he imported marine-corps methods into the police administration, and, despite an unrivaled genius for advertising, made one of the worst failures in American police history.

And the reason for this is clear: it is that this sort of corruption is close to the roots of the power of both of the great political parties today. Without the political-patronage system it might be possible to clean up. But with the weight of the two party organizations and of the hundreds of thousands of political office-holders against reform, a real housecleaning is an impossibility. Votes are not bought and sold today as baldly as they were a quarter of a century ago. But favors are swapped. Every city lawyer knows that the best way to obtain an acquittal for his petty clients is not to study law books but to see the right man—the man with influence, the friend of the judge, the "wise guy." Little men are ready to repay the favors done them by bigger men; and bigger men remember gratefully the powers that appointed them. Steffens's analysis, made in 1903, is as true today as it was then:

The President of the United States and his patronage; the National Cabinet and their patronage; the Congress and the patronage of the Senators and the Congressmen from Pennsylvania; the Governor of the State and the State Legislature with their powers and patronage—all these bear down upon Philadelphia to keep it in the control of Quay's [read "Vare's" in 1928] boss and their little ring. This is the ideal of party organization.

Steffens then was making the same discouraged analysis of the political scene which Frank Kent has just renewed in his "Political Behavior." The great virtue upon which American political reputations are built is loyalty: loyalty to the gang, to the party, to the organization and its weakest links.

The country had an exhibition of perversion of the upper reaches of its political machinery during the Harding Administration. And the federal Department of Justice is still being used as a partisan tool. Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt manipulates her official position for brazenly political ends. One need not cite her speech before the Methodists of Ohio. Her Broadway raids were intended to advertise the wetness of Al Smith's New York, while her own party's Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia went relatively unscathed. And, finally, her prosecution of Perry Howard, former Republican National Committeeman from Mississippi, was just cheap political blatherskiting. Perry Howard has been one of the pillars of the skeleton organization of Negro Republicanism in the South for years; he was one of Mr. Hoover's preconvention enthusiasts. Like all Southern Republican politicians, he dealt in post offices and other political appointments; he received cash from the organization, and paid it out for value received. He did what he was asked to do, loyally and corruptly, as did his fellows in the other Southern States. Then, when it became politically expedient for the Republican Party to dissociate itself from the Negroes in the South, Perry Howard was suddenly prosecuted for doing what he had been paid to do. Party power rests on protection and patronage, but, of course, protection lasts only as long as it is expedient.

This is a bossed country, and the power of the bosses roots, ultimately, in the protection given to the kind of criminals who are being exposed in Philadelphia. One or two police captains degraded will avail nothing; the men who named them will remain. The power of the precinct captains in both parties is responsible for the corrupt police officers, and the influence of the precinct captains will determine the national election. In Philadelphia, for instance, the Vare machine counts the votes before election. When one reads of "strong Al Smith sentiment in Philadelphia," it can mean little except that Mr. Raskob's lieutenants have come to an understanding with the Vares.

Labor Strategy

"CLASS collaboration," hissed the British Communists when the annual Trade Union Congress at London voted for the so-called Mond policy of co-operation between capital and labor. "Industrial realism," replied the leaders of the Congress. The realists won in the vote almost six to one.

The fundamental question at issue was this: How far can a group of workers go in cooperating with employers to maintain efficiency without surrendering the essential spirit and meaning of the labor movement? The traditional attitude of the labor movement has been one of opposition to the owning class. When Sir Alfred Mond, now Lord Melchett, invited the leaders of British unionism to meet him and a distinguished group of large employers to discuss industrial cooperation, the Cook-Maxton faction in the labor movement wanted to refuse the invitation. But the invitation was accepted, and preliminary plans were made.

It is too early to judge those plans; they have not been completed, much less put into practice. But this much seems clear: Class cooperation between British unions and employers is not the same thing as is usually described by that phrase in America. The British unions cooperate with employers on the basis of collective bargaining and the union shop. It is taken for granted that workers shall choose their own form of organization, their own leaders, and function without discrimination. That basic right is not established in nine-tenths of American industry. "Cooperation" in most American industries means agreeable submission by the workers to the methods of operation advocated by the management.

The British unions, in spite of their conferences with the employers, have not surrendered their union shop or their fundamental socialist aspirations—and these aspirations put a new meaning upon any temporary compromise they may accept. The ringing militancy of Robert Smilley is gone from a miners' union which has lost 300,000 members in frontal attacks upon the British coal owners, but the spirit of British labor is not broken. With industry in a desperate plight because of the loss of overseas markets and unemployment a chronic disaster, the British workers realize the necessity of increased efficiency if their factories are to be kept running. The labor movement has both an immediate and an ultimate purpose—to gain improved conditions for workers within the business structure and to modify the distribution of power in that system, in an effort to approach industrial democracy. The unions, having sensibly rejected the doctrine of violent revolution, must of course seek to make the most of the business system in its present stage.

Until recent years the labor movement, particularly in Great Britain, has maintained a negative attitude toward work. "If the employers want to get more work out of us, let them try," labor has seemed to say. "Don't we work hard enough already?" Fear has forced efficiency in times of unemployment, but in times of a scarcity of labor the responsibility for efficiency has fallen almost entirely upon the boss. It is useless to condemn this attitude of labor unless we condemn every other feature of the industrial system which enables men to get a living without efficient work. Under a profit economy the common worker not only has no stake in ownership as an incentive for labor, but he sees above him the accepted inefficiency of the business manipulators who deliberately limit output for the sake of profit.

But the sabotage of business manipulators does not justify labor in withholding efficiency unless the workers are aiming at a quick transformation of the business system through catastrophe. The best of our labor leaders have come to see that they will be in a better position to claim the fruits of new inventions if they openly cooperate with the advancing machine. Such unions as the Amalgamated Clothing Workers have agreed with the employers to accept improved work standards and changes in the machine process. The labor movement need not suffer from the loss of some of its pugnacious attitudes so long as its own independent organization is maintained, with the right to strike as a reserve weapon, and so long as the ultimate ideals of the labor movement are emphasized.

Unfortunately most of the leaders of the American Federation of Labor seem to have forgotten all about the ultimate ideals of the labor movement. With the accumulation of large stomachs, heavy watch-chains, and invitations to speak before the American Legion, they have abandoned organization activity in those areas of unskilled labor where their activity should be most intense. Two years ago at Detroit they sounded a trumpet call to organize the automobile workers; they have hardly made even a serious gesture in that direction. The speech of President William Green on Labor Day was the speech of a tradesman fighting for a larger share of the national income for his particular trades. It was excellent in its way but no more inspiring than a speech before the Southern Undertakers' Association appealing for better business in caskets. Until the American Federation of Labor adopts a militant policy toward the organization of unorganized workers the suspicion will be justified that its talk of cooperation with capital smacks more of surrender than of realism.

The Consumer's View

OFTEN it seems as if the consumer—the man who pays for all merchandise—has nothing to say in the determination of what he buys. At least his power is only negative—and limited at that. Buying is like voting; it is not getting what one wants but accepting the least objectionable of what is offered. It was not always that way. When shops were smaller and the boss stood behind the counter, the buyer could make known his ideas, and the proprietor—who was interested in building up his trade—had an incentive to pass the suggestions on to the producer. Now the man or woman behind the counter seldom has anything to do with the buying of goods and no encouragement to communicate the consumer's wants to the person who has.

It is a comfort, therefore, to discover that, though the manufacturer and the merchant sometimes seem to have no desire to find out the wishes of the person who supports their business, there is an organization of the federal government which thinks that the consumer should at least have a chance to blow off steam. The Federal Trade Commission is making an inquiry to develop reasons for and against giving to manufacturers of trade-marked or otherwise identifiable goods the right to make contracts with merchants obliging them to sell at a price named by the makers. For some curious reason the commission has assumed that the consumer's interests and ideas on this question are worth considering, or at least worth learning, and a questionnaire has been sent out to that end. The consumer is asked first if he favors legislation permitting manufacturers to make enforceable agreements with retailers fixing the prices to be charged for branded products. We shall be surprised if the commission receives more than a scattering of affirmative answers. The advantage of "resale price maintenance," as the technical jargon has it, is obvious on many counts, from the standpoint of the manufacturer, and its advantages are apparent for a considerable number of retailers. But it is hard to discover the benefits of the scheme for the consumer, unless the latter is a great believer in branded goods and thinks that fixed prices will increase the tendency of retailers to carry them. Certainly on general principles the merchant is better qualified to determine the price at which goods are to be sold than is the manufacturer, and it is to the interest of the consumer that the retailer should be allowed to do so. The storekeeper knows by experience at what prices articles of a certain sort move briskly or remain piled up on his shelves. He has considerable insight into the purchasing power of the community in which he does business and information in regard to the prices asked by his competitors.

"Do you, when purchasing goods, regard brands or trade-marks as guaranteeing quality?" is one question addressed to the consumer by the Federal Trade Commission. We think that, in general, the consumer does. In order not to be entirely at sea in his purchases, the buyer must have a standard by which to judge them. After a little experience with a given branded product the consumer may obtain its measure and be in a position to compare this intelligently with the price asked. Of course this depends upon a continuing uniformity in the product, and failure to maintain this has in the long run deprived many branded goods of any advantage. It sometimes happens that a manufacturer deliberately lowers the character of a product in order to "cash in" on the reputation that it has gained; or he sells his business and the new owner, either through ignorance or greed, exploits it unworthily. Then, of course, in a period of rising costs, a manufacturer is often in a dilemma when he must advance prices or reduce quality. He sometimes compromises by doing both. But it often happens that a manufacturer changes his standards for no such reasons. He changes instead because he thinks the public demands novelty and that he cannot continue to sell an article except by making frequent modifications. Generally this is a mistake. A man, for instance, after considerable experiment, finds a collar that suits him and lays in a supply. When eventually his collars have been lost or torn to threads in the laundry, he returns for more of the same style only to find them unobtainable, the manufacturer having decided to substitute another kind, or at least to change the name.

From the standpoint of the consumer the one essential argument in favor of branded goods is their uniformity, and the tendency of manufacturers to sacrifice this to novelty is one of the worst practices of the times. If there is anything which the Federal Trade Commission can do to remedy this situation it will have more meaning for the consumer than the question of "resale price maintenance."

Blasphemy à la Mode

DETERMINED to miss no opportunity of being absurd, the Boston authorities would not even consent to retire gracefully from the ridiculous position in which they placed themselves by launching a charge of blasphemy against Dr. Horace M. Kallen. Instead of placing the blame for the blunder upon the thick head of some zealous police captain where in all fairness it probably belonged, Municipal Judge Michael J. Murray preferred to seize what seemed to him an admirable opportunity for a spectacular demonstration of judicial broadmindedness and announced that the charge would not be pushed in view of the fact that Dr. Kallen's unfortunate remark ("If Sacco and Vanzetti were anarchists, then Jesus Christ was an anarchist too") was merely a slip such as any man might make in a moment of excitement. Thereupon, however, Dr. Kallen replied in a letter made public in this issue of The Nation that he had made the reference intentionally and with premeditated purpose. Judge Murray is left with an unpleasant alternative. Either he will have to attempt to bring the blasphemer to trial or else tacitly admit that his bluff has been called and that he was attempting to take public credit for magnanimity in withholding a blow that he was, in reality, afraid to strike.

The truth of the matter is, of course, that Dr. Kallen was merely employing a well-worn formula and that anyone in Boston or elsewhere may, with perfect impunity, attribute to Jesus whatever opinions he likes provided only he does not touch some particularly sore spot like anarchy in Massachusetts or the race question in the South. Real blasphemy is generally hailed with delight by that large body of eager churchgoers which is anxious to have its obligations explained away. Nothing has been more generally responsible for the fact that Christianity has been everywhere professed and almost never practiced than the ease with which the Master's name may be invoked to support anything from human slavery to wholesale murder. From the beginning it is chiefly from His friends that He has needed to be protected and always by the hypocritical kiss of a disciple that He has been betrayed.

Month by month the "Americana" department of Mr. Mencken's Mercury has recorded theological discoveries announced before various bodies. Jesus was the first Rotarian, the first realtor, and the first Kluge of the Ku Klux Klan; He was the best of all business men and the most irresistible of high-pressure salesmen. If He were alive today He would vote for prohibition and against it, favor child labor and oppose it, send the alien back where he came from, and join the Loyal Order of Moose. He has been patronized by embezzlers, slapped on the back by Babbitts, and manhandled by evangelists. One widely sold "biography" was written by a noisy Italian who discovered Jesus as the last of a series of sensational subjects, and another by a successful advertising man who attributed so many of his own opinions to Jesus that he appeared to be writing an autobiography. Yet on none of these previous occasions does the law seem to have been offended. But should the Department of Justice at last decide to set up an ecclesiastical court the results might be very interesting to the philosophical spectator. If Dr. Kallen is a blasphemer, how about Bruce Barton?

Since exclusiveness is what our public wants, a firm invented a new "exclusive" radiator-cap which was so exclusive that within three days 4,798,529 cars had bought it.

Next they marketed the "exclusive" antennae-hat for "exclusive" women and within two days 98,745,389 women had bought it.

Next they bought a yacht which had belonged to Prince Fritz of Anhalt-Meiningen-Eselsbrücke. They turned it into an "exclusive" touring-vessel and it sailed with 15,367 passengers on board.

Encouraged by their success they bought at great expense a single grain of an exceedingly "exclusive" truth, and spent eight billion dollars advertising it to the public.

And behold, after five years it had attracted the attention of three tin cans, one of which had severely cracked the glass covering.

Produced by the author. Munich 1928

It Seems to Heywood Broun

DRAMATIC reviewers in New York are too much inclined to stand with the devils, not the angels. Specifically, I am alienated from the members of the craft by their tendency to cry "unclean" whenever language in a play grows rough and ribald. A comedy does not of necessity become good merely because its author lays about him with a free hand among words which generally are forbidden. But I have seen even cheap and tawdry shows which seemed to me a little useful in smashing down taboos and inhibitions. Even the rattiest of burlesque troupes may have had some tiny share in making possible a "What Price Glory."

The present tumult in the town has been occasioned by "The Front Page." No one, to the best of my knowledge, has contended that this is a great play, although it can easily be argued that it is a show most skilful in construction and production. There is a disposition to say that Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur have had recourse to strong language merely in the hope of attracting that public which pays its money to be shocked. But such a service is not to be lightly dismissed as something of no consequence. Still less am I willing to admit that the author who shocks his hearers has done an evil thing. If every man, woman, and child in the community could be shocked with some degree of regularity each year I think we would soon have a sweeter and saner community.

Naturally I am not insisting that all words are created free and equal. An author or an auditor has a right to pick his favorites out of the vocabulary. He may and undoubtedly will keep certain prejudices. To any given individual a word may seem horrible either because of its sound or its connotation. I think that latter element is the more influential. Occasionally liberals have tried to excuse themselves for feeling a horror in the presence of certain blunt expressions on the ground that it was not the meaning but the mere vibration of the word which caused them anguish. In such cases I am generally doubtful of the rationalization. Something emotional and possibly unconscious lies behind the clash.

By now we hear much less than in the past about the downright immorality of any set of letters. Many will agree that it is silly to bring any sort of criminal indictment against vowels and consonants, however combined. Instead of Mrs. Grundy another arbiter has been appointed. This time it is a man and he is called Good Taste. I like him little better than the old lady. There is always room for argument about morals, but at that the principles of "right living" are more readily formulated than are the canons of Good Taste.

In "The Front Page," for instance, when the managing editor rips out an oath I may be pleased because an inner voice says to me "How like a managing editor!" Across the aisle another blanches and even as he pales insists that right or wrong has nothing to do with his objection. It's all a matter of good taste. In fiction and the theater I believe the truth to be in all cases sufficient justification. If reporters in real life blaspheme and use to great extent vulgar expressions then I think it is entirely proper that this same color should be in their conversation in a play.

I will be told that a skilful author can create the effect of violent expression and never once use any word to worry the most fastidious. This I doubt. It was not the way of William Shakespeare. When it was time for Falstaff to grow bawdy the bard equipped him with the necessary words and phrases. Shakespeare made no attempt to suggest ribaldry by setting nice words to dancing in a ballet. At the drug counter and the footlights the thing suggested as something just as good really is not.

Well do I remember the terrific disappointment which assailed me in hearing for the first time "The Hairy Ape." Eugene O'Neill was a leader of daring dramatists and he had gone down to the sea in ships and into the bowels of the vessels. Thus when there was bickering among the begrimed I sat back and tuned my ears for language. The great hulking brute around whom the play was written squared off to loose upon a fellow-worker a torrent of abusive epithets. He began mildly enough, but there was still the promise that the climax might be terrific. However, the entire tirade ended with one stoker calling the other a "louse" or something equally feeble in the cosmic scheme of cursing. For me the play was finished from that moment. I knew it then merely as the adventuring of a literary fellow who had decided on a little slumming.

Many will argue with me that I demand too much. Any literal transcription of the actual talk of stokers would be far beyond what is permitted even in this day during which the frontiers are being pretty constantly pushed forward. I am willing to admit that in such a scene actuality would be too terrible for a vast majority of people in any audience. I will not swagger forth and say that I might not be shocked myself. There is no intention here to suggest that this commentator has risen well above all inhibitions. In cases where listeners are too gravely shocked the effect upon their dramatic attention is decidedly harmful. Some single word may leap out and distort the general scheme of the performance. In Utopia things will not be like this. No bones in that fair land will ever be broken except by sticks and stones. Bad words will never hurt you if you know them with some degree of intimacy.

Since the stoker is as yet a man too articulate to be freely admitted into a cast of characters, I would be for keeping him out until we all have grown in wisdom. However, this limitation may prove too much to be accepted. For instance, O'Neill must watch for breakers on ahead if he purposes to do more plays in the manner of "Strange Interlude." Such thoughts of man as lie a bit below the surface are not always scoured in a way to make them readily suitable for public presentation. If O'Neill intends to go on in his traffic with the subconscious he must steel himself to follow part-way in the steps of Joyce or make the frank admission that the drama is but a feeble and a frightened echo of the novel.

"The Front Page" would remain an excellent entertainment if every doubtful word were scratched out of its script. It would not be as good a play and if any such revision takes place I certainly will be among the resenters. There is no such thing as a bad word. Language was created by man and in his own language.

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Hoover Whispering Campaign

By THE UNOFFICIAL SPOKESMAN

Washington, D. C.,
September 10

THE Republican Presidential campaign is a dual-personality spectacle. It is a Dr. Jekyll-and-Mr. Hyde drama.

Hoover, aloof and austere, devotes himself to smug generalities, evasions, intangible assurances. He says nothing and promises nothing. He is the Herbert Hoover who, a few months ago, was considered too good to have a chance at the Presidency; he is also the Herbert Hoover who fooled the politicians, the Slempts, the Rush Hollands, the Crockers, the Vares, and the Mellons, and won out in spite of them.

The Republican candidate has made it clear that he personally is going to take it easy during the campaign. Four or five speeches at the most during the six weeks preceding his departure for his home in California to vote, with perhaps one other address on the way out. That will be the extent of his contribution. In these talks he will "discuss" labor, tariff, international peace, prosperity, opportunity, and American moral and spiritual idealism, as developed and fostered by the Republican Party. Of water-power, corruption, imperialism, labor distress in the mining and milling industries, even prohibition, the Republican candidate will say nothing.

* * * * *

THE reason is simple. Hoover's campaign strategy requires that he do nothing, say nothing, which might in any way distract attention from the real Republican campaign—the under-cover attack on Governor Smith. Even if he wanted to speak out—which he does not, for one of the most outstanding characteristics of the man is his inherent reluctance and wariness about avowing himself, his rabid adherents notwithstanding to the contrary—the Republican nominee would be chary about saying anything important because to do so might divert attention from the "sh-h-h" campaign which has been started. It is Hoover's mission to give front and presence to the Republican race. The well-trained machine and long-experienced hordes behind him will take care of the blanketing mantle of "sh-h-h" tales, horrors, superstitions, defamations, suspicions that is being spread against Governor Smith.

Dr. Work wasn't talking ignorantly when shortly after his appointment he declared that as far as the Republicans were concerned prohibition and farm relief would not be issues. He was just telling a fact which saner politicians preferred to conceal. The Republican press and leaders therefore demanded of Hoover that he gag Work. And Work was bluntly told to keep his mouth shut. The politicians were afraid that Senator George Moses's observation about the Republican National Chairman might become too true: "At last we have found the man who can stop Hoover." It was only one step beyond Dr. Work's admission to the revelation that the Republicans proposed making their campaign not on issues at all but on two prejudices—those against Catholicism and against Tammany Hall. And Dr. Work's vague denial that personal attacks had been made with the sanction or authority or knowledge of the Republican National Committee does not change the fact.

* * * * *

EVERYWHERE, North, East, South, West, the Republican attack upon the Democratic candidate is based on his Catholic faith and his Tammany affiliation. Colonel John Q. Tilson, the lumbering majority floor-leader of the House, accompanying Hoover on his journey across the Continent for his notification ceremony, spoke only of these two matters. Newspaper correspondents who were on the trip report that Tilson would circulate among the meager crowds that greeted the candidate and inquire as to what the issues of the campaign appeared to be in the particular locality.

"Seems to me Tammany Hall and other [significant emphasis on "other"] questions ought to be of great importance in this campaign, don't you think?" he would ask.

In his talk with the newsmen, they say, he constantly stressed these two items. Farm relief, water-power, imperialism, prohibition were nothing in the Colonel's life. Tammany Hall and "other" questions were his obsessions.

And he was not alone in this propaganda. Every Republican leader across the country, coming and going, was reported singing the same refrain. Out loud they yelled Tammany Hall; under their breaths they whispered about the Pope and Romanism. At West Branch, Iowa, where there was an afternoon's program of political oratory, every speaker—among them Senator Smith W. Brookhart, Governor Hammill, Senator Capper, Representatives Dickinson and Will Wood—devoted himself to a bitter attack upon Tammany Hall.

"Tammany Hall was founded by a traitor who deserted the Revolutionary Army for the British," Wood, chairman of the Congressional campaign committee, shouted. "The devil don't change. It's the same organization today that it was when this traitor founded it."

Questioned by the reporters as to who the "traitor" was, Wood said he could not recall his name, but that it was contained in a recently published history of Tammany.

The next night at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where a political rally was held that presented the inspiring spectacle of the now regular Senator Brookhart, as the presiding officer, introducing as the main attraction the redoubtable "Jim" Watson of Indiana, who some two years ago was the floor-leader of the successful fight to deprive Brookhart of his seat in the Senate, the same performance was repeated.

In confidential conversations with Republican campaigners and managers it is frankly admitted that the Catholic and Tammany Hall factors are counted upon to put over the Hoover-Curtis ticket, particularly in the West. Arthur Evans of the Chicago Tribune, in a series of articles outlining the political situation in the corn-belt and wheat States, declared bluntly that it was the Catholic and Tammany Hall accusations, plus innuendo about drinking and other matters which are being industriously disseminated by the Drys, that would keep these States in the Republican column, with the possible exception of Wisconsin.

The William Allen White attacks upon Governor Smith as a friend of prostitution, although officially disavowed, are being circulated by the hundreds of thousands. "Tammany Hall and Womanhood" is the title of a particularly violent pamphlet issued in Hoover's home State, bearing upon its cover a quotation from William Allen White. The New Menace, the Fellowship Forum, the Nation's Voice, and other scurrilous panderers to race and religious prejudice, attributing nine-tenths of all crime to Catholics, charging Catholicism with every kind of private debauchery and public crime, citing the forged "Knights of Columbus oath," asserting that Catholic countries export assassins as other countries export merchandise, circulate by the million. Hoover and the Republican high command do not themselves distribute this poison, but they count upon it to win.

So it is no wonder that Hoover has nothing to say and will say nothing. To talk out might focus attention on such matters as water-power, imperialism, labor injunctions, and as to where he does stand on the prohibition question. And then what would become of the "sh-h-h" attack with which the Republican management confidently expects to strangle the opposition?

Jugoslavia at the Cross-Roads

By G. E. R. GEDYE

I

Zagreb, August 23

POLITICAL indigestion is common to the inheritors of the plums of the Hapsburg Monarchy—Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Poland, and Jugoslavia. In a general sense only, the present grave situation in the last country is due to the same trouble as that which the others have experienced—mature plums consumed in large quantities too rapidly for immature digestions. In Czechoslovakia, however, the plum of Slovakia was less mature than the Czech nation which absorbed it, and it is therefore not surprising that the Czechs have been the first to approach complete digestion. The particular violence of the attacks directed by foreign propagandists against Czechoslovakia have proved of great value to that state. The older civilization of Prague has been forced to recognize the danger of leaving more primitive Slovakia, with a number of grievances, a prey to the agents of those who desired only the disruption of the state, and the remedies for which the other states are crying aloud—decentralization and autonomy—have been so generously applied, especially during the past month, that Slovak grievances today are practically non-existent.

II

It is hardly necessary to say that there is no foundation for rumors optimistically floated in Budapest to the effect that the Croatian leaders are consumed with longing to set again on the Croat people the kindly yoke of Hungary from which that people struggled so long and so painfully to free itself. Hungary's attitude toward Central European difficulties, though officially correct, is privately too often that of a fisher in troubled waters, and no serious observer could make the mistake of thinking that any of the participants in the various family quarrels of the Slav states, and of Rumania, would welcome or even tolerate Magyar assistance. It can be said with equal certainty that none of the leaders of the Croat "revolt" against Belgrade dreams of cutting adrift from Serbia. A glance at the map will reveal one all-sufficient reason: an independent Croatia would lie helpless and defenseless between Italy and Hungary.

Here is the Croat case. From 1102, when, on the extinction of the Croat dynasty, Croatia entered into a "personal union" with Hungary, the Magyar rulers became ipso facto kings of Croatia. Croat autonomy has ever been zealously defended and, on paper at least, maintained. It is admitted that before the war Hungarian encroachments had deprived it of most of its real value and that in practice Croatia was treated as a subject province by Budapest. It was particularly the "class-vote" system of Hungary which put patriotic Croats in a permanent and ineffective minority in the Sabor (the Croat Diet). Nevertheless, that Diet existed till the creation of the Yugoslav state, and with it four independent ministries (Interior, Justice, Education, and Trade), three of which were reestablished by the Croatian-Hungarian "Compromise" of 1868. Fifty-four per cent of the revenues of Croatia were at the disposal of the Sabor and the country had its own schools and law courts.

The contention of Belgrade that the Croats are a thankless people to start complaining despite the debt of gratitude which they owe to Serbia for her release of them from Hungarian domination in 1918 is hotly resented in Zagreb. From the beginning of the nineteenth century, say the Croats, a movement had been afoot among the Southern Slavs for national unity, such as first Germany and then Italy succeeded in bringing about. When, under the hammer-blows of greater Powers than Serbia, it became apparent during the war that the final collapse of the tottering Hapsburg Monarchy could only be a matter of weeks, the Croat Diet, on October 29, 1918, broke off all relations with Austria-Hungary and proclaimed the formation of a new independent State of the Slovenes, Croats, and Serbs, who till then had been subjects of the Hapsburgs. At this time the territory of the Kingdom of Serbia was still in part occupied by Austro-Hungarian and German troops, so that, it is claimed, for the Serbs to talk of a "deliverance" of Croatia by Serbia is absurd.

The Croatian Diet elected a committee which, on December 1, 1918, decided to unite with the Kingdom of Serbia to form the new state of Jugoslavia, accepting the Karageorgevich Dynasty as the ruler of the new kingdom. Right from the start Stephen Radich, who had led the peasantry under the Hapsburgs and had suffered for it, was opposed to the form which the new state promised to take. When the constitution was adopted in 1921, Radich and his Peasant Party abstained from voting on the constitution bill. For his republican propaganda he suffered long terms of imprisonment, but it is admitted that later on he changed his views and became an enthusiast for King Alexander. In March, 1925, Paul Radich (who was one of those Croats who were murdered in the Skupshtina on June 20, last) accepted the constitution in the name of his uncle, who was shortly afterward released from prison. The latter, in fact, endeavored to make the best of what he had from the start declared to be a bad job.

Joint leader with him in the Peasant-Democratic coalition which has for so long been fighting Belgrade Centralism was, at the time of the shooting, his old enemy Svetozar Pribichevich. Pribichevich is the leader of the Serbs of Croatia (ex-Hapsburg subjects) and was for a long time a Centralist, making common cause with his coreligionists, the Serbs of the Old Kingdom. Today he is the outstanding personality—since the death of Stephen Radich—in the triumvirate leadership of the “revolt” against Belgrade. Thus one aspect of the general problem is that in the historic Kingdom of Croatia both the Roman Catholic Croats and the Orthodox Serbs, speaking the same language but using the Cyrillic instead of the Latin alphabet, are demanding from the Orthodox Serbs of Old Serbia that home rule—autonomy—which against the better judgment of the leaders of the Croat peasantry they surrendered in accepting the constitution of 1921.

III

But, just as in Rumania M. Maniu, primarily leader of the Transylvanian peasants, has succeeded in uniting behind him the peasantry of all the new Rumanian provinces in opposition to the Old Kingdom of Rumania, so the Peasant-Democratic coalition in Yugoslavia, in its struggle against the Centralist regime in Belgrade, claims to have the support of the peasantry of all the new provinces of Yugoslavia which were formerly subject to the Hapsburgs or independent (Montenegro) states. Radich's dream was always of a peasant federation of the Balkan Slavs (including the Bulgarians); in this he never wavered, though he once desired the “Balkan Federation” to take the form of a republic, and, later, that of a monarchy. It is for the achievement of this federal ideal—for the present, of course, without Bulgaria—that the Peasant-Democratic coalition which left the Skupshtina after the events of June 20 is now striving.

Though its members seem at present unwilling to be precise in their demands, they declare in general for the widest measures of autonomy for each of the new provinces—Croatia, Bosnia, Montenegro, and the others. The peasantry of the new provinces generally support the coalition; the Slovenes, at all events as far as their parliamentary representatives are concerned, form an exception, though the Slovene Peasant Party is coalitionist. The powerful party of the Clericals, the Slovene People's Party, however, is with Belgrade, the present Prime Minister of Yugoslavia, Father Korosech, being himself a Slovene priest.

The grievances of the Peasant-Democratic coalition are primarily financial. Four-fifths of the revenues of the country come from the new provinces, yet they have the expenditure of only one-quarter. Then there is the sore point of employment under the Government. The civil service, they complain, is used simply to reward supporters of the Serbian Government. It is true that the upper ranks of the army and of the diplomatic service are purely Serbian (there is but one Croat general, and there are very few Croat officers of the rank of major and above). The administration is declared to be shockingly corrupt.

“Belgrade,” one prominent partisan in Zagreb put it to me, “is the only city in the world which is being built by government servants. In other countries it is the captains of industry and commerce who accumulate wealth and put up fine houses; Belgrade is being built by the bureaucracy on baksheesh.”

I would make it clear that in setting forth these charges I am not myself bringing them, but merely trying to indicate the state of mind in Croatia. Like the Rumanians of the new provinces, the Croats are in revolt against what they call “Orientalism,” baksheesh, the heritage of the Turk. They insist that centuries of association with the West have left them free from this taint. They declare that the present intimate association between themselves and the Serbs of the Old Kingdom must come to an end: “East is East and West is West, and though the twain may meet in a central parliament and a common dynasty, they must have separate administrations and separate local parliaments.” They complain of the low value set on human life in Serbia. By way of example, they quoted to me the fact that during the past ten years twenty-seven parish priests have for one reason or another been murdered by their parishioners in Serbia.

“The Serbs may be quite right,” a Croat said, “in their contempt for human life, which, one may fairly say, decreases in value as one goes East from Susak (Trieste) and, starting at ten dinar (sixteen cents), would be worth half a dinar at the Bulgarian frontier and nothing at all on the other side of it. It is certainly not mere cruelty, for the taker of human life sets no value whatever on his own. He takes life perfectly casually, yet in accordance with very strict codes of his own. Within his own house, you may insult him from dawn until sunset without provoking him; he will merely let the daylight into you as you step outside the door. We do not attack the code or its exponents; it makes for virility. But we have been Westernized, civilized, and are consequently softer. The Serbs are our blood-brothers, but they have been brought up by such different foster-parents that although we intend to continue always to share our common house with them, for the present at least we must insist on separate bedrooms.”

The Zagreb dissidents number 87 members of Parliament who refuse to return to the Skupshtina “until it has been purged of the blood of June 20.” They consist of 22 Independent Democrats (Pribichevists)—4 Slovenes, 6 Croats, and 12 Serbs—and 63 members of the Peasant Party (Radichists). In Belgrade the Government consists of 110 Radicals, 21 Slovene Clericals, 61 Democrats, and 18 Bosnian Moslems. There is a small opposition (9 Agrarians, 1 Socialist, and 6 German Minority members) which remained in the Chamber after the secession of the Peasant-Democratic coalition.

Of the leaders Pribichevich is the most striking figure—he looks thirty, though he is far more, but he has all the fire and energy of that age. In Zagreb his bodyguard of three goes everywhere with him lest he share the fate of Radich, and nobody believes that even this precaution would avail him in Belgrade. The leadership of the coalition must nominally at least remain in the hands of a Croat, and Pribichevich is a Croatian Serb. He denied to me that he had any intention of trying to secure anything more than the joint leadership which was his when Radich was alive. Dr. Vlado Matshek, Radich's successor at the head of the Croat Peasant Party and Pribichevich's co-leader, has not the personality of his predecessor or of his present colleague, but he is not likely for that reason to act as a check on the temperamental Pribichevich; on the contrary, competition may develop as to who can be most extreme. Dr. Trumbich, the Federalist leader, is an older man, and the most doctrinaire of the triumvirate, but even he has no moderating influence partly because he is not one of the two "co-presidents" of the coalition.

IV

What does Belgrade propose to do in face of this perilous situation? At the moment of writing, nothing. It is inclined to follow the tactics of the Liberals of Rumania, which have left that country in such a parlous state, and act as though the political strike of what is admittedly two-fifths, and probably a good deal more than three-fifths of the nation were of no consequence. The cynical view taken in Belgrade is that the Croat secession is largely an affair of disappointed personal ambition, and that sooner or later it will be a simple matter to buy off one group or another—if personal jealousy and differences between Croats and Croatian Serbs do not lead to an early break-up of the new front—with an offer of ministerial portfolios. Personal politics do and always will play a particularly prominent role in the Balkans, but I believe that the Belgrade view is very wide of the truth. The important factor is that the Croat peasantry has been stirred to the core by the death of Radich, its uncrowned king. "The peasants really care little for politics, so long as the crops are good—and they are quite sound this year," they say in Belgrade. It is true, but Radich was not politics. He was a religion, and has already become a great legendary figure, canonized by the most fanatically devout element in any country—the imagination of the peasantry.

The policy of waiting for internal dissensions to split the ranks of the Peasant-Democratic coalition which Belgrade professes to be adopting is fraught with grave dangers. At any moment the leaders in Zagreb may be forced by an impatient following to recommend a general refusal to pay taxes—advice which, if widely accepted, would certainly cripple the finances of the country, but, what is more serious, would force the Belgrade Government to arrest the Croat leaders. The consequences of such a step cannot be foreseen. To reply to the demand of the Croats for a revision of the constitution as Belgrade does, "Let the malcontent members first return to the Skupshtina and persuade enough of its members of the necessity of such a course to obtain the three-fifths majority required under Article 12 of the constitution, and the thing will be done," is to trifle with a grave situation.

Exceptional cases demand exceptional measures, and the assassination of three members of Parliament on the floor of the House by a political opponent is exceptional even in the Balkans. On a great and contented Yugoslavia all hopes of Balkan peace rest. The country has on paper a sound democratic constitution and, in fact, a healthy population with admirable, if in some parts primitive, qualities. But there is need to go right back to 1918 and make a fresh start on a basis of local autonomy. Decentralization is the key to real unity in all the "new" states—a unity built up from below, not imposed from above. Czechoslovakia has realized this, and is prospering and progressing in consequence. Rumania declines to see it and is consequently paralyzed by dissension. Yugoslavia is now at the cross-roads, about to make her choice.

Mexican Messiahs

By ANITA BRENNER

I

THERE is a prophecy now current in Mexico which is said to be very old: "The ancient people shall have their ancient rights . . . when the chief temple of the Aztecs, bearing upon it the sun, appears in the principal plaza of the city of Tenochtitlan." In August, 1926, during the course of restoration and repair of the National Palace, in the main plaza of Mexico City, once Tenochtitlan, a monolith was brought to light. It is a reproduction of the chief temple of the Aztecs, with the sign symbolic of the sun carved on its surface. This is a curious piece of lore for 1926, but Mexico is a peculiar place. Prophecies and messiahs are still a habit of the country.

Frequently in ancient times the gods took the form of a savior, though they might be embodied simultaneously in mountains, rivers, trees, rain, animals, and certain men. The perennially youthful Tezcatlipoca yearly was honored in the living body of a young man, who at the end of this time died in order to nourish the sun, which could thereby live and make the next year's crops spring up again. Thus the Mexican messiah traditionally is an embodiment of deity; like the gods, he has various names and forms. But always it is the same messiah. He takes upon himself the people's burden; always he must die, and always he returns.

In Mexican mood the messiah is accompanied by disaster: an earthquake, a conquest, a revolution; death and pain. Therefore all the prophecies which promise restoration are complemented by announcements of catastrophe. The Aztecs believed that the white and bearded god Quetzalcoatl would come back bringing peace and happy days. At the same time that his return was foretold, the Emperor Moctezuma was warned that the end of his own reign was near. Earthquakes, signs in the heavens, omens of animals, and other communications to the court previous to the arrival of the Spaniards were so well timed, it is said, that when Cortés, white and bearded, arrived, apparently materializing the mythical and really un-Aztec form of Quetzalcoatl, Moctezuma's messengers were waiting to receive him. The brother of the emperor, sensing disaster, advised him: "Don't let into your house him who may turn you out of it"; but Moctezuma himself, certain that this was inevitable, received Cortés with courtesy though with dread; accepting his personal misfortune for the sake of the other half of the prophecy.

In Mexico there is still a good deal of faith in prophecies, perhaps because so many of them have come true. They circulate among the otherwise inarticulate, by word of mouth, in ballads, hymns, penny broadsides, by gesture almost. One hardly knows how, but the feeling is there. Sooner or later the mountains and the skies produce corroboration, and there may be some special disaster to mark more definitely the time for the appearance of a messiah. Frequently since Moctezuma the rulers have been warned beforehand of their death; frequently peasants have appeared who "walk about in the fields attending to the crops and other matters of the people's welfare," according to native account; frequently it is repeated that "the old gods sleep in the mountains; but some day they will awake, and shake, and then the people will no longer carry burdens on their backs." It is always the same prophecy, always the same messiah, always the same mood. A Mexican epigram puts it: "When all goes badly, all goes well."

II

In the years when the revolution of 1910 was brewing, and just before the pot boiled over, although the government did not know it, the people spoke among themselves of what was soon to come. I remember being held up above a mob to watch the great glare of a comet in the sky, and the old woman who held me said: "It means war, death, misery, hunger, and disease." Soon after that it rained ashes for a night and a day from a distant erupting volcano. The people said: "After this it will rain blood."

When Madero, political head of the turmoil that followed, rode triumphant into the capital, he was greeted by a wildly enthusiastic mob, black on the roofs and jammed in the windows. But that same day an earthquake in the city split a big building in half. It was said, and Madero knew it, that he was soon to die. Recently when Obregon, also a successful candidate, arrived in the capital, a large and cheering crowd awaited him. Likewise he was greeted by a shake, the biggest since Madero, of the "big brothers" who usually sleep so quietly, their peaked hats down over their eyes. People now say that, except for the date and the manner, his death was known in advance.

Indeed, it was sung in advance, for the ballads that sing of a hero, dead or alive, always mention his sad end. Those that speak of a messiah always include his return. These songs are numerous and are always appropriate though the messiah may be dead. Here is a fragment of a ballad sung originally about Zapata, who, with his brutal, passionate peasant troop clamoring for its ancient lands, was in the vanguard of the struggle that began in 1910:

Zapata fought for Madero, and helped his plans to succeed
So that then little by little they could fulfil his ideas.
They won a great victory, after they had fought a while,
And all of the troops then marched into the capital. . . .

Precisely then, however, Zapata said to Madero: "Take care you do not betray me; for if you do, you shall die." The ballad continues:

Time passed and Zapata waited for the promise that was made.

Of promise and promised lands no longer a word was said.

Waiting for what never happened, seeing the last hope fail,
Zapata rose up in arms at the Hill of the Nightingale.
If Madero has forgotten and has furled the glorious banner Though my life be the price of it I'll make good my Plan de Ayala.

These were the words of Zapata: Lands and liberty for all!
And through the state of Morelos many men came to his call.

Said Zapata: "I must burn and destroy, so that they will know we are here and to be reckoned with; otherwise they will give us nothing but words. Therefore while I live I shall cause much pain, and I shall be persecuted; but I shall die, and then they will do me honor." He proved a true prophet. The ballad goes on:

The hero and spartan Zapata was the victim of much slander

And many people have judged him as a man without a standard. . . .

If I molested my hearers while I was singing this song
Let me beg to be forgiven as I intended no wrong;
My only wish is to crown with narcissus and sweet laurel
The great Emiliano Zapata, loved by the poor and humble.

He was killed just before Obregon became President for his first term after Carranza. The troubadours sang, as they have been singing ever since:

But his soul has not forgotten
His ideal of liberty,
His ghost is forever haunting
All the fields until they're free.

Some say that he is not dead at all, but lives in a volcano; that he will return and will not rest "until the ancient people shall have their ancient rights."

III

In the meantime a messiah, embodiment of the gods, has again appeared. About the time Obregon began his last campaign there came out of the mountains of the north an Indian who takes upon himself another national burden. He is a healer known only by his assumed name, Fidencio Constantino, called Niño. A city has grown up in the desert around him on the estate of a German who is said to have been the first to benefit by Fidencio's powers. It is a city of beggars—for sight, for speech, for movement, for life. It is called the Place of Pain.

The constantly changing inhabitants of this famous place (lepers, paralytics, consumptives, the blind, the lame, the mad) are estimated by the thousand. First came the poorest; later, special trains brought failing landed gentlemen and pious ladies; and finally, so goes the story, lawyers, doctors, generals, the President, and priests. The richest live in shacks in a special residential section, the prosperous in tents, the poorest under the sky. Fidencio lives in a hut to which come, in rigid turn, rich and poor alike. He has, say all reports, "refused large sums for preference; to him, all these people are merely sick human beings who have need of health at his hands."

Fidencio is described by a newspaper reporter as "a youth of about thirty, of simple aspect, medium height, dark-skinned. . . . Wears an ordinary pair of trousers, a sweater or workman's jacket, and a cap. . . . His face, with high cheek-bones and full lips, has an unmistakably Indian expression. His dark eyes have a certain taciturn shadow . . . but grow alive when he faces the multitude which worships him."

Anonymous accounts say Fidencio is "clairvoyant," and "even knows when the hopeless cases will die," and tells them so. According to both the doctor and the priest, he "possesses a remarkable gift of diagnosis. By feeling the pulse, or the spinal column, or sometimes by simply looking at the patient, he finds the causes of the disease. Fidencio's surgical outfit "consists of a pair of automobile pliers for extracting teeth, and some pieces of glass which he uses as scalpels. . . . It is extraordinary that though he may scrape to the bone without anaesthetic, the patients feel no pain, and there is no hemorrhage. . . . He takes not the least aseptic precaution, but the wounds heal and scar well."

His most famous method is a swing, in which he places most cases of paralysis, blindness, "hysteria," and lunacy. He sways the sufferer gently, croons, murmurs, massages, then suddenly "with a quick, brusque movement, or an unexpected pull of the arms and legs, peremptorily demands: 'You will get well, go on, walk; you are better now. See?'" A certain cargador, or pack-carrier, who had been stricken with paralysis, was cured thus: "One day, while out in the road, Fidencio came upon him suddenly, and said: 'I am tired. Carry me.' Before he knew it, the man had taken the Niño upon his shoulders and walked into the town."

The favorite cure, however, is a brew kept boiling in a great container filled constantly by a flowing stream. Here are thrown the gifts brought to the Niño—fruit, flowers, chocolates, all kinds of herbs. His helpers, people cured by him, distribute this medicine to the crowd, "many of whom, by its means only, are made well . . . others simply by touching or partaking of the fruit, eggs, water, flowers, which Fidencio gives out to the people, to quiet them while they wait their turn. . . ." Says Fidencio, "I asked God for power to alleviate pain and cure the sick by means of a medicine at hand, and therefore I am as well served by an orange, an apple, or a salve, for any ill; because each is a medicine given by God."

The successes of the Niño Milagroso—the Miraculous Child—are ascribed to suggestion, hypnotism, and "magnetism" by the newspaper reporters, the lawyers, the doctor, and the priest. Some of the troubadours say that it is due to the songs he sings. His special song is about and to a "Blue Lily of the Mountain," and is considered a magic chant. It is a song of love and can, they say, make death easier, and quiet any pain.

But many of the humble folk say that he heals because of the Place of Pain itself. It is feared that if he leaves it, he will lose his power, and therefore they come to him. The tree under which he wept and prayed "is said by many to be the source, and is worshiped . . . as miraculous . . . by the humble people. Even ladies of some position kneel before its ancient trunk, upon which have been hung silver ex-votos. . . . Night and day, torches and candles brought by the faithful burn around it. . . ."

Again a messiah has coincided with national distress; again he has taken upon himself a national task; and again he and the people assume that he must die. For on one point only do all who have any concern with Fidencio agree, and that is that he has not long to live. Some say weeks, some say months. Fidencio says two years.

Back from Carcassonne

By MALVINA LINDSAY

THE American populace, which has been in a state of flux the last few months, is jelling down for the winter. The vacationists have returned. Darkened houses have been flung open to the sunlight, accumulations of newspapers and milk bottles have disappeared from front yards and back porches, and family cats once more are eating out of their home platters.

Every Pullman has been jammed with tourists; every highway dotted black with motor cars. Even on foot the hikers in knickerbockers have struggled back under the weight of knapsacks laden with souvenirs. There was nobody who did not have a vacation, from the wash-woman who went out to the Salvation Army camp to the overworked capitalist who ran up to the North woods for a couple of days' hunting and fishing.

In this country the idea of vacation is synonymous with movement, with travel. Perhaps the inheritance of a nomadic instinct from ancestors who explored the wilderness, who adventured in a new land, is responsible. Perhaps the restless energy of a people seeking an escape from themselves has brought this about. "Anything to get away for awhile" is the universal expression of those who count the days until vacation time arrives.

The development of cheap motor cars has quickened the vacation impulse. It has made the grandeur of the Rockies, the bustle of Chicago, the roar of the Atlantic and the Pacific realities to every citizen who can afford the price of a few hundred gallons of gasoline and the depreciation loss on a Ford. Railroad excursions also have given impetus to vacation movement. There is not a stenographer or upper-grade saleswoman, not a clothing-store clerk or gas-company bookkeeper who did not have a week at a "resort" or a ride on the boat from Chicago to Buffalo or who did not go with a lodge convention to Los Angeles or Atlantic City. There is no bridge addict who, worn out with the winter's labors, did not seek relaxation in the circle tour of the Northwest or take the southern route to California via the Grand Canyon or spend a couple of weeks viewing the Woolworth Building and Coney Island.

Optimistic sociologists might see in this travel mania many hopeful signs. It might betoken the germination of a universal brotherhood, a parliament of nations, a federation of mankind. It might mean the passing of provincialism and the dawn of a Utopian era of tolerance. Above all, it might constitute a stimulus to civilization by quickening the mind and spirit of the individual.

But does it? Let us listen briefly to some of these returning travelers in their Pullman sections, in their Fords, or even on the hotel verandas in the towns where they have stopped for gasoline and baths. Let us see what they have brought back from their journeyings to Carcassonne.

Brown and his wife have just "done" California. So have Jones and Mrs. Jones. Bored with the desert scenery, they scrape up acquaintanceship over a Pullman card game.

"Well, it's a great country if you've got plenty of money," volunteers Jones.

"Yes," Brown agrees. "You couldn't give me Frisco though. Now Los is a good town."

"Still, they got some mighty fine hotels in Frisco," says Jones. "What was that big one there, oh, the one where Fatty Arbuckle got in that mix-up?"

"The St. Francis," supplies Brown. "Speaking of hotels now . . ."

"I think the Broadmour at Colorado Springs is nice," Mrs. Brown interposes. "It cost one and a half million dollars, the guide said."

"Well, I like the stores in San Francisco best, anyway," contributes Mrs. Jones. "You can buy things cheaper there than you can in Indianapolis."

"Oh, if you're coming to stores," declares Brown authoritatively, "there's only one store in the country. That's Marshall Field's."

"I don't like Chicago," retorts Mrs. Jones. "It was so dirty there I had to have a shampoo twice a week."

"I know," says Mrs. Brown sympathetically. "And it was so damp when we were there I had to have a permanent wave in the winter, mind you!"

A train guide interrupts with the announcement that the train is approaching the Royal Gorge and that those who want tickets for the special attached observation car and also smoked spectacles should buy them now.

"We've seen the Royal Gorge," says Mrs. Jones. "We saw it on the way out. If you folks want to go through . . ."

The Browns rise. "I guess we'd better," says Brown. "We haven't missed anything yet. We took in the Grand Canyon going out."

"How did you like it?" inquires Jones, shuffling the cards.

"Oh, it was wonderful, of course," Mrs. Brown answers. "Only I was a little disappointed in it."

"Over-press-agented," explains Brown. "All those things are over-press-agented by the railroads. Well, see you later."

The train begins its approach into the majestic ramparts of the Arkansas.

"I bid six of diamonds," says Mrs. Jones.

East of Denver, the Pullmans are even more crowded. And the dusty highways of Kansas are specked with a never-ending caravan of eastward-bound motor cars. A middle-aged couple, daughter, son-in-law, and grandchild, sit in the hotel lobby at Topeka, Kansas, recuperating for the next stretch of their journey back to St. Louis.

"Yes, we wanted Junior to see the mountains," the grandmother is explaining to a casual acquaintance. "Come here, Junior. Tell grandma what you saw in Denver."

"Big gol' ball," replies Junior dutifully.

"He means the gold dome on the capitol building. It cost $35,000, the guide said. Did you ever see Lucky Baldwin's home there? He has his iron gates even tipped with gold. Tell grandma what else you saw, Junior."

"Buffoo Bill," answers Junior.

"He means Buffalo Bill's grave. It's on top of Look-out Mountain. It cost $30,000 a mile to build the road up the mountain to the grave, the guide said. Tell the lady something else you saw, Junior."

"Injuns," says Junior.

"He means the little Indian suit we bought him at a curio store in Manitou. He was so crazy about it he just would wear it up Pike's Peak."

"I was up Mt. Lowe in California," boasts the casual acquaintance.

"Well, Pike's Peak is lots higher, it's—how high is Pike's Peak, Elsie? I have it written down somewhere."

"It's 14,109 feet," replies Elsie promptly. "But, mother, Jim was up Long's Peak, you know, and it's 14,255 feet."

"Well, Pike's Peak is high enough for me. There was a man had a heart attack up there. He almost died. Did you see the Garden of the Gods? It's nice too. And so is the Cave of the Winds."

Elsie, giggling in reminiscence, interposes eagerly: "There's a room in the cave where every woman that's an old maid has to leave a hairpin. There must be ten million hairpins there. I didn't know there ever had been so many old maids—yes, Jim, we'll be ready in a minute. Hurry up, Junior, or papa'll be mad."

In Chicago the bus drivers are loading up their passengers at what they call the "Mu-ni-CIP-al Wharf." One of the big boats that has completed the eight-day excursion trip to Buffalo and return has just docked. Ruby and Bess, chic stenographers from Kansas City, have exchanged farewells and addresses with two clothing-store salesmen from Omaha and are escorted to a waiting bus by Cousin Mabel with whom they will spend a few days in Chicago.

Cousin Mabel's first question is a blanket order. "Well, and what did you think of it?" she asks.

"It was wonderful," says Ruby. "I never ate so much in my life. They have simply wonderful meals on the boat. And the salt breeze makes you so hungry. The scenery was wonderful, too."

"And such a keen orchestra," adds Bess. "We met loads of nice people."

"What did you think of Niagara Falls?" Cousin Mabel is persistent.

"Simply wonderful!" exclaims Ruby. "But I was a little disappointed in them. I thought they would be bigger."

"We had a nice ride in Detroit though," observes Bess. "We saw Henry Ford's home. And the place where they make Packards. But their Belle Isle Park isn't as big as our Swope Park at home."

"I was crazy about the dances on the boat," says Ruby. "I met a fellow that—Oh, Cousin Mabel, let's get off here. We can check our baggage some place. I want to look at some little fall dresses while I'm downtown. They say you can buy them cheaper here than you can in Kansas City."

So they return, the nomads who went a-gipsying so blithely, each in search of some intangible golden fleece. They have not come back empty-handed. There is a paper weight with a picture of Seven Falls for Uncle Horace. There are eucalyptus portieres from California for Aunt Lucy, starfish galore for Cousin Ella's book-case, pine cones from Packinac, sea shells from San Pedro, and petrified rock from the forests of Arizona for the children, New York hose and handkerchiefs for the flapper, an alligator's tooth from Florida for the baby, and an ivory back-scratcher from Chinatown for grandfather.

Their grips are full of gifts for others. But for themselves they have brought back nothing. For it is one of the ordinances of Carcassonne that those who take no offerings thither carry none away.

In the Driftway

PERSONS who deal directly with the forces of nature are likely to be at once humble and cynical. Thus sailors go on deck in howling wind and beating rain, only rarely grumbling at their fate. Thus the Drifter's farmer neighbors, in a wet summer, try day after day to get in the hay and when their day's work is rewarded with a thunder shower they only shrug their shoulders and say: "Well, maybe tomorrow will be dry," in a tone that indicates they do not at all believe it will. Gardeners, fighting mildew and worm, bug and weed, learn the same sort of fatalism. "The cucumbers are all eaten up. All right, we'll eat cabbage." "Too cold for lima beans this year. Well, we had a nice crop of peas." These remarks the Drifter hears every year, and on every hand. There is no use quarreling with the weather or with the pests that make the farmer's life more onerous than it otherwise would be. In a sense all gardens are perennial. There is a dreadful immortality in the earth. Neglect to plant your patch to corn, and weeds will take every inch of it.

* * * * *

THE Drifter regards the lilies that surround his summer quarters with a sour eye. Now they are dead stalks; a month ago they were rich with blossoms. Before that they were young shoots breaking the ground. Yet whether in flower or fruit, whether dry branch or opening bud, they contain within themselves an energy to think about which makes him dizzy. Why do they not bloom as well in March? Why does the exact cycle of life and death take place so regularly? Superficially he knows why. He knows, that is, that frost will do one thing to them and sun another; that rain and drought affect them differently. Yet even allowing for these variations, they behave in a disconcertingly constant manner. Each year they begin to bloom on almost the same day; on almost the same day they drop their last petals and are done. So with the maples on the grass, so with the luxurious rhubarb in the garden. The invisible fire in them makes him acutely uncomfortable.

* * * * *

WHEN he can forget for a moment the urge to life in the plants around him, there is no plant more pleasant to contemplate than the same rhubarb. It requires no planting, it disdains cultivation. Under its dense shade no weed can hope to sprout. Week after week it sends up new shoots, rosy and slender. The young stalks are as succulent in September as they are in May. An admirable plant, rhubarb. What a pity that some of its sturdy independence could not have been communicated to the pea, which would then require no brush to cling to; to the corn, which crows would then leave alone. Only one thing stands in the way of a whole garden full of rhubarb alone. It is inevitable, by the law of averages, that even the noble rhubarb plant should have one drawback for the Drifter. He admires it; he respects it; he would not be without it. But on no account will he bring himself to eat it. It makes his teeth ache; it hurts his tongue; it sends its sour pungency into his bones and shakes them from their fastenings. Let those who like rhubarb eat it as well as admire it from afar. For the Drifter it has aesthetic and moral values only.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

What Is Blasphemy?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a postscript on the blasphemy charge against Dr. Horace M. Kallen the following is apt. In his statement withdrawing the arrest warrant for Dr. Kallen Municipal Judge Michael J. Murray said: "The language employed may have been used inadvertently in the heat of an earnest argument." The language referred to was that part of Dr. Kallen's speech at the Boston Sacco-Vanzetti memorial meeting in which he said: "If Sacco and Vanzetti were anarchists, Jesus Christ was an anarchist. . . ."

Upon reading Judge Murray's statement Dr. Kallen immediately wired me the following comment which no newspaper in Boston would print: "I made the reference to Jesus intentionally with premeditated purpose. I see a resemblance between His story and that of Sacco and Vanzetti. If I had associated His name with Lowell, Thayer, or Fuller, that might have been blasphemy."

Boston, Mass., September 4

GARDNER JACKSON

Outspoken or Naive?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to congratulate you for speaking out in your editorial Al Smith Speaks Out.

San Francisco, August 30

CHARLES E. TALLMADGE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was in the Middle West campaigning with Norman Thomas when your amazingly naive editorial on the Al Smith acceptance speech arrived.

So fantastic had the campaign of the two old parties become that it seemed impossible to add anything to the political crazy-quilt of 1928. In the South we found Democrats solemnly assuring their rebellious and Dry rank and file that the Democratic Party was the only party of real enforcement and to wait until they heard Robinson skin the Wets alive. In Wisconsin we found the Democrats suddenly emerging from their cellars after years of exile, revived by a $150,000 campaign fund, assuring Socialist and Republican Wets that the Democratic Party would kick enforcement into the lake. We found Smith congratulating the Dry, Hay of Missouri, on his victory over the Wets; we read that "labor leaders" were rallying to the standards of open-shop Raskob, and that "progressives" were leaping aboard the Hoover band-wagon. But with all this we had not stretched our imagination to the point where we could picture The Nation saying: "If Al Smith continues to speak out with that frank clarity of utterance he will win the support of most of the five million voters who supported La Follette in 1924."

To be sure this sort of thing affords the blessed opportunity for rationalization of their desertion of all fundamentally democratic and progressive principles to a certain group of tired radicals—the depressing dregs of the La Follette movement. But since when has The Nation seen fit to comfort this flabby outfit?

Have real progressives become so desperate that the wariest gesture toward liberalism will bring them a-running? I think not. Out where we were they heard and read the Smith speech with their tongues very much in their cheeks, remembering the preelection speeches of another Democratic warrior, not so happy as Smith perhaps but surely speaking "large, divine, and comfortable words" that make Al's pious protestations sound like the feeblest "good government" goo. And they remember what happened to liberalism after Wilson got in his licks. No, progressives are notoriously simple-minded folk, but it takes more than one or two speeches to convince them that the Du Ponts and the Raskobs and the Southern industrialists won't have something to say about water-power in the event of some miracle that will land Smith in the White House. They may be simple, but they are not so simple as to believe that Smith's imperialism will be any improvement upon Wilson's, which he praises, or that Al will do anything more about injunctions in the White House than he has done in the past years up in Albany.

All that the Smith speech succeeded in doing in the erstwhile progressive parts through which we traveled was to persuade progressives that Al is still strong for liquor. And so far as we could observe, no one fell off his chair on the receipt of that information.

Let's pretend that it was the hot weather or sun spots or the general contagion of political gagaism that hit The Nation when it printed that Al Smith Speaks Out thing.

New York City, August 26

McALISTER COLEMAN

Communism in China

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mrs. Buck's article, Communism in China, in The Nation for July 25, includes, it seems to me, many misleading generalizations. The word communism is a very elusive term, and I fear that in her desire to prove the antiquity and universality of communism in China she has tried to prove too much. In what sense can the Hung Ch'iang Hui, or Red Spear Society, be labeled "communistic"? It has never had as one of its ends the common ownership of anything; it is an organization composed of the young sons of local farmers to suppress soldiers who have turned bandits. If "communistic" means to have a common aim, then all the societies of the world will have to be so labeled. Nor is it correct to say that the Red Spears are "an ancient society now rising with fresh strength in many parts of China." They were certainly not known until eight or ten years ago, and their activities have been unknown outside the provinces of Honan and Shantung.

My experience of ten years in a remote, interior province, in close daily contact with the common people, and five other years in the coast cities, would never prompt me to say that the Chinese people have "almost universal sympathy toward bandits"; that they have a "habit of mind which sees no wrong in using force to seek redress for individual grievances against society, or in forcing the rich to give up their possessions on demand"; or that throughout the course of their history "they needed no one to teach them to kill ruthlessly for what they wanted." My observation is that in normal times and under normal conditions (and there have been such) the Chinese of every class gain most of their ends by moral suasion and by pressure of public opinion rather than by force, which they have been taught to despise and which they employ only as a last resort. There are even today provinces in China in which murder is rarer than in equally populated states of the West, where missionary women travel alone night and day for months on end without harm or molestation. This is not true at all times nor in all parts of the country, but it has been true of Shansi province during the past fifteen years.

Is it true that "It has been the ideal of the rich man in China to spend his entire time in the pursuit of pleasure"? I doubt it. Certainly not pleasure in the sense which that word conveys to Westerners. The Chinese man of wealth indulges in no grosser vices than men of wealth anywhere, and by virtue of the national temperament such pleasures as he does enjoy are apt to take milder forms than those known to the West. However inadvisedly he may spend his money, it cannot be said of him that he gets it or uses it in order to exercise control over others. After he has made his pile he more commonly than not retires to his obscure home in the ancestral village, collects a library, fills his rooms with works of antiquity, engages a teacher for his sons, and lives a quiet life of otium cum dignitate. This form of pleasure may not put food into the mouths of the poor; but it does not despoil them, nor does it take from them what is more precious even than much food, their innate self-respect. This native self-assertion and self-respect which, in Mrs. Buck's own words, "makes every coolie feel himself a potential president" is one of the greatest traits of the Chinese people and is not something to be suppressed.

And shall we believe that "thousands of years before Christ there was a division of land which allowed for one-ninth of the total area being worked in common"? As a matter of fact no one knows what happened in China "thousands of years before Christ." The most careful writers on Chinese history agree that the earliest verifiable date in Chinese history is 841 B.C., and that the oldest extant writings, namely those on bone, do not go back beyond 1200 B.C. Dr. Hu Shih has in the late years amply proved that this idea of an ancient communism in China had its origin in an almost unintelligible passage in Mencius which was written not earlier than the fourth century before Christ. The obscure ideas of Mencius were highly amplified in the Chou-li, and so became a part of Chinese mythology.

Washington, D. C., July 25

ARTHUR W. HUMMEL,

Curator of the Chinese Collection,
Library of Congress

New Mexico and Yale

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You quoted an editorial I wrote in the New Mexico State College students' paper in one of your issues. Your point was that military men are subtle in addition to being astute. But the students here resent your editorial, which I reprinted. The two schools were unjustly compared, and the contrast was misleading. You stated that nine dollars a month and a thirty-six dollar uniform might be sufficient bait to make New Mexicans take military science, but that students of Yale must have "polo ponies" and "snappy tailor-made officers' outfits." The two schools are not in the same class. At State College, New Mexico, military training is compulsory in freshman and sophomore years; at Yale it is not. Most artillery or cavalry units have polo grounds. The small State College of New Mexico has an infantry unit; Yale an artillery unit. But Yale students receive no more money than do New Mexico students. Nor do they get much better uniforms unless they pay extra from their own pockets, as do the New Mexico students. New Mexico's officers are as snappily attired as are Yale's.

Las Cruces, N. M., August 28

CHARLES P. LOOMIS

Commercial Humor

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You deplore the action of the Seattle School Board in enjoining its high-school teachers from membership in a union. Now the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle passed two sets of resolutions, one indorsing the action of the school board in prohibiting membership in a union to its teachers, the other urging the teachers' union to win the next annual convention of the national union for Seattle! When asked the reasons for this action the general manager of the chamber issued this written statement: "Although we are always willing to supply information to inquiring friends, it would be impracticable to attempt to explain the 'reasons, motives, and principles' which influenced the trustees of this chamber in any action."

Watsonville, Cal., September 1

JULIA N. BUDLONG

Books and Plays

Two California Poems

By HILDEGARDE FLANNER

Summer's End

The sound of summer slipping from the trees
Is scarcely heard in this bright land.
The heavy fig-leaves falling to the ground
Make a nearly summerless and yellow sound,
But the pearly fig-tree with its linnets
Soft as roses on the marble twig,
Dismisses summer only to invite
A snowless winter to its arms of white.
And winter comes, with her unsleeping flowers—
Or is it spring, that flashes and is here?
Or is it both lie dreaming in one place
And rise bewildered, face to face?

The Owl

The sweet and ghostly laughter of the owl
Last night shook upward from the light bamboo.
The garden rose and trembled at the sound,
Suspended in enchantment and in dew.
What strange reversal of the blood and soul,
What dizzy floating upward from the earth,
When suddenly the darkness broke in two
Upon the honeyed edge of this soft mirth,
And in its wake a glint of mockery
Unbearable to hearts worn out with prayer.
For man, asleep, still labors over fears
The dreamless owl abandons to the air.

Down in the Long Grass

By DOROTHY LEONARD

Down in the long grass little girls
Remember dandelion curls;
Making a face at bitter milk,
Each mystically twirls and twirls

Till her Ionic capital
Is finished for its fairy hall.
They link together a great chain
That will not bear its weight at all

And leave it where it fell in two,
Snatching hollow stems to boo
As little bleating bands of boys
On midnight of Election do.

How can a child come home explain
The carpe diem of a chain
Or nod a head in silver curls,
Undone by dandelion stain?

Case Studies in Our Imperialism

The Americans in Santo Domingo. By Melvin M. Knight. The Vanguard Press. $1.

Our Cuban Colony. By Leland H. Jenks. The Vanguard Press. $1.

The Bankers in Bolivia. By Margaret A. Marsh. The Vanguard Press. $1.

AUTHORITATIVE investigation into the tangled nature of our relationships with the economies and politics of the Central-American and Caribbean republics has long been needed. This need the American Fund for Public Service undertook to meet in part by inviting researches, under the general editorship of Harry Elmer Barnes, into American dealings in Cuba, Santo Domingo, and Bolivia; and these three volumes are the fruits of the venture.

Dr. Jenks's interesting study points out how after our intervention in 1906 we broadened our interpretation of the Platt Amendment in a similar manner to that by which Roosevelt had extended the Monroe Doctrine—namely, by invoking the principle of "preventive intervention." Our State Department proceeded on the assumption that if we were privileged to intervene in order to maintain a government "adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty," we were also privileged to influence Cuban internal policy so as to eliminate any necessity for military intervention. Dr. Jenks believes that this policy was followed from 1909, when our second occupation of the island was terminated, to 1923, but that since then Cuba has been given relative freedom in her internal political affairs. Americans have, however, so come to control the sugar industry of the country that a business-man's government such as that of Machado has necessarily been satisfactory to our business interests and hence has made even "preventive intervention" unnecessary.

One of the most interesting features of Dr. Jenks's book is his history of the Cuban sugar industry and its relation to the tariff policy of the United States. The industry owes a great deal of its development to the preferential rates on Cuban sugar which were granted by the Reciprocity Agreement of 1903. The beet-sugar producers naturally fought against this concession, as they have against any idea of annexation. In 1921, however, they were victorious in securing a 33 per cent increase in the sugar duties. A graphic description is given of the dance of the millions in 1919-1920 when sugar rose from 7 cents in the New York market to 22.5 cents in May, 1920, only to fall back to 3.7 cents by the middle of December. This extraordinary rise and fall led to such speculative over-investment in the upswing and such ruinous deflation subsequently that the most important banks collapsed and General Crowder became director of Cuban policies during the next three years.

Dr. Knight's volume suffers from being an abridgment of a two-volume manuscript which he originally prepared. This, together with his very evident desire to cultivate a preciousness of style and his apparent determination never to explain a situation directly which can be treated allusively, makes it extremely difficult to follow all the threads of the Dominican narrative. But they can with care be traced. The claims of the Santo Domingo Improvement Company and of French, Italian, and British creditors gave Roosevelt his excuse in 1905 for putting pressure on Santo Domingo to agree to an American receivership in order to avert the financial partition of the country between the European claimants. When the Senate refused to ratify the Protocol, Roosevelt had the President of Santo Domingo put the agreement into effect by his own order. The convention of 1907 established an American receivership of the customs in order to guarantee payments on the public department. After the revolution of 1911-1912, the United States tried to broaden the convention by demanding control over the internal revenue and over all expenditures. The Dominican Congress came to believe in 1916 that President Jiminez, who had seized two members of the opposition, was secretly negotiating with the United States and finally started to impeach him. Jiminez thereupon marched on the capital. American troops were landed to support him and although he finally refused to utilize them, and instead resigned, they seized the capital and the other principal cities. We then tried to get the Dominican Congress to elect a pro-American President, but did not meet with the same success as in Haiti in the previous year. The government which was chosen refused to legalize by proclamation complete American control over their finances and police. We thereupon overthrew the Dominican government in November and set up a military regime in its stead.

During the six years of our occupation we did succeed in establishing a greater degree of internal order than had formerly obtained, but this was seriously marred by the brutalities and atrocities which such an occupation almost inevitably entails. We also built one main trunk highway for the Dominicans. The unfortunate speculations in 1920 of the military government in sugar and tobacco combined with the falling off of revenue caused the occupation to float the 1921 Speyer loan of $2,500,000. Dr. Knight's treatment of this is inadequate, but from an independent examination of the advertisements of the loan issued by the bankers it is apparent that the premium paid for redeeming the loan in the following year brought the actual rate of interest up to approximately 16 per cent. It would be most interesting to know whether the underwriting houses did actually distribute the loan to the public or retain so lucrative an investment for themselves.

Mrs. Marsh's little volume on the simpler situation in Bolivia is admirable in its unpretentious compactness. The author gives a clear picture of the geographic and racial aspects of the country and outlines with a firm hand the economic problems of tin mining and the railroads. The most interesting section of the book is that which discusses the $33,000,000 loan made to Bolivia by American bankers in 1922. She shows this to have been secured by prior liens on nearly two-thirds of the national revenue which, as is well known, it also called for the virtual control of the government's finances by a bankers' commission. Yet despite such strong security, Bolivia was obliged to pay an interest charge of 9 per cent. In addition she was not privileged to redeem any of the bonds before 1937 and then only in whole and not in part. If she redeems them prior to 1947, she must pay a thirteen-point premium over the price (92) which she received. Mrs. Marsh shows that these onerous terms were imposed because the Saavedra Government was not free to award the loan to higher bidders since it had only a year before given a three-year option on all foreign loans as a partial consideration for a million-dollar loan by Stifel-Nicolaus of Saint Louis. The 1922 loan seems only to have resulted in the building of 128 miles of rather poor tracks from Atroelra to Villazon at the high cost of $78,000 per mile, and in refunding the internal and external debt at a higher rate of interest. Against this, however, must be set the fact that some savings were apparently made in refunding the French loan because of the depreciation of the franc.

Mrs. Marsh correctly points out that thus far the whole affair is one between Bolivia and the bankers and that our government has not been embroiled. She raises the very interesting question, however, as to what our policy would or should be were Bolivia, because of a slump in the tin market or for some other reason, to default on the loan.

Taken as a whole, the contents of these three interesting monographs are not accurately described by the blurb on their jackets which represents the hapless inhabitants of these countries as being ground, with the active aid of our government, beneath the heels of the American financial juggernaut. That our government has most illegally stretched the meaning of the Platt amendment in Cuba and the 1907 convention with Santo Domingo must be evident. That our business interests have all too frequently driven hard bargains is abundantly illustrated in these studies. Our representatives have moreover frequently been incompetent and in some instances have used their influence to favor more than dubious claims and concessions.

But fairness requires that the other side of the shield be recognized as well. Where we have exercised financial control we have collected funds honestly and have sought to curb political graft. When we have exercised military control we have, despite all the atrocities, given the inhabitants relative immunity from banditry and revolutions. Certainly our military interventions in Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Nicaragua do not seem to have been dictated in the main by a desire to aid American financiers but rather to make our political influence predominant in the approaches to the Panama Canal. The desire to protect the canal by controlling contiguous or neighboring territory is, in the opinion of the reviewer, the predominant cause of our imperialistic policy in the Caribbean during the last twenty years, just as the desire to protect the Suez Canal has made Great Britain determined to preserve its hegemony in Egypt and in Asia Minor.

It is much to be hoped that the relative success of these studies may encourage investigations of our relations with the Central-American states, upon which a great deal of light remains to be thrown.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS

The New Historical Novel

The Devil. By Alfred Neumann. Translated from the German by Huntley Paterson. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

ALFRED NEUMANN is the third living German novelist of international importance to be recently introduced to America. "The Devil," which has achieved an enormous success on the Continent, is as brilliant a piece of work as "Power" and seems, on the whole, to be the production of a profounder and more complex mind. It should duplicate Feuchtwanger's triumph here, and, if it does, will owe that triumph not only to its own high qualities but to the masterly translation by Huntley Paterson.

The theme of "The Devil" is the almost occult relationship between a demoniacal monarch and his demoniacal familiar. The monarch is Louis XI of France; his familiar, conscience, and alter ego is Oliver Necker of Ghent, barber, diplomat, and genius—Machiavelli's prince minus the extraversion. From the point of view of the intrigue, whose complicated convolutions are handled with incredible skill by Neumann, Necker is simply the powerful, subtle agent of a highly modern king who is willing to employ the most relentless political methods to insure a united France. The intrigue itself is fascinating, but it is merely the skeleton of the story: it is where Scott would have stopped, and, in fact, did stop.

With admirable restraint that weakens only in the last fifty pages (which seem overly sentimental), Neumann deepens his book by the employment of a motif that reaches below and beyond the intrigue. This fundamental theme is mystic and metaphysical, gaining in strangeness from its realistic background of high diplomacy, the hypocrisies of courtiers, the movements of armies, the whole chess-board of fifteenth-century Europe. The author sets himself a difficult task in characterization. His two main characters are men in whom a supernal capacity for evil is so equally and intensely developed that they are deep affinities. Each is part of the soul of the other, each wages war within the other, and each, by virtue of the unique love which binds them together, rises, mystically, not morally, above the horror and tyranny of his external career. The subtle conflict is given concrete embodiment in the person of Oliver's beautiful wife, Anne, at once the object of Louis's lust and a constant reminder to him of his inability to possess her except in so far as his soul is also the soul of her husband. The whole conception has a German tenuous boldness that may not be entirely to the taste of an American audience which has cultivated easy cynicism to the point of degeneracy.

Feuchtwanger, Brod, and now Neumann give clear evidence of the fine and sweeping change that has overtaken the historical novel since the days of Scott, Bulwer-Lytton, and Auerbach. Not content merely with a more rigorous and conscientious historical realism, they have had the penetration to see that, for the purposes of fiction, there is no such thing as historical characters, but only characters. These characters are susceptible to the same profound presentation that is given to invented modern personages. The historical novelist today can no longer depend on the enchantment of distance or the glamor of royal gestures. He is psychologist, or nothing; and, as in the book under discussion, he may even be mystic. The standards have been raised and, it would seem, raised forever.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

The Irrepressible Conflict

John Brown's Body. By Stephen Vincent Benét. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THIS poem is the most ambitious ever undertaken by an American on an American theme. Yet our judgments must be qualified: there is an important sense in which it is not ambitious enough. There is a sense in which its sole title to poetry is the fact that it is written in verse. It is a weakness of our publishing system that a piece of writing can seldom be sold to the public without having had a great many lies told about it; the author and his work, and the public, too, are put in a false position in which no one, spiritually, is profited. "John Brown's Body" has merit enough; it has hair-raising defects; and yet it deserves to be widely read and, within reason, praised. It is an interesting book, but it is not the kind of work that the public has been led to believe it is.

It has been called among other things an epic and it has been compared, not unfavorably, to the "Iliad." Mr. Benét himself has no such pretensions; he is modest, and persons who have not lost their heads over the poem should keep them in reviewing the nonsense that has been written about it, lest Mr. Benét be confounded with his prophets and unjustly blamed. The poem is not in any sense an epic; neither is it a philosophical vision of the Civil War; it is a loose, episodic narrative which unfolds a number of related themes in motion-picture flashes. In spite of some literary incompetence in the author and the lack of a controlling imagination, the story gathers suspense as it goes and often attains to power.

Many passages, particularly the lyrical commentaries scattered throughout, are so good that one suspects that the vicious writing, which is most of the poem, comes of too hasty composition. Perhaps Mr. Benét, like most Americans, is mysteriously betrayed into writing with his ear to the ground. It is not his fault; let us say it is the fault of the "system"; yet whoever may be at fault, the poem contains lines like these (which are not the worst):

Now the scene expands, we must look at the scene as a whole.
How are the gameboards chalked and the pieces set?

There are too many other lines quite as flat, and they are not all bad because Mr. Benét has a bad ear for verse; they are due, rather, to a lack of concentration in the grasp of the material. The transitions are often arbitrary or forced, and this blemish, which at first sight seems to be merely literary, really takes the measure of Mr. Benét's capacity as a "major poet."

For he does not see the Civil War as a whole. I do not mean that he has not visualized all the campaigns (he has done this admirably), nor that he is deficient in general ideas as to what the war was about. It is simply that his general ideas remain on the intellectual plane; they are disjointed, diffuse, uncoordinated; they never reach any sweeping significance as symbols. The symbol of John Brown becomes an incentive to some misty writing, and instead of sustaining the poem it evaporates in mixed rhetoric. Mr. Benét sees that the meaning of the war is related to the meaning of Brown; yet what is the meaning of Brown? The presentation of Brown as a character is interesting; but it is neither here nor there to say, symbolically, that he is a "stone" or, at the end, that the machine-age grows out of his body. It is a pretty conceit, but it is not large enough, it is not sufficiently welded to the subject matter to hold together a poem of fifteen thousand lines. Is it possible that Mr. Benét supposed the poem to be about the Civil War, rather than about his own mind? This would explain its failure of unity; for if a poet have some striking personal vision of life, it will be permanent, and it will give meaning to all the symbols of his irresistible choice. We are permitted to say that the Civil War interests Mr. Benét; it has no meaning for him. He has not been ambitious enough.

Yet Mr. Benét himself appears, in this connection, to have recognized the diffuseness of his impulse. He seems to have felt that the partial glimpses he has given us of the social backgrounds of the war were not strong enough to carry the poem along, and he has contrived a "human interest story" to take the place of a comprehensive symbol. Jack Ellyat, the Union private, is captured at Shiloh; he escapes to a cabin in the woods, where he seduces the beautiful daughter. So far, so good; but when, shortly after the war, the daughter with the baby appears at Ellyat's home-town in Connecticut, the ways of God are not sufficiently mysterious. It is a trick done for effect; the effect is bad.

Many passages in the narrative are complete poems in themselves; a bare collection of these might display Mr. Benét's true stature to better advantage than their context does. Many are distinguished poems; the Invocation is one of the best recent productions by an American.

Mr. Benét has steeped himself in the documents of the age, and many of the historical portraits are freshly done; the interpretation in some instances is highly original. The picture of Lincoln is, as usual, uncritical and unconvincing. The greatest successes are Davis and Lee. If professional historians, particularly those of the Northern tradition, will follow Mr. Benét's Davis, a distorted perspective in American history will soon be straightened out. Nowhere else has Lee been so ably presented, yet the Lee is not so good as the Davis; for, perhaps frightened by the pitfalls, Mr. Benét openly points them out, and the portrait is too argumentative. Yet these and countless minor figures—generals, statesmen, private soldiers, runaway Negroes, plantation ladies, each sharply drawn in his right character—move in an atmosphere all their own that takes us past the literary blemishes to the end. Yet is this atmosphere a quality of the poem or of our memories? Succeeding generations will decide.

ALLEN TATE

The Drifting Grey

British Foreign Policy under Sir Edward Grey. By Count Max Montgelas. Translated by William C. Dreher. Edited, with a Foreword, by Harry Elmer Barnes. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.25.

THE distinguished author of this little book has a broad and factual knowledge on the question of the war guilt and an independent and honest judgment that should commend his writings to the American public. Although we need not accept all of Count Montgelas's conclusions, this present detailed study serves as an antidote to Sir Edward, now Viscount, Grey's disarming memoirs, and enables us to appraise more accurately the policy of that enigmatic statesman.

Count Montgelas is bent upon undermining another, and a particularly stubborn, myth about the origins of the World War. We have been led to regard Great Britain as one nation consistently pursuing a peaceful, conciliatory foreign policy about which lurked no taint of responsibility for that disaster, and to consider Sir Edward as wearing his gloriously immaculate diplomatic robes with all the dignity and honor that a moral man could assume in the company of slippery Machiavellis. The Count now shows us that in the breast of this blue-blooded, self-assured Britisher there dwelt two souls, that of a Gladstonian Liberal and that of another Joe Chamberlain. So harmoniously fused were they that the ethical power of the one lent confidence to the activism of the other and enabled this Liberal Imperialist in his conscientious investigations of his conduct as foreign minister to call it good. A pacifist at heart, he entirely approved the Boer War and made no mention in his memoirs of the second Hague Peace Conference. Nor did his love of peace prevent him from giving France a blank check at the Conference of Algiers in 1906 without demanding any quid pro quo, or from approving a veiled threat of war against Germany during the Agadir crisis in 1911. This simple and unimaginative man, asserts Count Montgelas, lacked the knowledge and breadth of view requisite for handling international affairs. Yet, convinced of his own rectitude, Grey showed singular readiness to make important decisions without consulting his more Gladstonian colleagues.

Grey entered office late in 1905 deeply prejudiced against Germany. The author stresses Sir Edward's prepossession that Germany was a chauvinistic nation of enormous power led by Pan-Germanists. The Foreign Minister watched with trepidation the rapid growth of the German navy and the extension of the Bagdad Railway. To counter-balance these menaces, he was determined to further the Conservative policy of reconciliation and cooperation with France and Russia. While asseverating that British hands remained free, he clung tenaciously to those two Powers and permitted preparations to be made with them for active aid in case of a war with Germany. His denial of any antagonism toward Germany was scarcely in harmony with his disinclination to reach a good understanding with her or with his jealous observation of any German efforts to approach France or Russia. He came to apply one standard to Germany's policies and actions and another to his own and those of his friends. He denounced Germany for being guided by national interest, but fully indorsed the same course for Great Britain. Germany's act in making friends with the Turks while developing their country he condemned as dastardly, preferring the more gentlemanly and time-honored way of the French in Morocco. When, continues Count Montgelas, Germany sought in a blundering manner to share also in the spoils of colonial loot, Sir Edward obstinately kept her out. As the knowledge that military and naval conversations between the Entente Powers soon reached Germany, she sought to make a political agreement with Great Britain. But Grey branded Germany's fear of encirclement as sheer hypocrisy. Suspecting her in turn of trying to isolate his own country, he refused to endanger the Entente Cordiale by negotiating such an accord. Count Montgelas explains Grey's lack of appreciation that his actions were alarming the Central Power and emboldening France and Russia, or that from the aggressions of those last two Powers a situation was developing which might lead to war.

Drifting with circumstances, Sir Edward tried to maintain peace but did not know how. When the crisis arrived, Great Britain was as well prepared for it as anyone else. Although still protesting that his country was free to act as it wished, Grey felt so strongly the urge of British interests and the moral obligations to France that from the evening of August 1 he was determined that Great Britain should come to the support of France in case of war or he would resign. Fortunately for him the Germans dispelled his embarrassment over finding an effective popular excuse for entering the war by invading Belgium. Armageddon had arrived. Who can deny that Grey's policy and actions had contributed to its birth?

EUGENE N. ANDERSON

Fiction Shorts

Spider Boy. By Carl Van Vechten. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Mr. Van Vechten, it will irritate him to learn, is one of our most useful members of society. By his books one can always recall the sophistications of four or five years ago. He is a constant reminder of the essential innocence of smart people and of the humorlessness of their gaiety. "Spider Boy" would like to be a mad, farcical, nonsensical extravaganza in which the insanities of Hollywood and super-productions and temperamental movie stars and Hebraic entrepreneurs are to be touched off with the neatest of hands. But it is not. It is a wearisome and flat burlesque, prodded into a sort of droopy excitement by the administration of banal farcical stimuli and removed forever from the literature of insomnia only by its astonishing vulgarity. A childish and petulant take-off on a well-known South-western critic and sociologist gives us the measure of Mr. Van Vechten's temperament.

Phoenix. By Alan Sims. Little Brown and Company. $2.50.

A new writer reaches tentative fingers into the myth-filled closet of the past and emerges with a high-spirited tale of ancient Hellas and the fall of Ilium. In swift narrative prose Mr. Sims retells the undying stories of the Greek hero, Peleus; of his famous son, Akhilleus of Phthia; and of his grandson, Neoptolemos. The blending of modern and antique prose is a happy one. The descriptions of the siege of Troy in which the author advances a sufficiently neat explanation of the legendary horse; the tragic death of Hektor; the slaying of the Kalydonian boar and the famed voyage of the Argonauts all recapture some of the glamor of the Homeric demi-gods.

The Mountain. By St. John G. Ervine. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Twenty-two sketches and short tales descriptive of humble life and humble people. Excellent as superior journalism is excellent, they hardly recall the novelist of "Changing Winds" and cause one almost to forget the dramatist of "John Ferguson."

The House with the Echo. By T. F. Powys. The Viking Press. $2.

Only the most faithful of Mr. Powys's very faithful audience will grow enthusiastic about any of these twenty-six rural anecdotes. Mr. Powys's style is bare enough to be powerful—but only in the longer forms. Here his stories appear actually bony, almost insignificant. Coming so shortly after his extraordinary "Mr. Weston's Good Wine," this volume possesses all the accidental disadvantages of anti-climax.

C. P. F.

Orientalia

China and England. By W. E. Soothill. Oxford University Press. $3.

A roseate view of Britain's generosity to China.

The Pacific: A Forecast. By P. T. Etherton and H. Hessel Tiltman. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

Two Englishmen foresee an industrialized Orient, in which the Great Powers will be China, Japan—and Australia. They see more essential antagonism between Japan and the United States than between Japan and Russia, but have no faith in Pan-Asiaticism. Their horoscope offers a stimulating perspective for American readers.

Modern Japan and Its Problems. By G. C. Allen. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

This is a remarkable study of Japan in economic terms. Chrysanthemums and geisha girls are omitted, but the amazing effort of a feudal clan to build a modern industrialized state, while retaining the family basis of a medieval society, is analyzed from the bottom up. There is no parallel in history to the conscious shaping of the new Japan, although already the modernizing process has released forces which make continued domination from above impossible. Mr. Allen concludes that Japan "alone among the Asiatic peoples appears likely to be able to work out some compromise between the West and the East, and by her comprehension of both civilizations to bring the two great branches of the human family together." His analysis will help more to an understanding of Japan than a dozen recent picture-books.

Problems of the Pacific. Proceedings of the Second Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, Honolulu, July 15-29, 1927. Edited by J. B. Condliffe. University of Chicago Press. $3.

When Japanese and Koreans, Chinese and British, Yankees, Australians, Canadians, and New Zealanders talk over informally the problems that so often divide them, the world is moving. The Institute of Pacific Relations is more than an institution; it is a growing spirit. It seeks to substitute agreed facts for the patterns of automatic loyalty-responses. Two conferences have met in Hawaii's benign climate, and this record of the proceedings of the second is a mine of material. The friendly discussions of course lose much in summary; but the contributed papers—particularly those on the population problem in the Far East—supply a mass of invaluable data. Every six years the world receives today an increment of new population equivalent in numbers to the entire population of the United States; here at last were men analyzing that increase, attempting to discover its why and where, and how to stop it or take care of it. Other papers treat China's tariff autonomy, extraterritoriality, the concessions and the missions, Asiatic immigration and the exclusion laws, and the radio controversies. Next year, perhaps, Russia will be represented at the institute; and some day there will be Javans and Malays and more vocal Filipinos; their presence will test still further this conference method of international education.

The China Year Book, 1928. University of Chicago Press. $12.50.

Each year one marvels at this encyclopedia of Chinese affairs. Its editor, H. G. W. Woodhead, is an almost apoplectically British treaty-port editor; his chief assistant, George E. Sokolsky, is a brilliant and intensely opinionated Russian-American, yet between them and with other help they produce one of the great reference books which every student of international affairs needs at his elbow. The statistics of Chinese trade, revenue, health, flood control, transportation, are, of course, official; the Who's Who is indispensable; and the documentary summaries of events of the year in China are unmatched. The 1928 volume includes also the text of the Mongolian Constitution of 1928, a history of the Nanking incident, the agreements for the return of Hankow and Kiukiang, proposals for treaty revision, the documents said to have been found in the Soviet Embassy in Peking, and a valuable revision of Mr. Sokolsky's annual history of China's labor movement. The history of the Kuomintang, somewhat marred in its later phases, where many of the facts are still uncertain, by Sokolsky's right-wing partisanship, is the most completely documented history of the Chinese Nationalist Party anywhere available. Few year-books published anywhere are as consistently satisfactory as this product of Tientsin.

L. S. G.

Books in Brief

Herbert Booth. By Ford C. Ottman. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Why do the heathen rage? The answer is that they usually don't—but Christians often do. Almost all of this preposterously long volume is devoted to an interminably detailed account of the petty wranglings between the famous General Booth and his son Herbert. According to one's point of view, one is either tormented or tickled by the way in which father and son constantly invoke Christian charity while slitting each other's throat with dialectical deliberation. The author is eminently fitted to relate the intricacies of this family squabble, for he labors less for love of Herbert Booth than for hatred against the present potentates of the Salvation Army.

An Artist in the Family. By Sarah Gertrude Millin. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

This is a novel with the seeds of several good stories imbedded in it. Unfortunately the artist in the family is the stereotyped creature of moods, stupidities, charms, and ineffectiveness. Placed in a South African setting, the artist "emotes" in a more exotic environment than he might in a Greenwich Village garret. The author has an easy and interesting style which redeems the platitudinous of the tale.

The Constitution of the United States in some of its Fundamental Aspects. By Gaspar G. Bacon. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

The six chapters of this book were originally prepared as the first series of lectures on a foundation at Boston University which bears the author's name. Any one who reads the laudatory paragraphs which the dean of the university law school contributes to the jacket of the book will be led to expect something quite important, but the lectures themselves are only mildly notable. What Mr. Bacon has to say falls substantively into two parts. The first consists of the usual elementary sketch of the history of the Constitution, with summaries of its provisions and the customary praise of their wisdom and farsightedness. The second deals somewhat in detail with federal usurpation, and surveys a number of the decisions of the Supreme Court and acts of Congress in which federal authority has been more or less grossly extended at the expense of the citizen or the States. As federal usurpation is obviously one of the most dangerous political tendencies in this country at the moment, those who fear and resent it will probably be glad to find Mr. Bacon on their side, but his protest is altogether too gentle and professionally dignified to stir the blood. The evils of centralization and arbitrary exercise of governmental authority which Mr. Bacon sees perfectly clearly will not be remedied, we may be sure, until lawyers and others who know the facts and realize their significance speak out with a good deal more stoutness than Mr. Bacon shows.

Drama A Comedy

WHEN, a few centuries hence, some butterfly-breaker of that distant age devotes himself to the composition of a thesis entitled "The Development of Moral Ideas as Revealed in the Drama of the Twentieth Century," he will be compelled to devote several chapters at least to a consideration of the various stages by which marital infidelity, ceasing to be considered the Unforgivable Sin, came to be regarded as merely an Annoying Habit. He will note that even when his period opened the attitude toward adultery had already lost a little of its completely intransigent character so that infidelity might, under certain circumstances, be defended if only the Manifest Destiny of Love and the artificial nature of Man-made Laws were invoked in a manner sufficiently convincing; but he will be compelled to add that even at this period the act was still considered to be marked by a certain finality and that (if the guilty person were female) she either went bravely forward into the unknown future with her new mate or was, as a matter of course, incontinently kicked out by the wronged husband. Having established this point he will go on to show how the gravity of the offense was progressively lightened until the act of adultery lost its decisive character and how, as a result, the question in such cases became, not Is my wife guilty or not? but simply Are her infidelities frequent enough and serious enough for me to conclude, without seeming ridiculously Victorian, that she has ceased to be even partly mine?

In a modern play the husband does not burst into a room in righteous fury and exclaim "All is discovered." He is, on the contrary, much more likely, while mixing a cocktail for one of the lovers pro tem., to say merely something like this: "Look here, my dear, you know that I have never been exacting, but it seems to me that the time has come when I can reasonably maintain that I neither see enough nor have enough of you to make it worth while for me to pay your bills. Surely there must be someone else who is willing to take that responsibility." He is, in other words, perfectly willing that nature should occasionally take its course, but he gets a little restive when, as one of the characters in the specific play to be got to presently, remarks, "Natures take their courses."

If our hypothetical commentator is interested in art as well as in morals he will probably add that this change in the attitude toward adultery necessarily brought about a change in the form of the plays in which the subject was treated, since Unforgivable Sins are the concern of Drama, while Annoying Habits are the concern of Comedy; and if he is, furthermore, an assiduous exhumers of by-then-long-forgotten plays he may cite as a case in point the badly named but amusing play called "Heavy Traffic" which Arthur Richman has written and Gilbert Miller produced at the Empire Theater. Mr. Richman can hardly be said to have discovered a very original story or a very original point of view. His long-suffering good-fellow of a husband, his cradle-snatching wife, and their giddy entourage are not new; neither is the former's attitude (substantially that outlined in the preceding paragraph) nor the particular circumstances which lead this long-suffering worm to turn. And yet, thanks to a number of neatly turned phrases, and thanks also to the fact that the play never lapses into either sentimentality or lubricity, it will probably both win and deserve a considerable success.

It would seem as though this age ought to be a great age of comedy. We have not those passionate moral and social convictions out of which drama springs, but, on the surface at least, we do seem to be capable of that detached intelligence which would make it possible for us to produce comedy out of the difficulties into which we wander as a result of the very fact that we have no deep-seated convictions to guide us. I should, however, be the last to maintain that we actually have any such great comedy, though I do feel a certain hope whenever I see a play like "Heavy Traffic" which seems to be at least pointed in the right direction. It is not, to my mind, so accomplished as S. N. Behrman's "The Second Man," but it does escape those pitfalls into which the American comic writer most often falls, since its epigrams have a consistent attitude behind them instead of scattering in all directions like the usual native wise-cracks, and since the moral which it points is a genuinely comic one instead of being, like the moral of most popular American comedies, something which seems to have been concocted by the editor of True Stories for the purpose of convincing rural clergymen that even the spiciest story may contain a Great Moral Lesson. Incidentally "Heavy Traffic" is very well acted by Reginald Masson as the husband and by Robert Strange as one of the incidental lovers, although I could wish that the popular A. E. Matthews would be a little less mannered and Mary Boland manage to acquire a little sharper edge.

"The Phantom Lover" (Forty-ninth Street Theater) is an incredible play from the German of Georg Kaiser which tells how a very ingenuish ingenue fell so desperately and mystically in love at first sight with an army officer that she passed the following night with the butcher-boy under the impression that he was her beloved. It tells further how the army officer, when he hears of these events, is immediately convinced that he and the girl have been united by a higher power and how he then proceeds to murder the butcher-boy before leaving for parts unknown with the ingenue. It would be kinder to the author to intimate that the play was doubtless better in the original, but at best it can hardly have been other than very silly indeed. Romney Brent contributes one spot of light to a very dark evening.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Voices rose and babbled in the wilderness that was America. Horace Greeley called that time

THE STAMMERING CENTURY

Now Gilbert Seldes has written a history of the eccentrics and fanatics of the 19th Century and of the movements they fathered. Here they march, prophets in motley, the gleam of the zealot in their eyes—revivalists, founders of Utopias, inventors of new religions, reformers, quacks and charlatans—a host of men and women and ideas whose influence on the American social scheme has been of great if unobserved importance. Mr. Seldes' account furnishes an interesting clue to the common source of bigotry and radicalism in this country; it is a new interpretation of the forces in the past that are creating the America of the present.

Illustrated, $5.00

By Gilbert Seldes

The John Day Company, 25 West 45th St., New York

THE GRANDSON OF THE LIBERATOR

A biographical sketch of Oswald Garrison Villard

by R. L. DUFFUS

Reprinted from THE AMERICAN MERCURY

Ten cents

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., N. Y.

International Relations Section

Freedom in Nicaragua

THE Nationalist Party of Nicaragua has recently published its political program, which is herewith made public in this country through the party's representative in the United States, Toribio Tijerino, formerly Consul General of Nicaragua in New York City. The Nationalist Party is a union of those who stand for the country's independence as opposed to domination by the United States, and it was refused the opportunity to place in nomination its candidate for the Presidency of the republic in the elections supervised by the American Marine Corps. The reason given for this refusal was that the officers supervising the election had decided to permit candidates to be put up only by the Conservative and Liberal parties, neither of which is opposing American intervention. The reason for barring candidates of any other parties was, of course, to prevent the election of a President unfriendly to the American domination of the republic.

The program of the Nationalist Party appears below as drawn up by the Executive Committee, consisting in addition to Dr. Tijerino of José Dolores Estrada, a former President; J. Francisco Gutierrez, Salvador Buitrago Diaz, Ramon Molina, Ramon Romero, Bartolomeo Martinez, another former President; Escolastico Lara, General Paulino Godoy, and Fernando Larios.

PROGRAM OF NATIONALIST PARTY

1. To gather within one organization all the citizens that in Nicaragua purpose firmly to maintain free and autonomous the fatherland left us by the heroes of the War of Independence, and to stand behind the blue-and-white flag, the sacred symbol of the national sovereignty. Likewise to call on General Augusto C. Sandino and his valiant companions to abandon the armed struggle and cooperate toward the triumph of the fatherland in the fields of civic struggle.

2. It being indispensable for the development of the democratic institutions adopted in the republic to promote the cultural and economic uplift of the working elements, to which the general mass of the people belong, the Nationalist Party of Nicaragua recognizes as good for the development of the Nicaraguan worker the labor doctrines contained in the fundamental charter of the Obrerismo Organizado of Nicaragua. For this reason it will cooperate toward carrying out the organizing, economic, and educational purposes of the working element, which are the essence of said charter.

3. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua maintains that the basis of the sovereignty of the nation is contained in its political and economic independence. It therefore demands the withdrawal from our national soil of all foreign armed forces and of all foreign officials who exercise jurisdiction. Likewise it is opposed to the delivery, to foreign exploitation, under pretext of protection to industry, of our lands and of our natural resources to the detriment of the present and future welfare of the Nicaraguan people.

4. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua believes that the concessions granted to the Banco Nacional and to the Ferrocarril del Pacifico de Nicaragua should be modified in the sense that said institutions, the bank particularly, be essentially to protect our nascent industry and our agriculture that is the basis of the economic life of the nation.

5. In order to insure the carrying into effect of the above plank, the Nationalist Party of Nicaragua understands that the control of said corporations should rest in the hands of the National Government and should be managed by Nicaraguans who are technical and morally capable.

6. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua regards as opposed to the welfare and the dignity of the nation the negotiation of all kinds of contracts that in any manner place in foreign hands the right to intervene in our fiscal legislation and in the collection and expenditure of the money of the public treasury. This plank does not prevent the negotiation of contracts that are not onerous and that are of equitable and reciprocal utility.

7. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua proclaims the necessity that all free nations are in of cultivating international amity. It therefore shall be our constant purpose to intensify most cordial relations with all the countries of the world, particularly with the American nations, for the strengthening of continental solidarity within the realm of effective self-government and sovereign equality that are the basis of our public law. The party shall also cultivate the fraternity of Central America within the very special bonds that bind the five states of the Isthmus.

8. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua purposes primarily to cooperate toward establishing a tendency among the social forces of Nicaragua looking toward self-government; and to this end it proclaims as a principle of democratic effectiveness the rule of NO INTERVENTION, that is, that no nation has the right of interfering in the settlement of the political questions of another nation, and that every effort in that sense attacks and denies the principle of self-government upheld by all civilized and democratic nations, and is contrary to the free evolution of democratic institutions, to the development of which the founders of the American nationalities dedicated these continents.

9. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua proclaims as fundamental for the enjoyment of life in freedom the unvarying and eternal principle of NATIONAL CONCILIATION, which is a moral element indispensable for the exercise and enjoyment of all the rights and duties that are guaranteed to us and exacted of us by our constitutions and our codes. For the carrying out of this principle we solemnly call to the free soul of our people to consolidate in ourselves and by ourselves the existence of our nationality by our joint and cooperative actions. This conciliation should acquire legal character through the enactment of laws giving representation to the minority groups in all the governing bodies of the republic, and especially in those of elective character.

10. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua proclaims the civil and political equality of both sexes. It therefore shall strive that laws be enacted guaranteeing the right of the women of Nicaragua to vote and the enjoyment by them of all those rights that are necessary to their free and dignified position.

11. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua regards as an initial point of its desires of nationality the increase of our national unity, and we therefore shall strive in every manner to make better our means of communication, and especially to construct the great railroad to the Atlantic Coast. In this manner we shall succeed in enlivening the material and spiritual currents among the different sections of the country and in strengthening the ties that should bind all citizens sheltered beneath the same banner.

12. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua believes that the basis of democracy is equality of opportunity for all members of the commonwealth and that, in order that this equality may exist, it is necessary that the state should provide with generosity for the maintenance and multiplication of schools. It maintains also that the revenues set aside for the development or creation of public works should be spent proportionally among all the departments of the republic with relation to what each has contributed to said revenues.

SEE RUSSIA ## and the Great ELEVENTH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION of the Revolution!

Begins in Moscow, November 7, 1928

Finest opportunity to view the U.S.S.R. and its people.

SPECIAL SAILING, OCTOBER 20th

conducted by

AMERICAN-EUROPEAN TRAVEL BUREAU

(Official representative of Russian Government Travel Bureau)

100 Fifth Ave. (Chelsea 4477), New York

MAKE YOUR RESERVATIONS EARLY

Russian visa is assured for the trip, and extension may be secured for a longer stay if desired. Steamship ticket good for one year.

The minimum cost of this tour will be $350, covering all expenses for three days in Leningrad and four days in Moscow.

RUSSIA WELCOMES AMERICAN TOURISTS!

A New Leader Editorial

Look Out for Rabbits

"WARNS Against Rabbit Disease," says a headline.

Certainly this warning is well-timed. For if there was ever a disease which threatened to overrun the United States it is this same rabbit disease.

The symptoms are easy to spot. The victim of this malady begins hemming and hawing and finally breaks out with words to the effect that while he or she believes that Thomas and Maurer are by all odds the best men in the field and stand on the best platform—nevertheless, and notwithstanding and perhaps some other year. . . .

Rabbits, little, white, palpitating bunnies, their noses a 'liberal' pink, scared to death to come out and vote the way they think, nibbling gratefully at such old-party garbage as is thrown at them—poor, poor bunnies, next November Herbert or Al, it doesn't much matter which, will make stew of you and you'll go hopping into the pot, very proud to provide a fat meal for a "good man."

THE NEW LEADER

7 East 15th Street, New York City

$2.00 A Year

$1.00 For Six Months

Sample Copies

Free on Request

AN ESSAY ON HASHEESH

Historical and Experimental

By VICTOR ROBINSON, Ph. C., M. D.

*Author of Pathfinders in Medicine, The Don Quixote of Psychiatry,
The Life of Jacob Henle, Pioneers of Birth Control;
Editor of Medical Life.*

Upon its first publication, the author of this treatise was hailed in the medical circles of this country and abroad as "The American DeQuincey." He has done for Cannabis Indica what DeQuincey accomplished for opium. For scientific accuracy and research, for oriental imagery, for brilliance of language, this hasheesh monograph is an unequalled classic. The experimental data are remarkable. Since hasheesh is no longer obtainable by the public, it need not be feared that the perusal of this study will give rise to "hasheesh clubs."

The present edition contains a most delightful preface by the author.

Cloth bound and printed in best Vail-Ballou style.

ONE DOLLAR, postpaid.

THE MAIL ORDER BOOKERY
BOX 94, ISLAND PARK, N. Y.

13. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua regards as bad morally and materially the practice of appointing representatives to Congress and to the chief local offices of persons who are alien to the respective departments. Consequently it demands that these high officials be natives or residents of said departments.

14. The Nationalist Party of Nicaragua does not seek as an end in itself the executive power but as a means for carrying out the planks of its program. Consequently it will act, alone or in company, with its own candidate or with a candidate of another party, in accord with the exigencies of the welfare of the country.

Ugarte on Sandino

THE following manifesto on Sandino and Nicaragua, by Manuel Ugarte, Argentine Consul in Nice, France, was recently issued in Madrid by the Spanish-American University Federation of Madrid, the General Association of Latin-American Students of Paris and Berlin, and the University Student Federation of Madrid:

The Pan-American Congress at Havana demonstrated the helplessness of most of our officials; now Latin America faces another slur, with the announcement of the sham election to be held in Nicaragua.

For us sometimes patriotism has consisted in denying realities; he may call himself a patriot who maintains that foreign intervention does not impinge on national sovereignty; that national integrity is untouched though the customs revenues may be in foreign hands; and who aids and abets the vain-glorious self-confidence of weak nations. Thus, some have thought to destroy dangers by ignoring them; to hide faults by refusing to see them; and thus, without warning or protest from the leaders of public opinion, we have been brought to this position of economic and political vassalage which today places the autonomous existence of Central and South America on the brink of an abyss.

We therefore repudiate the petty policies which jeopardize our progress, and the pretense, sometimes not disinterested, which poisons our atmosphere. We want to confront realities, however painful they may be, with our eyes on a great country of the future.

The Nicaraguan crisis is the evident result of three factors: first, the ambition of the plutocracy of the United States, anxious to increase the radius of its imperialism; second, the indifference of oligarchic governments of our America, incapable of understanding the problems of our part of the continent; and third, the shortsightedness of the Nicaraguan politicians, greedy for power at the expense of their own country.

This simple declaration of the facts establishes our attitude toward the Nicaraguan problem.

With a large part of the territory of that republic invaded by foreign troops, and the patriots who in guerrilla bands defend their country disqualified and kept from voting, any attempt at an election is an insult to the dignity of this people.

Let the uncontaminated masses of our republics not be deceived by the greedy rivalry between two groups traditionally subject to the United States; let us not be blinded by the sophistry of an election three times false: first, because of the presence of foreign troops; second, because of the submission of both parties to the invader; and third, because of the silence to which the element worthy of respect is condemned. To contest this election, even to discuss it, would give it the appearance of legality, and grant a status to the miserable minorities which, protected by the national enemy, dispute for power between themselves.

The Nicaraguan problem cannot be solved by an election. There are two parties only in the country, those who accept foreign domination and those who reject it. As the latter cannot vote, the election becomes a farce and a sop to public opinion.

Let us not admit any difference between these "liberals" and "conservatives," but mass ourselves against these cravens, against presidents anointed by the White House, against the miserable greed of vassals, in whatever form.

We should tender our enthusiastic support only to General Sandino, because General Sandino, with his heroic guerrillas, represents the popular reaction of our America against our own disloyal oligarchies and our resistance to Anglo-Saxon imperialism.

The comedy of the Nicaraguan election reveals the hopeless depravity of those who, between their own private interests and those of their country, choose the former. The future will condemn them as they deserve. And this same future will justify and reward the selfless figure of Sandino.

Heretofore, we have shed much blood in fruitless interior struggles, for the benefit of tyrants and oligarchies. The energy, the courage, the sacrifice, native to the Spanish-American spirit, have been wasted in suicidal upheavals which pitted against each other two groups in the same country, or caused devastation in two or more neighboring republics. Could we but sum this useless slaughter in one single deed, the force of it would suffice to level the Andes. But the men who could dispose of this treasure, instead of using it for the common good, wasted it in the service of personal ambitions. For the first time in many decades unworthy egotism is abandoned, and this blood flows for the sake of all. Therefore we are with Sandino, who in defending the liberty of his people forecasts the redemption of the Spanish-American continent.

Contributors to This Issue

G. E. R. GEDYE contributes to The Nation frequently on Central European topics.

ANITA BRENNER has passed most of her life in Mexico.

MALVINA LINDSAY is an occasional contributor to current periodicals.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS of the University of Chicago has made a special study of our policies in Latin America.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN contributes literary criticism regularly to The Nation.

ALLEN TATE is a poet and literary critic.

EUGENE N. ANDERSON is a student of international affairs.

REAL ESTATE

—If you have a house or property to sell or lease, try The Nation classified advertising section.

—If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.

—Write for rates to Dept. R., The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1928

No. 3299

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	281
EDITORIALS:
Should Liberals Vote for Smith?.....	284
Gearless Automobiles?.....	285
Hollywood Speaks.....	285
Business Superstitions.....	286
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROWN. By Heywood Brown.....	287
CURTIS'S OILY HANDS. By Frederic Babcock.....	288
SOCRATES SITS UPON THE LOG. By Leland Hamilton Jenks.....	289
WHAT HAPPENED IN MAINE. By Percival Musgrave.....	291
THE WAY OF BOSTON. By Gardner Jackson.....	292
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	293
CORRESPONDENCE .....	294
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
The Old Executioner. By McAlister Coleman.....	296
Eucharist. By Anne Singleton.....	296
Versailles Versus Civilization. By Harry Elmer Barnes.....	296
The Eccentric Century. By Herbert Solow.....	297
Mexico's Xenophon. By Ernest Gruening.....	297
Southwestern Poetry. By James Rorty.....	298
Books in Brief.....	298
Drama: Behaviorism and Drama. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	302
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
A Nation on Trial.....	304

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR

MARK VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

HEYWOOD BROWN

CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

WITH MR. HOOVER invading the East and Governor Smith the West, the beginning of the final phase of the campaign is at hand. At last the public is to be allowed to learn how the two chief candidates stand on other subjects than those discussed by them in their speeches of acceptance. For Governor Smith it is the crossing of the Rubicon. The election cannot be won for him by money nor by Mr. Raskob's organizing skill. It can only be won, if victory is to be achieved at all, by Governor Smith himself, his words and his winning personality. Such betting as there is remains at 2½ to 1 in favor of Mr. Hoover, and the odds have rarely been wrong. Meanwhile, the right honorable Charles Curtis has declared at Lexington, Kentucky, that while the tariff on farm products is an important remedy for putting the farmer "in a position of economic equality with other industries, the danger of undue reliance on the effectiveness of this method must be avoided." This is treason in the holy citadel. Has not Herbert Hoover said that an "adequate tariff is the foundation of farm relief"? How can Mr. Curtis insinuate that such a foundation can be shaky? Moreover, the tariff miracle must never be questioned. No miracle ever can be. It is a miracle or it isn't. It heals or it does not. So Mr. Curtis has committed nothing short of a crime. Two other happenings are worth recording: Senator C. C. Dill of Washington, a useful Democratic legislator in Washington, has been re-nominated and in New Hampshire Senator Moses has received one of the several black eyes he deserves. His hand-picked nominee for the Governorship, Ora Brown, has been rejected by the Republican electorate in favor of Charles W. Tobey of the progressive wing of the party.

ALL AMERICANS OF GOOD WILL should heed the call for relief sent out by Governor Horace Towner of Porto Rico for the 700,000 victims of the great hurricane which swept over the Bahamas and Florida last week. It is in such moments of disaster that the United States has unprecedented opportunity to win the friendship of people who have regarded us with suspicion. The hurricane left unusual human misery in its narrow train because Porto Rico's territory is more densely populated than any other portion of the Western Hemisphere. There are 378 persons to the square mile in Porto Rico, ten times the average for continental United States. Moreover, Porto Rico's people are poor, so poor that the sufferings of Florida's victims can scarcely compare to the effect of the disaster in our island territory. Even in normal times it is estimated that there are five unemployed men for every job and that 99 per cent of the children cannot afford to have milk after their nursing days. The wealth of the island has passed largely into the hands of absentee American owners. For those who want to relieve human suffering and at the same time help the United States to play a new role in Porto Rico the suggestion will be sufficient that the address of the American Red Cross is 598 Madison Avenue, New York.

NO DISTRUST OF DEMOCRACY corrodes the minds of the happy citizens of Arkansas. On the contrary, Arkansawyers are so sure of the beneficence of majority rule that they are about to extend it from politics to science. While other communities are trying to judge the theory of evolution by investigation and reason, the citizens of Arkansas, taking a short snappy way to truth, will settle the theory of Darwin on Election Day by popular vote. At that time a proposition will be submitted to the voters to forbid the teaching of evolution in any State-supported educational institution. A bill for that purpose was brought before the Legislature in 1927, but the latter body, unlike that of Tennessee, did not pass the measure. Opinion in Arkansas seems to be divided as to the prospects of the proposition for success in a popular referendum. The religious leaders, consisting mainly of Fundamentalist Baptist and Methodist exhorters of the old hell-fire school, are for the law. The University of Arkansas and many business interests are against it, the latter fearing that the measure may lay the State open to hurtful ridicule. We hope enough ridicule will deluge Arkansas before Election Day so that there can be no question that the fears of business are well grounded.

THE AMERICAN LEGION IS BRANDISHING its sword again, this time in Nebraska. Its prospective victim is C. A. Sorensen of Lincoln, Republican candidate for Attorney General, and a leader in the campaign to abolish compulsory military training at the State university. Branding Sorensen as a pacifist, the Legion's committee on military affairs accused him of making unworthy claims for exemption from military service during the World War. Sorensen demanded the right to reply to the charges before the Legion's State convention but the demand was refused. Although he did not evade the draft during the war he was a passenger on Henry Ford's peace ship and a consistent opponent of war hysteria. Since then he has been an ardent Norris liberal, an opponent of the power interests, and manager of the Norris campaign for the Presidential nomination. For all these things the reactionaries of the State and the American Legion hate him, especially since he won the fight in the Republican primaries against a campaign of bitter denunciation. His victory in November will be a rebuke to the meddlesome leaders of the Nebraska American Legion and an encouragement in the campaign against compulsory militarism at the University of Nebraska.

WILL THE RHINELAND be evacuated by Christmas? Most Americans have forgotten that French troops still occupy Coblenz and Mainz, but the Germans, naturally, have not. Aristide Briand's Geneva speech gave the impression that even ten years after the Armistice France had no intention of giving up her hold on Germany's throat; but, having roared for the jingoes, he is ready to do a little negotiating on common-sense grounds. It is, it appears, just a matter of bargaining. France is ready to evacuate if she can exact a high enough price in return. And France and Germany, with the interested cooperation of the British, have been engaged in working out a plan which would provide evacuation to satisfy the Germans, lots of cash for the French, and throw the burden on the United States. The cables report that they think they have been successful. France is to evacuate within a few months, leaving only a "Commission of Conciliation" behind to supervise the neutral zones provided for in the Versailles treaty; she will also agree to a final fixation of the total of Germany's reparations debt, if the Germans can convince her that it will be possible to float some four billion dollars' worth of reparations and "industrial" bonds in the international market—chiefly, of course, in the United States. Of this sum $500,000,000 is to be floated at once—more than enough to enable the French to pay what they owe the United States for war supplies. The French say that they are willing to reduce the number of German annuities paid to parallel the payment of the inter-Allied debts due the United States. Will Washington continue its solemn insistence that reparations and the debts have nothing to do with each other?

FISTS, BOOTS, CLUBS, AND GUNS were used by Pittsburgh police and reactionary officials of the United Mine Workers to smash the convention of insurgent miners which was called on September 9 at the Pittsburgh Labor Lyceum to form a new national union in the coal fields. Altogether it was one of the bloodiest and most disgraceful affairs that has occurred in this country since the Red raids of Mitchell Palmer's days. Left-wing miners, including some Communists, called a convention and notified Pittsburgh's Director of Public Safety ten days in advance of their intention, but no permit for the meeting was forthcoming. Members of the Lewis machine of the United Mine Workers, organizing an opposition group to storm the convention, picketed the Labor Lyceum at the opening session and attacked their Left-wing rivals. Although Pennsylvania police have been noted for their ruthlessness in breaking up mass picketing, this time they were not in evidence until rioting had continued for some time. When they finally arrived they arrested not the original assailants but the men who had been assailed and the leaders of the convention. Of the 138 men arrested 128 were insurgents. Two truckloads of insurgents arriving at the convention after the rioting took place were arrested in a body. Horace B. Davis of Amherst College, who was an eye witness of the affair, writes us: "The police made no serious attempt to prevent trouble at the Labor Lyceum. They allowed people peaceably assembling to be attacked and then arrested them for rioting."

NOT ALL OF PITTSBURGH approved the police tactics. A committee of prominent citizens rounded up by representatives of the American Civil Liberties Union protested vigorously to Director of Safety Clark. The Pittsburgh Press, a Scripps-Howard paper, demanded freedom of assembly for all minorities. Under pressure the authorities yielded, the deportation of radical delegates from the city was halted, and those in jail were released on payment of small fines. But the harm had been done. Those delegates who were not in jail had hurriedly adjourned to a neighboring town where they held a small session, elected officers for a new national union, and started to plan an organizing campaign; there they were again raided by the police, this time by the deputy sheriffs of Allegheny county. They broke up in confusion, and when the police of Pittsburgh finally announced that they would be allowed to meet in that city, the delegates had gone home. The whole incident underscores the fact which was revealed in the steel strike and in recent coal strikes that in Pennsylvania the constitutional guaranties of free speech and free assembly are worthless; city and State police pay no attention to them. Meanwhile the new national miners' union, cradled in violence, faces an almost hopeless task. The industry is overmanned and the miners have been on strike for a year and a half. It will be a miracle if anything permanent or constructive comes out of the Pittsburgh convention.

WANTED—ONE COLLEGE PROFESSOR, Southern, Protestant, and Ph.D. preferred; must be a good mixer, a man of sound business ideals, and a two-fisted fighter who can stamp out the fool notions of the labor agitators that are getting into the heads of our college students. The cotton manufacturers of Georgia did not use these words at their recent conference on industrial relations in Atlanta, but they might just as well have used them. They voted to establish a chair of social engineering at some leading Georgia college for research work in the field of industrial problems. The proposal sounds innocent enough, but these same manufacturers have steadily resisted previous attempts to disclose conditions in Georgia mills and have stoutly defended their eleven-hour day, twelve-hour night, and average weekly wage of less than $12. Now when they imitate the power interests and seek to establish their own professorship, we hope that the colleges of Georgia will be on their guard. The cotton manufacturers have already exerted too much pressure upon Georgia schools. A cotton manufacturer is Governor of the State. "Georgia Tech" boycotted a progressive speaker who had exposed mill conditions, after he was attacked by the Manufacturers' Record. Emory University, which is probably the most progressive school in the State, recently prevented a professor from engaging in an active campaign against the long working day in the mills. No one can prevent Georgia colleges from accepting a subsidy from the mill owners for any purpose which the trustees desire, but the academic world is entitled to know the fact, the name of the subsidized professor, the method of his choice, and the conditions of his tenure. In the interests of academic decency The Nation proposes to publish these facts concerning any choice which the Georgia mill owners make. We believe that a purchased article should bear its price-tag on the outside.

THE MATERIAL SUCCESS of the New York Times under the ownership and management of Adolph S. Ochs continues to be amazing. A broadside gives the latest facts. Its gross income in 1927 was $27,424,829.55 and its weekly payroll $154,246.98. It used up just under 100,000 tons of paper in 1927 and 4,491,593 pounds of ink. No less than 3,319 employees produced the daily which has grown in average circulation since 1896, when Mr. Ochs took hold, from 21,516 to 405,707 in 1928, with a Sunday circulation of 700,925. During the same period its advertising has increased from something more than two millions of agate lines a year to nearly thirty millions. The newspaper receives 100,000 words of news a day by cable, radio, and telegraph, at an annual cost of $500,000. It owns real estate assessed at $5,984,000, and is half owner of a paper mill in Ontario which produces 550 tons of newsprint a day and is capitalized at $370,000,000. No less than 4,700 square miles are covered by the plant's timber-rights and over fifty miles of private railroad are used to haul spruce to the mill. Of the Times's total capital stock of $16,000,000, $1,000,000 common was issued as a bonus in 1896; the rest, all 8 per cent preferred, was issued as dividends in 1920, 1924, and 1927. Few other papers in America, if any, can make as good a showing. As a business success it is colossal. If only its editorial ideals and policies had progressed in the direction of genuine, fearless liberalism, like those of the Manchester Guardian, the Times would today be not only a great newspaper but a great organ of enlightened public opinion.

IF FOREIGN POLICY plays a minute role in the political campaign, it still assumes a growing importance in the American consciousness. The amazing spread of the institute habit is evidence enough. Williamstown's Institute of Politics in its eight years' life has become a forum of international reputation, and the Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia this summer ran it a close second in public interest. But at Lubbock, Texas, earlier in the year a Conference on International Relations and Foreign Policy discussed similar questions, in the Northwest an Institute of International Relations held its sessions on the campus of the University of Washington, while Chicago had its Norman Wait Harris Memorial Foundation Institute for the Study of International Relations, and Iowa's Sixth Commonwealth Conference gave a large share of its attention to foreign affairs. Discussions at all these institutes, we hear, were keen and informed; and the attendants were largely men and women whose time is not lightly sacrificed to such meetings. The radiating influence of the Foreign Policy Association and its luncheon-debates, now held regularly in more than a dozen cities, may make itself felt on a larger scale in these institutes. They have a tendency, still, to play stupidly safe; although Williamstown listened to a German Nationalist this summer, which marked a pretty complete recovery from the world-war psychosis. All these institutes seem to fear looking upon Asia through nationalist Asian eyes, and not one of them, so far as we are aware, has yet been able to stand the shock of a real Russian Bolshevik.

THE LATE WILLIAM MILLIGAN SLOANE was one of the few American scholars of distinction who contrived to go through the period of the World War without losing his head. A Leipzig Ph.D., and for two years secretary to George Bancroft, American Minister at Berlin, he knew Germany at first hand as a young man, and carried into his work as historian and teacher the high standards of scholarship which as a student he had seen exemplified by Mommsen and Droysen. When the war came on he refused, quietly and with dignity, to surrender to the hysteria which swept the American professoriate, and while feeling no call to join with those who became aggressive champions of Germany, nevertheless retained his sanity in the face of the tumult and the shouting of Allied spokesmen and a subservient Allied press. For this not a few of his colleagues in the historical fraternity affected to regard him with suspicion or contempt, and more than one hostile comment was passed about in circles that did not quite dare to speak out openly. He was already, and again to his credit, somewhat under a cloud with certain of the dry-as-dusts because in his writings, notably in his great "Napoleon Bonaparte: A History," he had had the temerity to give to the fruits of learning an attractive literary form. It is gratifying to remember that in 1920, when the president of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, William Dean Howells, died, the succession was devolved without question upon Professor Sloane, and that much of the success of that organization, of which he had been an honored member from the beginning, was due to his devotion, his winning personality, and his high ideals.

MEXICO MOURNS NOT TWO HEROES, but three: the chieftain Obregon, the flyer Carranza, and the poet Diaz Mirón. Salvador Diaz Mirón as an artist was legitimately placed high in modern Spanish letters; as a man he belonged, with Obregon, to a passing Mexican tradition—the romantic, heroic, unquenchable, and stubborn "bad man" with ready laugh and ready gun. Throughout his lifetime Diaz Mirón, articulately an idealist, quarreled for his ideals. He duelled over women, he duelled over politics. In the "Diaz days" he served more than one prison term for a hasty word or a hasty shot, or for a deliberate and serious rhyme. As a member of the Chamber of Deputies he roared so loudly and flourished his pistol so frequently that even Diaz flattered instead of executing him. At the end of his days he sighed a little, and wondered if after all patriotic ideals were worth the trouble. But he growled as vigorously as ever over the one thing that to him was always worth the trouble, and this was the making of a perfect poem. In careful, rich, and finely polished Spanish he set forth his credo, like himself a Mexican tradition, postulating as of highest value three heroisms: the heroism of thought, the heroism of emotion, and the heroism of expression:

Tres heroismos en conjunción:
El heroismo del pensamiento
El heroismo del sentimiento
Y el heroismo de la expresión.

Should Liberals Vote for Smith?

WE are not deeply stirred by the announcement that the newly formed committee of Progressives who supported Senator La Follette in 1924, headed by Frank P. Walsh, will deliver the La Follette vote to Governor Smith. Progressives are not deliverable in bulk. Moreover, they are as confused by the issues and the personalities of this campaign as are all other thinking persons. Elsewhere we print a letter from Professor Edward Mead Earle, of Columbia University, who declares that intolerance and bigotry are the controlling issues in this campaign, but to others there are far more important questions, notably that of prohibition, and whether Tammany Hall shall be allowed to enter the White House in the person of Governor Smith. We are impressed by the large number of persons who would normally vote for the Governor who are influenced, in New York City at least, by their own personal contact with Tammany Hall and their experience of the kind of government it has given to New York. To others the instability of Mr. Hoover and his contradictory attitude in foreign affairs, are the controlling factor in the situation. The editors of The Nation are frank to admit that it is many years since they have found it as difficult to take a definite position. Upon one point they are agreed: No Progressive or Liberal ought to vote for Herbert Hoover, and no one who voted for Theodore Roosevelt or Woodrow Wilson in 1912 can support Mr. Hoover without doing violence to the convictions which led him to champion either of the 1912 candidates. Both Roosevelt and Wilson in that year, as we must once more remind our readers, declared that the sole issue of the campaign was the overthrowing of the great capitalists who were the masters of America, Roosevelt denouncing both the old parties as being so controlled by capitalists and political bosses as to be of no value to the American people. Mr. Hoover stands in this contest for the old order.

We have lost confidence in Mr. Hoover's intellectual integrity. He declares that he stands squarely on Mr. Coolidge's record, which he lauds to the sky. Thereby he forfeits every right to be considered a progressive, for, during the Coolidge Administration of which he has been a part, the powers denounced by Wilson and Roosevelt have gone further toward mastering the government, notably the several commissions created to defend the interests of the people against the raids of business privilege, than ever before. The highest claim put forth for Mr. Hoover is that he is a good business man, and an able executive. The hour does not call for a man of that type. The country needs a leader with soul and vision, one less interested in increasing the average income of the American and in the efficiency of business than in putting back into our national life some of that social and national and international idealism which has departed from it since Mr. Wilson put the country into war. Mr. Hoover's Newark speech, preaching a provincial tariff system, "the gospel of American progress," and "the ideal of distributed contentment" is the depressing product of an engineer turned party politician. As for his attitude on prohibition, that is mere fustian. He has been part of two administrations which made no really honest effort to enforce the Volstead Law.

As for Governor Smith, he is the most outspoken old-party candidate since 1912. He has stood by his guns as a Wet. His is an engaging and winning personality; he is an admirable administrator, and we should rather have him make over the Supreme Court, as the next President must, than Herbert Hoover. He has given, in office and in his acceptance speech, notable evidences of a trend to progressiveness. Furthermore, the bigoted and snobbish attacks upon him have, as Mr. Earle points out, made him a sort of symbol of tolerance in American life—racial, religious, and social tolerance, accepting into the American family the city-dwellers who have come to us within the last century. But his program everywhere stops short of firing the blood of a true progressive. He does not go the whole distance on water power; he does not use the words "government operation," which are the crux of the problem; he does not say that he will take corrupt big business by the throat as Wilson promised to do. The millionaires who are flocking to him ostensibly because he is an honest Wet would not do so did they not feel sure that he is satisfactorily safe and sane. He is still the Tammany sachem who glories in that office and believes in that accursed institution against which stand charged a century of corruption, misgovernment, and uncalled-for human misery in the city of New York, although he can rightfully claim that he has kept Tammany corruption out of his State Administration. He does not promise to disarm the country, though he has most admirably pledged himself to abstain from intervention in Mexico. Most important of all, he cannot make over the Democratic Party if he is elected, for that party is an even more hopeless conglomerate of absolutely diverse and discordant elements than it was in the days of Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson, neither of whom could wholly dominate it. Governor Smith, if elected, will give to the party temporarily a new life when it ought to die and give way to a genuinely progressive one. It has in this campaign thrown over the Wilson European program and abandoned its historic position on the tariff. There is little in its program and professions to differentiate it in any respect from the Republican Party. To vote for Smith is to choose the better of the two candidates, but the candidate of a party which seems hopeless. It is precisely because the American people allow themselves quadrennially to be put in this position that we make no more headway toward an honest party, toward a realignment with a clear division between liberalism and conservatism, between the privileged and the non-privileged.

There remains the Socialist Party. For its candidate, whom we are proud to list as one of our contributing editors, we have the highest regard. In personality and platform he comes closest to the principles for which The Nation stands. We are sorry for him that the menace of Hooverism will weigh so heavily with progressives that many thousands who admire Norman Thomas, and would like to make him the medium of their protest against the two old and rotten parties, feel today that they must once more support a Democratic candidate. We respect their position, though we can similarly understand those who even though non-Socialists will vote this year for Mr. Thomas, not deterred therefrom by the cry that they will be throwing away their vote.

Eight years ago The Nation urged its readers to cast their votes either for Eugene V. Debs, candidate of the Socialist Party, or for Parley P. Christensen, of the Farmer-Labor Party. To vote for Harding or for Cox in the hope of progress from either, it declared, would be to throw away one's vote. Four years ago it supported Robert M. La Follette for President, believing that he expressed American progressivism and that about him was gathering the nucleus of a new party, founded upon the interests of the city workers and the farmers and definitely opposed to the system which has entrenched Big Business in the capitol at Washington. What we wrote in 1920 and in 1924 seems to us true today, although the immediate prospect for progress is less rosy. The two old-party organizations are hopeless; hope lies in the crystalization of the spirit which Shippstead of the Farmer-Labor Party, Berger of the Socialists, Wheeler and Dill of the Democrats, and La Follette, Norris, and others of the Republican Party have expressed in Washington. The five million citizens who voted for La Follette in 1924 are still here, and some day that new progressive party will arise. The editors of The Nation are agreed that the formation of such a party is still the crying need of American politics; but the question whether the voter can this year best contribute to that end by voting for Norman Thomas or for Al Smith they leave to the individual conscience of each progressive voter.

Gearless Automobiles?

A DISPATCH from London brings the news that the inventor of a gearless car has triumphantly driven one group of press correspondents after another through the heaviest traffic in London and, apparently, has convinced them that his invention is a success. It is represented that he has spent years in achieving his results, and laid out $100,000 of his own funds. It is, of course, not strictly speaking a gearless car that he has produced. The cabled descriptions are too vague to give one a clear idea of the mechanism, but what he has done is to transfer the gear-shifting operation from the driver of the car to the machinery, so that the driver is left free to devote his exclusive attention to the wheel, the brake, and the gas pedal. If this becomes universal, the ordinary driver will never again be worried by shifting gear on a hill; beginners will not mess up traffic by stalling their cars or making the wrong shift, and there will be complete automatic flexibility of action. If this really works out, it is obvious that the inventor will not only recover his $100,000, but should reap an enormous reward for his patience and ingenuity.

This is, of course, not the first time that the announcement has been made that gear-shifting had been done away with. Many of our readers will doubtless recall the Owen magnetic car which purported to do the gear-shifting by electricity controlled by buttons on the wheel. It seemed most promising and technically correct, but it was only a short time before the car joined the large number of automobiles of promise which have gone out of existence, among them, curiously enough, some of the earliest and apparently most successful. The Stanley Steamer was another effort not only to avoid the use of gasoline, but to develop a car which should be entirely flexible in traffic and controlled only by the hand of the operator. It was a marvelous automobile for hill climbing and speed, and for years it enjoyed prosperity sufficient to absorb all the product of its factory. But its cars were ugly and not in keeping with public needs, the danger of the pilot light was never overcome, and the huge boiler could be injured entirely too easily. Even at that the car could have been kept alive had there been progressive management at the head of the company.

There will, of course, be two opinions in regard to the new invention. There will be those to groan at the increasing ease with which cars may be speeded—a further incentive to reckless driving. On the other hand, with the driver able to concentrate his attention on the actual direction of the car, and able to keep both hands on the wheel at all times, the new device should make for safety. It is, of course, true that the tremendous development of the motor car has made the shifting of gear far less important than in the early days of this epoch-making invention. Hills are no longer the obstacle that they were, and the flexibility and power of the modern engine is so vastly superior to the models, let us say, of 1912, as to make driving an entirely different affair. With automatic gear control there will be few who will not be able to drive with comfort and ease.

As a matter of fact, the progress of the modern automobile never stops. The four-cylinder succeeds the two, the six the four, and the eight the six. The $2,000 car of today is the equal of the $5,000 car of a few years ago. Many engines are practically fool-proof, and require no attention except to oil and gas. Paradoxically, however, the finest car of all, the Rolls-Royce, continues to require the most careful attention and incessant work if it is to be kept in condition to do its best. The life of tires, too, has been revolutionized; a run of 8,000 miles without a puncture is a not uncommon thing. In the early days, if a car's shoes lasted 2,000 miles it was something to boast about to friends and neighbors; a blowout before 1,000 miles was considered inevitable. We look forward to other radical changes besides the elimination of gear-shifting.

Hollywood Speaks

THREE new mechanical marvels—television, color cinematography, and talking movies—broke into the headlines almost simultaneously. Ultimately each may figure as conspicuously in the every-day life of the American citizen as the radio has come to do; the last already has its place on Broadway. We, however, should have learned before now that invention is not always an unmixed blessing and there are good reasons for doubting that either the moving-picture industry or the general public has cause to be glad that the irrepressible technician has at last succeeded in teaching shadows to talk. Edison let us in for a good deal when he made the movies possible by bringing the perforated film and the "star and camb" sprocket wheel together, but his ingenious contrivance assaulted only one of the five senses; only the imagination can guess what the ear may henceforward be compelled to endure.

The stock if not the earnings of the Warner Brothers corporation (owners of the Vitaphone patents) has gone soaring, but Hollywood sees only trouble ahead for an industry which was doing very nicely indeed before the new invention threatened complications which cannot possibly be solved for a long time to come. If the "movies" should actually be replaced by the "talkies" it would mean, first, that the international market upon whose existence the real prosperity of the industry depends would of necessity be destroyed and, second, that an entirely new technique of production would have to be evolved.

The stars of the screen do not know how to speak and the scenarists do not know how to write dialogue. Nor can the latter difficulty be overcome by the purchase of successful dramas. Plays intended for the stage cannot be photographed as written for the simple reason that the narrative form of the movies with its rapid changes of scene is entirely different from that of the stage where events are revealed in a different order and where everything that is represented to the eye takes place in only two or three places. Adaptation involves a retelling of the story in such a way that, for instance, many things merely reported on the stage are acted out in the cinema, and this means that the stage dialogue is unsuitable for a talking movie. Actually to prepare a play for the talking movies requires a rewriting almost as complete as that involved in the dramatization of a novel and even after the technique for doing so has been perfected the mere time required will be very much greater than is now needed for the preparation of a simple narrative sequence without words.

Nor is it, on the other hand, pleasant to imagine what the public will be called upon to endure. Silence imposed certain definite and very fortunate limitations upon the silliness of cinemetographic dramas. The infantile sentimentality and abysmal vulgarity of those who make them expressed itself only in gestures and they suffered from a blessed inability to suit the word to the action. Occasional sub-titles gave us a hint of what they would have said had they been able, and the memory of this hint is far from reassuring. Moderately literate people shuddered and even the naivest audiences frequently tittered when the intelligence and the taste behind a silent drama was suddenly revealed in the words of a caption. What will the movies be like when every gesture is accompanied by some audible "came the dawn"?

